THE FIRST OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE law was passed in 1915—not in a state, but in the Territory of Alaska. In 1923 Montana and Nevada became the first states to enact such legislation. Only 28 states had such laws in 1934, and even then the restrictions on eligibility were very severe and the amount of aid very limited. During the depression that followed the panic of 1907, and during the depression of 1914-1915, the fate of the able-bodied unemployed was left almost completely in the hands of private charity.

The traditional commitment of the country to laissez-faire capitalism was still very strong in the postwar depression of 1920-22. The federal government took the position that only private industry could solve the problem of unemployment and that the responsibility for relief of the unemployed rested with the local communities.

In September, 1921, President Warren Harding told the Nationwide Conference on Unemployment that "I would have little enthusiasm for any proposed relief which seeks either palliation or tonic from the public treasury. The excess of stimulation from that source is to be reckoned a cause of trouble rather than a source of cure. . . ." Curiously, organized labor sided with the President and the employer class in opposing public relief for the unemployed. The American Federation of Labor had always opposed such relief and continued its opposition to any form of federal unemployment insurance even after the Great Depression of 1929. At its 1930 convention, William Green spoke in ringing 18th century terms: "The American workman, proud of his freedom and his liberty, is not yet willing to make himself a ward of the state and a ward of the government. . . . We cannot deal with such a tragedy in a visionary way."

Even in the following year, with at least 7,000,000 people expected to be unemployed during the winter, the AFL termed federal unemployment insurance as "unsuited to our economic and political requirements here and unsatisfactory to American working men and women." It was not until July, 1932, when 11,000,000 workers were unemployed, that the AFL executive council reluctantly instructed President Green to draft a plan of unemployment insurance.

Social workers, too, opposed the "federal dole." Influenced strongly by Freud, they had moved, during the twenties, from the muckraking role of urging environmental reform to a greater emphasis on the psychological problems of their clients. This new psychological orientation, with its emphasis on the individual solution of problems, blended very well with the older traditions of self-help and social Darwinism. From it evolved a belief that the best way to help unemployed able-bodied workers was not through a federally controlled "dole" program, administered by politicians, but through locally administered private programs over which the social workers could exercise some professional control.

But by the summer of 1931, this re-affirmation of local responsibility was beginning to face strong opposition among social workers appalled by the effects of the Great Depression, and by the spring of 1932, the profession as a whole was united behind the urgent need for federal intervention.

The character of that intervention was set by Franklin Delano Roosevelt while he was Governor of New York, and can be found today in President Johnson's program. In August, 1931, Roosevelt had called an emergency session of the New York legislature, and one month later got a bill passed setting up the Temporary Emergency Relief Administration. TERA sponsored relief programs that were to be administered by local communities: the amounts allocated to each community were to be based both on the community's needs and their effectiveness in drawing upon their own resources. Thus, TERA was, in a sense, a compromise between the older tradition of self-help and the terrifying need for governmental action. It was headed by Harry Hopkins, a professional social worker, who gave the highest priority to work relief, for he was deeply concerned that the recipients of aid not lose the self-esteem which social workers believed would be destroyed by direct aid.

II

The argument over whether or not federal funds should be used to aid the needy had actually ended in the summer of 1932, when President Hoover had reluctantly approved federal loans to finance 80 per cent of all state and local aid to the unemployed (loans which obviously were not going to be repaid). The summer of 1932 was catastrophic for the Republicans: thousands of unemployed veterans had converged on Washington to exert pressure for the passage of a bonus bill, and were driven from the capital by force—an act which outraged the country. Roosevelt, as President, took immediate steps to meet the terrible crisis. In March, 1933, the Civilian Conservation Corps was established to provide work camps for youth; in May, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration was created; in June, public employment offices to be operated by the states were authorized; and in November, Roosevelt issued an executive order setting up the Civilian Works Agency to operate a federal work program. In January, 1935, Roosevelt proposed that Congress set up the Works Progress Administration. But his message to Congress reflected his commitment to the traditional attitude toward the dole: "The lessons of History," he said, "show conclusively that continued dependence upon relief induces a spiritual and moral disintegration fundamentally destructive to the national fiber. To dole out relief in this way is . . . a subtle destroyer of the human spirit."

Roosevelt also asked, at this time, that Congress act in the field of social security by establishing a federal-state partnership to finance old-age assistance, aid to the blind and aid to needy children. In August, the Social Security Act was passed, providing also for a federal tax on employer payrolls to finance unemployment insurance. The passage of this legislation, as well as the establishment of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, formalized the federal government's acceptance of responsibility for social welfare. (The first government job that Lyndon B. Johnson ever held was as a WPA administrator, an experience he obviously has never forgotten, for clear echoes of that experience can be found in his anti-poverty program.)

THE NEW DEAL welfare program changed an essential tenet of American life, but only in a limited way. Responsibility for the economic well-being of individuals was now vested in the government, but the responsibilities were carried out in ways that did no violence to traditional attitudes. Unemployment insurance and social security pensions were not given to all citizens as a matter of right; unemployment insurance was paid only to those who had been working for specified periods of time; payments to the aged were based on a system to which the workers contributed. The amounts paid out varied, too, in relation to the amounts paid in; nor did anyone question the right of the state to refuse unemployment insurance payments to the unemployed worker who refused to accept what was considered a suitable job. States' rights were also carefully preserved, and the emphasis of the program—accepted by the political leaders, the administrative staff and their social-worker allies—was on helping the depression victims adjust to their now somewhat better condition.

The fear shared by reformers and conservatives alike that unemployment relief and unemployment insurance would have the effect of pauperizing the recipient turned out to be groundless. Bakke, in The Unemployed Worker, a study of the depression victims, came to the general conclusion that "Unemployment Insurance has not made paupers." Nevertheless, over and over again, the "no handout" theme was emphasized by the administrative liberals running the programs. Together with the social workers, they adopted a kind of progressive paternalism towards the poor in which Roosevelt represented the kindly father figure.

But the establishment of federal work and relief programs also brought about the development of organized groups of the unemployed who, demanding better treatment or increased relief budgets, frequently met with bitter opposition from the welfare administration and from the police. However, some welfare administrators understood that these groups played an important role in dramatizing the plight of the unemployed.

In 1939 and 1940, another and more rebellious voice was raised—that of the Back of the Yards Movement in Chicago, which brought together a variety of community, religious and labor organizations centered in the stockyards. The BYM was overtly a pressure group, committed to tying local actions into programs of larger social reconstruction. In words that have a clear resonance today, for they are echoed by important segments of the civil rights movement, one of their spokesmen defined the organization's aims:

> We are sick of the social-worker aproach. The battle against slum conditions and slum areas is our prime > objective, as it must be the prime objective of all organizations and individuals who seek to do significant work for social betterment.

>
> Many liberals are disturbed by the Back of the Yards Neighborhood Council because they feel it is a pressure group which fights in a tough vicious way in which no holds are barred. It does fight viciously.
>
> We in Back of the Yards are fighting for our bread and butter, our homes, our families, and for our very lives. . . . These liberals fail to realize that the achievement and constructive use of power can help people better themselves.
>
> The force we rely upon is the power that can only be generated by democratic organizations. The liberals cannot believe this because they are remote from the people and have never seen or felt the vitality of democracy in action.

World War II brought an end to the depression, at least for the white majority, and with it also came a temporary easing of the ideological schizophrenia that the country had suffered during the thirties. The society concentrated its attention on the war efforts, which seemed, as a concomitant, to have brought prosperity to all. In fact, nothing of the sort had happened: the aged, the dependent, and the disabled were only a little better off than they had been during the depression, while the Negroes, the largest minority group, were only in a relatively better position.

At the end of World War II, memories of the depression resulted in the passage of the Full Employment Act of 1946, which again reflected the dual commitment so characteristic of American society. The Act affirmed federal responsibility for providing "conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment, for those willing, able and seeking to work and to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power"; but, simultaneously, it insisted that this responsibility had to be carried out "in a manner calculated to foster and promote free competitive enterprise."

Fortunately, the law faced no real test in the first ten years of its enactment, for employment remained relatively high except for brief recessions in 1949 and 1954. To be sure, some industries revealed a high rate of unemployment, and some groups—particularly Negroes and older workers—were quite clearly at a disadvantage. But only the unions and a few economists raised the issue of unemployment in any forceful terms; the Republican administration and the business community remained optimistic about a future upturn and insistent that the prewar values were still verities. The National Association of Manufacturers bitterly opposed, for example, the United Auto Workers demand for a supplementary unemployment insurance plan that would guarantee income for a longer time. Said the N.A.M.: "Guaranteed wage demands are based on the theory that employment is man's natural state and that when unemployment occurs employers should be held responsible. Actually, people cannot be employed until someone takes positive action which results in the creation of jobs."

III

Beginning in 1956, the unemployment rate rose steadily, from 4.2 per cent to 5.6 per cent. Even worse, inside the overall rate was buried a differential rate for Negroes that was having a sharp effect in the Negro community: Negroes were actually slipping backwards and were relatively worse off than they had been in the immediate postwar period. But now a more aggressive mood prevailed among the Negroes and other minority groups, stimulated in part by the expansion of community and race relations agencies that were often supported by foundation funds.

These agencies were the post-World War II counterparts of the social welfare and reform groups of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. But their focus had shifted to the improvement of inter-group and inter-religious relations, primarily through the establishment of community agencies with broad representation from all segments of the community. Generally, their operations were in the hands of professional staffs, backed by a board whose individual members either had personal or organizational prestige. And although the agencies recognized very quickly that the problems they confronted had to be dealt with in an integrated fashion, involving all aspects of community life, their actual operations involved very few members of the groups on whose behalf they spoke. In this approach they differed sharply from such organizations as the Back of the Yards Movement, with its emphasis on participation in decision-making by as many members of the community as possible.

Inevitably, then, reform became professionalized, and the reformers learned to operate within the context of society, rather than attempting to make radical changes in it. Even more important, the new breed of reformers became the experts to whom society deferred for dealing with community problems —including the one of poverty, which was again being discovered.

THE DISCOVERY WASN'T A sudden one, nor was it complete. In 1958, John Galbraith's The Affluent Society divided the "new poverty" into two main components: case and insular poverty. Case poverty referred to those individuals who suffer from some personal disability that prevents them from joining in the national upward trend, while insular poverty referred to an entire area, such as the Appalachians, where everybody was adversely affected by the economic downgrading that had taken place.

But most people were more heartened by the title of Galbraith's book than dismayed by its contents. And the civil rights movement, which was not yet directly connected with, nor concerned about, poverty absorbed the attention of the government and the reformers. Robert Lampman's work on unequal income distribution failed to draw the notice it deserved, and when, in 1962, Michael Harrington's The Other America was published, it received equally little attention. But a year later, Dwight MacDonald wrote a long review-article about poverty in The New Yorker praising Harrington's book, and the rush was on. Poverty had been rediscovered.

The rediscovery came at a most opportune time for American liberals. Their earlier struggle on behalf of the Negroes had been replaced by the Negroes' struggle on their own behalf—one from which the white liberals were being pointedly excluded. In foreign policy, the cold war consensus had eliminated any real differentiation between the liberal voice and that of the conservative. And the Kennedy administration had brought to Washington a group of people who combined a commitment to Realpolitik with a rosy vision of the liberal future. At the same time, the administration grew increasingly concerned with the problem of poverty, especially as it related to the intensification of the Negro struggle; indeed, the Negro became the personification of the poverty problem.

The assassination of the President cut short the administration's plans in this field, and thus Johnson was able to make the anti-poverty program his own.

Johnson's interests in developing the program were manifold. It was one of the first with which his Administration could be identified as initiator, rather than merely as executor. Such a program, moreover, represented a fairly safe political means of dealing with the race relations crisis, for few could openly defend the poverty level in which so many Negroes still lived. To be anti-poverty was certainly good politics in an election year. And finally, Johnson, unlike any other recent President, had spent his formative years in a poor part of the country and so had some direct personal experience with the traumas created by the depression of the thirties.

JOHNSON'S CHOICE of Sargent Shriver to head up the anti-poverty program was characteristic. Shriver, who was a symbol of the Kennedy style, had directed the Peace Corps operation remarkably well. He was an attractive figure against whom very little personal antagonism had developed anywhere in the country. If he knew nothing of poverty either personally or through academic study, he could be expected to learn very quickly, as indeed he did. And clearly, he was committed, sincerely, to the notion that some changes were in order. As a business leader in Chicago, Shriver had been actively engaged in community activities, and was familiar with the agency and foundation approach to civic problems.

The Peace Corps had attracted people to the Kennedy administration who might not otherwise have been willing to join government: liberal professionals with genuine commitment to limited change, and sincere volunteers, especially young ones, who were becoming involved in social problems but who, for one reason or another, were outside the civil rights movement.

The "war on poverty" attracted the same kinds of people—in some cases, the very same people. And Shriver, who was familiar with these types, liked them, and has proved willing to take some risks on their behalf. Under him, the "war on poverty" did not so much professionalize reform as bring professional reformers into the governmental orbit.

But despite manifestly good intentions, the program was handicapped from the start by the schizophrenia that has always marked the American view of the poor. For political reasons, it had to be defined immediately, in Shriver's words, as "not a hand-out program—or an individual case-work program." Instead, the main emphasis has been put on projects which, again in Shriver's words, are "prudent, practical, focused and patriotic." The program is designed to give some of the poor opportunity to participate more fully in the American way of life, through better education and jobs. The basic assumptions were stated by the President's Council of Economic Advisers in their 1964 report: "Americans want to earn the American standard of living by their own efforts and contributions."

THUS, NO ATTEMPT has been made to initiate new payments, or to increase the amounts of money now paid, to unemployables—the 4,174,728 recipients of Aid to Families with Dependent Children (whose average payment per family is $138 monthly); the 2,160,943 recipients of old-age assistance (average payment $78.88 per month); the 691,000 people who receive general assistance of $31.36 per month; the blind and the totally disabled. All these groups are still considered to be the "undeserving poor," no matter by what euphemism they are called.

So it is the "deserving" poor who are the main targets of the anti-poverty effort. Its major emphases are on youth education and employment, on planned regional and community development and on vocational training and retraining. But the programs are severely limited, almost all of them merely extensions of older programs. And the "war on poverty" was sold to the American public as a "cheap" war—one that would cost taxpayers very little.

As part of the effort to make the campaign seem a natural extension of society, some programs have been placed in the hands of business groups, especially those in the systems-development field. Computer techniques will be applied to the operation of Job Corps camps and training programs; the latest methods of teaching by machine will be used.

But all the programs are handicapped by the need its administrators feel to maintain good "public relations" and to avoid risking Congressional disapproval. Admission to the Job Corps is limited to young people without long histories of arrests for serious offenses; no volunteers from VISTA, the domestic counterpart of the Peace Corps, can be sent to a local community, except to mental hospitals, unless the community leaders request their presence. And the major portion of anti-poverty funds are focused on community-action programs submitted by broadly based community groups. But such great emphasis on local community support places even nonrisk programs in jeopardy. In a good many cities and areas, conflicts among local political interests and among community groups have held back development of even limited programs.

Only one new dimension was added to the "war on poverty": the poor were to be involved, as much as possible, in making decisions about their own future. But paternalism dies hard, and so the involvement of the poor has been limited—at times hardly noticeable—at the political level. When an organization such as Mobilization for Youth in New York encourages a rent strike, powerful forces rush in on the landlord's behalf to attack the organization. And even if Mobilization for Youth, or a similar body, can survive such attacks, inevitably it becomes more cautious.

The poor are encouraged to find new careers, new work opportunities; but when jobs are created in fields hitherto dominated by professional trade or labor organizations, great resistance is encountered. Unions resist those parts of the poverty program which they believe menace their direct interest; business organizations act similarly; and community groups seek to exploit the program for their own selfish purposes. Too often, the latter regard the "war on poverty" as a kind of "fuller employment act" for their own professional staffs, rather than as an opportunity to the poor to make their own decisions, even bad ones.

THE PROGRAM HAS suffered, too, from conflicting political interests at local, state and federal levels. The mayor wants to control the disposition of the funds in his area; the governor, given a veto authority over the program by the act, may seek to exercise it to further his political interests; the local Congressmen are convinced that they, too, have a stake in how the money is spent. Such political problems become especially acute when community groups are also involved, since these groups tend to support the political interests which provide them the best opportunity for carrying out their program. The poor seem lost, very often, in this tangled forest of politics and private and public agencies.

The basic idea of the "war on poverty" suggests that the enemy is impersonal, a matter of "unfortunate" circumstances like "ignorance" or "disease." But, in fact, there are people and institutions who have a vested interest in the continuation of poverty: employers who pay substandard and marginal wages; agricultural groups that refuse to pay living wages or to maintain decent housing for migrant farm workers; racists who understand the connection between maintaining the fiction of white supremacy and the reality of low wages. Yet, since such groups exercise a strong political influence in the society which is being called upon to support the "war," they go unmentioned in the propaganda.

Still another basic difficulty is that the program's success, especially for the youth, depends upon the creation of enough jobs to employ those who have gone through the training courses. If there aren't enough jobs, then the aspirations of the poor will have been raised without any opportunity for them to be satisfied.

But with all its limitations, this new effort to diminish the number of Americans living in poverty may help at least some people; and from it may flow consequences altogether unexpected by the Congress which approved it. Perhaps stimulated by the program, the poor will organize on their own behalf. If that happens, the country may yet be forced to adopt the kind of pre-Puritan ideas expressed about the poor by our Leveller ancestors in England, who in 1648 petitioned "that the too long continued shame of this nation, viz. permission of any to suffer such poverty as to beg their bread, may be effectually remedied: and to that purpose that the poor be enabled to choose their trustees to discover all stocks, houses, lands, etc., which of right belong to them and their use that they may speedily receive the benefit thereof: and that some good improvement may be made of waste grounds for their use: and that according to the promise of this House in your first remonstrance care be taken forthwith to advance the native commodities of this nation, that the poor may have better wages for their labor: and that manufactures may be improved for the best advantage of our own mariners and the whole nation."

TIME TO KILL
Automation, Leisure and Jobs
ERIC LARRABEE

Former associate editor of Harper's and managing editor of American Heritage and Horizon, Mr. Larrabee is the author of The Self-Conscious Society and editor (with Rolf Meyersohn) of Mass Leisure.

THE PARABLE OF AUTOMATION and leisure is that of the sorcerer's apprentice. Half-educated man, lured by the prospect of relief from toil, mechanizes and eliminates his work. The chores get done, idleness is achieved, but the would-be wizard finds that he is drawn into a nightmare where the machines will not stop and his fate is to be their victim.

Man of his nature is a tool-using animal, but a machine—as Lewis Mumford was pointing out thirty years ago, in Technics and Civilization—is something different from a tool. It is a tool which can function independently of its operator's skill or expended energy. The difference, Mumford wrote, "lies primarily in the degree of automatism. . . ." Mechanization implies automation, and all self-controlling mechanisms are to some extent uncanny. The dancing brooms and mops of the sorcerer's workshop are only the extreme case; all machines hold possibilities for awe and terror.

Mumford's argument, in his pioneering book, was that humanity had to mechanize itself before it was ready for the machine. People had to be willing to constrict their lives, to adapt themselves to regularity and repetitiveness, before the machine would unloose its power on their behalf. For Mumford the turning point was the introduction of the mechanical clock into Western Europe about the 13th century, since the clock is the type case of automatized precision and order, and since no other machine so permeates and controls our daily lives. The history of mechanization, as Mumford, Siegfried Giedion, and others have told it, is one in which man increasingly makes himself the machine's servant, and fears his master.

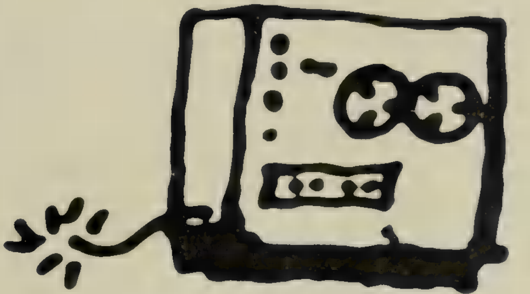
Automation is the currently fashionable object of that recurrent fear. In the past fifteen years, with the application of electronic computers to commercial and industrial tasks, true automation—or what some writers, following Donald N. Michael, prefer to call cybernation—has become a reality. Vast domains of hitherto human handicraft in farm, factory, office and even executive suite can now be invaded and occupied by machines. While the depth and meaning of this invasion are still in dispute, the fears which it arouses are many and natural, most of them deriving from a fundamental fear of being dehumanized: being deprived of identity, deprived of function, deprived of meaning—that is, the fears of bureaucracy, of unemployment, and of empty leisure.

The fear of losing identity is the most individual and immediate. One is vividly made aware of becoming a punched card and a number by one's inability to communicate with institutions except through a screen of coded responses, often inappropriate and always impersonal. Though every number is in fact unique, the sense of being treated as a number is one of being reduced to a common denominator. A mechanized economy, on the face of it, seems to produce nothing but interchangeable objects and demand nothing but interchangeable men and women to operate it. The characteristic posture of youthful revolt, in an incipient age of automation, is understandably one of revulsion and flight from the prospect of stereotyped lives: identical jobs, identical cars and consumer goods, identical houses, and virtually identical spouses and children—like a row of little boxes, in the words of the modern folk song, all made out of ticky-tacky and looking just the same.

THE FEAR OF UNEMPLOYMENT is the most general and traditional. It is general in that a threat of vanishing jobs produces the only organized response to automation, that of organized labor, whether in defiant resistance to all change or in grudging accommodation to the inevitable. It is traditional in that the arrival of automatic machinery in the textile industries of Germany, Holland, and England caused riots and brought on prohibitory edicts as early as the 17th century, and eventually reached a symbolic climax in Yorkshire with the Luddite riots of 1812, which have given their name to an attitude of hatred for machines and the desire to smash them. So deeply does this history permeate the world of learning that C. P. Snow, in his Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution, was constrained to describe all humanistic intellectuals as "natural Luddites."

The fear of leisure participates in these other fears, but it is neither so impingent nor specific. It is, by comparison, a fear one feels on behalf of others. Leisure is a recent arrival on the agenda of officially defined "problems"; as long as there was not enough of it to go round, it could be regarded as an undoubted good, as indeed the rare but indispensable ingredient of art and high culture. Leisure in this context is not merely inactivity or time free from labor, like the unoccupied but unusable time of the prisoner or the peon sleeping in the sun. It is disposable time, time paid for by work, whether your own or someone else's. Leisure is the luxury and the burden of conscious choice; it compels a statement of what you would do if left to your own devices—a definition, for yourself and others, of who and what you are. The machine has democratized this type of leisure, making gifts of it to many who never before possessed it, until one can now legitimately speak of Mass Leisure, an unprecedented phenomenon in which enormous numbers of people have not only free time but the resources to do with it what they will.

The fear of leisure is at base the fear of boredom, of what the medieval monks called acedia or what Robert M. MacIver has called "the great emptiness," the restlessness that comes upon us when we have time and nothing to do with it, or when we look inward and find nothing there. Modern experiments in sensory deprivation (in which the subject spends as much time as he can tolerate at rest in a sightless, soundless cubicle) have emphasized the obvious: that if you force a man to do literally nothing he will eventually go mad. Deprived of variety, the mind begins to oscillate and empty itself until a new message, whether in brainwashing or a mystical conversion, comes to it radiant with ineffable truth. Multiply individual boredom by the millions and you have all the unattractive attributes of mass culture: the worst of the mass media and the ever present possibility of mass hysteria. "When men and women find nothing within themselves but emptiness," in the words of the Report of the Commission on the Humanities last year, "they turn to trivial and narcotic amusements, and the society of which they are a part becomes socially delinquent and politically unstable."



When leisure was limited to a minority class the burden of it could be borne, so to speak, vicariously. What Veblen called conspicuous consumption by that minority had to be conspicuous in order to allow the majority to watch, to derive that paradoxical pleasure the employed multitudes have always seemed to get from the spectacle of the idle rich being ostentatiously unemployed. Envy is not eliminated, to be sure, so that people at any given level of social stratification—given the chance—tend to adopt the leisure styles of the strata immediately above them, with the regrettable consequence that the 20th century middle class exhausts itself (and strains the available facilities) trying to behave like the landed aristocracy of the 19th. Also, it is a question whether vacations for recreation (which is to say, recovery from work) can properly be defined as leisure at all, and the frantic exhaustion which characterizes them is a telling weapon in the debating armory of those to whom mass leisure is a contradiction in terms.

Old-fashioned optimism about the indolent paradise which automation will bring, as you might expect, is more likely to flourish today in the Soviet Union than in the United States. Mihajlo Mihajlov, a Yugoslav teacher of literature who published in the Belgrade monthly Delo an account of his visit to Moscow during the summer of 1964 (reprinted in translation in The New Leader), tells of how surprised he was to find even a Westernized intellectual like Ilya Ehrenburg completely doctrinaire and inflexible about the coming future in which machines will liberate mankind from work and "people will read a lot, listen to music, conduct intelligent conversations. . . ." The American experience with a declining work week (from sixty-six hours in the mid-19th century down nearly to forty by the mid-20th) has already been extensive enough to induce profound doubts and, where an even shorter work week has been tried for any length of time—in Akron, Ohio, for example, as described for THE NATION by Harvey Swados in 1958—the most notable result is moonlighting, an increase in the number of men who hold two jobs at once. Perhaps the only reasonable balance between naïve hope and premature despair is the point so clearly and forehandedly made by the Canadians E. W. Leaver and J. J. Brown in their Fortune article "Machines Without Men" in 1946, one of the earliest announcements of automation's imminent arrival. "The new machines," they wrote, "will force the issue, force society to find better use for men than to make them the mechanical operators of machines."

BUT WHAT ARE THE alternatives? The potentiality of leisure for self-cultivation is one that, historically, no more than a minority has been allowed to exploit. Though no evidence exists that this limitation is ordained by natural law, since lifting it has not been tried, writers of an elitist persuasion have traditionally maintained that it was—that culture of necessity had to be supported by a few, and those happy few supported by the rest. "On inequality," as Clive Bell bluntly put it in his little book Civilization (1928), "all civilizations have stood." Now that such outright snobbery is no longer respectable this view is less often heard, but similar reservations about mass leisure are entertained by those to whom true leisure seems unattainable in a society organized around work, as ours still is. Leisure in a civilized sense is a form of inner equilibrium and grace which cannot simply be ordered up as part of a three-week holiday package. As long as people define themselves in terms of their work, in work will their deepest satisfactions lie; and the image of unlimited leisure will be inseparable from a threat of self-deprivation and loss. "What we require," as Michael Harrington has said, "and this is particularly difficult for English-speaking countries, is an end to the Protestant Ethic that a man establishes his worth in the eyes of his neighbor and his God, and works out his eternal salvation, by doing drudgery and engaging in saving."

It is no accident, if the phrase may be used, that Michael Harrington is the author of an influential book on contemporary American poverty and that he spoke these words (over the Chicago radio station WFMT) as a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Triple Revolution, a private group which is trying to generate public concern over automation (along with civil rights and thermonuclear war) as part of an interlocked crisis for our times. Members of the committee vary in the emphasis they put on one aspect or another, but in outline they hold that automation is coming on a great deal faster than any preparations being made to meet it, and that a major social disaster is implicit in the efforts of the dispossessed minorities, especially the Negroes, to move upward into those very jobs which automation will destroy just before they get there. The economist Robert Theobald, one of the committee members, took the extreme position on the same radio program that within the present decade "most of the new factories, the new public works, will employ machines rather than men and that it will be absolutely impossible to give everybody a job."

THE CONSEQUENCES WOULD be so far-reaching, if this conclusion were accepted as a base for public policy, that the conclusion itself is naturally being challenged. Charles E. Silberman, in a Fortune magazine series on "Technology and the Labor Market," has said of the Ad Hoc Committee's predictions that "nothing of the sort is happening," that no fully automated process for any major product exists anywhere in the United States, and that employment of manufacturing production workers has actually increased by one million in the past three and a half years. At a national conference on automation in March, 1965, sponsored by the American Bankers Association, the popular viewpoint seemed to be that no one really knew how many jobs had been destroyed by automation, since those industries which had automated the most had also been expanding the most in employment. Yet Charles Silberman himself willingly agrees with his adversaries about the long-term trend. "Sooner or later," he writes, "of course, we will have the technical capability to substitute machines for men in most of the functions men now perform"—a confession which carries weight, coming from this quarter, even if it seems to imply that the future is clearer than the present.

The conclusion Robert Theobald draws from this minimal possibility, and from the economy which secular increases in productivity have already brought about, is that we must immediately start reconciling ourselves to the inevitability of paying people merely to exist. Theobald's latest book, Free Men and Free Markets, ends with a ringing demand for what he calls "an absolute constitutional right to an income." This concept, he says, "would guarantee to every citizen of the United States, and to every person who has resided within the United States for a period of five consecutive years, the right to an income from the federal government sufficient to enable him to live with dignity."

THEOBALD'S PROPOSAL has the qualities of clarity and excess. As Leaver and Brown said of automation, it forces the issue; there could hardly be a more concrete reduction to cases of what it means to substitute a Keynesian doctrine of consumption for the Protestant Ethic. Anyone who wants to argue with Theobald has got to propose some better solution of what to do with economically no-longer-necessary people, or else propound some competitive morality to the mild humanitarianism which has shaped the present, almost worldwide welfare state. One can take the position that humanity is simply not ready yet to stop working, that it has not yet found anything remotely suitable as a substitute. As William Faulkner told an interviewer from the Paris Review in 1956, "One of the saddest things is that the only thing a man can do eight hours a day, day after day, is work. You can't eat eight hours a day nor drink for eight hours a day nor make love for eight hours —all you can do for eight hours is work. Which is the reason why man makes himself and everybody else so miserable and unhappy." But to differ with Theobald one has to be as categorical, if perhaps not so ironic, as Faulkner.

To be sure, when Faulkner spoke of work he spoke as an artist, knowing full well that what he did as an artist for eight hours a day was in fact hard work. In principle, there is no reason why the challenge and satisfaction he derived from the craft of novelist could not be found by the multitudes in similarly uneconomic activities, from the arts as such to the more mundane and less honorific arts of daily living. For the individual's well-being it is the struggle rather than the goal which matters, provided only the goal is defined as admirable by one's own standard and that of one's peers. Theoretically, again, we can conceive of a society superficially not too different from our own in which self-respect could be based on personal achievement of a purely aesthetic or even spiritual kind, but the word "achievement" itself is a booby trap packed explosively tight with traditional Western assumptions about virtue and individuality. A truly Keynesian aesthetic would be built around the ephemeral experience, since this is the only thing we can all consume indefinitely, and it would therefore put as high a value on a dew-tipped blade of grass as on Beethoven's Ninth. There is just not room enough, either physically or psychologically, for everyone to be Beethoven all at once; we would have to be seeking fulfillment in self-expression while denying ourselves permanence, and to say as much is to ask for a reversal of inherited criteria in art as wrenching to individual ego and integrity as the economic idea of becoming a permanently de-pauperized ward of the government.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF denying mankind the one thing it can do eight hours a day are not likely to be manifest immediately, since they are so various and interrelated as to resemble a generalized psychic malnutrition of the body social rather than the onslaught of any single disease. But certainly it requires no tight certainty about cause and effect to observe that industrial democracy needs a number of incentives spread through the population in order to function properly, and that it functions very poorly without them. For one thing, the whole machinery of upgrading deprived social classes, such as the immigrants to America, has called for ambition and discipline on their part which today's deprived, for good and evident reasons, no longer share. Character is hard enough to come by even in the awareness that it generally profits a white, upper-middle-class male to apply himself and behave decently; take away that awareness and a decay of morale sets in, spreading inescapably into education and the formation of coming generations. The sense of hopelessness which pervades the New York Public School system, as Martin Mayer has described it in the New York Times Magazine, is but the mirror image of hopelessness in its pupils' future. "We have just got to accept the fact," a junior high school principal told Mayer, gesturing at an assembly of nine hundred Negro and Puerto Rican students, "that half of these children will never hold a job in their lives."

Their misfortune is to have been born into an overdeveloped society engaged in the headlong pursuit of economic goals it has long since left behind; all of its habits are organized around the struggle for material sufficiency and it doesn't know how to break them. These several hundred children are not useless by any objective measure; they are merely classified as useless by contrast with the energy and sophistication of a world metropolis. In any other surroundings there would be plenty for them to do. Remove them to a South Sea island or Siberia and they would reveal all the motivations and resources which New York City has bred in them but will presently deny them the scope to exercise. They learn as victims what it means to belong to an insufficiently utopian society. The fault is not in Manhattan Island's dynamism but in the failure of its aspirations to keep up with its capabilities, so that surplus human energies are left unengaged—surplus, that is, in the sense of being the most convenient to disregard. In an unequal race for a previously awarded prize most of the contestants are superfluous, and the vulnerable minorities—in pain, in public disgrace, and mainly in ignorance—have but the honor of being first to make the discovery.

For it is absurd to suppose, given the amount of ugliness and suffering the world still affords, that we have run out of work; what we have run out of is a set of organized connections between purposes crying out to be achieved and people crying out for purpose. Utopianism is one of the names for a connection between aims and efforts. It has to be a serious fantasy in that means must exist for pursuing it, but it must nonetheless remain fantastic to the extent of picturing a future worth extravagant risks to win. Automation is not the villain of this parable but only the occasion for it; there is so far no disequilibrium caused by increased productivity which could not be restored to balance by raising social goals. Automation forces the issue, as Leaver and Brown might have said, by compelling a given society to decide what its goals are going to be. It is a weapon put in man's hand like the dagger of the Gurkha: once drawn, it must be used.

IF A REVERSAL of the Protestant Ethic seems too much to ask, or an America given over to culture and contemplation is unrecognizable, then the reader should at least remember that utopianism is a national habit of long standing, and that the nation was in part created by men who expected sound institutions to nourish prosperity, and prosperity in turn to nourish art. "I must study politics and war," wrote one of them, "that my sons may have liberty to study mathematics and philosophy. My sons ought to study mathematics and philosophy, geography, natural history and naval architecture, navigation, commerce, and agriculture, in order to give their children a right to study painting, poetry, music, architecture. . . ." The prophecy was John Adams's, and the last portion of it has yet to be realized.

The amount of fact modestly offered as opinion by THE NATION goes a fair way toward counterbalancing the quantities of opinion disguised as fact in the rest of the public press. Without the valiant efforts of THE NATION, I don't know how we would go about trying to assess just what is fact. I hope that the profound respect in which it is held by some part of the public will sustain THE NATION for many years to come as it has for so many years gone by —Ben Shahn

Hearty congratulations to THE NATION on its hundredth birthday. For over one-half of this period I have read it sporadically, being at times made ecstatic, at times irritated by its authors' views, but never bored.

May it always remain in the thick of controversy. —Henry Cowell

ALFRED KAZIN

THE LITERARY MIND

A noted American literary figure, Mr. Kazin has taught at many universities, here and abroad, and is now Professor of English, State University of New York (Stony Brook). His latest book, Starting Out in the Thirties, is about to be published.

THE NATION was founded by an Irish-born Englishman in order to strengthen the influence in his adopted country of what E. L. Godkin called "the educated, moral and religious portion of the community." Godkin firmly believed in the political promise of the country; this had brought him over at twenty-five; but he doubted its capacity for cultural and moral development without the help of such intellectuals as himself and those he was able to enlist for THE NATION. He felt that a review of the English type was needed to help create "an educated class amongst us, to be the guardians of the traditions and feelings and aspirations of high culture." An "atmosphere of thought and study" was "a kind of barrier against the growing materialism of the time, the growing tendency to estimate the value of everything in dollars and cents." He felt that the absence of this "educated class, and the apparent failure of the universities to hold out even any promise of it, and of society to approve or call for it, furnish to most cultivated Americans a standing theme for lamentation." In 1867, making "A Plea For Culture," he calculated that there were only thirty-seven thousand people employed in the publishing and manufacturing of books in this country and found his theme in this insignificance of the book industry: "That the people of our country shall acquire knowledge easily is of paramount importance. Compared with the question of education all other questions of our time sink into insignificance." He pleaded with the politicians in Washington to advance "the interests of authors and readers . . . the class who keep civilization alive and make progress . . . possible." "The movement of the world towards purer manners and nobler laws; toward larger liberty, deeper insight; its growth in faith and hope, and in moral and material power, is due to the labors of a comparatively small number of thinkers."

Godkin was of course interested more urgently in reform and political-economic questions than in belles-lettres; he condescended to the novel in this country, supposing that all the available plots were based on country houses, and had been used up by the English. But he was himself a literary man in the style of nineteenth-century editors, he had close friends among the leading writers, and he was much admired by literary men and able to enlist their collaboration with THE NATION; his belief in the moral leadership to be exercised by men of letters certainly corresponded with theirs. Charles Eliot Norton and James Russell Lowell thought THE NATION simply "the best periodical in the world." Lowell even thought "the paper sometimes too good for the world." "What a sanitary element in our affairs THE NATION is," rejoiced George William Curtis.

The new "realistic" writers were coming up just as THE NATION was being founded; Henry Adams, William Dean Howells, Henry James and Mark Twain were the natural spokesmen in imaginative literature, especially in the significant new form of the novel, for the "educated class" whose reform politics, dislike of the overbearing new rich, and fear of the embittered South's violence Godkin expressed in The Nation. As compared with Godkin and many other liberal intellectuals, mugwumps and genteel idealists making their protest as they bobbed up and down on the new wave of power, the important thing about Adams, James, Howells and Mark Twain is of course their commitment to literature, their sense of themselves as literary professionals. The last three were devoted to the novel; even Adams wrote two. There had been no school of modern novelists in this country until James and Howells met through their common interest in realistic fiction. But these writers were in the orbit of Godkin's Nation because they all had a marked incapacity for religious belief and made a fetish of "culture," on models English, French and Italian. "Civilization," Anglo-American, had replaced both religion and nature; American Victorians definitely lacked the spiritual tension that can make a sentence by Thoreau, Emerson and Whitman so cutting in its spiritual edge.

WHAT NO ONE ever says about all these charming and gifted figures is how much they liked and approved of themselves as a group. Unlike so many twentieth-century writers, for whom imaginative expression is a making up for life, many of the leading literary presences of the time thought of each other as the best company of the time. Charles Eliot Norton once wrote to his friend Leslie Stephen in England: "I wonder whether you would agree with me that the set of men of letters, and their kindred, whom we have known, is a good deal the best that the world has seen . . . the pleasantest to live with, the best-intentioned and the honestest." Introducing Howells at a program of "Authors' Readings" in 1887, Norton said that "a true realist in fiction" must be "one who sees clearly with the vision of imagination. He must be primarily an idealist . . . More than this, the realist is the deepest of moralists, for he teaches his lessons after the manner of life itself. I present to you the moral writer, the idealist, Howells."

They were "beloved authors," cherished by their audience and in close touch with it. Even Henry Adams, paying Scribner's to publish his great History of the United States, was astonished by the number of people who bought the set. No doubt the pleasure these writers found in each other reflects the pride in the old stock that possessed many Americans during the eighties and nineties. But Norton's expressed satisfaction in his "set of men of letters, and their kindred," reflects faith in "letters" at a time of ever-growing technical specialization and a marked relief at the vast number of disturbing and unsettling questions about human experience that he and his friends were able to evade. Norton strongly urged a "holocaust" of his friend Ruskin's letters, when they betrayed his disordered sexual emotions; Adams burned his diaries after his wife's suicide, could make no reference to his wife in the Education (first privately printed for his friends), and asserted his cult of "woman" by proclaiming the natural superiority of the wives he knew to their husbands. Sex, the Bible makes clear, brought guilt into the world; Adams, James, Howells and Mark Twain were not willing to introduce into their work the conscious pain that was to give such a special cast to the writings of Hardy, Housman, Conrad. The moral order that American writers represented to themselves could not be allowed to suffer disorder; these writers had to think well of their own moral ideas, for they could no longer think well of society, "their" society.

Representatives of the genteel tradition had a certain responsibility to the moral office expected of themselves by themselves, their friends, and much of the country. When Mark Twain got up at the Whittier birthday dinner in 1877 to josh the literary idols of New England, he embarrassed his New England friends so deeply that he had to regain his credit with them. New England was already painfully conscious of being historic, the American museum; the native worthies could not admit what the isolated and sardonic Santayana was soon to notice at Harvard—that the cultured in New England were a minority, out of touch with the experience of most people; the mutual approval of the local intelligentsia was a form of escape. Henry Adams had a passion for his friends, a uniquely gifted set; but they alone were what he could approve; everything else about society spelled catastrophe, to which he felt chained by his instinct for historical analysis—the end of his world was clearly marked on his graphs. He had no hope. Howells became a Socialist and took off for New York; James settled in England, where no one would get mad at him for writing sardonic portraits of desiccated New England reformers, like those he put into The Bostonians; Mark Twain was, with increasing fury at the meaninglessness of existence, mounting up to his final denunciations of the "damned human race." But while the sense of privilege remained with them, they knew that they were not helping to direct the thinking of the country, much less its social destiny. They merely amused each other.

YET WRITERS LIKE Mark Twain and Henry Adams were still connected, through their friends and their own natural appetites for the great world, to the main line of power in this country; they were always near the powerful, they knew about power, they fretted about the wrong people—Roosevelts and Morgans—having power. Stephen Crane, who did all his living and writing as if he were specially marked for destruction, knew that whatever he might think about power, he could have no share in it. Crane was the first American writer to base a whole oeuvre on the creed that man and the creation have no moral connection with each other. An advance sentinel of twentieth-century dogmas of absurdity, he saw that from now on the writer's perceptions would be always eccentric to the social order, subjective in content, and personal in their truth. "An artist, I think, is nothing but a powerful memory that can move itself at will through certain experiences sideways, and every artist must be in some things powerless as a dead snake." "When I was the mark for every humorist in the country I went ahead; now, when I am the mark for only 50 per cent of the humorists of the country, I go ahead, for I understand that a man is born into this world with his own pair of eyes, and that he is not at all responsible for his vision—he is merely responsible for his quality of personal honesty. To keep close to this personal honesty is my supreme ambition." To Crane the writer is always a bystander, a reporter by trade, a percipience into the tragic cast of things made more acute by the writer's refusal to commit himself to any value judgment of the universe whatever—that being a form of sentimentality. Where the literary men of Howell's type had found their associates among the bookish men easily made comfortable by the trappings of culture, Crane gravitated to the outcasts on the Bowery, the private soldiers, the victims of war and of every mischance in the streets of New York. He had a special vendetta with the New York Police Department; only the lost were ever right. Even the great love of his life was the madam of a brothel in Florida; for the writer's dispossession from all cultivated and established values, Crane as easily made a symbol of his life as he did of his work.

* * *

Is this where it began in our literary consciousness —the twentieth-century writer's belief that truth is always private and subversive, that the writer always stands apart from the social order even when he is admired by it? Crane, I think, is prophetic of many writers today, more so than the satirists of the twenties and the angry realists of the thirties, because he was our first poète maudit, the first to make a career out of the incongruity between man's imaginative consciousness and the forms of culture and society. The characteristic themes of twentieth-century literature—and never more so than now—revolve around D. H. Lawrence's realization that "man has his excess always on his hands." To a writer like Crane, as to many a writer today, man is always imaginative man, and imagination and society are unrelated. In the age of Godkin the connection between writers and the public had been a common belief in culture, in civility, in "the right values." The writers of the polite tradition had defended these values against the upstarts of plutocracy, for they had believed in these values. Crane does not. Society—along with many other externals—cannot express the necessary range of the human imagination; only the cosmic drama does that, as he showed in his great story of The Open Boat. Human creativity can fulfill itself only in confronting man's fate as a whole—in showing the contrast between man's feebleness and the force of the creation, which can crush him at any time, by accident, without design. Against this overriding sense of his fate (which we have learned to call existentialism), the artist, now man's only hero, puts forth the power of language, the force of his wit— not to avail but to express, to situate, the immediacy of what it means to exist.

MORE AND MORE the historian of twentieth-century literature is compelled to recognize the power over writers' minds of the Romantic faith in the supremacy of "mental events." That is Blake's phrase, and Blake now means as much to us as Freud does. We exist in our minds, and if we hold fast against the dominating circumstances that our minds have built, it is only by finding imaginative recourse in our minds. It is symbolic that the hero of Saul Bellow's Herzog should be an expert analyst of the Romantic consciousness. While liberal historians and critics were busy determining the "influence" of society on writers and the importance of "commitment" to political ideals, the writers were themselves getting more and more absorbed in the drama of human creativity— a plastic stuff, seemingly limitless, fierce in its insistencies. But it must also be said that now that many a prosperous bourgeois is as cynical about the satisfactions of well-being as only poets and other wild men were seventy years ago, the passion to be an "artist," to follow the dictates of "imagination", permits a dream-like confidence in the "absurdity" of everything else. Art has become too easy, a gratification of the self—and the self is terrible in its demands on our taste. Surely it is not just terror of the Bomb and resentment of racial inequality, militarization and widespread poverty that leads so many commonplace and merely fashionable minds to echo the disgust with civilization sounded by Genêt, Beckett and other genuinely idiosyncratic writers. From the inflamed consciousness of one's own creativity, everything else looks absurd. The devaluations proceed too rapidly. The more the raw American ego becomes conscious of having its excess on its hands, the more these marginal irritabilities can be taken for creativity and genuine concern.

Admittedly, many value traditions have broken down and art must minister to our condition. But we are also propelled by the dissatisfaction created by too many easy satisfactions; an uninhibited fantasy like Norman Mailer's An American Dream—and that is just what it is—can be taken as evidence of unlimited "boldness" and of a heroic striving to reach "the outermost limits of the Ego." Still, Mailer is not only fascinated by his exceptionality; he is exceptional. I open the Sunday paper and learn from the author of a new comedy hit on Broadway that he, too, belongs to the theatre of the absurd; "three characteristics of the theatre of the absurd," he informs us, "are language used in other than its literal sense, the fantastic made commonplace, and the focus on man as an isolated, unredeemed individual confronting his own destiny in a pitiless world." I open an academic journal specializing in contemporary literature and am told by a camp-follower that the only real art in America is pop art, that the only literature equal to our age is to be found in the mass media; the writer asks "only that we abandon our game of categories . . . an important first step toward a re-evaluating of all sorts of new writing forms, in which I include even journalistic sociology, picture books, cartoon books, and all the other 'non-books' now so easily disdained, and so infrequently grappled with, by our serious critics." I open a Sunday book supplement and read in an article by the editor of a "girlie" magazine that the United States is "monster-land," and that "the nightmare of sheer survival in a culture of such murderous indifference to the individual being" has made a new generation of writers, "neo-lunacy literary jive-bombers like Joseph Heller, Terry Southern, and Jack Gelber, coldly aggressive about converting art into electric shock to awaken the conscience of a puppet-like, things-oriented, mass-minded enemy. . . . It is America's artists who love her the most because they love beauty, and what its ideal symbolizes, and they feel that the land of their fathers has turned them out with its commercialism, callousness, opportunism, unimaginativeness, stupidity and honesty." One fears, says the editor of this book supplement, that "the curtain is falling on the American Dream to the sound of canned laughter." I go to a Greenwich Village symposium and am told by the Negro playwright LeRoi Jones—who obviously has no subtler way of getting publicity—that the "revolutionary theatre" for which he speaks "hates whites" and "is a theatre of victims."

TO HEAR ALL such commentators, one would suppose that they care about nothing but the "victims," that they are possessed night and day by the fiercest moral indignation about all the injustice and ugliness in our society. And of course many of them are concerned about the issues that do press down on us every day and that are mounting toward violence that we cannot permit. But I believe that behind all the vehemence now become commonplace among writers is a cult of the artist, who has been released from many conventions and many hardships, and who is excited and maddened, as in times past only the greatest writers have been, by the disproportion between the writer's own consciousness and the external world. Just as some minds have been released to bombard the stars and others to expand the possibilities of the nervous system, so literary minds, the gifted and the ungifted alike, are excited by what they have discovered of creative possibility in their own inner space. They must therefore collide with a society which they think of as backward, but which is actually exciting to writers, as it is to us all, because it is the most consciously dramatic age in history. The age has finally turned all our dreams into books. And it does not matter to most of us if the books are bad, for our dreams are now more important to us than our books. We are in love with human possibility, and we will surrender our sense of ourselves to nothing, not even the limitations of art.

I have watched the soul, Ferdinand, give way bit by bit, lose its balance and dissolve in the vast welter of apocalyptic ambitions. It began in 1900. That's the date! From that time onwards the world in general and psychiatry in particular frantically raced to see who could be most perverse, salacious, original; more disgusting, more creative, as they say, than his little next-door neighbor. A first-class scramble. Each strove to see who could immolate himself the soonest to the monster of no heart and no restraint . . . The monster will scrunch us all, Ferdinand, that's how it is, and rightly so . . . What is this monster? A great brute tumbling along wherever it listeth. Its wars and its droolings flood in towards us already from all sides. We shall be swept away on this tide—yes, swept away. The conscious mind was a bore, apparently . . . We shan't be bored any longer! We've begun to give Sodom a chance and from that moment on we've started having "impressions" and "intuition".
—Louis-Ferdinand Céline, Journey to the End of Night

THE NEW APOCALYPSE

EUGENE GOODHEART

Assistant Professor of English at the University of Chicago, Mr. Goodheart is the author of numerous articles and reviews and of a book, The Utopian Vision of D. H. Lawrence. He is now working on a study of the Artist as Hero.

THEY ADVOCATE PASSION over the intellect, exalt the body over the mind, prefer the perverse to the normal, the spontaneous to the habitual, the risks of violence and disaster to the security of our ordinary modes of existence. They can perhaps best be described as apocalyptists, because they exist in a condition of expectation of some event of a demonic or catastrophic kind that will transform their lives. They are often politically radical though the old conception of political struggle (its Marxian version, for instance) is superannuated. ("The long rejected bastard brother of the proletariat," says Jean Malaquais, "of marijuana-soaked hip.") They might concede the importance of social reorganization, but the reorganization would presumably follow the revolution in the body and the consciousness of men. Religious idea and image loom large in this literature of expectation. ("I think there is one single burning pinpoint of the vision in Hip: it's that God is in danger of dying. In my very little knowledge of theology this never really has been expressed before." Mailer, of course, is naïvely echoing Nietzsche.) The apocalyptist appears in the familiar guises of the bohemian, the hipster, the beatnik and the militant homosexual. His artist-heroes are Nietzsche, Whitman, Rilke, Lawrence, Genêt, Henry Miller. (Norman Mailer has been the outstanding American publicist of the Apocalypse.) In a less familiar aspect, the apocalyptist has produced a body of "philosophical" work: the writings of Wilhelm Reich, Herbert Marcuse and Norman O. Brown.

In common with other "movements" there is a certain amount of internecine warfare. The purity of doctrine must be preserved from its deductive variants. Thus Norman O. Brown in Life Against Death dissociates himself from the "primitive" genital psychology of Wilhelm Reich (Reich would have undoubtedly repudiated Brown's "religious mysticism") and "the paradoxically conservative sexuality" of D. H. Lawrence, when he declares for the abolition of repression and the reconstruction of the Dionysian ego. Brown is an extreme left-wing Freudian, who believes that the New Jerusalem is embodied in his interpretation of psychoanalysis. As Brown understands psychoanalysis, the New Jerusalem is no metaphor, for in his heretical interpretation of Freudian thought, psychoanalysis rejoins religion—the mysticism of the body—and thus transcends its original atheism.

The apocalyptists are, of course, hostile to orthodox Freudianism. Psychoanalytic therapy, except in the most reactionary and ignorant view of it, is hardly radical. It is a therapy motivated by a desire to help the patient accommodate himself to "reality"; it presupposes a conservative view of reality as a given, alterable only within narrowly defined limits. And yet it is psychoanalysis that illuminates most vividly the source of apocalyptic thought and feeling. Freud had systematically argued that our civilization as well as our individual lives is a history of the sublimation of sexual energy. By sublimation, a term Freud took from the romantic poet Schiller, he characteristically meant a channeling of sexual activity into nonsexual activity. The part of Freud that was committed to civilization (and it is the major part) valued sublimation, and psychoanalytic therapy is an outcome of that commitment. But it is possible to argue from psychoanalytic premises that the "reality" of therapy is no more than a complex of illusions, a masking of libidinal energies. Norman O. Brown in Life Against Death and Herbert Marcuse before him in Eros and Civilization have recently attempted this transvaluation of psychoanalytic values.

MARCUSE'S BOOK is rooted in German political and social philosophy. A scholar of Hegelian and Marxian thought, he justifies his use of "psychological categories" by asserting that they have become "political categories." Whether Marcuse's book is genuinely concerned with the political is moot, but it is clear that Eros and Civilization is the response of a man who is deeply committed to the idea of political "salvation" (the metaphor is mine) and who is trying to supply the old political categories with the sophisticated psychological content of Freudian thought. Brown, on the other hand, speaks of "the superannuation of the political categories which informed liberal thought and action" and the quasi-mystical atmosphere of his book suggests his greater kinship with current apocalyptic thought and feeling.

In the concluding chapter of his book, Brown addresses himself to the possibility of resurrecting the body and thereby finding a "way out" from the dilemma of a civilization whose progress is based on the attenuation—i.e., the repression—of human energies. Brown admits that he is engaged in utopian thinking; earlier in the book, he speaks of the "mad consequences" in which his argument issues. But he defends his "madness" as the only way "of affirming faith in the possibility of solving problems that seem at the moment insoluble."

Brown advocates the abolition of repression; that is, the recovery of "erotic exuberance" and narcissism that man had possessed in a mythical golden age. This erotic exuberance (Freud calls it "polymorphous perversity") entails the destruction of the mind-body dualism and a new, completely sensualized body in which Eros has moved outside of its "normal" genital zone and reconquered the whole body. Reconquered because polymorphous perversity is paradise regained, infant sexuality recovered on a higher plane. The goal of life, in Rilke's phrase, is to live out all the "unlived lines in the body." The resurrected body that Brown celebrates is the risen body of Augustine, the body electric of Whitman, "the greater life of the body" of Lawrence. Brown's characteristic instances are from the mystical tradition (Jacob Boehme) and visionary poetry (Rilke).

The consequences of the resurrection of the body are social, political and moral. In the New Jerusalem, repressive work is banished. Work would be transformed into play and the aim of bodily activity would be instinct-gratification. The society of abundance that Marx envisaged in the formula "from each according to his ability, to each according to his need" is, of course, a precondition of this vision. This new psychology of consumption and pleasure would destroy our anal-oriented and self-destructive connection to money, permit the conquest of the fear of death ("only those who have unlived lines in their body are afraid of death") and subvert the regime of time (the past and future are real only to the impoverished body and the dissatisfied self).

BROWN'S ANTIPATHY to civilization, its past as well as present, is total. His "dialectical" view (in the Hegelian mode) makes it impossible for him to repudiate the history of civilization, but he sees it as ultimately negating itself. (He quotes approvingly Stephen Dedalus in Ulysses: "History is a nightmare from which I want to awake.") The history of civilization is a history of sublimation, in Brown's "dialectical" version of it, and is its own undoing. For Brown, sublimation is an unequivocal negation, "The dehumanization of man is his alienation from the body."

Brown does not confront the fact that even in his own terms there is an unbridged (perhaps unbridgeable) gap between our actual bodies and the resurrected one he envisages. If we abolish repression, then we may permit our disordered bodies to act in terrible ways, for there is no guarantee that the abolition of repression would mean a new body: it might mean nothing more than the old body acting without restraints. To achieve a body worthy of the freedom Brown conceives for it, something more is required than merely abolishing repression. About that something more, Brown has nothing to tell us.

Moreover, Brown (and other apocalyptists) tend to confuse repression with oppression or suppression. If repression is unconscious, as Freud maintained, then it cannot be "overthrown" by the will. The rational and conscientious psychoanalytic will can mitigate some of its more painful effects, but repression permeates the mind-body too thoroughly and too subtly to be regarded as an ephemeral tyrant. Brown cannot tell us how repression can be overthrown or how the body becomes deserving of a new freedom.

How to bridge the gap between our disordered bodies and the resurrected one is the unsolved (perhaps insoluble) problem of the apocalyptist. Narcotics, liquor, criminal self-abandonment, disease (like tuberculosis), perversion: these are the traditional ways of release. Norman Mailer has called the new body psychopathic, and Jean Genêt, the arch-hipster of Europe, and a greater artist than Mailer, has made the most elaborate chart of the adventures of the rebellious body.

But the kind of demonstration that Genêt makes, for instance, emphasizes rather than solves the problem. For perversion, for all its advantages of intensity and vitality, is a cul-de-sac. To say, as Mailer has said in the notorious essay "The White Negro," that the psychopath "may be indeed the perverted or dangerous frontrunner of a new kind of personality," is to beg the question. The evidence is against the possibility. To pass beyond the psychopath, one must make a detour: to go through it is to come smack against a wall. Perversion, as Freud and Dostoevsky before him taught, is slavery, not freedom. To be driven by a murderous impulse, or by the compulsion to be beaten, may produce an ecstasy of pain and pleasure. But it is not to be confused with the repossession of one's body that one would expect in the resurrection.

DOSTOEVSKY'S Notes from the Underground (written in 1861) is the locus classicus for the connection between perversity and the dream of the resurrected body. Throughout most of the story, the underground man asserts his freedom from the "laws of nature." One law of nature—as conceived by the utilitarians, the scientific psychologists of the 19th century—is that the enlightened man pursues pleasure and avoids pain. The underground man will suffer, and with full consciousness, if only to prove his freedom from the tyranny of psychological law. However, in his relations with his friends and with a prostitute, he shows himself to be sado-masochistic. He moves between gestures of self-abasement and self-humiliation, on the one hand, and gestures of superiority and insult on the other. We soon come to realize what we may have suspected throughout: that the underground man's freedom is illusory, that he is the most driven of men, that his actions proceed from terrible compulsions about which he has some understanding, but about which he can do nothing. Our own realization is confirmed by the underground man himself who at the end acknowledges that he too knows his freedom to be illusory, that in having invidiously distinguished himself from others by asserting his uniqueness he has come full circle to the knowledge that in his perversity he is no different from anyone else. The paradox of the perverse rebel is that he is the most complete victim of the order against which he is revolting, that his revolt is itself a mark of his enslavement and that even knowing this, he has no choice but to continue to revolt.

Jean Genêt knows this, but he doesn't permit it to darken his celebrations. Our Lady of the Flowers (a "novel" which is really a series of fantasies involving a cast of characters that Genêt has invented to satisfy his masturbatory appetites) and A Thief's Journal (a book devoted to the new trinity of Treason, Theft and Homosexuality) are extraordinary efforts at an aesthetic transvaluation of values. Genêt celebrates what I think is a general truth about the erotic apocalyptist: that he is an onanist, seeking in the love object not another, but himself. The apocalyptic hero is the sexually volatile hermaphrodite, the creature capable of becoming man or woman or both. Genêt also affirms the sado-masochistic character of his imagination. "If I continue, he will rise up, become erect, and penetrate me so deeply that I shall be marked with stigmata. I can't bear it any longer. I am turning him into a character, whom I shall be able to torment in my own way. . . ." The ultimate reach of this perversity and suffering is "saintliness," which Genêt defines at one point as loving what one hates. This is of course a rather playful perversion of the religious tradition. Genêt is like a Dostoevsky character who has preempted the moral authority of the novelist.

AS MORAL SPECULATION, apocalyptic "thought" is unconvincingly abstract and disturbingly inhuman. One can sympathize with Philip Rahv's recent complaint that those who should know better have been taken in by "the moral idiocy" of Genêt. Genêt, of course, is a more interesting counterpart to our own hip ethos, and the current interest in Genêt reflects, I would imagine, the fact that the hip ethos has fully penetrated intellectual culture. But it would be wrong to regard this phenomenon merely as a fad or as a symptom of cultural pathology. The apocalyptic vision is an important element in our cultural life, but its strength is in its poetry (and Genêt is, among other things, unquestionably a poet), not in its manipulation of categories.

The poetry of Whitman, Lawrence and Rilke is an effort to extend the boundaries of the ego, not to be confused with the task of psychoanalysis, as Freud understood it, which is to insure the domination of the id by the ego. The visionary poets do not want domination at the expense of energy. They rather seek constantly to extend the ego beyond the area of safety, to create the adventure of the "spirit" in which even the destruction of the self is risked.

Self-dissatisfaction is the condition of the visionary poet's soul, and any resting within an area of safety is experienced as a kind of atrophy or death. The restlessness of the visionary poet is as much a curse as a blessing; half in love with easeful death, he yearns for a surcease of striving. (The negation of history, in Brown's view, is the end of striving and restlessness, which, one might add, would be the end of visionary poetry.) The visionary poet seeks the unattainable condition of divinity. It is no accident that he is apocalyptic, that his characteristic vocabulary is so often religious.

The current versions of the Apocalypse (its beat and hip manifestations) suffer from comparison with the really great instances. In "Song of Myself" Whitman declares:

I am the teacher of athletes,
He that by me spreads a wider breast than my own proves the width of my own
He most honors my style who learns under it to destroy the teacher.

But Whitman's students (e.g., Ginsberg) are weak-chested. They have largely imitated the slackness, the stridency, the shrillness. They are not without gifts, but in the light of the largeness of their claims, they come off as unwitting parodists of the Apocalypse, confusing inspiration with slackness, automatism with spontaneity. Thus Allen Ginsberg in "Howl" imitates the Whitman catalogue, the least interesting and most vulnerable of poetic "devices." To be sure, the monotonous incantation is somewhat relieved by genuinely powerful and witty images: "angelheaded hipster burning for the heavenly connection," "ashcan rantings," "radiant cool eyes hallucinating Arkansas and Blakelight tragedy." But these images never coalesce into significant event. Whitman's best poems, "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking," "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed," "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" are poems of spiritual adventure and discovery: the journey into the "delicious" darkness of death in "Out of the Cradle" and "Lilacs," the epiphany in "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" that the poet is suspended in "the eternal float" of community with other human beings. The egotism of Whitman and Lawrence is offensive and strident when they merely flaunt their vitality against the squalid world. In their best work, the "vitalism" is conditioned by their humanity. They know loss and impotence and guilt (see Lawrence's superb poem "Snake," for instance, or his novel Women in Love). The shout on the rooftops—Ginsberg's characteristic utterance—is the rhetoric of vitalism, not necessarily an expression of vitality.

Of the writers of the Apocalypse, Norman Mailer has perhaps provoked the most attention. Mailer, it seems to me, has betrayed or mistaken the nature of his gifts. He is essentially a naturalistic writer in the tradition of Dreiser and Dos Passos. (Some of his best writing has, significantly, been reportage.) His justly admired short novel The Man Who Studied Yoga is strong on the observation of a semi-bourgeois, semi-bohemian life that Mailer knows so well; it is weak on dream and fantasy. (He need only be compared with Genêt, a genuine fantasist.) When Mailer tries to be a fantasist, he almost always becomes strident. His recent novel, An American Dream, is violent in plot and rhetoric, but it is curiously without visionary power, or without sufficient visionary power to redeem the book from its dross: arbitrary situations, inadequately realized characters, bad prose. It is very hard, if not impossible, to believe that Mailer's hero, Stephen Rojack, has sailed into "the harbors of the moon," that he is in communion with the demons of the universe and that the murder of his wife is authentic, so unreal are the emotional consequences of that murder. Crime without punishment, a Nietzschean transcendence of guilt and responsibility: above the genuine suffering and torment, Mailer is playing with abstractions barely disguised as fantasies. Mailer is a writer of considerable energy and talent, but an energy and talent that belong to the inspiration that produced The Naked and the Dead: the inspiration of realism.

IN MAILER'S RECENT career and in the public and imaginative career of some of the other apocalyptic writers, there is a strong element of buffoonery. It is hard to know when the buffoonery is intended or unconscious. But the comedy is often the most attractive side of beat and hip writing. It is almost as if the writer knows that he is not serious enough for his claims, or he is serious enough to know that the kind of gesture he makes is extravagant and ludicrous unless informed by genius and heroism—so he mocks his own gestures. There is a touching and amusing moment in An American Dream in which we get a glimpse of this kind of honesty—unfortunately only a glimpse, for Mailer prefers the frenetic and ultimately dull contortions of his "existentialist" fantasying.

> "I can't get over the way you look," Deborah [Rojack's wife] exclaimed. "I mean you really look like some poor peddler from the Lower East Side."
>
> "I'm descended from peddlers." [Rojack replies]
>
> "Don't I know it, honey-one," said Deborah.
>
> "All those poor materialistic grabby little people."
>
> "Well, they never hurt anyone particularly." This a reference to her father.

Shortly afterwards, Rojack murders his wife. The peddler is forgotten or denied, and authenticity becomes gratuitous acts of violence.

Immoralism has traditionally been linked to the aesthetic attitude (see, for instance, Genêt's invoking of the standard of elegance), and the value of that link was that art—with its emphasis on order, control and beauty, although a more flexible order than that of social morality—supplied a check to the excesses of the perverse imagination, a way of ordering it. The aesthetic justification may not be necessary for a genius of the order of Whitman and Lawrence (though we know what price they pay for such absolute trust in the power of their daemon), but it is necessary for minor talents. There is in fact an admission of this necessity in the hip ethos currently fashionable in some highbrow circles. Originating in a profound dissatisfaction with the forms of life available in contemporary America, hip has converted that dissatisfaction to a narrow belief in a particular style called swinging, which always verges on affectation: a style that is world-weary, cool and at bottom cynical.

THE APOCALYPTIC VISION is necessarily lonely, aristocratic and tragic. It requires an authentic vision, fidelity in communicating it, a capacity to live in a permanent state of expectation, for no transformation would really satisfy. In its democratic cultus, as a "movement" of adolescents, dope-pushers, shrill solipsists and minor talents, we have a caricature of a valuable element in our cultural life. ■

Down here in the Southwest a short while ago, a good man, J. Frank Dobie, died. In my University of Texas days, Professor Dobie taught me a favorite expression of his: 'He will do to ride the river with.' Well, old Pancho Dobie's expression applies to THE NATION on its centennial anniversary because THE NATION will do to ride the river with. And ride it has—for the right of dissent, for what my father called 'liberty and groceries,' and for the family of man. —Maury Maverick, Jr.

As a frequent reader of THE NATION during the past third of a century and a sometime contributor to its pages during the nineteen thirties, I have been impressed year after year by the unfailing honesty of its editorial leadership. After all these years, THE NATION continues to be, in my opinion, the supreme American journal of social, political, and literary contemporaneousness. The generations to come will probably be as appalled by its iconoclastic proclamations as many generations in the past have been—but likewise be awakened and enriched by its unrelenting campaign against myth and stupidity. —Erskine Caldwell

THE NATION and ITS POETS

ALEXANDER LAING

For many years, Mr. Laing has conducted seminar courses in creative writing, as well as a poets' workshop, at Dartmouth College. His own poems and critical essays have appeared in THE NATION and other magazines. He is the author of fifteen books of poetry and prose fiction.

THE NOISIEST EPISODE in THE NATION's long and concerned involvement with poetic values began as the issue dated February 11, 1925, reached its readers. More than a thousand contestants and their well-wishers were eager to know who had won the fifth annual "NATION's Poetry Prize" of $100. The editors themselves were a bit edgy. For the first time they sought to forestall expected criticism. A column-deep editorial offered the "guarantee that nothing beyond their instinctive preference has operated to decide their choice. This year they chose 'Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana' because it seemed to them the most passionate and interesting poem that came in." Some representative lines:

> Montana, thou art, and I say thou art, as once monks said of God,
> And thought, too: Thou art.
> Thou hast Kansas on thy side;
> Kansas is in the newspapers, talked of by men;
> Idaho thou hast, and far away, Singapore, Alabama, Brazil.
> That bird over this green, under that sun, God, how sweet and graceful it is!

The author, Eli Siegel, aged 22, had been quite unknown. The vigor of THE NATION's influence was demonstrated in an immediate editorial uproar across the country, commenting upon prizes in general and upon the lunacy of this particular award. Much of it assumed the form of raucous parody. Literate columnists—there were some in those days—had a gay time with "Hot Afternoons."

The disturbance reached inward. Maxwell Bodenheim—a poet whose death by shooting in 1954 provided copy for magazines that had done little to keep poets alive—wrote a furious letter. Claiming that THE NATION, in the four years preceding, had printed more of his poems than of anyone else's, he announced that it would never have another chance. His reckoning was not quite right: twelve of his poems had been used in the four-year period, but Ann Hamilton had nosed him out with fourteen. If translations were to be included, both were far outnumbered by Witter Bynner's thirty-one.

Smouldering still from the earlier insult, as he saw it, of a mere honorable mention in the 1923 contest, Bodenheim apparently did not read far enough past the 1925 prize winner itself to observe that he had been sullied again: honorably mentioned a second time. (His rage presently drifted into forgiveness. One of his poems appeared in THE NATION in 1932.)

Ludwig Lewisohn, himself a contributing editor of the magazine, wrote a letter of dissent. This is notable because the award to Siegel helped to dramatize, for a large audience, a transition in the perception of literary values which at this midpoint of the 1920s was already evident, although still arcane. If THE NATION's choice, "Hot Afternoons," is thought of as nothing more than a catalyst, the magazine's willingness to stand up for the unorthodox in poetry was symbolically important. It had not always done so. Siegel published a few more poems in little magazines. Then he vanished for a quarter of a century, until the vastly kind and angry William Carlos Williams was persuaded by a mutual acquaintance to take another look at "Hot Afternoons." Writing in 1951, Williams declared, "Only today do I realize how important that poem is in the history of our development as a cultural entity. . . . I say definitely that that single poem, out of a thousand others . . . secures our place in the cultural world. I make such a statement only after a lifetime of thought and experience, I make it deliberately. . . . On that rock and only on that rock can we in our cultural pattern build."

The declaration from which these lines are taken helped Siegel to a brief renaissance. A number of his poems appeared in good magazines in the early 1950s, and "Hot Afternoons" at last came out in a book in 1957. If Dr. Williams was right (I doubt it), the editors of THE NATION chose, in "Hot Afternoons," something of absolute seminal importance, not merely a first-rate catalyst.

"THE NATION's Poetry Prize" was first announced on Dec. 1, 1920, for bestowal in the ensuing February. It was last awarded in 1927. All of the winners were young—the oldest, Roy Helton, was thirty-five when he divided the original award with James Rorty, four years younger. No previously eminent poet took first place, although Stephen Vincent Benét, who won the 1923 prize in his twenty-fifth year, was already the veteran author of four books, including two successful novels: The Beginning of Wisdom and Young People's Pride. Counting split decisions and deducting repeaters among the honorable mentions, we have a total of thirty-five poets called to special notice during the seven years of competition. Ten of these now seem figures of some importance in the history of American poetry: Benét, Babette Deutsch, Thomas Hornsby Ferril, John Gould Fletcher, Alfred Kreymborg, William Ellery Leonard, Siegel, Genevieve Taggard, Allen Tate and Elinor Wylie. In nearly all of these cases, recognition was a forecast of fine accomplishments ahead. The established poets may have been reluctant to compete, even for what was then a substantial award, but the editors seem to have been in favor of youth.

AN EDITORIAL commenting upon the second contest noted that nearly 2,500 poems had been submitted by nearly 1,000 poets; that there was more rhyming than in the first year; that young women excelled; and that most of the poems were either "compact studies of mental states" or "more extended, realistic comments upon current affairs." Benét's "King David" did not fall into either handy category. It provoked some shocked responses because of the lusty tone in which the poet faithfully retold the facts of the Biblical original:

> Bathsheba bathed on her vine-decked roof.
> (The Lord God is a mighty God.)
> Her body glittered like mail of proof.
> (And the Lord is King above all gods.)
>
> Her body shimmered, tender and white
> As the flesh of lilies in candlelight.
>
> King David forgot to be old or wise.
> He spied on her bathing with sultry eyes.
>
> A breath of spice came into his nose.
> He said, "Her breasts are like two young roes."

One school supervisor retaliated, curiously, by removing the entire back file of THE NATION from the student library. While it is not clear that the Siegel controversy influenced the work of other poets, Benét's prize-winner probably did. Without referring to "King David," a NATION critic perceived, some years after its appearance, a strong resurgence of Biblical themes in contemporary American verse.

During the bestowal of its seven annual prizes the attitude of the magazine toward poetry was being reformed. For a long time its interest had been expressed only in academic criticism of new volumes. One might argue that when creativity itself was in the doldrums, its editors had the good sense to refuse all of the derivative stuff that pretended to be original. Evidence in the back file suggests a more complex condition which raises the old problem of poetry and politics as well as the more recently stressed aesthetic question of the use of poetry. The inspection that follows grows from my own assumption that poetry is the central, the most profound and durable, therefore the most important, activity of the human spirit, rightfully drawing through all perceptions from all circumstances, outer and inner. Every subject is suitable, but each can find for itself only one perfect form, however strict or free. (Go away, Plato. I haven't the room, here, to explain you away.)

THE NATION's steady subject, throughout a century, has been, of course, the nation—in all its turbulent complexity. The publication's journalistic device has been unremittingly political: to encourage the people to use government virtuously in their own crisscross interests. If there had been enough poets of an all-embracing perception of circumstance, THE NATION's business could best have been done entirely in poetry, at a wonderful saving of space. The fact that there were not, the likelihood that there will never be, enough poets of protean ability, should not be inflated into arguments for the thesis that poetry and politics have no connection. In the great hours, poets have always been as political as they felt like being. It is one of the uses of poetry to focus intensities of insight upon problems leading to political choice; but such problems are made less soluble than ever when the offered means is not poetry, but merely false logic residual in a deft jingle:

> Take up the White Man's burden.

Something more to the point was being reached for by the editors who chose Martin Feinstein's "In Memoriam" as one of the joint prize-winners of 1922. Here is the vernacular ballad's ending:

> It took a shrapnel shell,
> Spat from the jaws of hell,
> To bust the color line,
> Till even a fool could tell
> A nigger's a man, and a man's divine.

This raises a miserable question: if the ballad had been written by an able poet—if it had had the skill which was perverted into Kipling's atrocious, unforgettable line—would we have had to argue the same point during most of a second World War? Would THE NATION, at the end of its century, still be engaged in a prose monologue, pitched toward Alabama and Mississippi, which repeats the same lucid arguments it sent in the same direction in 1865? This unanswerable question brings us to the beginnings of THE NATION's involvement with poetic values.

II

In its first issue, the mingling of poetry and politics began with Aubrey de Vere's two strong, conventionally phrased sonnets on "The American Struggle." A few weeks later, in a facile, over-long poem, "The New Exodus," Julia Ward Howe admonished Southerners to learn to do honest work. John Greenleaf Whittier followed with a more discerning plea, "To the Thirty-Ninth Congress," for compassion toward the defeated and for legislation that would make reunion possible:

> . . . Cancel all
> By one brave, generous action; Trust
> Your better instincts, and be just!
>
> Make all men peers before the law,
> Take hands from off the Negro's throat,
> Give black and white an equal vote.
>
> Keep all your forfeit lives and lands,
> But give the common law's redress
> To Labor's utter nakedness.

Should the poet perhaps have addressed himself to the Eighty-Ninth Congress?

There was also a long but curiously effective political poem in Volume 1, entitled, "The Street Commissioners to the Cholera. Invocation." Its anonymous author, impersonating neglectful officials, coaxed the disease to visit New York, where the filth in the streets would give it an ideal environment. The conclusion:

> . . . the dull wheels of the hearses that creep, > Harnessed to nightmares, trouble the sleep
> Of the great city we deck for thy home!
> Cholera, cholera, cholera, come!

The remaining six "poems" in the first volume were conventionally sentimental and derivative. One was signed Marah, pseudonym of the woman who later, as Helen Hunt Jackson, wrote compassionate if still sentimental novels in the interest of justice for the Indians. Her verse generally was signed H.H. THE NATION, in its first four years, printed fourteen unhappy examples of it, which made H.H. its favorite verse writer at outset. None was as dreadful as "Noli Me Tangere," C.B.C.'s contribution to Volume 3, which begins:

> Luscious and sorrowful, bird o' the roses. . . .

If it seems unfair to exhume this lamentable anapest, I do so only in evidence that early political verse in THE NATION stands up much better than the consciously literary examples. Perhaps the latter were chosen by the staff writer of an unsigned review, a few issues farther along, of Dana's Book of Household Poetry. "We . . . have not as yet been able to detect the omission of a single shorter poem of value which we have ever lighted on and admired elsewhere."

James Russell Lowell contributed three poems early in 1866. The first indicates that he had been reading the recently published "Rabbi Ben Ezra." The second was on reconstruction in the South. The third and longest, "Mr. Worsley's Nightmare," assumes itself to be a passage from Aristophanes. Philip Stanhope Worsley, a young English translator of part of the Iliad, had dedicated his work to General R. E. Lee "as the best living representative of its hero." This was too much for the Yankee classicist of "A Fable for Critics":

> FROGS
> Brekekex! Brekekex! Who goes there?
> WORSLEY
> Please, your Frogships, Homer's last translator.

Bacchus and the frogs give Worsley an unsettling time on the bank of the Styx. It turns out that the translator is to be ferried across with a vast crowd of American ghosts. A hearty spook named Smith presents the first three thousand hand-shakers to Hector until the hero cries:

> By Jove! I feel like an old town pump.

But Smith has one more request:

> That's to present my friend, Mister Worsley,
> I made his acquaintance on the boat:
> I rather guess it's likely you know him—
> Author of "Homer," a first class poem.

Hector, to the alarm of Worsley, indeed knows of him:

> My staff has been longing, these three months past,
> To measure the back of that dedicator
> Who likened me to the double traitor,
> False to his country, false to his oath,
> Me, who'd have given my life for both!
> . . .
> You insulted my soul without reason,
> Coupling my name with a broken trust,
> Dabbling my fame in the lees of treason.

Worsley presently "awakes in terror, but gradually composes himself by reading a few pages of his translation of Homer."

This, and others among THE NATION's early examples, suggest that political verse is likeliest to succeed when it is satiric. E. L. Godkin and his associates must, however, had had cumulative misgivings about the aptness, for their purposes, of any sort of verse. In the first year they printed thirty-one varied examples, in the second year eight. The number for the third and fourth years dwindled to five apiece, and in the fifth year to only one. Beginning in 1870 the evident policy was no verse at all. It was broken on a few occasions for Lowell's mortuary pieces and political epigrams. Half a dozen of the latter enlivened the Presidential campaign of 1876:

DEFRAUDING NATURE

Skilled to pull wires, he baffles nature's scope
Who sure intended him to stretch a rope.

These were unsigned, but in the following year Lowell acknowledged four sequential sonnets that began in memoriam, bucolically, and ended with a political thrust. His sprawling comment on "infant industries," written in the last year of his long life and published on May 1, 1890, put an end to "purely original verse" in THE NATION for twenty-four years.

Throughout its first half-century, the magazine maintained toward poetry, as it did toward the less central subjects of high consequence, an attitude closely critical. If it published very little verse, it evaluated a great deal. For its unsigned reviews it soon developed the virtuous practice of focusing a single critical intelligence consistently upon a particular category of writing. From 1877 to 1903, for example, clustered volumes of new poetry were considered in more than fifty contributions by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, the "Dear Preceptor" who salvaged Emily Dickinson. A year later Oscar W. Firkins assumed the task for a similar period. Both, along the way, wrote more extensive reviews of significant single books. They were men of classical education, far more competent in the task of critic than the genial noddy who, in Volume 3, had copied forty-eight lines to show "how narrowly Mr. Niles can escape doing well" with the comment, "It is senseless stuff, we may as well confess, but who is not pleased with it?"

HIGGINSON AND Firkins both knew what it feels like to want to write good poetry. As critics, they were adventurous only to the degree in which the trait occurs among good teachers who try hard to keep their minds pried open. Too much should not be inferred from a narrow sampling, but there is some hint of THE NATION's earlier standards in its successive comments upon two differently revolutionary poets who startled the world of letters at about the time of its own origins: Algernon Charles Swinburne and Walt Whitman. A review of Atalanta in Calydon in the magazine's first volume praised the newcomer generously as having "powers which, if wisely employed in the production of poetry of modern style, would secure him a place among the popular poets," but it chided him for not reflecting, in a drama upon such a theme, the orthodox Greek attitude toward the gods. In the following issue a review of Walt Whitman's Drum-Taps began, "It has been a melancholy task to read this book; and it is a still more melancholy one to write about it. . . . It exhibits the effort of an essentially prosaic mind to lift itself into poetry." The long and acidulous piece concluded: "This democratic, liberty-loving American populace, this stern and war-tried people, is a great civilizer. It is devoted to refinement. If it has sustained a monstrous war . . . it is not to put up with spurious poetry afterwards. To sing aright our battles and our glories it is not enough . . . to be aggressively careless, inelegant, and ignorant. . . ."

In these unsigned reviews, Swinburne was being welcomed by Charles Eliot Norton, and Whitman by Henry James. When Laus Veneris was published, two years later, the unacknowledged critic—Russell Sturgis—wrote a review that was in many respects remarkable: "It is foolish and useless either to abuse or to ignore this book, for what Mr. Swinburne has written is now a part of English literature. . . . Blasphemous these poems are not; for blasphemy consists not in the mere expression, but in the intent of the words. . . . Insincere books are necessarily immoral . . . but may not a work be at once immoral and sincere?"

Swinburne, more outrageous than Whitman to the Victorian proprieties, was given a serious hearing as an objective artist: it could be inferred that the song was not of himself. Moreover, his style shimmered with elaborations upon the admired archaic orthodoxy; it had nothing of Whitman's strong, plain lunge into the vernacular future. It took the Supreme Court almost a century to catch up with one phrase in the Sturgis review: "The immorality of a book is not, however, to be judged by its effects on any chance reader, but only by its influence on the average moral mind."

Swinburne continued to receive fair treatment in THE NATION throughout his lifetime, with an occasional knuckle rap when he probably merited it, but few chances were missed to take a remorseless swing at Whitman. A few months after Henry James's surly review, a famous pamphlet entitled The Good Gray Poet was noticed. "Mr. W. D. O'Connor asks us to make common cause with him," in objecting to Whitman's dismissal from his government job. The editors cheerfully sided with the government. In attempting, a few weeks later, to explain the British attitude toward the self-exiled Victor Hugo, they say he was regarded as "the type of the grotesque and abnormal and vicious, a sort of Walt Whitman." The animosity obtrudes again and again. When Whitman died in 1892, the writing of an obituary was assigned to the usually gentle Higginson. The five or six columns resulting are at points almost frenetic: ". . . a bad influence—we speak from personal observation—on the lives of young men"; "Those who thus claim to be Nature's darlings end as Nature's warnings . . . paralysis, insanity, premature old age are the retribution for 'the drench of the passions' in youth"; "Compare this premature senility of the poet of 'life coarse and rank' with the old age of the chaster poets—with Bryant's eighty-four clean and wholesome years. . . ."

After the critical balance had turned strongly in Whitman's favor, old Henry James, the originator of the long process of rebuke, was given the opportunity to examine his memories of fifty years earlier, when he was a twenty-two-year-old staff member of the new NATION. He did not think to adjust his view of the poet, but instead wrote a maudlin piece about "fairies"—the quotes are his—that presided over the magazine's origins.

III

The issue of March 12, 1914, presented thirteen "Features to be Introduced" under Oswald Garrison Villard's new editorial policy, These included:

> 5. POETRY. Greater attention than heretofore to contemporary verse. "The Nation," which first published many of the works of Lowell, Whittier, and other eminent poets, is peculiarly fitted to encourage and guide modern aspirants for poetic fame.

"A Lay o' the Day," by Jefferson B. Fletcher, was chosen as peculiarly fitting to end the years of poetical famine. Other dismaying efforts were interrupted in midsummer by Stuart P. Sherman's angry polemic, "The White Slave." Then Europe took to its guns. The ensuing attempts to make political use of poetry failed. Poetasters reached into an ordered past for image and form, missing the needed violent immediacy. "The Victory," poor busted statue, was pondered by Marion Couthoy Smith up to a last line revealing her as

> The flaming soul—of France!

There was some awareness of a strange orchestra scraping discords. In 1915 Professor Firkins discussed "The New Manner," pointing out that "oddity, to be respectable, must be necessary. In this point, Mr. Lindsay's verse is inconclusive." Later in the year Firkins amiably faced up to his own problem with, "The New Movement in Poetry, the Self-Exposure of a Reactionary Critic of the Imagistes." He conceded to imagism "its own modest place in a tolerant and balanced commonwealth; its mistake was to unfurl the banner of revolution."

AS THE WAR ended a change was evident. Babette Deutsch, Edna St. Vincent Millay, and Edwin Arlington Robinson made their first contributions in 1918, followed by Edgar Lee Masters. In 1920 THE NATION at last did what was indispensable to realize the aim of the Villard manifesto of 1914: it appointed a specific literary editor, Carl Van Doren. He and his successors, chiefly Mark Van Doren from 1924 to 1928, honored the stronger established poets and took well-calculated risks with many newcomers. Criticism kept pace. "The Waste Land" was promptly explored by Gilbert Seldes, who gave prior attention to T. S. Eliot's prose criticism as "the clue to his poetry. . . . 'The Waste Land' is, in a sense, the inversion and complement of 'Ulysses' . . . each has expressed something of supreme relevance to our present life."

Robinson, between 1918 and 1924, contributed several poems including one of his finest, "Mr. Flood's Party." His Children of the Night had been cordially reviewed in 1897, first of seventeen of his books to be respectfully criticized. Carl Van Doren noted that The Three Taverns, 1920, "unites the fullest courage of innovation with . . . unhurried wisdom. . . . It is not of course by being topical that Mr. Robinson achieves his immense pertinence to the moment"—a hint of the surest way in which verse, beyond aesthetics, can find its most effective political use. Mark Van Doren also suggested this when he said, of The Man Who Died Twice, "the whole will sing where Mr. Robinson intended that it should sing, in the depths of the brain."

The crossrips of politics and poetry tumble persistently in THE NATION's consideration of Ezra Pound, first noticed in 1911: "the few bits of really good comment" in The Spirit of Romance "are too rare to be worth hunting for." When his early cantos were appearing in Poetry and The Dial, the only notices here were of his prose. Gaudier-Brzeska (in 1916) "deserves a better fate than to be maundered about by an unvenerable Imagiste." Pavannes and Divisions, 1918, was shrugged off. Instigations, 1921, was called by Mark Van Doren "a mess, if an agreeable and often erudite mess." The complete response to Pound's Poems 1918-1921 was, "Now witty, now pretty, now dull, now absurd." None of Pound's verse ever came out in THE NATION, but it did publish his articles, in 1927 and 1928, on the witlessness of passport officials and the sins of American libraries and musical foundations.

On June 10, 1931, the full phenomenon of Pound was confronted at last in a long review of A Draft of XXX Cantos in which Allen Tate called him "probably one of two or three living Americans who will be remembered as poets of the first order." Three years later Kenneth Burke deftly dissected The ABC of Reading in which Pound, perhaps unawares, borrows the sentimental Marxist distortion of the word "science" without the comfortless rigors of the accompanying dialectic. The accumulating cantos were noticed from time to time.

A prophetic cartoon of 1936 portrayed the poet "Interrupted in his Daily Devotions" before busts of Mussolini and other idols. In 1939 Louise Bogan epitomized Guide to Kulchur: "He likes to fiddle around." She regretted the lack of "real, as opposed to hysterical, breaking through into new thought." Perhaps the first of many attempts to wish half of the schizoid anomaly away came in John Peale Bishop's reminiscence of 1940: "no man can be a consistent admirer of fascism who holds John Adams in admiration." Then came the treasonable broadcasts and Eliot's defense of his mentor. THE NATION responded to both with Gilbert Highet's long lampoon, "Homage to Ezra Pound." Some passages:

> though ole T.S.E. proclaimed his maestro > and in such prose, my God > constipated but dignified like an elderly cat
>
> . . .
>
> So he took to damning his own country, living in > Rapallo and Rome
> among the black shirted brown bottomed yellow > hearted Heroes

When the question of a condign fate for Pound arose, THE NATION held to a clear principle in defense of poetry. "It is an unwarranted slur on the poet to maintain that he is less responsible for his actions than other men."

Four years later Margaret Marshall printed in her column a letter signed by eighty-four writers condemning the way in which a contributor to the Saturday Review had used the Bollingen award to Pound as a device for discrediting poetic experiment, a protest rejected by that journal. Again the issue was not the behavior of one man who happened to be a poet, but THE NATION's insistence that poetry itself should not be dabbled in the lees of anyone's treason.

In April, 1956, THE NATION appointed its first editor exclusively for poetry: M. L. Rosenthal. For his first critical piece he chose Pound's Section:Rock Drill. Cantos 85-95, referring to all the cantos as "this great experiment . . . which seeks to extend the spirit of poetic art in an enterprise so daringly complex that it risks losing the main chance in a wilderness of multiplicities"—a careful effort to concentrate upon the poetry apart from the politics.

In the following spring an undergraduate poet, David Rattray, hoping to make a good report, visited Pound in the mental hospital. There he found representatives of a ring of neo-fascist disciples that included John Kasper, the renegade segregationist. Rattray's disillusioned piece, "Weekend with Ezra Pound," was secured by Rosenthal for THE NATION, but he took care to imbed in the text Ramon Guthrie's nostalgic tribute, "Ezra Pound in Paris and Elsewhere," which perceived amid inexorable tragedy the remaining debt of so many writers to the poet's early generosities:

> The frowsy slut
> you would have breathed > —forsooth—a soul into > has got > her teeth snagged in your jugular.
>
> . . .
>
> 'So few drink of my fountain' > (although the best did > and came away changed men)

When old friends at last forced the political question to an issue, a NATION editorial, noting that Pound's "anti-Semitism is one of the running sores of modern letters" recommended the release of the "sick and vicious old man—even if he were not the brilliant poet he is." Two years later with "The Pleasures of Pound" Rosenthal concluded upon a note of balance: "Pound represents the best and the worst in our civilization."

IV

After an editorial reorganization in the mid-thirties THE NATION's interest in poetry varied. Forty-six poems appeared in 1933, twelve in 1939. The World War II poets were much abler than those of World War I: W. H. Auden, John Berryman, Robert Penn Warren, William Carlos Williams, and others. Noting in 1945 a "New Genre," F. W. Dupee praised Jean Garrigue, Randall Jarrell, John Frederick Nims, Karl Shapiro, and most of all, the newcomer Robert Lowell. When John Ciardi edited Mid-Century American Poets, 1950, he introduced Lowell's section with a nine-page reprint of Jarrell's NATION review of Lord Weary's Castle.

Interest sagged again. Only sixteen poems were printed in 1955, but with Rosenthal's appointment the number zoomed to the highest level ever: about one hundred a year. The new editor outlined his views in several witty articles. For example, "experimentation in verse is largely a matter of adjustment between personal motivations and available traditions." He ranged widely, seeking distinctive combinations of motivation and tradition, not content merely to see what the mailman would drag in. The five poets whose work he printed most often are warrants of his adventurousness as well as of his respect for both freedom and strictness when used with skill. He chose twenty-two poems by W. S. Merwin, his successor as poetry editor; twenty-one by Dilys Laing; thirteen by Howard Nemerov; eleven by Richard Eberhart; ten by Paul Blackburn. Rosenthal's success in swiftly advancing THE NATION to the forefront of generally distributed magazines that include poetry was partly the outcome of his willingness to annoy poets by pointing to weak passages, requesting their improvement. Harriet Monroe used to bring poets up to their own best performance, in spite of themselves, in the same manner.

Rosenthal also employed the device of calling a specific poet strongly to attention by publishing several poems, not in a single gust, but in a quick sequence. In this way he recalled Ramon Guthrie from his long reticence, publishing four of Guthrie's poems in separate issues between October 26 and November 30, 1957, and two others a bit later. These were the nucleus for Guthrie's Graffiti, which justified Rosenthal's judgment by becoming much the most successful volume in the new paperback Macmillan Poets series, begun in 1959.

THE REMARKABLE POLICY established for THE NATION by Rosenthal was continued by a series of interim editors: Merwin, Blackburn, David Ignatow, A. R. Ammons, until the appointment in October, 1963 of the present poetry editor, Denise Levertov. The measure of her editorial acumen cannot yet be taken, partly because she stresses so generously THE NATION's now traditional welcome to newcomers. Unless the new criticism has freed all poems from their creators, as it has tried to do for the poems of Pound, the scores of new names in the magazine, introduced by Miss Levertov, will have to be attached to more poems before we can know whether she has been as successful as Mark Van Doren and M. L. Rosenthal in fixing upon consistently able new talents. A year or so ago, when she was conversing with a group of undergraduate poets, I asked her to describe her principles of selection. Her reply, as I recall it, was simply, "I choose the poems I like." Those with formulated justifications of their liking probably do the same.

Rosenthal's imaginative care in securing a Guthrie poem to publish in counterpoint with Rattray's article on Pound has been the pattern for some of Miss Levertov's editorial arrangements. Adrienne Rich's long review of John Berryman's 77 Dream Songs was confronted by a full page given to three additional dream songs written after the printing of the volume. With this and a number of other full pages she has succeeded in returning the magazine to its earlier laudable practice: one more warrant that poetry is thought of as something more than a convenient spatter of type to fill out a column after the prose is all used up.

Is there any way of characterizing poetry that has appeared recently in THE NATION, by comparison with the general nature of contemporary American verse? To get some idea I have scanned Ciardi's anthology of fifteen Mid-Century American Poets who "came to prominence" in the nineteen-forties; the Donald Hall-Pack-Simpson collection of thirty-six poets under the age of forty in 1957; Donald Allen's The New American Poetry 1945-1960, with forty-four contributors aged up to fifty-one years; and the Beatitude Anthology, ages not given, forty-two poets, "edited on a kick or miss basis by a few hardy types" in 1960. Only Lowell and Richard Wilbur, from the Ciardi volume, survive into the Hall-Pack-Simpson. No poet in either of the earlier two volumes appears in either of the later two, and these have only seven in common. Here then are 128 poets selected by editors varying between the mildly conservative and the distinctly radical.

Under Miss Levertov's editing, 20% of the poets in the first anthology, 17% of those in the second, 23% of those in the third, and one poet from the fourth, have appeared in THE NATION. Since the lonely one from the Beatitude Anthology also appears in Allen's, THE NATION's interest in the phenomenon of the beats has come to the vanishing point, replaced by another kind of newness that perhaps will prove less transient. If I had to choose one poet to represent this kind of newness, he would probably be Miss Levertov's own favorite in the number of poems printed—Wendell Berry, who appears in none of the above anthologies. To characterize his poem "My Great Grandfather's Slaves" and another in the same recent issue, "Nuns at the Dali Exhibit . . ." by Beth Bentley, I find scribbled in my copy's margin, "hopeful signs of a new poetry combining classic straightforwardness with modern idiom, insight, problems." The same statement will do for most of the poems that I myself like, among Miss Levertov's choices.

Politics? Still present, but unobtrusive, as in some of Berry's poems. They already sing, a little, in the depths of the brain. Another aspect is the terse discipline of many of the newcomers, who seem to be recovering an awareness that it is always the poet's task to reverse the expanding universe, to compact experience into its significant essentials: into a form which will expand again, of itself, creating new experience in the reader.

NYC

There now is your insular city . . . commerce surrounds it with her surf. . . . Look at the crowds of water-gazers there.
—Melville

1
Gray to the marrow, pale as tall smoke across the East River
the boneyard of Queens burns

Into my window charred letters fall from the grim incinerators, some still legible, with lovers' initials and the brown reek of fire

2 Pools of blue children under the haze under the sailing hats of nuns

3
Private darkness strays into rubble where the Catholic god and the Jewish god grow weak stems in cinders

Terror is private
A woman is murdered in 38 windows

Everybody is nobody's keeper
Ask mercy of stray cats

The dim roar of traffic over bridged burroughs comes savage and sad

4
On an island staked out by stolen car aerials professional liars in glass canyons cross Madison Avenue and disappear in secret Connecticut

Marcantonio's city of shattered wine bottles and brown cut flesh rings Columbia in

In the midnight streets I hear young whores cursing

5
The smiling girl who committed suicide, mistress of gem thieves, hid a black eye under polaroid glasses
She screamed the length of her lover's coffin
She rode in a Cadillac long as a whore's dream

Lover, tell me the best hate Murderer, tell me the best love

6
The cold wind shines

A train clicks quietly under the iron grating where, with axle-grease on a lead sinker, a coatless man fishes for lost coins

I watch raw-knuckled care for all trivial, all small

And here

7
Banks whisper money

Male whores reply

Oiled locks slide free

8 Aluminum trucks bleat like lambs hauling barrels, crates over the cobbles

Streets grow long with vegetables and messengers

Near dawn I walk among fishnets and boatloads of coffins

And where the streets move, treeless,
I hear pawnshop trumpets

9
The ferry rides under gulls crying in high monotones the water's given names over Crane's forgotten bones

And wrecks passed without sound of bells

Acropolis builders, stand with me here, see how you failed!

—Robert Hazel

A Man

'Living a life'—
the beauty of deep lines dug in your cheeks.

The years gather by sevens to fashion you. They are blind, but you are not blind.

Their blows resound, they are deaf, those laboring daughters of the Fates,

but you are not deaf,
you pick out your own song from the uproar line by line, and at last throw back your head and sing it.

—DENISE LEVERTOV

Two Elegiac Poems

Harry Erdman Perry, 1881-1965

I

I stand at the cistern in front of the old barn in the darkness in the dead of the winter, the night strangely warm, the wind blowing, rattling an unlatched door.
I draw the cold water up out of the ground, and drink.

At the house the light is still waiting.
An old man I've loved all my life is dying in his bed there. He is going slowly down from himself, his body dwindling to the bone, as an old field on a hillside weathers finally to the native rock.
In final obedience to his life, he follows his body out of our knowing.
Only his hands, quiet on the sheet, keep a painful resemblance to what they no longer are.

II

He goes free of the earth.
The sun of his last day sets clear in the sweetness of his liberty.

The earth recovers from his dying, the hallow of his life remaining in all his death leaves.

Radiances know him. Grown lighter than breath, he is set free in our remembering. Grown brighter than vision, he goes dark into the life of the hill that holds his peace.

He's hidden among all that is,
and cannot be lost.

—WENDELL BERRY

THEATRE: THE LAGGARD ART

HAROLD CLURMAN

Mr. Clurman, well known stage director, has been THE NATION's drama critic since 1953. He has directed plays by Odets, O'Neill, Hellman, Williams and Giraudoux, among others. His latest: Miller's Incident at Vichy.

The best things come, as a general thing, from talents that are members of a group.—Henry James

By losing traditions, we lose our hold on the present . . . The great ages did not perhaps produce much more talent than ours; but less talent was wasted.
—T. S. Eliot

WRITING IN 1869, Walt Whitman in his Democratic Vistas complains: "Of what is called drama, or dramatic presentation in the United States, as now put forth at the theatres, I should say it deserves to be treated with the same gravity and on a par with the questions of ornamental confectionary and public dinners, or the arrangements of curtains and hangings in a ballroom—no more no less."

Seven months after the assassination of Lincoln in April, 1865, the "hit shows" were the delightful actor Joseph Jefferson in Rip Van Winkle and The Black Crook, the first of our big musicals in which "one hundred beautiful girls in short diaphanous skirts and flesh colored tights provided an unprecedented sensation."

This at a time when our literature had already bequeathed to us Moby Dick, The Scarlet Letter, Leaves of Grass, not to speak of Emerson and Thoreau. We can sympathize with Whitman's reaction. But we are less astonished. The theatre is almost always a laggard art.

A single reader may be said to constitute an "audience" for a poem or a novel; one viewer may be sufficient to encourage the solitary artist who shows his painting. Theatre requires a larger number of people to convene at the same set time. The theatre is both a public and a composite art, social in the nature of its creation as well as in the circumstances of its manifestation. A history of the theatre must comprise not only a study of dramatic texts but an examination of acting, the mechanics and economics of production and, inseparable from all these, a consideration of the audiences to whom the art is addressed and from whom it derives.

After they had passed through the primitive state of tribal rites the great theatres of the western world emerged as forms of civic and religious celebrations. State and church—in effect the entire community—supported them. Later, when the theatre was no longer an organic part of governing bodies, when indeed it was frowned upon and its suppression urged by those who held it to be immoral, the theatre still managed to survive through various devices of aristocratic or royal protection. Despite all the vicissitudes of its history the theatre was recognized as a social benefit meriting special privilege. In a word, a tradition developed in Europe which bestowed care for the theatre.

This tradition was lost in the settlement of America. The Puritans thought the theatre sinful. With a civilization to be built there was no time for such frivolity. By the time the educated minority was able to provide for them, a few playhouses were put up in the main cities of the eastern seaboard. Plays and actors were usually foreign. The best fare consisted of mutilated Shakespeare. There was practically no native drama and hardly any native actors.

When preoccupations beyond those of material needs could be entertained, schools and universities were established, important writers appeared and a few signs of original theatrical creation. One of these was Anna Cora Mowatt's Fashion (1845), a satire on the American parvenu, which in our present estimation is hardly more than a chromo. Yet Edgar Allan Poe found it praiseworthy.

That Poe should have welcomed so slight a piece, though he probably would not have deigned to notice its literary equivalent, may appear paradoxical. But this paradox repeats itself constantly. (William Dean Howells in 1891 referred to James Hearne's Margaret Fleming, a crude and creaky bit of claptrap, as "epoch-making" because it was the first of our realistic plays.) We may discover a clue in this to the peculiarity of our theatre's progress.

"Hardly anybody listens in the theatre," the Irish dramatist Denis Johnston had said, "to anything he doesn't know already." For a play to prosper it must unite its audience—which to begin with must be homogeneous. A minority attitude, a heterodox premise are divisive, and the theatre's life depends on popularly recognizable interpretations of a common experience. The cultivated handful who were able to appreciate the Brahmins of our literature couldn't have filled the tiniest theatres of their times.

It has been said—and it is perhaps true—that the liveliest and most representative "theatre" of the period immediately following the Civil War was to be found in the riverboats, in the saloons, in the minstrel shows on the Mississippi and westward. These frolics possessed the rough vigor of their audiences, the hardy folk who were opening the country.

The situation in the East, as we have seen, was that which made Whitman exclaim: "Do you call that perpetual, pistareen, paste pot work . . . American drama?" Still clinging to his faith in the American dream he was dismayed by a society ever more dominated by money values. Capitalism was set on its roaring course of empire building. Fortunes were being made by and for a most fortunate people. It was the Gilded Age. Theatres attracted folk eager to ease themselves with entertainment inducing the minimum of mental strain. The really poor never went to ordinary playhouses and thus poverty was never made the subject of any but the cheapest tear-jerkers. A large part of the audience was beginning to free itself from some of its Puritan inhibitions, though the "upper crust" in press and pulpit hypocritically persisted in upholding the Puritan code. Only the smiling aspects of American life or titillating melodrama were suitable material for such audiences. So rage as intellectuals might, the theatre between 1865 and 1890 was in its own distorted way a mirror of the times.

EVEN THE INTELLIGENTSIA does not go to the theatre for literature alone. Native acting during this period improved steadily. If America did not see any good plays (Shakespeare, remember, was bowdlerized), it had the opportunity of catching glimpses of such luminaries as Edmund Kean, Rachel, later Salvini and Duse. Edwin Booth refined the red-necked robustiousness of Edwin Forrest, America's first tragedian (1806-1872).

The actor-manager Lester Wallack, who beginning in 1864 ran a stock company for twenty years, was patronized by New York's gentry. His theatre was something like a London theatre in Manhattan. He never produced an American play because he found none that was good enough. After Wallack the big "name" producer from 1879 to 1899 was Augustin Daly who had a sound sense of integral play production. Though he produced Shakespeare with excellent actors, the fare at his theatre was more frequently trash. Daly's "discovery," Bronson Howard, the first writer for our stage to become rich from his work, was the author of Shenandoah (1889), a Civil War saga which one can't read today without indulgent laughter.

The theatre prospered, but because of the advent of realism the playhouses were built smaller. Playgoing became respectable; the social elite or "carriage trade" made it customary. Shows toured the hinterland. The theatre became industrialized. Henry James writing in 1885 found that "scenery and decoration have been brought to the highest perfection while elocution and acting, the interpretation of meanings, the representation of human feelings have not long been the subjects of serious study."

To appreciate the frame of mind of theatrical leaders at this time one may cite the fact that in 1893 the dignified manager Daniel Frohman rejected Pinero's The Second Mrs. Tanqueray (about a woman who had been kept by four men before marriage) because it was "too frank." When it was produced the reviewer of the New York Herald spoke of the play as being "for audacity surely without parallel in dramatic literature." Even as late as 1905 when Shaw's Mrs. Warren's Profession was produced (and suppressed) it was said by the New York Sun "to glorify debauchery."

Clyde Fitch, the most highly regarded dramatist between 1889 and 1909, was entirely sincere when he wrote: "I feel myself strongly the particular value of reflecting absolutely and truthfully the life and environment about us." He had the impulse to confess himself as much as to reveal the environment, but his play The Truth (1906), about a compulsive liar, and The City (1909), about the corrupting effects of the Big Town, are rather rickety contraptions. After all plays, like most of the novels of the day, had to please the Ladies or they would incur the censure of the Gentlemen.

While Edward Sheldon may be credited with bringing social themes to the stage—the destitute in Salvation Nell (1908), the "race problem" in The Nigger (1909) and politics in The Boss (1911)—the plays themselves are sophomorically inept and timid. (Stephen Crane, Frank Norris, Theodore Dreiser had already written most of their stories and novels.) Sheldon's true vein was that of Romance (1913), about the love of an Episcopalian minister for an Italian opera star. A play which harks back to New York in its Age of Innocence, it is chiefly memorable as a vehicle for the glamorous Doris Keane, rapturously admired by Stark Young. There was artistic substance in the American theatre of the day—not in the plays but in the players. Otis Skinner, Laurette Taylor, Maude Adams, the Barrymores, and later Pauline Lord, Alfred Lunt and numerous others brought life to the boards.

One notes other progressive signs. The actor Arnold Daly champions Shaw, the intrepid actress Mrs. Fisk and the exotic Alla Nazimova do much to convince the retarded, including the shocked William Winter, the New York Tribune's drama critic from 1865 to 1909, of Ibsen's worth.

Most indicative of the community's steadily growing sophistication is the effort sponsored in 1909 by J. P. Morgan, John Jacob Astor, the Vanderbilts, Thomas Paine Whitney and Otto Kahn to establish a "permanent national art theatre." A sumptuous house was built on Central Park West between 62nd and 63rd Streets, at this time an exclusive residential section for the well-to-do, and a remote suburb to citizens of more modest means.

Chosen to direct the ambitious New Theatre was the Harvard-educated Bostonian Winthrop Ames, a man of ability and taste. He enlisted an admirable company and produced Galsworthy's Strife (capital and labor), several plays by Maeterlinck (among them The Blue Bird) and Shakespeare. It was difficult to find American plays of corresponding calibre (only three, including Sheldon's The Nigger, were offered) because few American plays, with only such possible exceptions as Langdon Mitchell's brightly written comedy The New York Idea about divorce among the rich (1906) and Percy MacKaye's imaginative The Scarecrow (1910), were anything better than hack work.

The New Theatre collapsed after two seasons. Apart from the auditorium's unsuitability for the presentation of modern drama, its poor acoustics, its high prices, its inconvenient location, the reason for the New Theatre's failure was the absence of an audience great enough to sustain a serious repertory theatre.

YET FORCES WERE AT WORK to bring about a distinct change. Contact with Europe began to exercise a marked influence. The culturally alert became acquainted with stimulating and still unfamiliar dramatists (Tolstoy, Hauptmann, Gorky, Andreiev) on New York's Lower East Side—in both Yiddish and German. Little theatres were spreading all over the country so that by 1915 there were nineteen hundred. In 1916 the attractive comedian John Barrymore proved himself an actor of immense emotional power in Galsworthy's Justice. New manager-directors like Arthur Hopkins, inspired by overseas example, ventured into new fields which yielded fresh ideas, unusual plays employing the talent of that fine artist Robert Edmond Jones. A number of discriminating critics—their columns full of intriguing foreign references—began to clamor for a theatre in touch with art, literature and life. Chief among them was George Jean Nathan.

Most important, though little noticed at first, were the activities centered in the vicinity of Greenwich Village. The year 1915 witnessed the formation of the Neighborhood Playhouse on Grand Street, The Washington Players (transformed into The Theatre Guild in 1919), the Provincetown Players, who were to reappear in the early twenties as a triumvirate of the critic Macgowan, the designer-director Jones and the dramatist O'Neill. These new groups planted seeds from which a proud harvest was soon reaped.

In 1920 we became conscious of the flowering with the production—cautiously introduced at special matinees—of O'Neill's first full length play Beyond the Horizon. That event marks the birth of American theatre as a conscious art intended to contribute to our inner life what we expect of the best literature.

This "birth" in the theatre corresponded with a rebirth in American letters generally. For while the years between 1835 and 1850 gave evidence of our native genius in poem, essay, short story and novel, the fortune-hunting years between 1865 and 1913 had very nearly destroyed vital literary expression. During this interval Dreiser, on the one hand, and Henry James, on the other, dwelled in limbo. This is also true of Whitman, Melville, Thoreau, whose work was known to a rare few only. They came into their own just before and immediately after the First World War.

WHAT MADE THE twenties a feverish and wonderful time was our coming of age in prosperity, in power, in self-confidence, as well as in self-consciousness. This made it possible for us to recognize our character and to acknowledge our shortcomings. Our desire to learn and accomplish things as a great nation lent a tremendous impetus to all endeavors. We became cocky and at the same time self-critical. We were prepared to look at ourselves with unrelenting realism. We were rediscovering ourselves as Americans.

Many thought us fooled by the holiday of our success. Others declared our iconoclasm adolescent. The superficial traits of our Puritanism were raucously shed. Freud began to be read by the literati. We rerejoiced in our afflatus and jeered at our rejoicing. Some said America had become a jungle of competition; others read that Western Civilization was doomed. But whether the diagnoses and prognoses were rosy or black everything took on a jubilant air.

New York playhouses doubled in number. One hundred ninety-six productions opened in 1920-21; two hundred seventy in 1927-28. The Theatre Guild assembled a loyal body of subscribers which assured its productions a minimum run of five to six weeks. The Guild did many unusual and stimulating plays by foreign authors as well as by some Americans. After a while it clasped O'Neill to its bosom. Eva La Gallienne at the Civic Repertory Theatre produced Ibsen, Chekhov and other "standard" European dramatists at popular prices.

Musical comedy, the one theatrical form in which we undoubtedly excel, with truly gifted tunes by Kern, Porter, Gershwin, Rodgers and others, sweetened the surrounding clamor. The Ziegfeld Follies, glorifying the American girl in gorgeous dress and suave undress, served as emblems of our high spirits. Among the lovely faces and the lush furnishings a parade of comedians close to genius cavorted.

The shadowy side of the picture was painted by the uncouth master figure of Eugene O'Neill himself. Apart from his concern with the complexities of personal psychology, O'Neill brooded on the drama of man's soul in America. Something had gone astray. The poet who yearns to explore realms beyond the narrow confines of his job fails to follow his bent and as a result wastes his being. The simple laborer proud of the strength which turns the wheels of our magnificent civilization finds himself scorned and adrift in a mechanism in which he is merely a cog. The artist wishes to attain the effectiveness of the man of affairs; the businessman envies the artist's imagination. Both suffer a sense of incompleteness. The would-be aristocrat from the Old World with his dream of grandeur is rendered absurd in the factory of a materialistic democracy. But without that strain of grandeur the dignity of a true manhood is somehow damaged. The son has little of his pioneering father's grit; the father in his struggle to master the soil of his farm (America?) impairs his capacity to love.

O'Neill dramatizes himself and us as people cut off from but still seeking some principle of coherence. For want of it everyone feels isolated and frustrated. O'Neill's strength lies in the persistence of his quest for a wholeness which has been shattered in the new world. We sicken in detachment from some age-old secret of sanctity. O'Neill is committed to its recovery. He told friends that his never completed cycle of nine plays would be an epic of America's failure to realize its promise.

THE DEPRESSION OF THE thirties exposed the moral as well as the social lesion in the national body. Having been wounded where we believed ourselves invulnerable we began questioning ourselves in new ways. The plays of the depression were not depressed. (Depressed plays appeared in the fifties in a time of prosperity.) The depression was a time of hope. Youth would not accept defeat, take "no" for an answer. It condemned the illusions of the previous decade which had exulted in the fun principle. The thirties sought and found a solution to our dilemma in collective action for social betterment.

The theatre was struck a bitter though not a fatal blow. The number of productions shrank; playhouses were sold for use as grind movie emporia and for burlesque shows. Actors left for Hollywood which prospered because the disconsolate wished to flee the gloom of impoverished homes and streets. The disease wrought its own healing. As Roosevelt aroused the country with his New Deal, so Groups, Collectives, Unions of the theatre were formed. What characterized most of them was the attempt to present plays confronting the times: the condition of the unemployed, the dispossessed, the unprotected worker, the dispirited middle class, the desperate farmer, the threat of fascism. All this was to be done in a new fashion: through organizations which would commit themselves on a permanent collective basis to a disciplined practice of theatrical craft.

The theatre of the thirties was thought to be political—a mistaken opinion. Its impulse was moral—even moralistic. That is the essence of Odets' work. He was the era's representative playwright just as The Group Theatre, of which Odets had been an actor-member, was the representative theatrical organization. That is why after The Group Theatre's dissolution in 1941, it still remained an influence in the ensuing years through its former actors, directors, designers, teachers.

One particular contribution to theatre technique made by The Group was a way of work which was the heritage of the Moscow Art Theatre's New York visit in 1923. This was the Stanislavsky System which in time—through the Actors Studio founded in the forties—came to be known as the Method. While the Method is presumed to have narrowed the scope of American acting, though this is not at all its aim or necessary effect, it added a certain vibrancy and density of feeling to our actors' endowments.

WITH THE SCATTERING of forces during the Second World War and its immediate aftermath, in which not only The Group Theatre but the inestimably valuable Federal Theatre Project (the Government's first entrance into the domain of the arts) disappeared, a subtle change took place. As business as usual resumed there followed a cooling of social fervor which soon turned into a freeze.

This was hardly noticed at first since Arthur Miller's early plays and even those of Tennessee Williams sounded a more subdued and introverted variation on the mode of the thirties.

Social reform had failed to "save" us. Many suggested panaceas had proved delusive (or so it was thought) and some were considered positively treasonable. The source of our ailments, it would appear, lay in our unsatisfactory relations with parents, wives, children. Our traumas—our traumas were to blame! Though Tennessee Williams' work always had discernible social connotations, what public and press chiefly responded to was its private and especially sexual aspects.

The age of conformity and of McCarthy terror drove men of sensibility into themselves. Young folk exiled themselves in the ghetto of their egos. The faceless world, all perpetual motion without any core of meaning, was to be shut out. "Contact" as someone has said about the new dancing, "went out in the fifties."

Connection with the outside world, now threatened with annihilation, became attenuated. Some solace (or drug) which might alleviate the pain of aloneness or sink us more deeply into forgetfulness was craved. To be "beat" became an ideal by default. This laid the ground work for the dramaturgy of the maimed.

The plays of Beckett, Genêt, Ionesco, Pinter—usually presented at some distance from the theatre's supermarket—which were expressions of not altogether similar but of equally disabling stresses, became models for American writers. Edward Albee's "permanent vagrant" disturbing the complacent gent on the park bench is a youth who prefers contact through his own violent death at the hand of his neighbor to total neglect. At this moment Albee seems as representative of the early sixties as William Saroyan and Thornton Wilder were in embodying the spirit of benevolent reconciliation (or "national unity") in the early forties. Albee testifies to the agony of a society no longer real in which we try to live on debris of exploded faiths, a state which renders us savage.

Though, retrospectively, we may realize that since O'Neill our theatre has turned in earnest to the contemplation of our existence in a manner unthinkable a hundred or even sixty years ago, we remain dissatisfied. Broadway as the hub of theatrical activity has become an electrified desert. We still go there though its game is crooked because it is the only game in town! Seventy-five productions a season constitute the norm. At the moment of this writing only musicals and skimpy comedies are produced with much chance of public support.

MOVIES AND TELEVISION are not the cause of the downfall. It is show business itself which is destroying the theatre. Its arrangements are anarchic: the costs of production are too high, the price of tickets prohibitive. The greedy exactions of the stage hands' unions are not the sole cause for this. They do what all the others do: treat the theatre as a business, which means every craft for itself, every man for himself. This inevitably becomes destructive to an art, the very nature of which depends on the planned and enthusiastic integration of its entire personnel. We have lost the tradition—indeed have never established one—of the theatre as a service, a social need. When business ceases to be profitable it has lost its reason for existence. There is "no foundation all the way down the line," in Saroyan's words, and it will take more than the Foundations to supply one.

Are we to end with a whimper? On the contrary: we may yet see a new beginning. Observation on my travels convinces me that the country is full of talent and appetite for theatre. Young folk are trying to rediscover a true theatre tradition.

The decentralization of the theatre is not the result of any special "idealism" but the response to a need for using all our unused gifts. In San Francisco, in Seattle, in Minneapolis, in Houston, in Washington, in Philadelphia and elsewhere new professional theatres have been, or are about to be, established. This trend is bound to grow.

These theatres aspire to be more than show shops. We are becoming aware that there are other "classics" beside Shakespeare. Many world famous plays —ancient and modern, in foreign tongues and in our own—are still unknown to our stages because they do not sit well in the maw of commerce. One hears of productions in university and community theatres as well as in cafés, of plays so "advanced" and "experimental" that even off-Broadway (now being assimilated into the stream of running rats) dares not undertake them. We are also beginning to get free theatre in the parks and on the very streets of certain cities—both in the South and in the North.

New York itself is now endowed with ambitious new theatre organizations. A heavy load of disdain has been hurled at the first two seasons of the Repertory Theatre of Lincoln Center—some of it merited but most of it misguided. To found a theatre is not the same as setting up a series of productions. A considerable time of preparation and at least three years of performance are required as a preliminary test. The demand that these new organizations immediately satisfy our hunger for genuine innovation and artistic achievement is a way of applying the old hit-and-flop criteria of Broadway to enterprises with very different objectives and entirely different problems. The sheer fact of the repertory theatre, of Lincoln Center's having come into existence, is a step forward. We must hope that the prolongation of its life, no matter under what auspices, will fulfill its serious artistic function.

If it is correct to speak of our theatre as having been "born" only forty-five years ago we must agree that compared to the long years which went into the making of the Elizabethan, the French neo-classic stages, the recently founded British National Theatre, our theatre is in its infancy. It is part of our immaturity to expect immediate consummation. The misfortune of our theatre history—due to the absence of a tradition—is its fragmentation. We always seem to be starting from scratch. But perhaps this after all is not the case: there may be a continuity which we don't readily perceive because in our juvenile impatience we are forever grumbling "Yes, but what have you done for me recently?"

Of course I am delighted that THE NATION has reached its centenary, and I am happy to congratulate it and (even more) its readers. But I should not like to confine my pleasure to its mere longevity. It is a delight to read a journal which is so consistently literate on every page; and it is a special delight in a journal whose main purpose, after all, is not literary. That seems to me a true contribution to culture.

—J. Bronowski

TV: THE 21″ BORE

ROBERT ALAN AURTHUR

Mr. Aurthur has written more than a hundred original TV plays, a half-dozen films, two Broadway plays, short stories and a novel. For many reasons, some of which appear below, he is now concentrating on films.

EARLY IN 1950, on an icy winter's night, your average non-TV Viewer, me, hurried along Manhattan's East 57th Street. I was just a short sprint from my destination, the apartment of friend and painter Jimmy Ernst, and the thought of being deflected was inconceivable.

There was little traffic on this usually busy street, and I was literally the only pedestrian. It could have been the cold, but it wasn't. Older Viewers will grasp the significance of the fact that it was 8:25 P.M. on a Tuesday evening.

Turning into Third Avenue, I became suddenly aware of a brightly lighted store window, and in front of it, huddled together for warmth, a large knot of people. Never one to pass up a disaster or two midgets making love (for what else in that window could hold the rapt attention of two dozen people in 26°F?), I edged my way through the crowd for an unobstructed look.

Need I tell you? The store sold radios and those new-fangled television sets, and centered in the window was the newest-fangled of them all, a Louis Quinze-Georgian box with a ten-inch eye. And there, soundlessly, in full, glorious close-up, a man, dressed like a chicken, was dancing.

Never before having seen Milton Berle on television, I had, of course, heard of his phenomenal impact. I knew that from 8 to 9 P.M. every Tuesday night not only were the streets empty, but restaurants, clubs and movie houses as well. In 1950, television was exclusively an urban privilege with about ten million single-set homes clustered around the larger cities (now there are over 62 million homes equipped with heaven knows how many sets, and not a single region of the country out of reach), and of those ten million homes Milton commandeered 90 per cent every week. No one since has ever matched Berle, the closest being the night Lucy had her baby when I Love Lucy scored a single rating of about 75.

There were a lot more people addicted to dancing chickens, relatively speaking, in those days than now. Today a hit show is one with a rating of 30, and a smash is a special like the 1965 Academy Award Show, which Mr. Neilson reported had a rating in New York of 42.9. Against the Awards, the two other networks combined rated a mere 11.2, indicating that in 1965 almost half the potential audience in New York didn't even have their sets turned on! It is possible that mass boredom has gripped you Viewers, or does it mean that it is time to bring back Milton Berle?

Needless to say, the entire Yugoslav Army under the command of Joseph E. Levine could not have dragged me from that store window fifteen years ago. It was ten after nine when, frostbitten and in desperate need of brandy, I burst into the Ernst apartment on 58th Street with the stunning news that I had just witnessed a man, dressed like a chicken, dancing. No one cared. Bill Baziotes was talking quietly in a corner with Bob Motherwell; Peter Grippi whirled Inez Ferran around a Max Ernst totem pole to the tune of Jelly Roll Morton's Dr. Jazz; John Latouche was humming an entire ballet; and Jackson Pollock was in the center of a large group at the bar being hostile.

At the time I reasoned that no one responded to my news because in this corner of the art world people very often dressed like chickens, even when they weren't dancing. Much later it occurred to me, however, that of all those people, many of whom were to be immortalized by Harold Rosenberg as Abstract Expressionists (and who would have heard of them otherwise?), I was the only one to become rich and famous in television. Draw your own conclusions.

In 1950, television was very much in its Model T stage. The two coasts had not yet been linked by the coaxial cable; thus, a program could not be beamed live from New York to Los Angeles. Now, of course, we get pictures "live from the moon," and even as you read, Early Bird satellites whirl in synchronous orbit 22,000 miles per hour above the earth which can bring instantaneous pictures into your home from anywhere on the globe.

I was one who sat and thrilled in October, 1964, when from 1 to 3 A.M. I watched over NBC the program transmitted live from Tokyo at the opening ceremonies of the Olympic Games. This was truly a miracle. Certainly, man's hope for progress rests squarely on his ability to communicate—to inform and educate; and television now provides us with the ultimate. What man does with this great power is something else. Those who control television somehow always manage to tarnish their miracles, if not destroy them completely. Because it was only 10 P.M. on the West Coast, NBC chose not to interrupt their prime-time programming, and so Pacific Time Viewers saw their Olympic miracle on tape a couple of hours later. Video tape, though itself a minor miracle since 1955, is not quite the same thing as "live from Tokyo" via satellite for the first time in world history. The lesson here is never plan a giant step in the progress of man if it is necessary to interrupt a commercial.

Commercial television today is a medium of advertising, and that's all it is. They can say it's a lot of other things, and often do, in license applications or in public hearings, but They lie.

AGAIN BACK IN 1950, Hollywood was just a minor contributor to the art, with over 80 per cent of production originating live from New York. Because the enormous bonanza of network repeat showings and subsequent world-wide syndication was not even yet a dream, film was far too expensive a means of production. Today, the ratio is just about reversed, with over 80 per cent of programming produced on film in Hollywood.

In case anyone asks you—and you never know when someone will—the one reason that most television entertainment is on film from Hollywood, produced by the same people who for so many years produced so many bad movies, is not because it is better, not because it is easier, but because there are vast profits in film residuals. An hour film series in its fourth year brings a gross income of over $8 million to a network just in its first-run and network repeats, and subsequent profits in non-network syndication are inestimable.

To date, with the possible exception of functioning oil wells, no one has yet come up with a more certain profitmaker than television. In 1965, total advertising billing on the networks reached $1,610,000,000, and it is projected that this figure will better two-and-a-half billion by 1970. In 1964, CBS reported a net income of $49,655,739 on sales of $638,076,567—an increase over the previous year of over $7 million net.

The really incredible thing about the figures is that some of the biggest money-earning shows on television require the least effort to produce. Huntley and Brinkley, those two charming fellows who just sit there, will earn $27,300,000 for NBC in the season 1965-66, and the same network projects a weekly two-hour, prime-time feature film show (where they simply buy a product in a can, like soup) that will gross $44 million.

One could go on, but what's the point? The stunning fact in all this is that these fantastic profits have literally nothing to do with quality. Huntley and Brinkley can continue to bring us bad news, the feature pictures can be just awful, and the film series can be rehashes of rehashes, yet the millions will continue to roll in. Why?

Well, it's really very simple. Television, like other advertising media, charges on the basis of cost per thousand; i.e., the more people you reach with your message, the more you are charged for it. This simple fact accounts for the desperate dependency on ratings. In order to support the continually rising charges, the networks must deliver the largest possible audience. A minute commercial today costs the advertiser about $40,000 as opposed to around $10,000 fifteen years ago; and, as the potential audience grows, so will the cost of time.

In the dear dead days when television was a little more daring, when it would still experiment with new forms and new talents, it was a great deal less expensive. The Philco Playhouse, where I did my duty for some five years as writer, script editor, and ultimately producer, never cost more than $35,000 a show to produce. The sponsor, Philco, paid an additional charge of about $30,000 for time, in return for which there were three two-minute commercials and two "billboards" at the beginning and end of the show, all adding up to six minutes and twenty-five seconds. There was no half-hour station break.

Today, the average hour show will have six one-minute commercials at $40,000 each. The "billboards" will add another forty seconds, and at the half-hour the network and local stations will surround the station break with forty-five seconds of commercials (recently increased from thirty-five seconds) for additional income.

OH NO NOT WHEN I'M EATING!

Yes, Viewers, there's gold in those airways (leased and licensed by law for "the public interest") as a certain former Texas janitor, now in more prominent surroundings, his broadcast holdings temporarily put away in trust, can easily attest.

Of course, that same Philco show today would cost about $75,000 a week to produce because of increased costs on every level, but that is still less than the average hour film show budgeted at $140,000 a week. Not that the film shows cost all that money to produce, but you have to figure things like 10 per cent to a "packaging" agent [a fellow who (1) knows someone in power at the network and can get him on the phone, or (2) a fellow who represents a star the American public can't live without, like Cara Williams or Paul Ford], furnishing network officials' apartments, limousines, suites at the Beverly Hills Hotel, etc. The show, or what you see on the screen, may actually cost $100,000. That's a lot of icing in there, Viewers, but then, you Viewers buy a lot of deodorants, cavity-preventing toothpaste, dandruff destroyers and supportive underthings.

AS BAD AS television is today, and it is generally pretty awful, I am not about to beat the old drum about how much better it used to be. It really didn't used to be that good, and if you think it was you are dealing from a jaded appetite. In the earlier days, the medium was controlled mostly by the advertisers and their agencies, and there was a terrible censorship of ideas, a dread fear of any controversy.

Very early in my television career, desperately casting about for a story to adapt (this was just before the advent of original television plays), I suggested the possibility of doing Kafka's Metamorphosis which, in my naïveté, I thought ideal for the small screen. I submitted my proposal to a leading producer, and in a subsequent meeting it was suggested to me that the story was a possibility—". . . But couldn't you have him change into a dog?" I could barely croak out a "Why?" and the producer said, "Well, you see, we go on the air here in New York at nine P.M., which means we're on the West Coast at six, and the Mountain States at seven. The thing is, a cockroach is very distasteful. You have to understand, on the West Coast people are eating. . . ."

"People Are Eating" television lasted a long time, until the networks took over control. Now they have abortions, hysterectomies and murder most vile and varied, and no one seems to care what you Viewers are doing at the time.

It must also be said that during the so-called Golden Age of television there existed the political blacklist, initiated and perpetuated by the advertisers, in which literally hundreds of actors and writers were banned from the airways. The basic morality of any kind of blacklist is debatable, no matter what the "crime," but even accepting the fact that an admitted Communist should not be permitted electronically into your living room, it was certain that of the hundreds punished all but a handful were completely free of any real political taint. I was once threatened with the loss of my livelihood by the Borden Company (which had a White List of "acceptable" artists) because I was accused (1) of once having been a sponsor of a meeting that supported Red China (not true—but then no one asked me), and (2) of having written a novel that got an excellent review in the Daily Worker (true—but the book had also gotten a better and bigger review in The Chicago Tribune).

Most victims of the blacklist, by the way, discovered themselves mysteriously out of work and never knew why. The fact that I found out in time and beat the rap was only because my friend and sometime employer, David Susskind, went to someone high enough in the agency and successfully fought my case. I was one of the few lucky ones.

AND SOME OF us survived, though no one is particularly proud of having worked through such an era, and it was finally the networks, by taking control, who broke the blacklist. Not that the networks deserve many bravery medals, but television has always been a seller's market; thus the networks are less susceptible to the kinds of pressures that make weak men weaker.

The fact that a recent ruling of the FCC intends to turn control of half the prime-time programming back into the hands of the advertisers in order to lessen the absolute power of the three networks brings no cheers from those who have been controlled by advertisers. Nothing in the past gives any indication that sponsors will select programs that are better or more experimental or more varied than the networks do now; indeed, all evidence is to the contrary. But perhaps the move has less to do with programming than it does with economics. Why should the networks alone get all those millions?

It is a matter of continual astonishment that there is such a furor about the "Wasteland" of television, that anyone actually expects it to be better than it is. Consider the simple fact that twenty thousand hours a year need to be filled on just the three networks, and who has the audacity to expect these hours to be filled with excellence? Television does an increasingly superb job in covering sports and news events, the realities of our society, and perhaps that's all it's really designed to do well. As for the entertainment side, as long as there are just three networks, as long as the powerful lobbies led by Congressmen with interests in existing television stations limit the number of outlets and prevent other systems like Pay-TV and Community Antennae-TV from coming into being, then the general level of entertainment will be gauged to the lowest popular taste. It is, after all, the business of the networks to make the most money possible, and to do this they must reach the widest audience possible. If most of you Viewers prefer Peyton Place to Shakespeare and the Beverly Hillbillies to Molière, and there is more than ample evidence that you do, then that is what you will get.

The thing one must always remember is that television is no different from any other medium of mass communication. Where is it better? On Broadway Jean Kerr succeeds; Brecht isn't produced. You don't see publishers throwing Irving Wallace or Herman Wouk out of their offices. The Reader's Digest sells just a few more copies than does THE NATION, and Fellini can make pictures as long as they don't cost more than $700,000.

Ah, but, you say. . . . But there is an off-Broadway where Brecht is produced and is acceptable; publishing isn't just limited to the best-selling Wallace and Wouk; THE NATION is on the newsstands; and Fellini does make pictures.

AND YOU WOULD be right. There is a difference between television and the other media in that television is the only one where absolute control is in the hands of only those who go for the biggest buck. This will change not by trying to raise the general level by some mystique whereby the public suddenly rejects Peyton Place for Son of Godot, nor will it change by handing the choice of programs back to sponsors. And it certainly won't change by vocal minorities like parent groups or education committees or even FCC chairmen crying for better product. It will only change when the monopolistic practices of the combined force of network and advertiser are broken, when Pay-TV or its equivalent allow independent producers to reach smaller audiences and still make a real profit.

It happened in films when the large studios were forced to divest themselves of their theatres. Until then an independent could not get his product booked, just as today an independent television producer finds it virtually impossible to book his product onto a network without network ownership or control. It also happened in publishing, when means were devised to distribute paperbacks wherever there are readers, and it became possible to make a profit on esoteric books by little known writers. It happened in the theatre when playwrights found audiences in small houses not controlled by the Shuberts or the City Investing Company, who book only potential hits into their houses.

The power structure in television will resist any attempt to widen the outlets by any means possible, from millions spent to swing an election in California that outlawed Pay-TV, to Congressional fiat, to FCC foot-shuffling. And why not? A dollar diverted is a dollar lost. A certain former Texas janitor would not be worth an estimated $14 million today if he had not legally been awarded a monopoly to control a large television market.

At present, what you Viewers see (or don't see) on television is controlled for all practical purposes by the three networks. Anyone with a new show idea, even if he has the money to produce a "pilot" sample himself, submits his idea to the network and proceeds only if he has a reasonable guarantee that the network will look upon the final product with favor. This favor is usually won by making the network a partner. There are, then, no more than a dozen men who ultimately decide what goes on the air, mainly because they control what is offered for sale.

A COUPLE OF years ago I spent a stunningly unsuccessful season in the employ of United Artists Television as a creator of new programs. UA is one of those companies that develop shows as so-called independents, but always eventually in partnership with the network. As a result, I had a few brief brushes with the network power structure as it exists today, and I'm a much poorer man for the experience.

James T. Aubrey, now a semi-retired millionaire, was then president of CBS, and he was something to behold if you happen, as I am, to be a student of the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie. When Big Jim walked into a room, you never saw so many highly paid people reduced to so many shambling wrecks. I mean, that man generated terror. He owned the joint, and he was fierce! Nothing went on the air over at CBS that Big Jim personally didn't approve. You had to check him on every line of the script, every piece of casting, every item on the set. He was the boss!

Among my various projects that year was a half-hour comedy written by a very gifted man named Harvey Orkin that I thought was one of the really funny pieces of our time. It was wild, yet it was sophisticated. Its protagonist was a New York lawyer who dealt with the legal profession from the standpoint of the Marx Brothers. It was submitted to CBS and was subsequently reported to me that "everyone" loved it, thought it as funny as I did. Did "everyone" include Big Jim? We would find out at a meeting.

Jim Aubrey looks something like Jack Kennedy out of Jimmy Stewart. He was graduated from Princeton cum laude, has lived and worked in big cities all his life. He is not a hick. He has an ingratiating smile and sits mostly with his feet up on his desk. At the meeting to discuss the Orkin project we were joined by five vice-presidents, all of whom had, before the meeting, told me the script was incredibly funny, that we had a real winner.

Since the meeting was only about the Orkin project, the hope was that at the end Jim would give us a go-ahead to make a pilot film. I was told to make my sales pitch. Not that it needed any selling; the script did that, but it was the way one did things in such meetings.

And so I pitched. Ignoring all the vice-presidents, knowing where the power was, I spoke directly to Big Jim. I told him how funny the script was, how Harvey Orkin was perhaps the most original comedy talent since Aristophanes and a lot more acceptable for the home screen, and how we had incredibly detailed plans for episodes that would keep America laughing for years to come. Jim listened carefully. He never stopped smiling.

I pitched for twenty minutes, and then there was no more to be said. When I fell silent, Jim said, "Finished?"

I nodded. Then he nodded, got to his feet and paced the room twice. As he did so, I took out a cigarette and three vice-presidents leaned forward to light it for me, indicating I was a smash. Jim was still smiling as he turned to me.

"I've got to tell you," he said, "nothing you said made any sense. Not one thing!"

There was absolute silence, like at my funeral just before the man gets up to give the eulogy.

"The script is terrible," Jim said. "There isn't one funny line in it. Not one joke, not a smile. I don't think either you or Orkin understand the first thing about comedy."

This from the man who put the Beverly Hillbillies on the air.

Jim went on: "What the hell makes you think that one person in the United States gives one goddam about some guy, some flip clod, who wisecracks his way through life, whose only real problem is what bar he bellies up to at night? Grass-roots humor—that's what the people like. And that's what they buy. Not this crap."

That was the beginning of what he said. There was a lot more, but it all added up to the death of me, Harvey Orkin and our project. Oh, I did put up a little struggle; I even, in desperation, turned to the vice-presidents who had helped light my cigarette. One said it was the worst script he'd ever read, the second said he personally had seen nothing at all funny in it, and the third indicated great surprise that a man with my track-record for taste would even come around with something like that.

Jim accepted this surprising support for his position with aplomb, then said in a very kindly way, "Don't look for comedy in the lives of guys like you and me. Nobody really gives a damn about what happens to us."

When Aubrey left CBS he took with him about two-and-a-half million dollars in stock options. I tell this story not because I like to kick a man when he's up, but because I've been proved right and Jim wrong. When Jim was fired, the story made front-page headlines in newspapers all across the country including The New York Times, so you Viewers out there do care what happens to guys like us. And a lot of people (but not me) did laugh.

It is strictly a coincidence that a year later I found myself wandering, alone, in a foreign country. It was a very cold Sunday night in late January as I walked down O'Connell Street in Dublin. Pubs were closed, movies sold out. Ahead of me, a lighted window, a crowd. Sure enough, pressing through the people I found myself peering through a thick glass at a 21″ screen. Telefis Eirean is very primitive and concerns itself mostly with earnest men who talk in Gaelic to convince people that everyone should talk in Gaelic. Not many people own television sets, and those who do are centered around the cities. There is only one channel.

This, however, was not the usual political panel show. A man, dressed like a chicken, was dancing. I swear it's true. Fifteen years later, almost to the day. The people standing around me were laughing, and when the man took off his chicken head he looked just like Brendan Behan.

Well, what were you expecting—Milton Berle?

THE NATION has always inspired respect for its intellectual integrity. I look upon its praise as a most valued endorsement of an artist's effort, whether of the arts, of the theatre, or of the films. —Charles Chaplin

NOTES ON THE NEW STYLE

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

William Phillips is editor-in-chief of Partisan Review and teaches English at Rutgers University. Chilmark Press is putting out a collection of his essays.

It's all anti these days: anti-literature, anti-art, anti-morality, anti-society, anti-ideology, anti-matter. Some people, mostly those with one foot in the past, are for something, but the young, and those who have jumped on the bandwagon of youth, are busy inventing new forms of rejection and secession. It's called cooling it or copping out—depending on whether you're in or out.

This is the new sensibility. Usually a new sensibility is a new literary style which reflects a new life style. At present, the life style is so strong that it has taken over the functions of art. Perhaps the new attitudes are too dramatic and uncompromising, or have not settled sufficiently to support works of literature, or perhaps the new writing still is not able to stand on its own. Anyway, new fiction has been itself part of the scene, which explains why it is so sprawling, and why it is so difficult to fit it into the old frames. Burroughs, Genêt, even Beckett, to some extent Mailer, do not have their niche in the history of the novel the way, for example, Faulkner, or Bellow, or Flannery O'Connor or Nathanael West do—a situation obviously confusing to those teachers and critics who would like to keep up with new beliefs by holding on to their old ones.

Some of the new fiction must then be seen as a break with the past. There was an earlier break with tradition that brought the literary exile back into the fold. Both these changes have been played down, however, because literary history, which takes to similarities more than differences, tends to flatten out the past. Even criticism, which should know better, has done the same thing, because the kind of criticism that goes in for theory and historical connections usually abhors discontinuity and has a weakness for traditions which have been academically certified. For some critics, to question the lines of tradition is as unthinkable as to question the idea of heredity or history. Hence the common version of what happened to the novel fails to explain why the figures of what might be called the Golden Era—Proust, Mann, Joyce, even Kafka, who falls outside most schemes—seemed to mark the end of a line.

These novelists, who dominated the early part of the century, were sustained by two beliefs: that society had a certain shape and direction; and that, though they were outside it, in some mysterious, often perverse, way they represented its ideals and its possibilities. They were in and out, but comfortably so, nestled in the tradition, going back to the Romantics, of an intellectual aristocracy that acted as both rebel and prophet. When Joyce made his famous pledge "to encounter . . . the reality of experience and to forge the uncreated conscience of my race," he was not so far out as he seemed at the time. Earwicker, after all, was Everyman. Nor was Mann way out when he created the artist-bourgeois hero, who had it both ways. Kafka, I think, broke out of this essentially aesthetic view of society, because he was impelled more by his own morbid experience and his own feelings than by the myths of belonging and not belonging. In his indifference to society and hence to conventional motivations, Kafka was closer to the current sensibility than some of his more explicitly avant-garde contemporaries. But even Kafka was not free of the bruised humanism behind the panoramic and allegorical fiction of Joyce, Mann and Proust. The Waste Land tradition in the novel seemed to require these big, suggestive themes, roaming through time and space, for only on such a scale could the agonies of the hero be blown up to represent man's fate.

As we know, this culture-hero has had a long literary career. He began as an English Romantic, as an angel who doubled as a devil. Nietzsche and Dostoevsky played up his morbid and diabolical side. He appeared in some movements as the alienated man. He turned up at one time or another as a symbolist, a dadaist, an exile. He was also a political rebel, sometimes a revolutionary. On the whole he was nourished on the idea that the forces making for a better society were to be found in society itself. Hence he opposed the values it practiced, not the values it professed.

IN THE FOLLOWING PERIOD, the novel came down to earth. It took its place in society, but without a theory of society, or of art. It lost its ambition. The novel became smaller, less symbolic, less self-conscious, more like the ordinary idea of ordinary experience. Not only was the tradition of the big brooding novel played out; more important was the fact there was no longer a main tradition. Instead, there were many little traditions that lost their power over new writing and broke down into vague conventions and influences. The novel took off in many directions. Thus we got genre novels, regional novels, novels of manners, exotic novels, academic novels. The shift could be seen in the early Hemingway and Faulkner, for whom the narrative was more important than the theme. But even more typical of the new era were figures like Kingsley Amis, Iris Murdoch, Katherine Anne Porter, Mary McCarthy, Bernard Malamud, Saul Bellow. They were all novelists of manners—social, moral, and sexual manners—all committed to a genre in which the writer stakes out his claim in a society that is taken for granted. They were not morbid, or apocalyptic, or angry. The cold war between the writer and his society was over.

The most representative novelist of the period is Saul Bellow, perhaps because he is one of the most gifted and self-conscious writers today. His first novel, The Dangling Man, which seems to have been forgotten because it falls outside the pattern of the later work, comes out of the tradition of the heroic anti-hero. In its scale and its conception, The Dangling Man reflected the new adjustments to more modest views of the world. But he was still a marginal man, an artist-intellectual set apart by his values and his anxieties. In fact, reviewers who did not believe in alienation were quite hostile to Bellow's novel, despite the fact that the dangling man had both feet on the ground.

Obviously, the young Bellow was if not an alienated man an alienated writer. But his later writing shows a steady de-alienation. The Victim, a novel about anti-Semitism, seems to be a transitional work, for the transformation of the Jew from the alienated man to the victim of injustice meant that the conflict was now situated in social conventions and institutions. But the two later, more expansive novels are more explicit. Augie March still had a little of the old freewheeling, self-assertive, and self-pitying quality of the dangling man. This could be a self-portrait, a mixture, as in most writers, of what Bellow feels and what he thinks he should feel. But Augie's drifting was no longer on the metaphysical edges of society; he was a wanderer on the inside, a borer-from-within. As Augie made his way into the experiences of the average man, with his charm, his wit, and the jauntiness of his sufferings, he grew into a picaresque hero. Augie became a Tom Jones of contemporary America: a little less roguish, a little more self-conscious, still an adventurer within his own time and country—an American.

THE OUTSIDER WAS now the insider. But it took more than ideology to make this reversal; it was accomplished, as it always is in fiction, by bringing what one saw together with what one looked at. It took a certain literary insight to connect the peculiar footloose, sharp-eyed quality of American life with the legendary traits of the alienated man; and no doubt much of Bellow's appeal comes from his domestication of the wanderer to fit in with the new sense of America.

Herzog completes the process of de-alienation, though the dangling man seems to be here again. But he returns through the back door, through sex, which makes him a case rather than a symbol. Like all the earlier heroes, Herzog sighs and sags, but this time he reaches the end of his rope and not the end of existence. He can't make it because he has lost his grip and because he has bad luck with his women. This is a story of maladjustment, not the allegory of a dropout. Clearly, Herzog has the inside track to understanding as well as to suffering, and if he has trouble—who hasn't? The end is ambiguous because Bellow recognizes that ambiguity is the most certain form of reality, at least in fiction. Still, one is left with the feeling that Herzog will probably make it.

And if he does, it is because he exemplifies the optimism, made more explicit in various essays and reviews, that Bellow apparently needs to overcome his doubts. Otherwise, you would get only the whining of the dangling man, who makes us feel sorry for him because he thinks he is smaller than his fate and larger than his lot. The letters Herzog writes to famous men and to the world at large provide the clue: they are nutty and absurd and full of the folklorish wisdom of people who have nothing to do with practical things, but they are the letters of someone who is always playing the game.

Bellow's fiction also shows a formal break with the earlier tradition. It is relaxed, discursive, almost like a throwback to the beginnings of the novel, when the plot hung on the meanderings and fortunes of the hero. Yet Bellow did not invent the style. It was in fact the prevailing one, though it naturally took a different form in such different temperaments as Mary McCarthy, who has an eye for cant and social immorality, or Bernard Malamud, whose civilized passions are those of a Jewish epicure, or Henry Miller, who confuses his dreams with his frustrations. Most of the novels of the period were worldly in tone as well as in theme and situated in a particular locale. In this respect, Mary McCarthy was perhaps most typical: her concern with the observable world fit right in with the breakup of the big novel, while her sophistication kept her away from naturalism.

BUT MAYBE MORE important than individual temperament was the national temperament. The new turn was largely American, and the reason, I think, was the native bias against monolithic traditions. It was much more American to believe in the present than in the past, and in geography rather than history. If there was a dominant myth it was that America existed in its constant rediscovery of itself. In the period after the war this anti-myth took the form of feeling that big ideas were played out, that the novelist now had the job simply of writing about the things he saw and felt.

The very diversity of American life made for a diversity of fiction. But a similar mood existed abroad and European writers were quite receptive to American influence. In England, where the native bent for empiricism and urbanity had usually kept the novel from becoming too inflated, a rash of easy-going, talky, comic novels by writers like Henry Green, Kingsley Amis, John Braine appeared after the war. And even more socially-minded writers, such as Doris Lessing, or Alan Sillitoe, were more concerned with recording than with generalizing their observations. In France, the national weakness for the rhetoric of ideas naturally persisted. But for the leading figures of the period, for Camus and Sartre, for example, the novel was mostly a comment on contemporary life.

After almost a century of philosophical speculation and literary experiment, the novel had come back to more homely subjects and the novelist no longer thought of himself as the moral conscience in exile.

NOTHING LASTS VERY LONG these days, and now the tide is all the other way. The new sensibility is a swing away from civilization, a kind of de-civilization, and not in the name of some higher civilization. The key figures are Burroughs and Genêt, supported, as any new style must be, by lesser writers like Selby, Rechy, and Blechman.

But the transition to the extremes of writing today was made by Norman Mailer, whose first novel was a documentary of his observations, and whose latest was a documentary of his dreams. It has been pointed out that Mailer reversed the usual development of novelists, transforming himself from a conventional and popular novelist to a dissident one. Only recently, however, has the extent to which Mailer has gone back on his past been recognized, and mostly by his critics, who have been ranting against the new immorality. The accusation is not original: it was made against Joyce and Lawrence, as it always has been made against any innovators in sex or morals. And the answer to such indictments, as Leavis said, is that the business of literature is to raise moral questions, not to answer them. If Lawrence broke the rules, it was because he was interested less in sexual conventions than in fulfillment. The same obviously can be said for Mailer. But what concerns us here is that Mailer, in stretching the limits of experience, has come close to the anti-world of Burroughs or Genêt. I say he has come close, because even in so wilful and self-indulgent a book as An American Dream Mailer shows he cannot give up the established liberal world with its old-fashioned concepts of power and justice and heterosexual love. Even in his sexual forays, the messianic Rojack, who is out to save women from civilization, is himself trapped in the traditional opposition between work and play, fulfillment and frustration.

In An American Dream, Mailer's inability to accept or reject all of society is resolved partly by psychosis, a common form of adjustment by people half-in, half-out. The explanation—that escaped most reviewers—for much of Rojack's inexplicable behavior lies in his failure to connect with what he expects of the other characters or what they expect of him. The murder itself, the odd behavior of the police, the foxy calculations of Rojack, all add up to a fantasy as consistent and illogical as psychosis.

But the psychotic character in the novel cannot be thought of simply as deranged. The use of psychosis is a means of creating a new system of motivation that would not work in ordinary life, but does in a novel. Such a self-contained system of motivation was used, for example, by Gide in The Counterfeiters. In fact, motives in fiction are never real motives, since an imagined character has no existence outside the story, and there is no "person" to which his actions can be related. For this reason, extreme behavior can be given a literary form resembling psychosis. In the past, this was done to make murderers or sex criminals plausible—for example, Stavrogin, Lafcadio or Merseult. Lately, however, dreams and dissociations that border on the psychotic have become a staple of the new sensibility.

Mailer's efforts to flagellate himself into more extreme positions showed up earlier in his essays, though one tended to think of them as shock-waves to neutralize the opposition and not to take them too seriously. "The White Negro," the articles on Kennedy and Goldwater and the self-advertisements all show Mailer constantly straining to get beyond the conventions even of advanced thinking into a cooler, more neutral state of being. In this kind of world, you do not solve things, you experience them; you step up your personal life while cutting down on your involvement with society. But unlike Burroughs, who doesn't know where he ends and the world begins, Mailer is still preoccupied with politics and social causes, that is, with the idea of humanity which lies behind any belief in change and improvement, even self-improvement. No matter how hard he tries, Mailer cannot attain the state of historical amnesia or total personal detachment required to make one's inner life entirely self-sufficient. But the fact that he can't make it gives him much of his strength as a novelist—at least as far as those who haven't gone overboard for the latest in dissociation are concerned.

The contrast between these two major figures, Bellow and Mailer, is quite suggestive. Bellow, who started out as a loner, a moral prowler, has reached the ripeness, the mellowness, the confidence of the established man of letters. Mailer, on the other hand, after an assured career, now acts like a young writer, cocky, nervous, and unpredictable. Bellow is admired as a novelist; Mailer has become, particularly for younger people, a messianic underground figure.

AS WRITERS KEEP OUTDOING each other in destroying the past, each new breakthrough trumps the last one. Compared with Genêt or Burroughs, Norman Mailer sounds almost normal. He is, it is true, a little perverse. But with the help of Norman O. Brown, and some reinterpreting of Freud, perversity can be assimilated to the idea of normality. What we have in Genêt and Burroughs is something else: it is not the extension of "normal" experience to include what used to be regarded as abnormal experience, but a different kind of life, out there, in which dope, and crime, and sexual experiment are taken for granted.

Genêt is by far the most gifted and interesting figure, and for this very reason no longer seems so exceptional or so extreme. As with most outstanding writers, his genius justifies his aberrations, and connects them with more traditional ones, particularly in the plays, where the madness of his associations is made natural and plausible. Still, the life represented by Genêt is not the life most of us live, certainly not the outer life and only in part the inner life. Nor is Genêt saying it is a better or a worse life; it is just his. I am not here concerned with judging Genêt or his values. But, I should say that what we call morality is a constantly shifting and unpredictable combination of old and new values. Nor is there any rule tying us to certain more conventional subjects and putting others beyond the pale. It must be said, too, because of the sudden boom in moralizing criticism, mainly on the part of aging critics, that it is sheer cant to pretend one's real or fantasy life is free of the things that are dismissed as too extreme or immoral.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that Genêt, like Burroughs, is writing about a life we associate with the underworld. And the question naturally arises how the underworld became the basis of the new sensibility, which, after all, is taken to be suggestive of contemporary life in general. The answer, I guess, is in the youth, the advanced youth, not all of it, obviously, just those forceful and flamboyant enough to impose their style on the period, particularly on its writing. But this can't be the whole story. The new sensibility can't be just the style of a new literary generation, saying no not only to the world as it is but also to the idea of changing it. Even the most extreme spokesmen must be reflecting more than their own boredom or their own brand of fun. They must be expressing, the way extreme literature has always expressed what a period means, the fact that we are all in some sense cool and disengaged today. Don't we all play with the notion that the very madness of the world is what holds it together?

The new sensibility gives a purity of form to this type of madness by fantasizing institutions out of existence. Neither in Burroughs, nor in Selby, nor in some of the other advanced novelists, are there any social or moral institutions, any psychological norms, by which people measure themselves and against which they rebel. In fact, there is no rebelling; only abstaining and resigning. Hence violence becomes personal, and, given a bent in this direction anyway, sexual. In Burroughs we actually get a kind of sexual cannibalism, that doubles as a homosexual and a social symbol. In this sort of free-for-all, the family naturally disappears, too. In fact, the only place I know where Marx's prediction of the breakdown of the family is actually fulfilled is in the novels of Burroughs and Genêt. Generally in the fluid world of the anti-world, in which there are no recognizable boundaries, all the people act like orphans, as well as drifters. As I recall, there are no sons or fathers in Burroughs, only spacemen on leave from reality. Hence all relations are incestuous and patricidal and all distinctions of age or authority tend to disappear. Selby's tough adolescents, too, though always in motion, do not seem to be coming from or going anywhere.

It is interesting to note that many eighteenth and nineteenth century heroes and heroines were real orphans; one thinks of Tom Jones, Becky Sharpe, and Jane Eyre. Their rootlessness, like that of the modern orphan, made for mobility. But this was a device used by the novelist to create characters who were not bound by the stability of society, while the symbolic orphans of today come out of a sense of instability.

I have talked mainly about the more established and the more dramatic of the new novelists, because they have set the tone of the new style. But, of course, there are many others, quite gifted, though less formed. (I have not discussed John Rechy, who is very much like Burroughs, but not so good.) One of the most accomplished is Selby, who creates an imaginary violence, mostly sexual, that is made to look real by means of a stylized naturalism. Perhaps the two most original talents are Pynchon, author of that remarkable novel V, and Susan Sontag, who is better known for her criticism than her fiction. Miss Sontag, I think, is the most intelligent of the new writers, and paradoxically, the most traditional, though she has been taken as a spokesman for the new style.

Some of the writers associated with the new sensibility have not been able to make a complete break. But in the more extreme figures de-civilization has gone a long way. Fiction, particularly, has gone so far one can't imagine what else could be coming. The old development of character, which takes for granted that it is possible to grow up, is out. We now have instant realization, and instant destruction. As in science fiction, characters will have to be invented instead of being created.

I have been trying to think what I really get out of reading THE NATION. I think it's this: I cannot believe much of what I read in the papers. It is not even a question of whether they are venal or not, it is rather their accepted mode of presenting the news, a blank undigested recital of actions. These actions don't become facts, they don't take on the color of truth until they are put into some kind of perspective. THE NATION has been publishing long enough to have identified itself with one of the major traditions of this country, a liberalism that does not operate by fiat but one that has experienced enough trials to take into account all the actions and digest them and present them in the light of an honest concern for the public welfare. Thus, when I read THE NATION I think am getting something pretty close to the truth, give a little, take a little. This is a great satisfaction.

—Allan Seager

HENRY JAMES and THE NATION

LEON EDEL

A Pulitzer Prize biographer of Henry James, Mr. Edel is Professor of English at New York University. He has written or edited more than 30 volumes and contributes frequently to the book review columns of THE NATION.

IT IS NOT GENERALLY KNOWN that Henry James was one of the most consistent—and most prolific—contributors to THE NATION during its first fifteen years, those years when it came "to enjoy a fortune and achieve an authority and dignity" (as James later said) unknown to any other publication in the United States. James was twenty-two when he wrote his first book review for the very first issue of the weekly. Between 1865 and 1880 he contributed more than 200 essays, reviews, travel sketches, commentaries and theatrical and art criticisms; he was, in a word, a sort of critic-at-large for Godkin's publication, in New York, in Paris, London or Rome. He found time, in the midst of his writing of fiction, to go to a London Academy show and tell NATION readers about the pre-Raphaelites and Whistler; or to describe Paris after the Commune; or to take the readers on some of his vigorous walking tours in the Alps. On occasion he would even dig up a sporting event, say the college regatta at Worcester, or the Oxford-Cambridge boat race, viewed at dawn from a bridge over the Thames. For a very brief time he attempted parliamentary reporting, visiting Westminster loyally and discoursing on Disraeli and the grandiosities of Victoria or the vicissitudes of the "Afghan affair." But these excursions were short-lived. He was, first and foremost, a critic of the arts.

The prospectus of THE NATION had implied that literature was as much the weekly's concern as politics; and it had added that "sound and impartial criticism" would be published "in every case by writers having special qualifications for it." NATION readers might have wondered about the qualifications of a 22-year-old novice in letters like Henry James, who had printed one tale in The Atlantic Monthly and a few unsigned notices in The North American Review when Godkin invited him to write for the weekly. Those were the days, however, when criticism was anonymous; Godkin took responsibility for everything. The editor, moreover, had no doubts of the young man's talents or qualifications. He had been told by Charles Eliot Norton of his precocious literary gifts; and he had gone out of his way to call on the two Henry Jameses, father and son, in Ashburton Place, on the farther side of Beacon Hill, to enlist them as contributors. Volume 1 Number 1 of THE NATION contained a review by the senior Henry of Carlyle's Frederick the Great while the junior reviewed a Henry Kingsley novel. Young Henry James seems to have welcomed anonymity; his reputation was to be made in fiction, and he continued to write criticism "silently" for THE NATION, enjoying the freedom to comment as he wished, without having to watch his words. The unsigned article made for easy and for unselfconscious reviewing. Years after he was to boast that his early pieces were beyond recovery. But he had not reckoned with the persistence of modern bibliographers. There came a moment when THE NATION account books yielded their secrets: the names of the authors, what they had written and how much they had been paid.

Henry James's early reviews are recognizably youthful even though they pretend to be written by an older man; they have a certain edge and they are without compromise. He admonishes Kingsley to "forget in the first place, that he is an English gentleman, and remember that he is a novelist." With the high seriousness of his years, he chides Trollope as one who "just eludes being serious; unless it be the almost equal success with which he frequently escapes being really humorous." On the other hand he is quick to see George Eliot's "extensive human sympathy, that easy understanding of character at large, that familiarity with man from which a novelist draws his real inspiration." He discourses brilliantly on Dickens, on Flaubert, on Turgenev; his range is wide, and to list his reviews would be to list most of the important novelists and essayists writing on both sides of the Channel at the time—from Edmond de Goncourt to Hardy, Hugo to Zola, Mrs. Gaskell to Miss Braddon. He reviews Hawthorne's journals, Howells, Bayard Taylor, De Forest and Miss Alcott. As was always to be the case, he is a splendid critic of fiction and often a lame one of verse. His well-known lapses are his account of Les Fleurs du mal—"the effort of an essentially prosaic mind to lift itself, by prolonged muscular strain, into poetry" and his formidable assault, in Arnoldian accents, on Walt Whitman. He reprinted the Baudelaire, much revised, but he repudiated the Whitman. The recantation was emphatic—"nothing would induce me to reveal the whereabouts of my disgrace, which I can only recollect as deep and damning." The whereabouts were revealed as we know; and it was just as well for literary history. We can see the young man taking his false as well as true steps as a critic.

TO READ HIM in THE NATION'S pages is to see his growth. The sharp didactic tones cease altogether; a certain shrillness disappears. In the 1870s a humane critic emerges, wide in his interests, generous in his sympathies, singularly good-tempered; he is distinctly a man of his time, but like all gifted individuals he is also capable of rising above it. The critical writings become not merely a record of personal development; they reveal to us the standards of taste and discrimination which Godkin maintained in his columns; and the extent to which the THE NATION cherished cultural values at a time when the raw wounds of war were still healing. James constantly mentioned writers new to America; and for a number of years, after he took up residence abroad, he kept NATION readers informed of cultural currents abroad. Even when he misjudged the impressionists, he reported on them; and Americans reading the weekly were also well-informed about new plays to be seen in London and Paris. He did not confine himself to fiction in his reviews; he discusses the latest writings of Taine, Sainte-Beuve, Renan; and he treats the minor French critics, Schérer and Montégut. One can understand why Godkin gave Henry James so much freedom and all the space he needed. The editor had complained that American journalism was stodgy; and that American intellectuals "all want to write ponderous essays if they write at all." He found it difficult to get "men of education in America to handle any subject with a light touch." Henry James had the light touch; and he cultivated verbal felicity and charm. His prose of these earlier years had not acquired the mandarin qualities of his later time. It was fluid and explicit, epigrammatic, witty. It was criticism at its freest and most spontaneous; as James remarked, criticism for him was "an agreeable luxury—something like printed talk."

GOOD AS JAMES'S NATION reviews were, they were surpassed by his travel writings. He made himself into one of the foremost literary travelers of his time. This was the era when going abroad was still an adventure; and Americans remaining on their spreading continent liked to read of far-away places. James began by persuading Godkin to print sketches of certain American scenes—Newport, Saratoga, Lake George, Niagara Falls. These revealed him at once as an admirable observer of American manners. His

> The villas and cottages, the beautiful idle women the beautiful idle men, the brilliant pleasure-fraught days and evenings, impart, perhaps, to Newport life a faintly European expression, in so far as they suggest the somewhat alien presence of leisure—"fine old Leisure," as George Eliot calls it. Nothing, it seems to me, however, can take place in America without straightway seeming very American; and, after a week at Newport, you begin to fancy that, to live for amusement simply, beyond the noise of commerce or of care, is a distinctively national trait. Nowhere else in this country—nowhere, of course, within the range of our better civilization—does business seem so remote, so vague and unreal. Here a positive organic system of idleness or of active pleasure-taking has grown up and matured. If there is any poetry in the ignorance of trade and turmoil and the hard processes of fortune, Newport may claim her share of it. She knows—or at least appears to know—for the most part, nothing but results. Individuals here, of course, have private cares and burdens, to preserve the balance and the dignity of life; but these collective society conspires to forget. It is a singular fact that a society that does nothing is decidedly more picturesque, more interesting to the eye of sentiment, than a society which is hard at work.
>
> —Henry James, THE NATION, 1870

studies of the older society at Newport, the only spot where a sense of leisure was cultivated in the busy America of his time, and of the nouveau riche society at Saratoga, constitute for us today classic documents of their era. James evokes the wide "piazzas" of the Saratoga hotels, the sauntering wives and daughters, and their hourly changes of finery—"a hundred rustling beauties whose rustle is their sole occupation." He listens to the conversation of the husbands, self-made men with their feet up on verandah rails, their cigars tilted at the same angle, "hard nuts, which have grown and ripened as they could." He cannot resist adding that he seemed "to hear the cracking of the shells." He observes in particular the children; they will figure in his tales of the middle period; and no modern writer discussing "permissive" parents could offer better testimony than James's pictures of youngsters roller-skating in hotel corridors and sprawling asleep and neglected late in the evening in big leather lobby chairs.

Having established himself as a literary traveler in America, James went abroad in the early 1870s, largely counting on his NATION earnings to support him in Paris or the Rome of Garibaldi. Godkin paid him $50 for each travel article; and his papers from these cities and from rural England "from our special correspondent" are as fresh and as readable today as they were when they first appeared. Assembled in 1875, they constituted James's first book, Transatlantic Sketches, and many years later they served him in his volumes of English Hours and Italian Hours. James was a comfortable, sentient, easy traveler; he sought to resolve his impressions into concrete pictures; he sought also to give his readers that tissue of image and tableau which he admired in his French models, Taine and Gautier. He speaks of himself in these papers as "an observant American" or as "our old friend the sentimental tourist." He is in fact more than a tourist: for he watches closely the finer differences in national manners, which will become the subject of his fictions. He divides his attention evenly between the works of nature and of man; he decidedly prefers the latter, the flow of life into art, the flow of art into life. He likes the picturesque, but it must be the "human picturesque." Americans busy with their tasks could travel vicariously with this "special correspondent" in THE NATION's pages. He has an eye for houses and for architecture; he is a sophisticated searcher-out of paintings hidden behind altars in dark churches; he wanders with a keen eye for flora and fauna in English country lanes, or evokes the little flowers springing out of ancient Roman ruins. The sense of Europe was brought by James with great success to Americans busy creating their cities and their industries—to those very families he had seen in Saratoga who were about to venture forth across the ocean, there to become the further subject of James's "international" tales.

THE WRITER of thirty, traveling about Europe, had one complaint. The NATION printers did not seem to be able to read his handwriting. When he wrote about the "blood-stained pavements" of Paris the words appeared as "blood-stained garments." When he ventured to describe certain "idle vistas and melancholy nooks" some typesetter, of apparently ecclesiastical bent, read this as "idle sisters and melancholy monks." "What do you think of this!" the author exploded to his brother William, in a letter filled with a record of typographical errors and a sense of outrage. The affront to his prose was remembered into old age, for in the last piece which he wrote for THE NATION, in 1915, a reminiscence of the paper's founding, he spoke of being "never criticized, never corrected, nor disapproved, postponed nor omitted, but just sweetly and profusely and plausibly misprinted."

There was one period, however, when he was able to read his own proofs, and when he could smell the printer's ink and the fresh paper in THE NATION's own editorial offices. Henry James came to New York in 1875 to try a calculated experiment: he wanted to see whether he could support himself by his pen in America. Without becoming a regular staff member of THE NATION, he had from Godkin a free hand with books, art shows and the theatre: he was, that winter, THE NATION's critic of the arts. He saw Madame Ristori and George Rignold in the old playhouses of Fifth Avenue; he visited a series of art exhibitions; and he reviewed books steadily. I have told the story of James's New York winter in the second volume of my life of the novelist; how he lived in shabby rooms at 111 East 25th Street near a Dutch grocery just off Second Avenue, within walking distance of Madison Square, then the heart of Manhattan. He used to take the elevated down to THE NATION at 5 Beekman Street to deliver his copy in person; there he fraternized with Godkin, the assistant editor, Arthur Sedgwick, and Wendell Phillips Garrison. There was a story that Godkin actually invited James to take a regular position with THE NATION; but he remained an uncommitted free lance. He worked extremely hard that winter; three and four articles a week appeared in THE NATION and he was writing also for The Atlantic and The Galaxy and seeing his first travel book and his first novel through the press. Sometimes the entire arts section of the weekly was the work of James. He was paid from $12 to $30 for each piece, depending on its length. He wrote in all 70 essays and reviews during that year and some 40 of these appeared in THE NATION. He reviewed almost anything that came to hand: biographies of New England worthies, accounts of Fourierist and Communist communities in America, religious memoirs, the journals of Greville and of Dr. Livingstone, Taine on Paris, Hare on Rome—his racing pen worked overtime. But at the winter's end he was exhausted, and he had found time to write only one short fiction. He could fare much better in Europe; one travel article could yield him as much as three or four reviews. In his diary he speaks of this Manhattan winter as "bright, cold, unremunerative, uninteresting." And at the end of that year he sailed to take up residence in Paris.

He did not stop writing for THE NATION, however. In 1877, when he was at work on his novel The American, he found time to do thirty-one articles in Paris and London; and in the year of Daisy Miller—when he became famous on both sides of the sea—he contributed twenty-five reviews. But now his fiction was in demand and after 1879 he ceased to write fugitive journalism. The Portrait of a Lady was in the making, and his connection with THE NATION ended just about the time that Godkin went to the New York Post and the weekly became affiliated with that newspaper. James had thus been associated with THE NATION during its first great period, when it attained a substantial circulation and was a journal of power and influence. Its influence on the arts is more difficult to appraise. But it is safe to say that the quality of its criticism, as exemplified above all in James's contributions, set a standard for the new generation of critics.

In his autobiographies, written late in life, Henry James incorporated a long passage evoking the time of his first dispatching of "copy" to THE NATION when he lived in Ashburton Place. He speaks of the "premonitory gusts of April"—the history-charged moments in the spring of 1865—the end of the long war at Appomattox, the discharge into civilian life of bronzed and seasoned soldiers, the assassination in Washington and the progress of Lincoln and his "mould-smashing mask" into legend. And with these moments he evokes another significant moment—that of Godkin's coming to see him, young and untrained as he was, and the founding of the magazine. Godkin had become "THE NATION incarnate" and James paid tribute to his "vivid ability," his "admirably aggressive and ironic editorial humor." It had a quality and authority new in American journalism.

They had remained fast friends to the end, as James's letters to Godkin, preserved at Harvard, attest. It had all been, James wrote in his article (for the 50th anniversary issue of THE NATION) "the most copious chapter of experience"—a chapter not only in his own life, but that of American journalism and of literature. Future historians are likely to say that it was a significant chapter also in American culture and civilization.

My heartiest congratulations on THE NATION's 100th birthday. The magazine has had a somewhat checkered history under its various owners and editors but it always has had something to say, and has filled a very useful role in American life. It is good that we have a magazine of its sort going so far back into our history. It is even better that it should have its present vigor and make its present contribution to the understanding and discussion of issues of great public importance. May it celebrate its second centennial under an economy of abundance in a world of peace, freedom and fraternity.—Norman Thomas

THE NATION 333 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10014

Please enter my subscription to The Nation for the term checked

☐ Bill me ☐ I enclose $____

☐ One year $10 ☐ Two years $18 ☐ 6 Months $5

Add $1 per year for Foreign and Canadian Postage

Name______________________________

Address______________________________

City______________________________

State________________Zip Code__________

FIRST CLASS
PERMIT No. 1169
NEW YORK, N. Y.

BUSINESS REPLY MAIL
No Postage Stamp Necessary If Mailed In The United States

POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY—

THE NATION
333 SIXTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

(Continued from page 53)

where the country could not keep out of the war." Unlike the New Republic, which was strongly in favor of our entrance into the conflict, Villard's Nation was pacifist at heart. It loyally supported the war effort, but stressed the importance of "a peace of justice and the remaking of the world into a sensible, decent whole." Early in 1918, it published the opinions of various university professors on the "secret treaties" which Villard's Evening Post had laid before American readers for the first time. (The treaties previously had been published by the Bolsheviks, who found them in the archives of the Czarist regime.) In his Nation comment Carl Becker said:

> . . . Unless the nations adopt radically different ideals of national welfare and radically different methods of attaining it, the next war will come in due course as surely as night comes with the setting of the sun.

Harold deWolf Fuller could not breathe the fresh air that Villard was now letting into The Nation's pages. On January 31, 1918, the journal announced the retirement of its fifth editor. Oswald Garrison Villard was now to direct the publication with Henry R. Mussey, lately of the Department of Economics of Columbia University, as managing editor.

A few months after this development, on July 6, 1918, the editorial separation of the weekly from the Evening Post (sold to Thomas Lamont, brother of Hammond Lamont, who had been The Nation's third editor) was announced. The weekly was again completely independent, as it had been until its merger with the Evening Post in 1881.

Villard was in some ways as conservatively respectable as any of his Harvard classmates. But More and Fuller saw him only as a dangerous radical. When Fuller and another Evening Post-Nation conservative, Fabian Franklin, started a magazine which was intended to combat the pernicious influence of Villard's weekly, More gave it cash and articles and his blessing. The Nation survived, and rapidly acquired under Villard an influence comparable in extent, if not in kind, to that of the journal under its first brilliant editor.

II

Issues and Men: 1865-1918

The "pre-modern" Nation, from 1865 to 1916, expressed opinions on the major political and social issues agitating the United States, as it did on cultural issues like the debate over realism and naturalism in the arts. This brief history can discuss only a few of these questions, but may recall something of the stir and pulsation of American life as they were felt and to some degree affected by The Nation's editors and contributors.

Godkin's weekly anticipated, in 1865, the end of autocracy everywhere. An editorial in the first number, "The Emperor and the Two Sons," noted sardonically the decision of the French police to permit, after first prohibiting, a popular subscription for a medal to be presented to Abraham Lincoln's widow. Louis Napoleon, said Godkin—who had observed politics in Paris three years before—feared understandably this public "offering of republicans to a republic." It was Hamlet-like "miching malecho" which had "esoteric as well as exoteric significancy." The French people wished to be shut of the noxious nephew of Napoleon the Great just as American Negroes were free of their repressive masters. The Nation proudly quoted Mazzini's recent declaration that the United States had done more for the cause of republicanism in four years than had been achieved in fifty by European discussion; and the weekly went on to declare that "republican propaganda" was "inseparable from a republican establishment." Godkin wanted to export this American revolution. American democrats, his journal clearly said, were spiritually at one with Mazzinis and Kossuths.

Godkin, like Mazzini, was not committed to Freedom as an absolute good. He shared the great Italian's conviction that men's duties were as important as their rights, that free men had an obligation to act with the whole community in mind. Thus his position on Reconstruction, overwhelmingly the most important American problem at the moment of The Nation's birth, was governed by this rational dream: the emancipated Negroes, educated with the assistance of the Federal government, would be integrated into a free labor system in an industrializing South. No man, said The Nation in its first number, has a natural right to vote; but every man, "born a member of the state, has a natural right to become a voter by the unhindered attainment of the qualifications prescribed." While this view and this language were too tame for Abolitionist Nation stockholders like Wendell Phillips and George Luther Stearns, The Nation feared—as they did—the perpetuation of the Southern "class" system through control of voting by the whites. During that summer of 1865, President Andrew Johnson seemed, to Godkin, bent on doing too much too soon with the formerly Confederate states. His lenient Reconstruction plan (it closely resembled Lincoln's) was rapidly bringing them back into the Union. Urging, in its first issue, "Some Reasons for Delay," The Nation cited reports that some Virginia planters had decided to pay their freedom laborers "starvation wages," that the Negroes' condition in the interior of North Carolina was "scarcely better than that of slaves," and that similar conditions obtained in South Carolina and West Tennessee. "And yet," The Nation observed, > so far from being put on probation, subjected to restraints, and above all shorn of the power which has corrupted and seduced them, the Southern people find self-government forced upon them with such rapidity, that we shall to all appearances, have the Union restored by the first of August.

Proof should surely be demanded of the Southern states, said the journal, that freedmen would be able to vote on the same basis as whites. In no other way could these states' willingness "to become really one people with us" be proved.

Julia Ward Howe was meanwhile writing a poem called "The New Exodus" which appeared in The Nation's third number, and which ended:

So from your Southern Eden the flaming sword doth drive;
Your lesson is appointed, go, learn how workmen thrive;
Not sloth has fee of plenty, nor pride > of stately crest,

> But thou of God beloved, O labor > crowned with rest!

Wanting to know how the former Confederates were learning their appointed lesson, and whether they were preparing "to become really one people with us," Godkin had sent a young Harvard graduate, John R. Dennett, traveling through the South with orders to report objectively what he saw and heard. Dennett, whom Henry Holt later described as perhaps the wittiest man he ever knew, was until his early death in 1874 an uncommonly versatile lieutenant to Godkin. He wrote incisively on literature as well as politics, and he was prepared for the Southern assignment by a nine months' stay, during the war, on a South Carolina plantation. His anonymously published reports to THE NATION—the London Spectator reported rumors that they had been written by Carl Schurz—appeared weekly beginning on July 20, 1865, under the heading, The South As It Is. Charles Eliot Norton was to remember them as "remarkable," and they deserve to be republished. [See page 153 for excerpts.] Summing up his observation in April, 1866, after his long journey through the South, Dennett called hostility to emancipation there so great as to make Negro suffrage an inadequate means of protecting the fruits of Civil War victory. Negro voting > would in my opinion, be powerful at the present time only when joined with . . . the military occupation of the South until she gives guaranties which cannot be revoked.

Such guarantees had not been required by President Johnson during the summer and fall of 1865. On the contrary, as the former Confederate states were taken back into the Union, they enacted Black Codes which, while conferring some civil rights on Negroes, kept them socially in a state of semi-servitude. THE NATION'S comment that the future of "four millions of emancipated bondsmen" was endangered by the Codes was less dramatic than the Chicago Tribune's threat:

> We tell the men of Mississippi that the men of the North will convert the state of Mississippi into a frog-pond before they will allow any such laws to disgrace one foot of soil in which the bones of our soldiers sleep and over which the flag of freedom waves.

but it conveyed a similar view. In verses addressed "To the Thirty-Ninth Congress," and published in THE NATION for December 7, 1865, John Greenleaf Whittier declared, "We urge no conqueror's terms of shame," and exhorted the South:

> Keep all your forfeit lives and lands,
> But give the common law's redress
> To Labor's utter nakedness.
> Then shall the Union's mother-heart
> Her lost and wandering ones recall,
> Forgiving and restoring all:
> And Freedom break her marble > trance
> Above the Capitolian dome, > Stretch hands and bid ye welcome > home!

But the mood of the two leading Congressional Radicals, Representative Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania and Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, was much harsher. On Christmas Day, Stevens delivered a speech urging that the former Confederate states be treated as conquered territories until the rest of the country decided it was safe to readmit them. Sumner, a few days earlier, had blisteringly attacked the President, calling his honesty into question. THE NATION deprecated these declarations. Not yet ready to give up on Johnson, despite strong misgivings about his Reconstruction policy, the journal chided Stevens for using intemperate language and defended the President against Sumner's attack (which was "in very bad taste") by suggesting that he might have information Sumner did not have.

It was just such calmness—or lukewarmness, from another viewpoint—in THE NATION's treatment of Reconstruction, that infuriated its Boston Abolitionist stockholders. Wendell Phillips, who was one of them, denounced the weekly—his powerful, musical voice stirring listeners at an Anti-Slavery Society meeting in Boston—

> How uncertain is its sound! How timid, vacillating, and non-committal is its policy! Where has Mr. Sumner a more heartless and unfair critic?

Whereupon William Lloyd Garrison came to THE NATION's defense. He had helped found the Anti-Slavery Society, had once called the United States Constitution an "agreement with Hell" because it tolerated slavery, had been mobbed in the stree by solid, respectable State Street financiers, and had just ended publication of his weekly Liberator upon ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment. In a letter to THE NATION signed "An Abolitionist," he argued that Phillips was given to vituperative utterance, citing his 1863 attack on Sumner for having "betrayed the Negro," and his assault upon Abraham Lincoln as the "slave-hound of Illinois." Eloquent as Phillips was, said Garrison, his criticisms were daily becoming less valuable and less valued

THE NATION had defended itself the previous week in an interesting article, probably written by Godkin The article declared that THE NATION was not the official successor to the old anti-slavery journals, nor was it the representative of any body or association. It was considering the condition of the Southern Negroes as a "national question," not as a "Negro question." It respected Wendel Phillips as an orator, but disapproved of his love of exaggeration and his conviction that he had the pure truth The article concluded:

> Those who like thick-and-thin laudation of great "standard bearers" and "symbols" can find plenty of newspapers to supply it. In THE NATION they will always look for it in vain.

While declaring and demonstrating intellectual independence, Godkin was clearly in basic sympathy with the Radical position on Reconstruction. When Stevens and Sumner began to take the play away from Johnson in this field early in 1866 THE NATION was on their side. A brie look at the journal's position on three major legislative measures reveals how radical it then was.

The Freedmen's Bureau Bill was an effort to counteract the Black Codes; it sought to enlarge the scope and extend indefinitely the life of the Freedmen's Bureau, an extremely important government agency whose work in the South on behalf of Negro education and employment THE NATION had regularly been reporting (Godkin had hoped, incidentally that his friend Frederick Law Olmsted would be chosen to direct it)

Congratulations to THE NATION on its Hundredth Anniversary from the Publishers of:

DEAN ACHESON
Morning and Noon

FRANCIS BROWN
Opinions and Perspectives from the New York Times Book Review

JAMES MacGREGOR BURNS
Presidential Government: The Crucible of Leadership

ROBERT CANZONERI
"I Do So Politely": A Voice from the South

LORD DAVID CECIL
Max

RANDOLPH CHURCHILL
Twenty-One Years

MARTIN B. DUBERMAN
In White America

ANTHONY EDEN, Earl of Avon
The Reckoning

JOHN K. FAIRBANK and
EDWIN O. REISCHAUER
East Asia: The Modern Transformation

JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH
The Scotch

GERALD HOLTON
Science and Culture

JONATHAN HUGHES
The Vital Few

GEORGE H. KERR
Formosa Betrayed

WALKER LEWIS
Without Fear or Favor: A Biography of Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney

ARCHIBALD MacLEISH
The Eleanor Roosevelt Story

WILLIAM LEE MILLER
Piety Along the Potomac: Notes on Politics and Morals in the Fifties

MORTON MINTZ
The Therapeutic Nightmare

ARTHUR MIZENER
The Far Side of Paradise: A Biography of F. Scott Fitzgerald Revised Edition

BERNARD D. NOSSITER
The Mythmakers: An Essay on Power and Wealth

PIERRE VIANSSON-PONTE
The King and his Court

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, Jr.
A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House

J. PERCY SMITH
The Unrepentant Pilgrim: A Study in the Development of Bernard Shaw

EDMOND TAYLOR
Richer by Asia, Second Edition, Revised

J. R. R. TOLKIEN
Tree and Leaf

WALLACE TURNER
Gamblers' Money

WILLIAM S. WHITE
The Professional: Lyndon B. Johnson

B. J. WIDICK
Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States

Coming in 1966 a book by ROBERT SHERRILL

Available at better bookstores
Houghton Mifflin Company, Publishers
2 Park Street ▪ Boston ▪ Massachusetts 02107

The President's veto of the bill led The Nation to assert that he did not understand the significance of the Civil War: he saw it merely as the putting down of a rebellion, when in fact it had worked a social revolution which would be consolidated only when the Negroes were truly independent.

THE SAME DESIRE for full independence for the freedman actuated The Nation's support of the first Civil Rights Bill, another Stevens-Sumner thrust against the Black Codes. This bill declared the Negroes to be United States citizens having the same rights and subject to the same penalties as white persons. When Johnson vetoed it too, The Nation denounced his States-rights "mania," and called his veto message "one of the most discreditable state papers known to American history." It should be noted in passing that by this time —April, 1866—Godkin had lost respect for Johnson as a man. On Washington's Birthday, the President had charged in a speech to a serenading party in front of the White House that prominent members of Congress were encouraging his assassination. Johnson's opposition to the social revolution in the South was bad enough from Godkin's point of view, but this boorish accusation put him personally beyond the pale.

The President's veto of the Civil Rights Bill was overridden, and the greatly encouraged Congressional Radicals pressed on with a proposed Fourteenth Amendment. A draft of this measure, reported in January, 1866, had proposed a reduction in Congressional representation as punishment for states denying voting rights to the freedmen. (This provision was very similar to one finally approved and included in the Fourteenth Amendment—and never, to this day, acted upon). The Nation here disagreed with the Radical leadership, considering punishment a negative approach to the problem. The weekly suggested a simple prohibition of any exclusion from political rights on grounds of race or color. The Nation also parted company with the Radicals who wanted to include in the Fourteenth Amendment a provision requiring—in The Nation's language —"the consent of the Southern people to the disfranchisement of three-fourths of their own number as a condition of their readmission to the Union." Our salvation, said the journal, > lies not in restricting privileges, but in extending them; not in erecting a class for our defence, but in breaking down all class distinctions; not in perpetuating hates, but in leaving no man a reason for feeling wronged.

The Congressional Committee of Fifteen did modify its original disfranchisement plan, and when the Congress finished its work for the session by approving the Fourteenth Amendment and continuing the Freedmen's Bureau for two years, The Nation was satisfied. In sum, then, the journal's position on Reconstruction in 1866 was clearly opposed to Andrew Johnson's, and close, with nuances of disagreement, to that of the Stevens-Sumner Radicals. Godkin stressed the importance of education for the freedmen, and of avoiding undue punishment of the Southern whites, while Stevens and Sumner wanted to confiscate slaveholders' property, partly to punish them, partly to give the Negroes more leverage in their struggle for full emancipation. This gap between The Nation and the Radicals was to become a fissure by 1869. Significantly, when in March, 1867, Congress decreed martial law for the South until certain conditions were met, The Nation impatiently remarked that excluding rebels from the polls was "the only thing to which most of the majority in Congress seem to give much attention." And, insisting on the importance of Negro education, the journal declared in July, 1867:

> Every time Wendell Phillips calls for forty acres of land and a nomination for the Vice-Presidency for every black head of a house, a ton of schoolbooks, besides periodicals, ought to be ordered and dispatched.

To The Nation's regret, Senator Sumner's attempt to insure the maintenance in each Southern state of common schools, open to all on a non-discriminatory basis, failed to win Congressional approval. And Godkin began to shake his head over reports from the South, undoubtedly magnified, about the incompetence and corruptness of Negro legislators. But The Nation had not yet given up on Congressional Reconstruction: in November, 1867, it was calling "participation in the government" by the freedmen the proper medicine for their "weakness" of being misled by demagogues "on their first entrance into political life." Early in 1868, The Nation was still Radical enough to react to Andrew Johnson's removal of Radical Secretary of War Stanton, in apparent violation of the Tenure of Office Act, by going along with the "impeachers." Godkin had been condemning impeachment of Johnson since General Ben Butler (one of Godkin's bêtes noires) first urged it in 1866; now, however, The Nation was willing to have the President deposed "as an incorrigible dunce." But the weekly did not take the position of Horace Greeley's New York Tribune that no Republican Senator could vote for Johnson's acquittal "without making himself infamous." When Johnson actually was acquitted, despite the fact that Ulysses S. Grant had called on Senators at their homes to persuade them to vote for conviction, Godkin praised the handful of Republicans—Ross, Trumbull, Fessenden, et al—who had made the verdict possible.

ONE OF THE MOST striking ceremonies of the impeachment trial had been the procession each day from

In its 170*th anniversary year

The Gazette and Daily

York, Pennsylvania

salutes

THE NATION

on its 100th anniversary in the name of truth, independence, liberty, justice and peace.

the House of Representatives to the Senate chamber, with the gravely ill Radical leader, Thaddeus Stevens, carried by two strong men. Stevens, whose humor was a counterpoise to his Jacobinism, once asked them, "Who will carry me, boys, when you are dead and gone?" But Stevens died a few months later, in August, 1868, and with his going went much of the Radicals' élan. Sumner, who eulogized Stevens as a "hero statesman," was too top-lofty to be an effective leader; Stevens, club-footed but athletic, had also been down-to-earth. Reconstruction might have taken a somewhat different course if Stevens had lived longer, but during the summer of his death, military rule of the South was coming to an end. Former Confederate states were restored to Congressional representation—seven came back in June—and soon the formal nature of their return was underscored: twenty-five Negro members of the Georgia legislature were expelled by Conservatives who claimed they were ineligible to sit there; race riots broke out in South Carolina, Virginia, Arkansas and Georgia; General Nathan Bedford Forrest, who had gotten there "fustest with the mostest" during the war, and also founded the Ku Klux Klan, claimed a Klan membership of 40,000. THE NATION decried all this, but said that little could be done except elect General Grant President. Godkin was depressed over the failure of Radical Reconstruction to insure an effective educational system in the South; it can be seen in retrospect that the scant government support given to the Freedmen's Bureau, and the tragic decline of that agency into a political machine, were responsible for much of the subsequent evil. The establishment, under Freedmen's Bureau auspices, of Howard University and Fisk University, and of many schools, indicates what might have been accomplished, given sufficient will and courage at the top.

By February, 1869, the discouraged NATION was taking a State-rights position on the Georgia mess. Against the decision of the United States Senate Judiciary Committee that the Conservative Georgia legislature was illegal, Godkin's journal defended that legislature's right to judge of the qualifications of its own members. Reformation of the South, said THE NATION, could come about only through education and the growth of industry. THE NATION was to become markedly "conservative" during the seventies. Godkin shared with other reformers of the period—James Russell Lowell, Thomas Wentworth Higginson—a fear that could verge on hysteria, of the unwashed and illiterate. By 1870, THE NATION was plumping for peaceful co-existence with moderate Southern whites. In 1875, sickened by corruption under Grant (Henry Adams was later to remark that the course of political evolution from Washington to Grant was alone enough to disprove Darwin), Godkin observed that the impeachment articles against Johnson in 1868 "have a very comic air." He imagined a speech which Johnson, now a Senator from Tennessee, might fairly deliver to the Radicals; he would point to the failure of their own Reconstruction plan, and remind them that his own had been devised by Abraham Lincoln, and was one "an honest and a patriotic man might very well have supported." Writing in the mid eighteen-seventies to Charles Eliot Norton, James Russell Lowell commented on the "shameful" condition of things in the South, and announced himself ready "for a movement now to emancipate the whites." Jason Compton's snarl, in Faulkner's Sound and the Fury, about freeing his family from the "niggers," is only a degree more bigoted than that utterance of a former Abolitionist. Yet Lowell's view was paralleled in a NATION article of 1880 called "The White Side of the Southern Question." With Reconstruction at an end, the article said, the Republican Party should send leading speakers to campaign in the South as "formal recognition that there is such a thing at the South as a white question." The whites, THE NATION continued, were more energetic and able, as well as more numerous, in the South than the Negroes, and upon them the political future of the region depended.

It is depressing to find, upon turning NATION pages of the eighties and nineties, that the generous spirit of 1865 was moribund. This journal which had been deeply concerned to see the last shackles removed from the freedmen's limbs and minds, now spoke somewhat complacently, when it spoke at all, about Negroes. A piece which appeared in August, 1886, is characteristic: called "The 'Poor Negro'," its aim is to discredit as hypocritical Republican objections to President Cleveland's nomination of a Negro as Registrar of Deeds for Washington, D.C. While the objecting Republicans, said THE NATION, pretended to be opposed to the appointment because the man did not live in the District of Columbia, their real reason was that he was a Democratic Negro: Republicans did not want, by confirming the nomination, to encourage Negroes to vote the Democratic ticket. THE NATION praised Cleveland's readiness to appoint a Negro as "remarkable evidence of the decay of prejudice," and predicted that Republican opposition would hasten the day when Negroes would divide between the two parties "precisely as white men do." Grover Cleveland, while an estimable man in many ways, was to say publicly in for 100 years . . .

The Nation has been in the highest service to mankind, pointing to the dignity of each human being.

The UAW is a proud participant in this struggle to give greater dimension to human dignity and light to the dreams of all men.

UAW

Walter P. Reuther, President
Emil Mazey, Secretary-Treasurer
Pat Greathouse, Vice President
Leonard Woodcock, Vice President

1903 (when lynchings of Negroes were not uncommon in the South):

> . . . let us try to be tolerant and considerate of the feelings and even the prejudice or radical instinct of our white fellow-countrymen of the South who, in the solution of the Negro problem must, amid their own surroundings, bear the heat of the day and stagger under the weight of the white man's burden.

In view of this fact, The Nation of 1886 seemed willing to settle for very little "progress" for colored men.

IN 1893, GODKIN DID speak severely in The Nation of "Southern Lynching." He surmised that the number of sexual crimes by Negroes had been exaggerated, asserted that an official enumeration of these crimes was needed, and insisted that the Southern whites' notion > that women cannot, like men, live under the law and trust to the law for their safety, honor and welfare is another relic of barbarism of which the South must rid itself.

But this plea for the prevention of cruelty to Negroes is undercut by The Nation's sympathy for the moderate Southern whites who maintained that ignorant Negroes were foisted on them as legislators and administrators during the bad days of Reconstruction. Thus, The Nation quoted without comment the Philadelphia Bulletin's statement in 1895 about the plan of a political convention in South Carolina to disfranchise Negroes:

> It is difficult to find an argument against either the Mississippi or the South Carolina plan of disfranchisement, however much we may detest the race prejudice which has partly inspired it.

What was at best lukewarm advocacy of humane treatment for the Negro, and at worst a callous legalism which left him to the mercies of white men sick with race hatred, was found, in the eighties and nineties, not only in the New York Nation. The liberal enthusiasm of 1865-1866 had simply petered out in the United States. The fear of socialism and anarchism and of foreigners pouring into our cities with their un-Anglo-Saxon attitudes and languages, gripped many people who had once been Radical with Greeley's Tribune or at least reformist with The Atlantic Monthly. Thomas Bailey Aldrich, who was editor of The Atlantic Monthly from 1881 to 1890, wrote in 1892 a poem called "Unguarded Gates" which is in effect a "one hundred per cent American" answer to the famous Emma Lazarus sonnet; Aldrich took a very dim view of the huddled masses:

> Wide open and unguarded stand our gates,
> And through them there presses a wild motley throng—
> Men from the Volga and the Tartar steppes, > Featureless figures of the Hoang-ho,
> Malayan, Scythian, Teuton, Kelt, and Slav, > Flying the Old World's poverty and scorn;
> These bringing with them unknown gods and rites,—
> Those, tiger passions, here to stretch their claws.
> In street and alley what strange tongues are loud,
> Accents of menace alien to our air,
> Voices that once the Tower of Babel knew!

Godkin, himself the object of attack by American nativists (sometimes as an "Irishman," sometimes as an "Englishman"), was no xenophobe. But he regarded all ignorant masses as dangerous, and one consequence of his fear was Nation support in 1896 for poll taxes and literacy tests in Mississippi. "If honestly enforced," said the journal, "nobody who believes that some guards should be put around the ballot-box can object to them." Many Negroes during this period, under the able but extremely conciliatory leadership of Booker T. Washington, who emphasized the "dignity in tilling a field" and the need for colored people to begin "at the bottom of life"—and not to "permit our grievances to overshadow our opportunities,"—acquiesced in their own virtual disfranchisement. But around the turn of the century, new Negro leaders began to throw a searchlight on the degrading circumstances in which supposedly "free" men were existing. In a sermon preached in 1899 in Washington, D. C., the Reverend Francis J. Grimke spoke of what was actually involved in certain cases of Negro "rape":

> I observe that of the cases actually reported, of some of them at least, it is known and well known, that relations of intimacy had previously existed between the parties and that the cry of rape was raised only after they were discovered. That was true of the Negro who was burnt at Texarkana. A careful investigation disclosed the fact that he had been living with this woman more than a year.

In 1901, Monroe Trotter and George Forbes founded in Boston the bitterly satirical Guardian to attack Booker T. Washington's "Tuskegee Machine." W. E. B. Du Bois, who took his Harvard doctorate in 1895, the year of Washington's famous accommodating speech at Atlanta, published eight years later the lyrically militant Souls of Black Folk (which was highly praised in a Nation review), and became a leader of the Negro-intellectual Niagara Movement, which first met at Niagara Falls in the summer of 1905. (Gunnar Myrdal notes that it convened "on Canadian soil, since they met discrimination in the Buffalo hotel at which reservations had been made for the conference.") While the "radical" Niagara movement did not attract many Negroes, it did help bring about the founding of the predominantly white-led National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, with which the Niagara movement merged. The call for the NAACP, issued on the one hundredth anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birth, was written by Oswald Garrison Villard, who had already begun contributing to The Nation, and who was to become the journal's owner and editor in 1918.

IT WAS IN THIS new atmosphere of Negro and white liberal protest that The Nation, emerging at the turn of the twentieth century from its Rip Van Winkle sleep, began again to speak of Negroes with some humane urgency. A Carl Schurz essay in the muckraking McClure's Magazine led The Nation to recall Schurz's 1865 report to President Andrew Johnson on conditions in the South; Schurz had warned of the danger of the "re-enslavement" of the freedmen. Unhappily, The Nation observed, precisely such a policy had been carried out by the Southern whites. Rollo Ogden, a prolific contributor to The Nation since the early eighteen-eighties, was finally awaking to the IBM computers helped provide Olympic scores in seconds.

IBM computers help put better steak on steers.

IBM computer helps protein-starved children.

IBM computer helps 60 nations save lives at sea.

IBM computer helps locate rare blood.

In what new ways will computers serve you?

THE pictures above show some of the many ways computers are helping contribute to man's welfare—not only in the United States but throughout the world.

Computers were virtually unknown ten years ago. Yet today it would be difficult to name a modern product or service in which computers have not played a part.

Computers now enable men to multiply by thousands of times the research that was formerly possible. As a result, today's scientists, engineers and businessmen have greater freedom to think—and to apply their thought to human needs and problems.

Now—IBM's new SYSTEM/360

With the recent introduction of IBM's SYSTEM/360, the computer becomes an even more useful servant to man.

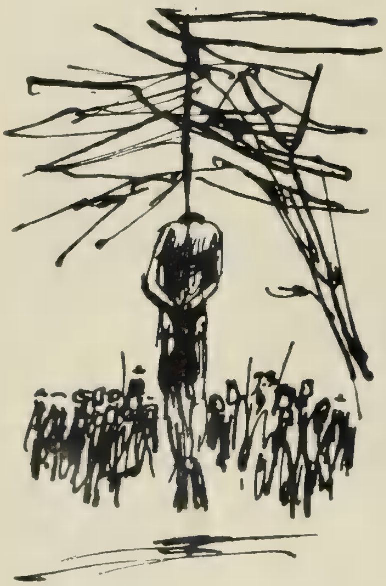
It is the first all-purpose computer system, the first built to serve every area of need in business, science and government. It will do more work for more people, faster—and at lower cost—than any computer system IBM has ever built before.

It, too, will help men continue to explore new fields of knowledge, and to discover new ways of making life better.

IBM

everyday nightmares of Southern life: on the unearthing in certain Alabama counties of a system of Negro peonage he remarked that this is what had come of heeding the Southern "let us alone" plea. The whole country, said Ogden, had a duty to change this frightful situation.

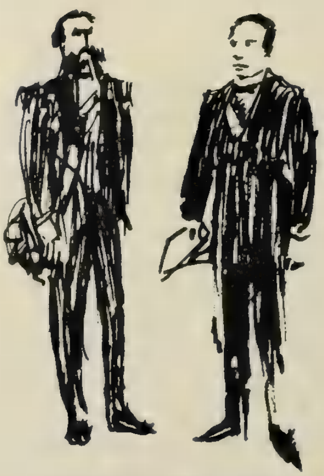
In addition to the writings of Du Bois, the publication of the Guardian (widely read by Negroes), and the general stir of protest in America, criticism from abroad was having its effect in the United States. In August, 1903, The Nation referred to protests from Italy, Austria and China against the lynching ferocities, and called its readers' attention to an important statement by President Theodore Roosevelt: the prevalence of lynching in this country, he had declared, disabled us from speaking up "in the old way" against wrongs and cruelties in other lands. The Nation, consistently anti-imperialist since 1865, welcomed this utterance by the strenuously imperialist Roosevelt, and pointed out that American cruelties against the Filipinos since 1898 had encouraged outbreaks against colored men in the United States. The same cruelties, as well as what The Nation regarded as American cupidity and hypocrisy in such places as Hawaii, Cuba and Puerto Rico, helped to turn the journal's attention around the turn of the century to the Negroes' plight in the United States.



Foreign Policy

Here it will be helpful to look closely at The Nation's attitudes toward United States foreign policy during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries: significantly, it was during these periods when the weekly was most aware of this country's role in international affairs that it was most alert to the Negroes' situation at home.

Earlier in this history, reference was made to Godkin's attack, in The Nation's first number, on the autocratic regime of Napoleon III. Godkin disapproved no less of the French ruler's attempt to establish an empire in Mexico, under the Austrian Maximilian, than he did of Napoleon's denial of freedom to the French people. In 1861, Maximilian had landed in Mexico accompanied by French troops under Marshal Bazaine. He was welcomed by Santa Ana, of "Alamo" fame, and his conservative followers, but was strongly resisted by the popular Liberal, Benito Juarez. Abraham Lincoln remarked wisely in an interview with a Philadelphia lawyer in 1864 that Maximilian's empire was a "pasteboard concern" that would "soon tumble to pieces" without our wasting "a man or a dollar." Nevertheless, Lincoln's successor, Andrew Johnson, quickly moved an army under General Phil Sheridan to the Rio Grande. United States action in the name of the Monroe Doctrine was called for at mass meetings and in newspapers throughout this country, and for a time it looked as though we would become heavily involved in Mexico. Godkin's Liberal views made him sympathetic to the Mexican Liberal Juarez, who was fighting against Maximilian, but the editor's opposition to "manifest destiny" led him to fear the consequences of American intervention. He was keenly aware of the private interests that would have greeted with delight United States "protection" of Mexico; what one writer on The Nation's foreign policy describes as Godkin's "vacillation" here was probably the manifestation of a "Liberal's" dilemma: what do you do if you can aid a foreign leader whose cause you favor, only by engaging in war—which you abhor? Allowing for the enormous differences in the stakes, and in the persons involved (Maximilian was no Hitler), Godkin's problem was like that of Oswald Garrison Villard, in the nineteen-thirties. He abominated the European dictators, but could not approve a war against them.



Maximilian and Juarez

If The Nation between 1865, when it began commenting on the Mexican affair, and 1867, when Maximilian was killed, emphasized sometimes the desirability of the Austrian's being "forced" out of Mexico, and sometimes the importance of our not being drawn into a military adventure, it need not be assumed that Godkin was confused or wildly inconsistent. The Nation spoke on one occasion of the need for "dexterity" in handling the situation, and an unwontedly belligerent article of March 1, 1866, boasting of American ironclads' ability to seize and hold Mexican harbors against French ships, may have been a psychological chess move responding to an ambiguous speech by Napoleon III a few weeks earlier. Certainly the tenor of The Nation's other comments on Mexican matters was not warlike. An article of November 29, 1866, noting that the French would soon be departing from Mexico, declared that it was not Juarez—who had been accused by a Mexican politician, Ortega, of ruling unlawfully—that The Nation had been defending, but rather the principle he represented: that every country knows its own business best, and is entitled to manage it, whether well or ill. Godkin called President Johnson's attention to the

CONGRATULATIONS
to
THE NATION
MAGAZINE

As long as publications like The Nation can survive the economics of honest and courageous journalism and the economic penalties of dissent from the status quo, the United States can honestly lay claim to a free press.

As long as the reading public can subscribe to a publication like The Nation, it can make an honest appraisal of the issues, and doing that can remain free.

The 1,720,000 members of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters congratulate The Nation on its Centennial Edition, and because of publications like The Nation we are optimistic over being here to congratulate The Nation on its second hundred years of championing the cause of a free and unhindered press in the United States.

THE INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF TEAMSTERS

JAMES R. HOFFA President	JOHN F. ENGLISH Secretary-Treasurer

pressing problems needing attention here in the United States; the country was already suffering, said The Nation, from an inordinate increase of "frontier life." The reference to American "frontier life" calls to mind a letter John Stuart Mill wrote to Godkin in May, 1865; acknowledging receipt of a copy of the North American Review containing Godkin's piece, "Aristocratic Opinions of Democracy," Mill said of the article,

> I consider it a very important contribution to the philosophy of the subject—a correction from one point of view of what was excessive in Tocqueville's theory of democracy as my review of him was from another. You have fully made out that the peculiar character of society in the Western States, the mental type formed by the position and habits of the pioneers, is, at least in part, accountable for many American phenomena which have been ascribed to democracy. This is a most consoling belief, since it refers the unfavorable side of American social existence . . . to causes naturally declining, rather than to one which tends to increase.

These comments tend to bear out the conclusion drawn by at least one recent American historian that Godkin anticipated Frederick Jackson Turner's thesis about the significance of the frontier in American history. But it was Turner's thesis with a reverse twist, since Godkin deprecated the frontier influence. He and The Nation opposed the Seward purchase of Alaska because of fear of the expansion of an under-civilized United States; opposed the Grant administration's proposed annexation of Santo Domingo; opposed jingo pressures in the eighteen-seventies to liberate Cuba from Spain—and Canada from England. (Godkin did favor "amalgamation," given Canadian approval, of Canada and the United States). In 1895 Godkin broke temporarily with President Grover Cleveland, whom he had warmly admired, over United States intervention in the Venezuelan boundary dispute with England. And The Nation is well-known to American historians for its denunciation of end-of-the-century United States imperialism in Hawaii, Cuba, the Philippines and Puerto Rico.

The Nation's break with Cleveland in 1895 was dramatic. Since 1884 when Godkin helped lead the "Mugwump" bolt by Republicans from the GOP Presidential candidate, James G. Blaine, The Nation had loyally supported Cleveland. The magazine's position on the 1895 dispute over the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela was sympathetic to Great Britain. If Lord Salisbury, the British foreign minister who was unwilling to submit the dispute to arbitration, were to hand the British subjects over to Venezuela, he would be transferring them against their will to the "rule of a semi-barbarous and unsettled government." Cleveland saw things differently. When he received Salisbury's notes denying that the Monroe Doctrine was involved in the Venezuelan matter, Cleveland felt "mad clear through" and stayed up all night writing a very tough speech, which he sent to Congress on December 17, 1895. The speech announced the American Government's intention to determine unilaterally the boundary line, and to fight if necessary to maintain that line. Godkin wrote to Norton that he was "thunderstruck" and described the week following Cleveland's message as "the most anxious I have known in my career." Godkin had come to admire Cleveland more than any other man in American public life. Now the President had joined the Jingoes, had—like the last non-conformist in Ionesco's play—become a rhinoceros along with the others. Somebody has observed that it is marriage not politics which makes strange bedfellows, but it is hard to imagine a stranger wedding than the one between Godkin and Henry George after December 17. George, exponent of the Single Tax on land, was miles apart, in his ecoomic and social thinking, from the laissez-faire Godkin. But in The Nation of January 2, 1896, George is highly praised for organizing an anti-war demonstration at Cooper Union. The New York Tribune, The Nation angrily remarked, had given "mendacious reports" of the meeting magnifying the number of hecklers, but the occasion had been a success. George had made "a powerful and effective speech in the interest of peace and common sense."

Interestingly enough, Joseph Pulitzer's New York World, which was to play a notorious role two year later in feeding the flames of Jingo passion over the sinking of the Main at Havana, exerted a calming influence in the Venezuela crisis. On December 21, 1895, the World declared "There is no menace in the boundary line, it is not our frontier it is none of our business." And according to Thomas A. Bailey, an historian of American diplomacy, the answers to Pulitzer's cables to prominent Englishmen like the Prince o Wales and William E. Gladstone, were "uniformly conciliatory and expressive of warm friendship for America," and had a "steadying effect on public opinion." The dispute over the Venezuela line was at last amicably settled in October, 1899, essentially along the lines of earlier British proposals to Venezuela.

While The Nation was disenchanted with Cleveland's stand on the Venezuelan matter, it could continue to applaud him for opposing Manifest Destiny in the Pacific Cleveland's White House predecessor, Benjamin Harrison, had at the end of his term sweetened the lives o many Hawaiian sugar cane planters by rushing an Hawaiian annexation treaty to the Senate. The Senate, however, had failed to approve it by the time Cleveland again became President; and Cleveland shared the view Harper's Weekly earlier expressed:

> "Shall we take Hawaii in, sirs?" that's the question of the day.
> Would the speedy annexation of that dusky country pay?
> Would the revenues from sugar and from smuggled opium > Counteract the heavy burdens that with them are sure to come?

But the American minister to Hawaii had been busy on behalf of annexation. On February 1, 1893, he had proclaimed Hawaii a protectorate, hoisting the American flag, and exulting to the State Department, "the Hawaiian pear is now fully ripe . . ." Only pluck was now needed, from the point of view of American expansionists, but a month later a special commissioner sent by President Cleveland to investigate the situation ordered the flag hauled down. The Commissioner, James H. Blount, proceeded to turn out a report which was a damning indictment of the whites' uprising that had overthrown Ha-

An Invitation to Charter Membership in a unique and timely new program

THE LIBRARY OF URBAN AFFAIRS

...and an unusual Special Offer to accept any 3 of these fine books (values to $32.45) for only one dollar each

1. THE HEART OF OUR CITIES by Victor Gruen. List Price $8.50

2. THE ROAD TO H by Isidor Chein & Associates. List Price $12.50

Urban Growth Dynamics

3. THE URBAN COMPLEX by Robert C. Weaver. List Price $4.95

4. THE DEATH AND LIFE OF GREAT AMERICAN CITIES by Jane Jacobs. List Price $7.50

SICK CITIES

5. SICK CITIES by Mitchell Gordon. List Price $6.50

6. URBAN GROWTH DYNAMICS ed. by Chapin & Weiss. List Price $8.95

Housing and Society
Glenn H Beyer

7. HOUSING AND SOCIETY by Glenn H. Beyer. List Price $8.95

Metropolis

8. METROPOLIS: VALUES IN CONFLICT ed. by Elias & others. List Price $7.50

9. SOCIAL CHANGE AND PREJUDICE by Bettelheim & Janowitz. List Price $5.95

The Chicago School of Architecture

10. CHICAGO SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE by Carl W. Condit. List Price $8.50

11. HEAL THE HURT CHILD by Hertha Riese. List Price $10.00

Mental Health of the Poor

12. MENTAL HEALTH OF THE POOR ed. by Riessman & others. List Price $9.95

WHY THE LIBRARY OF URBAN AFFAIRS?

Our cities have been called "the great unspoken, overlooked, underplayed problems of our times." But today people from many fields and disciplines are urgently seeking solutions to these problems and planning for the future. What has been needed is a single source of authoritative, up-to-date information on the death of neighborhoods, troubled schools, traffic chaos, explosive race problems, the "other America", and the many crises now sweeping the nation's urban centers.

THE LIBRARY OF URBAN AFFAIRS has been created to meet this need. It brings together – for the first time – the finest, most significant books on all aspects of urban life. Under the guidance of a distinguished Editorial Advisory Board, these books are chosen for their timeliness, their ability to cut through to the heart of a problem, to stimulate lively, even controversial ideas. Selections cover the entire spectrum of urban affairs, dealing with such topics as: urban planning, city government, urban sociology, education and welfare, housing, crime and delinquency, family problems, and many others.

As a Charter Member, you receive – each month – a special report on the current selection, often written by an outstanding authority on the subject. All selections are available to members at savings up to 40%. However, you need accept as few as four books during the next twelve months. (The Charter Membership Offer above counts as your first selection.) And you receive a free Bonus Book of your choice with every fourth purchase.

Why not join in this exciting new program designed for all those who are seriously concerned with the future of our cities.

Editorial Advisory Board

Charles Abrams
Housing and Planning Consultant

Herbert Gans
Associate Professor of Sociology and Education; Research Associate, Institute of Urban Studies; Columbia University

E. A. Gutkind
Research Professor, International History of City Development; Institute for Urban Studies, University of Pennsylvania

Michael Harrington
Author, THE OTHER AMERICA

The Hon. Arthur Naftalin
Mayor, Minneapolis, Minnesota

Anna Arnold Hedgeman
Committee on Race Relations; National Council of the Churches of Christ

Joseph D. Lohman
Dean, School of Criminology, University of California, Berkeley

Frank Riessman
Associate Professor, Department of Psychiatry, Albert Einstein College of Medicine

Christopher Tunnard
Director, Urban Studies Program; Professor of City Planning, Yale University

CHARTER MEMBERSHIP FORM

Library of Urban Affairs 59 Fourth Ave./New York 10003 N9

Please enroll me as a Charter Member and send me the three books circled below, for which I will be billed only $1.00 each plus postage. I understand that I need buy as few as three more books during the next twelve months, and I will receive a free Bonus Book of my choice after every fourth Selection.

Circle three:

1 2 3 4 5 6
7 8 9 10 11 12

Name

Address

City State Zip Code #

Please be sure to insert correct zip code.

LYTTON SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATION
Home Office: 8150 Sunset Blvd., Hollywood, Calif. 90046 • Branch Offices: Los Angeles, Canoga Park, Pomona

WHERE INTEREST IS COMPOUNDED DAILY AND NIGHTLY

INSURED

waii's Queen Liliuokalani, and whi put a temporary damper on annex tion talk in the United States. Edwa
P. Mitchell, for many years editor-chief of the New York Sun, used hear Godkin refer scornfully to t pro-annexationist Hawaiian whites the "sons of missionaries." The ej thet symbolizes Godkin's view American expansionism as mora repulsive. In the fall of 1897, wh the Hawaiian government vigorous propagandized in the United States favor of annexation, THE NATION irc ically linked some news from Loui ana to the Hawaii affair. Noting t indifference of the Northern Repu lican press, which was heavily pr annexationist, to plans to disfra chise the Louisiana Negroes, Go kin's journal observed that Haw already had a non-voting popul tion. The same people who did n care about what happened to Neg suffrage in Louisiana or Georgia Mississippi could easily grant Ha waiian whites the right to "suppre the suffrage of a lower race." Short thereafter, THE NATION report South Carolina's virtual disfranchis ment of its Negro population throu one of the clauses in its new Constit tion, and predicted wholesale ignorin of this by Republicans, who would course support disfranchisement Hawaii.

BY THE END OF the nineteenth ce tury, Godkin had completely lost h once-bright dream of the Unit States as a Promised Land. Wh
"sealed the fate of the American r public," as he wrote to a friend 1898, was our war with Spain. Th immediate cause of this "splendid li tle war," as Secretary of State Ha referred to it (without tongue cheek) was the mysterious explosio of the American battleship Maine
Havana harbor. The captain of th Maine, aware that American publ opinion, already hostile to Spanis rule in Cuba and recently inflamed b by the Hearst papers' publication an indiscreet private letter by th Spanish minister in Washington (h had called President McKinle
"weak and a bidder for the admir tion of the crowd"), immediate urged that judgment be suspende pending an official investigation, as to responsibility for the explosion. But Pulitzer's New York World published a cartoon captioned "The Only Atonement—Free Cuba," showing Uncle Sam drawing his sword to liberate that shackled island; and Hearst's New York Journal screamed: "THE WARSHIP MAINE WAS SPLIT IN TWO BY AN ENEMY'S SECRET INFERNAL MACHINE; THE WHOLE COUNTRY THRILLS WITH WAR FEVER." Assistant Secretary of the Navy Theodore Roosevelt, of whom one of his associates later remarked that he was "about six," wrote, "I would give anything if President McKinley would order the fleet to Havana tomorrow. . . . The Maine was sunk by an act of dirty treachery on the part of the Spaniards." Godkin, who on becoming editor of THE NATION in 1865, had hoped to help raise the standard of newspaper reporting, now commented in "The Week" on some newspapers' "gross misrepresentation of the facts," their "deliberate invention of tales calculated to excite the public," their "wanton recklessness in the construction of headlines." Attempting to counteract this sensationalist influence, the small-circulation NATION pointed out that at the funeral of the Maine sailors, the Spanish authorities as well as the people of Havana escorted the procession to the cemetery, where the bodies were buried in ground presented to the United States as a gift. But the American public, further intoxicated by speeches in Congress—among them Senator Proctor's of Vermont on Spanish concentration camps—plunged toward war. On March 17, 1898, THE NATION—in an article probably written by Godkin, who was later to seek out in Paris the author of the book here discussed—cited Gustave Le Bon's study, The Crowd, in order to throw light on the war hysteria. The people clamoring for war with Spain did indeed constitute, said THE NATION, a > body of persons animated by the same thoughts and desires, for reasons they cannot formulate, which as individuals they would probably largely ridicule or repudiate.

About ten days later, this analysis was strikingly confirmed by the public's response to the American Court

Which should you buy?

A tape recorder priced at $99.00 . . . OR another tape recorder priced at $179.50?

A tank-type vacuum cleaner priced at $41.95 . . . OR another model priced at $99.95?

The answers below—from the 432-page CONSUMER REPORTS BUYING GUIDE issue—may surprise you!

IF YOU buy "blindfolded" (as most consumers do) you are probably spending too much money. For example, according to our impartial laboratory tests . . .

- the tape recorder priced at $99.00 was judged equal in overall quality to machines costing as much as $179.50. (Possible saving: up to $80.50.)
- the $41.95 vacuum cleaner was considered a "Best Buy," and rated ahead of 31 others including one priced at $99.95. (Possible saving: up to $58.00.)

These ratings and hundreds more are in the latest 432-page Consumer Reports Buying Guide. A copy is yours as a gift with a one-year subscription to Consumer Reports.

Consumer Reports is published monthly by Consumers Union, a nonprofit public-service organization. It is not connected with any manufacturer. It accepts no gifts or "loans" of products for testing. It accepts no advertising. Its sole income is from the sale of publications to some 800,000 subscribers and newsstand buyers.

"Detective Agency for Buyers"

Our own shoppers buy, at retail, samples of products to be tested comparatively by chemists and engineers. Each issue of Consumer Reports brings the latest findings, rating each product by brand-name and model number.

In addition, the magazine reports the authoritative (and sometimes startling) facts about misleading advertising, deceptive packaging, hidden costs of credit buying, reducing diets, vitamins, and many other topics essential to home management. The Wall Street Journal credits our "broad appeal to the reputation for honesty and technical accuracy [we have] maintained" . . . while The Reporter calls us "a detective agency for wary buyers."

Save $3.00 Immediately

By subscribing now, you will see Consumer Reports' ratings on dishwashers, floor coverings, AM/FM portable radios, tires, ranges, lawn sweepers, compasses, slide projectors, color TV sets, electric heaters, food blenders and many other products — all scheduled for the coming 12 issues. In addition, you will get the 1965 Buying Guide issue which rates over 2,000 products.

All this costs $9.00 at a newsstand. With the coupon, you save $3.00 at the outset. And your subscription might end up not costing you a cent. Thousands have told us how Consumer Reports helped them save up to $100 a year and more.

GIVEN TO YOU with your subscription to Consumer Reports—this 432-page Consumer Reports Buying Guide issue

CONSUMER REPORTS
THE FACTS YOU NEED IN 1965

Partial listing from table of contents. Many products are rated comparatively; general buying guidance is given for all.

Air conditioners
Air purifiers Antifreeze Automobiles
Binoculars
Blankets
Broilers, portable electric Cameras
Camp stoves
Cap removers
Carpet underlays Clock radios Clothes dryers
Coffee-makers Cooler chests Dehumidifiers Dentifrices
Dishwashers
Dog foods
Exposure meters Fans Fishing tackle
Floor washer-dryers
Food blenders
Food mixers Frankfurters
Freezers
Fry pans, electric Garden hose
Glues Guns
Hair dryers
Hamburger
Hams, canned Heaters
Hedge trimmers, electric Insecticides
Irons
Knife sharpeners
Laundry bleaches, dry Lawn mowers
Margarines Mattresses
Paints
Phonographic equipment
Poultry products
Projectors
Radios
Scales, kitchen Scouring pads
Seat belts and harnesses
Sewing machines
Shavers Sheets
Shoes
Shop tools Sleds, children's Sleeping bags Soup mixes Spot removers Starches, spray
Sunlamps
Tape recorders Television
Toasters
Toothbrushes, electric Tuna fish, canned Typewriters, portable Underwear, thermal Vacuum cleaners
Vaporizers Vitamins
Washing machines
Zippers

THE COUPON AT RIGHT SAVES YOU $3.00 IMMEDIATELY FROM THE NEWSSTAND PRICE

HERE'S HOW:

You get the next 12 issues of Consumer Reports, including the Buying Guide issue for 1966 when published — newsstand price	$7.25
You get the 432-page Buying Guide issue for 1965 — newsstand price	$1.75
TOTAL	9.00
YOU PAY ONLY	6.00
YOU SAVE	$3.00

Consumers Union, Dept. N-1
Mount Vernon, N. Y. 10550

Please enter my subscription to CONSUMER REPORTS for a full year (12 issues) at just $6.00, and send me the current 432-page Consumer Reports Buying Guide issue at no extra cost.

☐ Bill me ☐ Payment enclosed

NAME ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY ____________ STATE ________ ZIP CODE ________

If you wish, you may benefit from the reduced rate for two or three years. Simply check the period you prefer.

☐ 2 years—$10.00 ☐ 3 years—$14.00

of Inquiry report. The report found the Maine to have been blown up by a submarine mine, but made no attempt to fix responsibility. A responsible American diplomatic historian has observed that even if the investigators were correct in declaring the explosion to be external, > it is unthinkable that the Spanish government, which was desperately trying to avert war with the United States, deliberately destroyed the vessel.

But immediately it was widely assumed here that Spaniards had deliberately blown up the ship. "Remember the Maine!" became a roar, and the amiable McKinley was from then on a chip on a tidal wave. The Nation's, and a few other publications', small voice of reason insisting that no evidence of Spanish treachery had been found, could not compete with that modern imitation of the voice of God: the sensationalist press. And such a responsible newspaper as Adolph Ochs's New York Times unfortunately made the restraint it advised seem dull in comparison with the vertigo of war. In one of the best short stories of the period, "Editha," William Dean Howells captured the mood of factitious virility in which the country sent its youth abroad on a "heroic" mission. The central character lucidly analyzes his own "conversion" to the cause:

> Why, I believe I was the first convert to the war in that crowd tonight! I never thought I should like to kill a man; but now, I shouldn't care; and the smokeless powder lets you see the man drop that you kill. It's all for the country! What a thing it is to have a country that can't be wrong, but if it is, is right anyway!

If The Nation was deeply depressed by our Cuban adventure, it was profoundly ashamed—along with Mark Twain and William James—of our treatment of the Filipinos. Our Assistant Secretary of the Navy at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War was Theodore Roosevelt, who knew, as President McKinley did not, just where the Philippines were, and cabled orders to Admiral Dewey to prepare to attack the Spanish fleet there. Gridley fired when ready, the United States cooperated with the Filipino patriot leader, Aguinaldo, in taking the islands from the Spaniards, and then American forces took the Philippines from the Filipinos. The official argument used to defend this procedure—that the mass of the natives desired American rule—was refuted by The Nation:

> Whenever a small force of Americans undertakes an expedition, the woods and hills become alive with enemies.

Not bands of Filipino "robbers," The Nation continued, were using terrorist tactics; rather,

> The American troops have done the terrorizing. Their conduct in some actions has been so ferocious, and their revenge in many cases so terrible, as to make them dreaded and hated. The natives submit to the Americans because they are afraid of them . . . .

30,000 Filipinos, the magazine estimated, had been killed by our forces.

Anti-Imperialist Leagues, originating in Boston, began to spring up in American cities. One of the most eloquent answers to Rudyard Kipling's exhortation to Americans to take up the white man's burden was given by a colored soldier in one of the regiments sent to suppress Aguinaldo's Filipino rebels: "Dis hyar white man's burden ain't all it's cracked up to be." Mark Twain, who had shared the view of many Americans that the war with Spain was a war to liberate the Cubans, could not stomach what was happening in the Philippines. He smashed icons in a Swiftian piece called "To the Person Sitting in Darkness":

> Would it not be prudent to get our Civilization tools together and see how much stock is left on hand in the way of Glass Beads and Theology, and Maxim Guns and Hymn Books, and Trade Gin and Torches, of Progress and Enlightenment (patent adjustable ones, good to fire villages with, upon occasion), and balance the books and arrive at the profit and loss, so that we may intelligently decide whether to continue the business or sell out the property and start a new Civilization scheme on the proceeds?

William James's declaration that we had "destroyed in Luzon the one sa-

McKAY

My Twelve Years with John F. Kennedy

by EVELYN LINCOLN

Personal Secretary to the President

In 1952 John F. Kennedy was a thirty-five-year-old bachelor Congressman who often walked with crutches, so thin his suits looked too big for him, so young-looking that another Congressman mistook him for a page. That was the year Evelyn Lincoln picked him "to be my boss and to be the President of the United States."

How little most people knew of the real John F. Kennedy is revealed in this book by the person who in many ways knew him best. As his personal secretary, Mrs. Lincoln was privileged to be an integral part of Kennedy's life for twelve years, epochal years for the United States, unforgettable ones for her. Her book is a warm, personal, and loving account of those shining years, an intimate portrait of a great man. $5.50

DAVID McKAY COMPANY, INC., New York

cred thing in the world, the spontaneous budding of a nation's life," was echoed by THE NATION, which noted, early in 1903, the indications by Governor William Howard Taft of the Philippines that the islands were in a "shocking condition." The journal pressed, and kept pressing, for a specific promise of independence to the Philippines. In January, 1907, for example, asserting that the American people were sick of colonial possessions, the journal called for a statement by the government "that the Filipinos shall have their independence at a fixed time." But it was not until 1912 that one of our major political parties—the Democratic—specifically pledged eventual independence for the archipelago. Woodrow Wilson took the pledge seriously enough to try hard for legislation that would grant independence within a few years, and at a definite time; however, as THE NATION disappointedly reported on May 4, 1916, this measure was defeated in the House of Representatives, which passed instead the original Jones Bill, giving more home rule to the Philippines, and vaguely promising independence some day. THE NATION praised Manuel Quezon, formerly Aguinaldo's companion-in-arms against the Spaniards, then against the Americans, and now leader of the Philippine independence movement, for acceptance of limited autonomy as a promising step. Quezon's view, which he had stated publicly to the Filipinos, should strengthen, said THE NATION, "the willingness of Americans to deal fairly with the Filipinos it represents." Contrasted with the approach of THE NATION to this whole matter was that of the newly founded weekly, The New Republic. In February, 1916, while a promise to the Philippines of independence in four years was still a live option in Congress, The New Republic asserted that the Democratic Senators weren't talking about the real motive inspiring them: they were willing to promise independence because they knew that the American navy could not defend the Philippines in a war with Japan. Whatever the mix of cynicism and idealism on Capitol Hill in 1916, the archipelago had to wait another thirty years for independence.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY said that he had arrived through divine guidance at his decision to demand the Philippines of Spain at the peace conference in 1898. It is not known whether McKinley believed his demand for the cession of Puerto Rico to have been similarly inspired. The Puerto Ricans accepted the change of suzerainty much more peaceably than did the Filipinos, but in August, 1900, THE NATION called attention to a leading article in a Puerto Rican newspaper which explained "why we abstained from joining in the celebration" of the anniversary of union with the United States. In the first place, said the article, Puerto Ricans participated less in the government of their own island under United States rule than they had under Spanish rule. Previously, three senators and sixteen representatives had been elected by Puerto Ricans to the Spanish legislature; now, there was one voteless Puerto Rican delegate in Washington. In the second place Puerto Rico had always had a revenue surplus, but

To The Nation
"Happy Hundredth!"

And to its readers, a great chance to try

THE NEW REPUBLIC

for thirteen weeks...for just one dollar.
(Regular newsstand cost $4.55)

When The New Republic's circulation jumps more than 89% in one year . . . When it is read carefully, quoted and used by congressmen, senators, cabinet officers, editors, ministers, professors and public officials . . . When America's finest writers appear in its pages . . .

There have to be reasons. Here are three of them.

Reason one: Washington-based New Republic editors are in constant touch with America's top decision-makers.

Reason two: The New Republic's editors and foreign correspondents are first-rate. Murray Kempton writes regularly for The New Republic. Gilbert Harrison, whom Newsweek calls "one of the finest editors in the business," is its editor-in-chief. Alex Campbell, formerly Washington correspondent for The London Economist, is managing editor. "T. R. B. from Washington," a weekly feature, is one of the sharpest political columns to be found anywhere. The drawings and cartoons of Bill Mauldin, Robert Osborn and Jules Feiffer always sharpen the focus.

Reason three: Its literary, theater, music, art and architecture critics—Robert Evett, Robert Brustein, B. H. Haggin, Christopher Jencks, Gerald W. Johnson, Stanley Kauffmann, Frank Getlein, Wolf Von Eckardt—and other regular editors and contributors — provide The New Republic readers with fresh and perceptive insights and solid opinions about today's cultural picture.

Walter Lippmann calls us a "necessary magazine." Perhaps you'll agree.

SO TRY US.

CLIP AND MAIL COUPON TODAY

Please add my name to the growing list of informed people who subscribe to The New Republic. I enclose $1 for the next 13 issues since I understand that the extra expense of billing me would make this bargain offer impossible. N-100

TO: THE NEW REPUBLIC
1244 Nineteenth St., N. W.
Washington, D. C. 20036

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________ STATE________ ZIP________

was now facing a deficit amounting to a million dollars. Finally, said the article in the Diario de Puerto Rico, Puerto Ricans now suffered many disabilities that had not been known under Spanish rule; particularly humiliating was the fact that the inhabitants of the island were not citizens of the United States or of any other sovereign power. "We have been granted nothing of what we were promised," concluded the bitter article, "and our condition is that of a slave adscript to a conquered soil."

Early in 1901, THE NATION reported that a delegation of Puerto Ricans had protested to President McKinley against what they alleged to be an ill-considered and oppressive tax law. McKinley having replied that he could do nothing about the law, THE NATION observed, with tongue deep in cheek:

> Nothing can be wrong. The American flag is over the island, which is being benevolently assimilated.

United States policy toward Puerto Rico gradually became less paternalistic, more democratic. In September, 1915, THE NATION noted with approval the passage in the island of a new homestead law opening 150,000 acres of old Spanish crown lands to the people. But a few months later, the weekly criticized the indifference of the American public to affairs in Puerto Rico, and noted that the new platform of the moderate Unionist Party had, while disavowing the independence movement, insisted on the importance of citizenship for Puerto Ricans. This request, said THE NATION,—consistent with its position since the beginning of the century—had been too long unheeded. At last, in 1917, the Jones Act effectively heeded it, in addition to giving the island a greater measure of self-government. How much THE NATION had to do with these developments it is impossible to know in precise terms. However, one student of the life and mind of Woodrow Wilson, during whose administration United States policy towards both Puerto Rico and the Philippines was liberalized, had pointed to the magazine as an important general influence on the young Wilson's thinking. And Oswald Garrison Villard, who was a warm supporter in the columns of the Evening Post and THE NATION of Wilson's 1912 Presidential candidacy, was what the French call a caution de gauche to the President for some time after his election. Incidentally, one of the most dramatic chapters in the history of the journal is that of Villard's break with Wilson—over the Treaty of Versailles. But this will be discussed later. Until the end of the first World War, the anti-imperialistic, pacifistically inclined Villard was, with declining ardor, a Wilson supporter.

One reason for THE NATION's enthusiasm about Wilson in the early

G is for a glamorous mountain setting, lovely in every season . . . for golf on 3 superb championship courses . . . gamesmanship that runs the gamut from swimming to trapshooting, bowling to horseback riding. It's for gala social activities including nightly dancing . . . for gourmet fare and gracious accommodations. 650 rooms; American plan. Group meeting facilities for up to 1200. Relaxing Mineral Baths. Nationally famous diagnostic Clinic.

Truman Wright,
Vice President & General Manager

Wesler Keenan, Manager

Easily accessible by rail, car and air.

THE Greenbrier
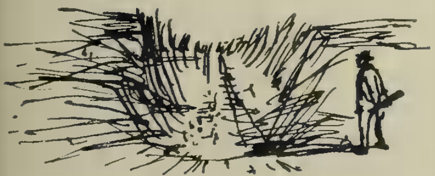
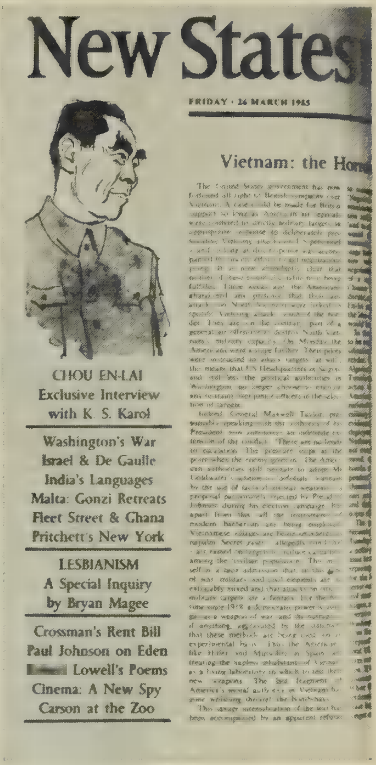
White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia
Telephone: 536-1110 (Area Code 304)

1900s was that he seemed gratifyingly unlike Theodore Roosevelt. Back in 1896, a NATION review of Roosevelt's Winning of the West (Vol. 4) criticized the writer's "impetuosity and recklessness of assertion," while recognizing Roosevelt's virtues as an historian. Roosevelt as President inspired more bitter comments than these in the pages of the weekly. "The Panama Dishonor" was THE NATION's description, in November, 1903, of the United States-inspired revolution in the Isthmus against Colombia. Citing assurances by successive American Secretaries of State—Seward, Fisk, Evarts and Bayard—that Colombian sovereignty would be respected in every way—the journal declared that Roosevelt's intervention was rough compared with the practices of the buccaneers who had sailed the Spanish Main. Roosevelt's one controlling desire, asserted another NATION article, was to "get that ditch"—the Panama Canal—whose construction by the United States the Colombian Senate had refused to authorize on United States terms. (France had made what Colombia considered a better proposal for the building of the canal.) Immediately after the artificial Panamanian revolution, Roosevelt recognized the republic of Panama, and negotiated a treaty paying Panama the sum Colombia had rejected, in return for the grant of a ten-mile wide zone. "An Honorable Way Out" of this big stick situation was suggested in THE NATION at the end of December, 1903: since Colombia, as well as Panama and the United States, really wanted a canal, the people of Panama should again be merged in the sovereignty of Colombia, and Colombia should then validate all the acts of independent Panama, including ratification of the treaty. Under this NATION plan, Colombia would have been obliged to accept the United States terms she had originally rejected, but the Roosevelt who later boasted, "I took the



A SPECIAL CENTENNIAL OFFER FROM BRITAIN'S LEADING VIEWSPAPER: 40 ISSUES FOR ONLY $5!



New States

FRIDAY · 26 MARCH 1965

Vietnam: the Hom

CHOU EN-LAI
Exclusive Interview with K. S. Karol

Washington's War
Israel & De Gaulle
India's Languages
Malta: Gonzi Retreats
Fleet Street & Ghana
Pritchett's New York

LESBIANISM
A Special Inquiry
by Bryan Magee

Crossman's Rent Bill
Paul Johnson on Eden [illegible] Lowell's Poems
Cinema: A New Spy
Carson at the Zoo

Britain's NEW STATESMAN, a radical stripling of 52, greets a centenarian friend with a special 'get acquainted' offer to mark the occasion: 40 weeks' issues for only $5—saving over 40% of the regular rate.

Of the NEW STATESMAN, Newsweek said recently: 'Week after week it nags, preaches, and reasons with subscribers in the White House, the Kremlin, and the Elysée Palace, as well as in Whitehall and Westminster'; while Time called it 'Britain's leading organ of dissent'. In the NEW STATESMAN comment is free and forthright. Its distinguished contributors review the current scene with authority, candour and wit. Its political and social comment is pungent. Its literary, arts and entertainments sections carry some of the finest critical writing of our time. Join the half million all over the world who enjoy this weekly mental tonic! Clip the coupon and mail today!

New Statesman

for thinking people everywhere

For an informed view of British life and British politics, for a British view of America's politics and culture, for a window on the whole world scene, thinking people take the NEW STATESMAN direct from London every week.

MAIL THIS COUPON NOW!

To: NEW STATESMAN
Great Turnstile, London WC1, England

I accept your 'get acquainted' 40 weeks offer and enclose $5 (check, cash or order). I am not already a reader.

Name ....

Address ....

....

.... N2

Canal Zone" was in no mood for any compromise at all.

It has been mentioned that Henry George, the American advocate of the "Single Tax" whose writing strongly influenced the Fabian Socialists in England, was congratulated by THE NATION for his opposition to President Grover Cleveland's policy in the Venezuelan border crisis. The paradox of the economically laissez-faire NATION joining hands with economic "radicals," because both the magazine and the radicals were opposed to colonialism, was illustrated on other occasions around the turn of the century. For example, in 1896 THE NATION noted that the Socialists in Germany had been directing their attacks more and more upon militarism, "which they characterize as the systematic fleecing of the workingman in the interest of a soldier class." The magazine observed:

> They are about right. . . . it is hardly too much to say that international socialism is at present about the most promising influence that is making for the disarmament of Europe.

It cannot be stressed too strongly that the journal which thus praised "international socialism" was anti-Marxist and laissez-faire. During the muckraking years at the beginning of the twentieth century, the journal was to remain a most cautious critic, and always from a nineteenth century Liberal standpoint, of the "trusts." But to the extent that "my enemy's enemy is my friend," THE NATION of that era was a friend of the anti-militaristic Socialists. There is another point to be made here. Oswald Garrison Villard, who while never a Socialist was far more sympathetic to socialism than were men like Godkin, Garrison and Lamont, became a more and more important influence on NATION policy during the early years of the twentieth century. Only when Villard actually took over the weekly in 1918 did the magazine become "radical" (though not socialistic) during his editorship, but there was a distinct difference between the tone of Villard's articles on social questions during the early nineteen-hundreds, and the tone of pieces by the more staid Rollo Ogden and Fabian Franklin.

Railroads and Laissez Faire

Ogden and Franklin were on matters social and economic the legitimate sons of E. L. Godkin. When THE NATION got under way in 1865, Godkin was—while chiefly concerned with Reconstruction—worried about the growth of monopolies in the United States. The "invisible hand" that Adam Smith had seen as reconciling private interest and public good appeared to be inert. In September, 1865, a NATION editorial commenting on the "shocking slaughters" that had taken place recently on the railroads (there had just been a terrible collision on the Long Island road), asserted that corporations in the United States had acquired > a degree of power and exemption from control to which they have nowhere else been as yet able to attain. Such concentrations of wealth and power in the hands of a few persons not sovereign, have not been witnessed in modern times since the overthrow of the feudal barons.

A salute to The Nation from the publisher of the nation's smash best seller

John le Carré's
THE LOOKING GLASS
WAR

The superb new novel by the author of THE SPY WHO CAME IN FROM THE COLD

At all bookstores • $4.95
CMcC COWARD-McCANN, INC.

A few weeks later THE NATION called for national regulation of the railroads, pointing to the enormous power of railroad corporations in various states:

> What power commands at Trenton? Is it not the Camden and Amboy? What at Harrisburg? Is it not the Pennsylvania Central? What at Albany? Is it not the New York Central?

Significantly, just as Charles Sumner in the Senate referred to one of these railroads as a "usurpation with all the pretensions of state rights, hardly less flagrant or pernicious than those which have ripened in bloody rebellion," THE NATION too linked the principle of freedom of transportation to the principle of freedom for the Negroes:

> One thread runs through all the proposed amendments of the Constitution—equality of states and citizens. We invoke the same principle in demanding the overthrow of railroad monopolies, for which no amendment is needed. . . .

While supporting a "Bill to Facilitate Communication Among the States" (which, when it became law in 1866, slightly inhibited the states' power to grant monopolistic privileges), THE NATION was also proposing "to make safety pay" on the railroads by attaching a pecuniary penalty to every injury. Such a penalty the railroad companies would regard "as a loss to be avoided, like other losses, by the general good management of their work." Congress did not adopt the proposal, but THE NATION kept up a steady barrage from 1865 to 1868 against the railroad monopolies' disregard of the public safety and convenience. "A passenger is treated," said one NATION writer, "as a parcel of freight"; the individual was helpless, but it "might do some good to form a Railroad Company Prosecution Society." In 1868 the machinations of such robber barons as Drew, Fiske, Gould and Vanderbilt—which the magazine circumstantially described—led the weekly to shift its focus to the financing and management of the railroads. Since Godkin's journal was soon to take a dim view of regulation by the national government of anything at all, it is interesting to see what THE NATION was saying about the railroads in 1868. Their construction was frequently made possible, the weekly pointed out, through the sale of mortgage bonds which put the railways in debt for much more than they were actually worth. As long as a road did not earn more than enough to pay expenses and interest on the mortgage bonds, no dividends could be paid on the stock. In order to pay such dividends, many railroad managers gave in to the temptation to cut down on expenditures for the upkeep of their roads. This practice resulted in deterioration of the roads, and more money would have to be borrowed by the companies to keep them from being ruined. Eventually, the roads found it impossible to borrow money, accidents became more common, income was no longer sufficient to pay expenses and interest on the mortgage bonds.

> Then the mortgage is foreclosed, the property sold at auction; if fortunate, the road sells at its full value, the amount of the mortgage is fully realized, and the millions of stock held by the unsuspecting public are swept away and vanish into thin air.

While many well-managed roads existed, excessive adherence in the United States to the policy of laissez faire "argued the inevitability of greater government control of the railroads." J. N. Pomeroy, an expert on constitutional law, argued some weeks later in THE NATION that Congress had the right to regulate interstate railway commerce. The cases he cited as precedents—such as Gibbons v. Ogden, in which John Marshall had handed down the decision, concerned water transportation, but Pomeroy was plumping for an elastic interpretation of the Constitution, for a recognition of its > faculty of adaptation to the changes in the forms of conducting the activities of life, and to the progress in the material arts.

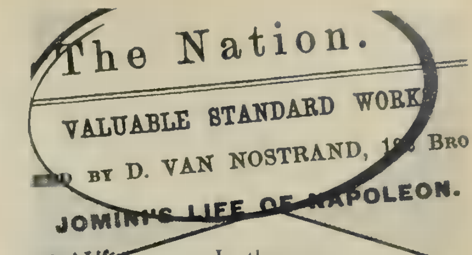
Interestingly, and consistently enough, THE NATION took during its early years a similarly pragmatic view of the Constitution in treating the Reconstruction issue. Thus, without saying that the Reconstruction Act of March 2, 1867—engineered chiefly by Thaddeus Stevens—was constitutional, the journal attacked President Johnson's veto-denial of its constitutionality by asking where he had got the power to impose the abolition of slavery on the Southern states. And just as the magazine gradually came to interpret the Constitution strictly in order to prevent what it regarded as a corrupt Grant regime from intervening in the South, so it gradually shifted to a strict view of what the "commerce clause" of the Constitution permitted in the way of railroad regulation. Compare Pomeroy's 1868 article, with its emphasis on the Constitution's "faculty of adaptation" with one that appeared



The Nation.
VALUABLE STANDARD WORK
BY D. VAN NOSTRAND, JOMINI'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

In the very first issue of The Nation, July 6, 1865, VAN NOSTRAND advertised Jomini's Life of Napoleon, Jomini's Grand Military Operations and Holley's Ordnance and Armor. Now, one hundred years later, we call to your attention these books of current interest:

HOFFA AND THE TEAMSTERS
A Study of Union Power
RALPH and ESTELLE JAMES (coming in October) $7.50

THE ABNORMAL PERSON AND HIS WORLD
An Introduction to Psychopathology
PAUL J. STERN $6.50

DULLES ON DIPLOMACY
ANDREW H. BERDING $4.95

VISITORS TO THE UNITED STATES AND HOW THEY SEE US
BRYANT M. WEDGE $4.95

WOODROW WILSON: REFORM GOVERNOR
A Documentary Narrative
DAVID W. HIRST $4.95

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.
Publishers since 1848
120 Alexander Street
Princeton, New Jersey 08540

in The Nation six years later. In January, 1874, a committee of the House of Representatives reported that Congress's power to "regulate commerce" among the states included the power to fix freight charges. The Nation protested in these terms:

> To "regulate commerce" is such a vague general term that it is absolutely necessary to go back to the time of its introduction to know what its design was, and if there is anything clear in the world it is that in the year 1787 no one in the world supposed it to have anything to do with freight rates charged by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy or the New York Central, but that what the framers did was to enable the Congress to prevent the states from controlling their commercial relations with each other.

What had happened between 1868 and 1874? Grant's woeful presidency, and the Granger movement in the West.

There is a story that when Ulysses S. Grant was a boy, an itinerant phrenologist predicted—as a practical joke on the Grant family—that Ulysses would become President of the United States. (Ulysses, to his credit, is reported to have been terrified at the prospect). The joking phrenologist proved to be a better prophet than the Nation writer who in May, 1868, declared:

> Grant's election will afford the best chance that has ever been offered of a reform in the civil service . . . . Grant is not a regular politician. He will be the first President the country has had for a long day on whom old party doctrines, as to 'spoils' and 'claims' will have no influence. . . . He has shown . . . . in his administration of the army, that he knows a good man when he sees him. . . .

THE NATION, OF COURSE, was not alone in looking to Grant as a political savior. He shone, in Republicans' eyes, by comparison with Andrew Johnson who had just missed being expelled from the White House. Harper's Weekly not only supported Grant warmly in 1868, but four years later declared with a straight face that his administration had been, on the whole, satisfactory. Godkin, on the other hand, decided not more than a year after Grant's accession to the Presidency that he was knuckling under dangerously to the "spoilsmen" in the Republican Party; the appointment of the notorious General Sickles as American minister to Spain, taken together with Grant's refusal to stand behind Secretary of the Interior Jacob D. Cox, whose scalp was demanded by certain Republican politicians, disgusted the journal's editor. Cox had committed the unpardonable sin of effecting civil service reform in his own department, of making appointments under a merit system rather than under the going spoils system. When Grant permitted him to resign—Cox had evidently decided to do so in order to spare Grant embarrassment—The Nation spoke of the "wreck of General Grant's fame." A year later, in December, 1871, the journal pointed to the "numerous and heavy frauds and defalcations" that had marred Grant's administration, and in the spring of 1872 Godkin was one of many disenchanted Republicans who met at a "Liberal Republican" nominating convention in Cincinnati. What men like Godkin and Carl Schurz and Lyman Trumbull and Edward Atkinson wanted to do was to nominate for President a man committed to civil service reform and free trade. They had in mind the distinguished Charles Francis Adams, son of John Quincy Adams. To their sick amazement, the popular choice of the convention proved to be Horace Greeley, who had crusaded in his New York Tribune for a protective tariff, and whose interest in civil service reform was undetectable. Finding Greeley's nomination to be the country's "greatest disappointment since the first battle of Bull Run," and seeing no way out of what he described to Schurz as "the wretched mess," Godkin held his nose and gave Grant The Nation's endorsement for a second term. In the midst of the electoral campaign, the New York Sun published letters revealing the Credit Mobilier swindle: a group of stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad had organized a construction company to build the road, made generous contracts with themselves that depleted large Congressional grants to the Union Pacific, and in order to forestall any Congressional investigation had placed Credit Mobilier stock "where it will produce the most good to us," as one of the letters said. Among those whose reputations were smirched by this scandal was Grant's Vice-President, Schuyler Colfax.

An important Nation editorial inspired by the Credit Mobilier affair demanded that the national government

> let trade, and commerce, and manufacturers, and steamboats, and railroads, and telegraphs alone. It cannot touch them without breeding corruption.

Thus in reaction against the corruption of the Grant administration, The Nation adopted during the early eighteen-seventies a more extreme laissez-faire policy than it had ever advocated. There is a striking contrast between the 1873 editorial quoted above, and one published in 1868 which noted approvingly proposals in Congress to place all insurance companies in the United States under control of the government, to provide for the management of all telegraph lines by the Post Office Department, and to look into the condition of railroads in all parts of the country. Specifically, the last-mentioned proposal, made in the House of Representatives, instructed a House committee to consider the constitutionality of a law to regulate railroads so as to secure the safety of passengers, uniform and equitable charges for freight and the transportation of property, and proper connection between roads for the transportation of passengers and freight.

PROPOSALS VERY much like those for regulation of the railroads which The Nation had approved in the eighteen-sixties were being made, successfully, in several mid-Western states in the early eighteen-seventies. But they were now being made by farmers organized as the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, and Godkin found them to be dangerously "confiscatory." In 1873 the Grangers announced their intention of obtaining, both at Washington and in state legislatures, measures to control and limit "the rates and charges of existing lines of transportation." The magazine asked the Grangers to consider the "facts" of the situation, which were—briefly—that cheap transportation could be permanently secured

YUGOSLAV PUBLICATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION RATES

REVIEW, illustrated Yugoslav monthly magazine on current events. $2.20

SOCIALIST THOUGHT AND PRACTICE, quarterly theoretical and informative review, $2.00

YUGOSLAV SURVEY, quarterly record of facts and documents. $5.00

REVIEW OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, fortnightly magazine; Yugoslav and foreign authors, $3.40.

YUGOSLAV REVIEW OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, 3 times a year, $4.50

YUGOSLAV EXPORT, illustrated economic monthly; $5.00

ECONOMIC REVIEW, monthly publication $10.00

YUGOSLAV LIFE, monthly newsletter on political, economic, cultural and other aspects of Yugoslavia, $1.20 per year.

AVAILABLE THROUGH JUGOSLAVENSKA KNJIGA
P. O. Box 36, BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA
AND ITS FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVES

"There is never an instant's truce between virtue and vice."

HENRY DAVID THOREAU
(1817-1862)

The Nation's past is a hundred years of eloquent dissent, of loyal opposition to contemporary cliché and bigotry. We, who are human beings in a small world but citizens of a large country, owe The Nation a special debt of gratitude for every issue it has published. Its staunch defense of liberty, its firm dedication to free enquiry, its devotion to freedom and equality constantly remind us that there can never be a "truce between virtue and vice."

The hundreds of thousands of organized workers in the men's and boys' apparel industry sincerely wish The Nation many, many more years in which to serve as a strong voice of reason.

Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America
AFL-CIO

Jacob S. Potofsky General President • Frank Rosenblum General Secretary-Treasurer • Hyman Blumberg Executive Vice President

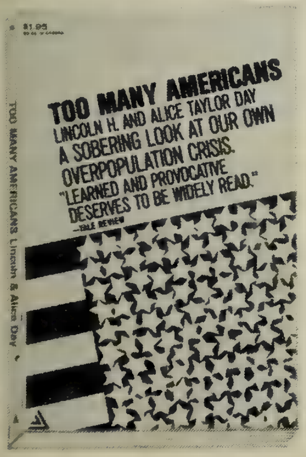
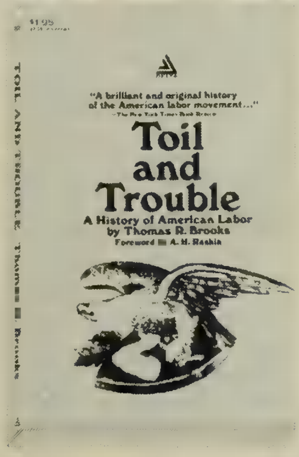
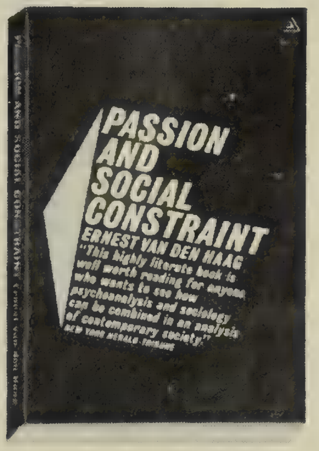
DELTA BOOKS
For the Age of Continuing Revolution



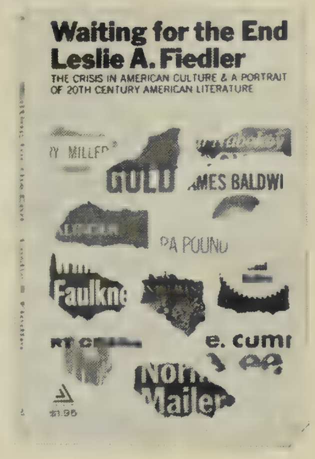
$1.95
TOO MANY AMERICANS
LINCOLN H. AND ALICE TAYLOR DAY
A SOBERING LOOK AT OUR OWN OVERPOPULATION CRISIS.
"LEARNED AND PROVOCATIVE DESERVES TO BE WIDELY READ."
—YALE REVIEW
TOO MANY AMERICANS Lincoln & Alice Day



$1.95
"A brilliant and original history of the American labor movement..."
Toil and Trouble
A History of American Labor
by Thomas R. Brooks
Foreword by A. H. Raskin
TOIL AND TROUBLE Thomas R. Brooks



PASSION AND SOCIAL CONSTRAINT
ERNEST VAN DEN HAAG
"This highly literate book is well worth reading for anyone who wants to see how psychoanalysis and sociology can be combined in an analysis of contemporary society."
NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE



Waiting for the End
Leslie A. Fiedler
THE CRISIS IN AMERICAN CULTURE & A PORTRAIT OF 20TH CENTURY AMERICAN LITERATURE GOLD
AMES BALDWI
PA POUND
Faulkne
e. cumi
Norm Mailer
$1.95

DELTA BOOKS are discerning works of scholarship on the complex problems of our times.

Other outstanding titles include:

THE PREDICAMENT OF DEMOCRATIC MAN Edmond Cahn $1.65 THE CHANGING NATURE OF MAN J. H. van den Berg $1.95
THE TRAGEDY OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY William A. Williams $1.65 THE MARXISTS C. Wright Mills $1.95

These and other titles are available from your local paperback bookstore.
For a free catalog, write to: DELTA BOOKS, 750 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017

only through good management, that the best management was that not of government but of experienced railroad men, and that if high protective tariff on the supplies the railroads used were removed, transportation prices would immediately be lowered. THE NATION had not come to see railroad men as saints, but it observed:

> When we hear of their having corrupted a legislature, or bought a judge, the blame lies not so much with them as with those who provide cheap and nasty legislators and judges.

Hammering on the theme of the need for tariff reductions, William Graham Sumner—the hard-boiled social Darwinist professor of social science at Yale—asked in THE NATION:

> Are not the high charges for transportation due to the enhanced cost of every ounce of iron, every stick of timber, every piece of metal, every yard of cloth, which has gone into the construction of railroads for the last ten years?

From the moment of its birth, the magazine had been a free trade journal, but it had not in the eighteen-sixties presented tariff reduction as the only solution to the problem of high transportation charges. In its comments on Granger measures, such as the Potter Law in Wisconsin, THE NATION was self-righteous and abusive. Solon J. Buck, in his history of the Granger movement, observes that NATION articles and brief paragraph editorials > are largely responsible for the long prevalent idea of the Granger movement as a dishonest attempt of the Western farmers to confiscate railroad property by securing control of the legislatures and the courts.

BUT THE MOOD of the Supreme Court was not that of THE NATION, or of such other Wicked Witches of the East as the New York Evening Post and Samuel Bowles's Springfield Republican. In the "Granger cases," the Court affirmed the right of states to fix maximum rates for passengers, and for the transportation and storage of commodities. This important decision helped clear the way for the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887. Interestingly enough, many railroad leaders became resigned during the late eighteen-seventies to some form of national regulation. One railroad executive expressed the view that "the public will regulate us to some extent," and that perhaps a national board of commissioners would do less harm to the railroads than would "State politicians." THE NATION, once Grant was out of office, became a shade less unfriendly to the idea of national regulation; the Hepburn Committee's 1879 investigation of charges of freight discrimination in New York was commended by the journal, which observed that despite justifiable popular mistrust of government supervision of corporations, "some effective regulation is imperatively needed." But regulation of what kind? The magazine was hazy about this. When President Garfield's Secretary of the Treasury, William Windom, supported a bill that was pressed by the Anti-Monopoly League to limit railroad profits to a fixed percentage of capital investment, and give excess profits to the public through rate reductions or increases in service, THE NATION cried: communism! Such a "railroad usury law" was based on the "sentimental theory" ("sentimental" was a favorite NATION epithet in the Godkin days) that business men "will work just as well for the public as they will for themselves." Charles Francis Adams, Jr., who made these comments, had been chairman from 1872 to 1879 of the Massachusetts Board of Railroad Commissioners, and was currently chairman of the government board of directors of the Union Pacific Railroad. This prominent railway expert's opposition to a measure supported by the moderate William Windom indicates how strong the resistance was, among "solid" citizens, to really effective legislation. In actual fact, only legislation bringing the newly created trusts, particularly the Standard Oil Company, under close national supervision, along with the railroads, could have been effective in the 1880s.

When, a short time after the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887, several railroad rate cases were brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission, THE NATION cited Commodore Vanderbilt's remark that there was only one man in the world he feared: the manager of the Standard Oil Company. The real defendant in these rate cases, said the journal, was that company, which was able to dictate rates for the shipment of its products. Horace White, THE NATION's financial expert, argued that the Interstate Commerce Act's prohibition of "pooling"—whereby earnings from freight had been distributed among several railroads—had deprived the roads of a weapon against the "terrorism" of the trusts. With pooling outlawed, the Standard Oil Company could more easily play one railroad against another through threats of withdrawal of Standard's business. White approved of the suggestion, in the first report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that Congress enact further legislation to deal with the problem of shippers' pressure upon the railroads. But he insisted that the aim of any laws must be to preserve for the country the benefits of railroad competition. The same basically laissez-faire position, more relevant to conditions in America before the Civil War than it was in the 1880s, had been set forth in THE NATION by the man who had bought it and the New York Evening Post in 1881—Henry Villard. Himself a railroad builder who had pushed the Union Pacific to completion as a transatlantic road in 1883, lost control of it when it went into bankruptcy, then returned to it as a director in 1886, Villard was proud of the editorial independence of his papers. He apparently contributed only two articles after buying them—both, published in 1887, concerned the Interstate Commerce Act. Declaring that he was not opposed to some federal supervision of common carriers, Villard denounced this law as > nothing less than an attempt to substitute for the established business organism, so to speak, of the country, a piece of State socialism at variance with the real interests of the people and with the national character.

Thus in the new age of consolidators—Rockefeller, Carnegie, Morgan—men like Henry Villard and Godkin and Horace White kept urging the importance of competition in large-scale enterprises. Less realistic than the consolidators, on one hand, and the Socialists, on the other, the laissez-faire Nation and its cultivated readers still wished that business could be conducted in a marketplace regulated by the law of supply and demand. In this Manchesterian utopia, there would be no protective tariffs or corporate monopolies or labor unions, and prices and wages would find their proper level. Realizing that in fact some regulation of large-scale enterprises was necessary, the journal's writers feared the effects upon "free enterprise" of the very laws designed to curb the trusts.

If during the eighteen-eighties and eighteen-nineties The Nation made no particular effort to secure legislation to regulate the trusts, the weekly was no more traditionally laissez-faire than the solid, Democratic Grover Cleveland. Cleveland came to realize, during his first administration (1885-1889) that the gap between the affluent and the poor was growing dangerously. Just after his defeat by Benjamin Harrison in the election of 1888, he declared in a speech:

> The gulf between employers and the employed is constantly widening, and classes are rapidly forming, one comprising the very rich and powerful, while in another are found the toiling poor. . . . As we view the achievements of aggregated capital, we discover the existence of trusts, combinations, and monopolies, while the citizen is struggling far in the rear or is trampled to death beneath the iron heel. Corporations, which should be the carefully restrained creatures of the law and the servants of the people, are fast becoming the people's masters.

While this language reminds one both of the Populist Party platform of 1892, with its reference to "the two great classes—tramps and millionaires," and of a novel Jack London was to write, The Iron Heel, Cleveland actually had nothing more to propose than downward tariff revision. The Nation was for this too, and saw Cleveland as a hero in the strife. But the Republicans, in control of Congress under Harrison, revised the tariffs not downward but upward, and even after Cleveland returned to the Presidency in 1893 Democratic protectionists joined Republicans to prevent radical reduction of duties. Some reduction there was in the Wilson-Gorman tariff of

BOLLINGEN SERIES

PAPERS FROM THE ERANOS YEARBOOKS

Edited by JOSEPH CAMPBELL

Each year since 1933, leading scholars from Europe, Asia, and America have assembled for a unique meeting of minds at the villa of the late Olga Froebe-Kapteyn, the originator and guiding spirit of Eranos, near Ascona, Switzerland. At these Eranos conferences (so called from the Greek word meaning "convivial feast"), they deliver lectures on subjects ranging through philosophy, religion, ethnology, psychology, the natural sciences, and art. The lectures are subsequently published in the annual Eranos-Jahrbücher.

Selections from the Jahrbücher, based on central themes, and translated by Ralph Manheim and others, make up these volumes – which together constitute number XXX in Bollingen Series. Each volume is 6″ x 9″, indexed, illustrated. "Few students in our time are unaware of Eranos, this powerhouse of psychological anthropology, this laboratory of spiritual development, which may aptly be compared to the workshops of the alchemists in times past . . . This project one might expect to become a truly immortal work."

—The Review of Religion

Volumes available now:

1. SPIRIT AND NATURE
Essays by Ernesto Buonaiuti, Friedrich Dessauer, C. G. Jung, Werner Kaegi, C. Kerényi, Paul Masson-Oursel, Fritz Meier, Adolf Portmann, Max Pulver, Hugo Rahner, Erwin Schrödinger, and Walter Wili. xvi + 492 pp., 7 halftones. $5.00

2. THE MYSTERIES
Essays by Julius Baum, C. G. Jung, C. Kerényi, Hans Leisegang, Paul Masson-Oursel, Fritz Meier, Jean de Menasce, Georges Nagel, Walter F. Otto, Max Pulver, Hugo Rahner, Paul Schmitt, and Walter Wili. xvi + 476 pp., 15 plates, 6 text figures. $5.00

3. MAN AND TIME
Essays by Henry Corbin, Mircea Eliade, C. G. Jung, Max Knoll, G. van der Leeuw, Louis Massignon, Erich Neumann, Helmuth Plessner, Adolf Portmann, Henri-Charles Puech, Gilles Quispel, and Hellmut Wilhelm. xx + 414 pp., 4 plates. $5.00

4. SPIRITUAL DISCIPLINES
Essays by Rudolf Bernoulli, Martin Buber, C. M. von Cammerloher, T. W. Danzel, Friedrich Heiler, C. G. Jung, C. Kerényi, John Layard, Fritz Meier, Max Pulver, Erwin Rousselle, and Heinrich Zimmer. Introduction by Mircea Eliade. xxii + 506 pp., 32 plates, 16 text figures. $5.00

5. MAN AND TRANSFORMATION
Essays by Ernst Benz, Henry Corbin, Jean Daniélou, Mircea Eliade, G. van der Leeuw, Fritz Meier, Adolf Portmann, Daisetz T. Suzuki, Paul Tillich, Lancelot Law Whyte, and Heinrich Zimmer. xvii + 413 pp., 10 plates. $5.00

Bollingen Series is published by Bollingen Foundation. Distributed by Pantheon Books, 22 East 51st St., New York, N. Y. 10022. For detailed catalogue, write to Bollingen Series, 140 East 62nd St., New York, N. Y. 10021

1894, but Cleveland found this mere tokenism, and allowed the law to be passed without his signature. As passed, it provided for an income tax of two per cent on incomes over $4,000, to make up for the lowered tariff rates. THE NATION, unhappy along with Cleveland over the small downward revision of duties, was also sharp in its criticism of the income tax provision of the law. Rollo Ogden denounced it as "class legislation," and warned that the two per cent tax could much too easily be increased to five, or ten—or fifty per cent.

Labor

The same laissez-faire liberalism which led THE NATION to oppose an income tax in 1894, caused it to be harshly unsympathetic to the nascent labor movement. From THE NATION's point of view, labor unions were, like the Standard Oil Company, combinations in restraint of trade; but whereas the weekly was unwilling to urge, as a remedy for undue corporate power, anything more than a lower tariff, it condoned —from the late seventies to the early years of the twentieth century—the use of force against striking laborers. It was the great strike of 1877 on the Baltimore and Ohio and on the Pennsylvania Railroad which inspired Godkin's first notable denunciation of labor "demagogy." This strike occurred against the general background of the 1873-79 depression, the most severe depression in American history until the 1930s, and was sparked by a general 10 per cent wage cut. A significant aspect of the work stoppage was that rail service was disrupted from Baltimore to St. Louis: discontented workers, it now appeared, could have an effect on the national economy and comfort. THE NATION, sternly denying that the general wage reduction was a just grievance, reprimanded the workmen who > give ear to current demagogical platitudes regarding the oppressions of the poor and the injustice of the rich.

"Manifesting the acute uneasiness" that these labor disturbances—there were three days of rioting and looting in Pittsburgh during the summer of 1877—inspired among those comfortably situated, THE NATION declared:

> The kindest thing which can be done for the great multitudes of untaught men who have been received on these shores, and are daily arriving, and who are torn perhaps even more here than in Europe by wild desires and wilder dreams, is to show them promptly that society as here organized, on individual thought and action, is impregnable, and can be no more shaken than the order of nature.

THE NATION, and the majority of articulate Americans, spoke of "individualism" when laborers organized, and placed the blame for all criminal acts squarely on the "individual conscience"; but before their eyes the whole economy was being reshaped by large combinations, and sociologists were beginning to study the shaping of the individual by his environment. The organization of working men into such a society as the Knights of Labor, which grew remarkably after the 1877 railroad strike; the entrance of labor into politics—(the Greenback Labor Party got over a million votes in the 1878 Congressional elections); and the development of Marxian socialism in the United States, as evidenced by the formation of the Socialist Labor Party—all of these movements were aspects of a trend toward collective action. Thus, while THE NATION comment of May, 1878, that > we are witnessing, at this moment, the spread of a movement among working-men . . . for the avowed object of despoiling the owners of accumulated property in some way . . .

was a typical response of respectable, well-educated men, it was irrelevant to the deep realities of social transformation.

During the eighteen-eighties the most significant mark of this transformation in the labor movement was the growing insistence on a national eight-hour day. The organization that was to become the American Federation of Labor, superseding with its pragmatic program the vaguely oriented Knights of Labor, called for strikes and demonstrations for an eight-hour day throughout the United States, beginning on May 1, 1886. Work stoppages and protest meetings did occur in many cities, and in this highly charged atmosphere there took place the tragic Haymarket affair. In angry reaction to the killing by policemen of four strikers at the McCormick Harvester Company, a meeting was called by labor and anarchist leaders at Haymarket Square in Chicago. Police tried to disperse the crowd, and somebody, whose identity has never been established, threw a bomb; seven policemen were killed, and sixty-seven were injured. In what has been called "one of the most injudicious trials in the record of American juridical history," seven men were condemned to death and one man was sentenced to prison for having incited the person who threw the bomb. All of the men condemned were anarchists, and the Knights of Labor—who had virtually nothing to do with any of the May demonstrations, but who symbolized "anarchy" in the public mind, were widely blamed. THE NATION spoke of the "anarchist disease," and asserted that at the "center and core of every strike" were well-heeled people who read weekly "three or four Socialist newspapers." The country, said the journal, was going through a "mental craze" for radical labor legislation, as if something like the philosopher's stone were about to be discovered. But THE NATION of the 1880s had little more to offer as a cure for the "disease" than a change of attitude on the part of the "great corporations." They should do more, said the journal, to > infuse into their dealings with their employees something better than the spirit of contract or patronage merely. In other words, they should do something to make their men feel that the Union is not a necessity to them.

CONGRATULATIONS ON THE

Centennial Issue of

THE NATION

It is one of the few magazines that for a complete century has steadfastly and courageously fought for the rights of the common people. "THE NATION" has been a gem of truth, and it is one of the few national magazines that can be depended upon to make its editorial expressions always in the interest of sound democratic principles.

Amalgamated Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen
of North America, AFL-CIO

2800 NORTH SHERIDAN ROAD
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, 60657

THOMAS J. LLOYD
President

PATRICK E. GORMAN
Secretary-Treasurer

"I hear a great many of the fools are angry at me, and I am glad of it, for I write at them, not to them."

— WILLIAM CONGREVE, 1695

⁂

THE CHARLESTON GAZETTE
The State Newspaper
Charleston, West Virginia

Distinctive Books From Regnery

ROMA
by Aldo Palazzeschi

"Roma is the work of a marvelous old writer, shaggy, confident and full of a succulence which no twentieth century Italians but Lampedusa and Gadda provide." —Richard Stern

222 pages, $4.50

RACE: CHALLENGE TO RELIGION
Edited by Matthew Ahmann

Addresses to the 1963 National Conference on Religion and Race by Martin Luther King, Sargent Shriver, Albert Cardinal Meyer and other leaders. Awarded the National Conference of Christians and Jews 1964 Brotherhood Award.

186 pages, $4.95 Softbound, $1.65

•

COMING IN FALL—The Memoirs of Konrad Adenaur and The Golden Journey; Poems For Young People, edited by Louise Bogan and William Jay Smith

ELECTIVE AFFINITIES
By J. W. Von Goethe

"Elective Affinities is not only a minor masterpiece, but also one of the most extraordinary novels ever written."

W. H. Auden, The New York Times Book Review

326 pages, $5.95

THE GREAT BOOM AND PANIC
By Robert T. Patterson

An informal history of the stock market and the men behind it in the tumultuous twenties by a distinguished economist. Photographs and charts.

310 pages, $6.50

THE HENRY REGNERY
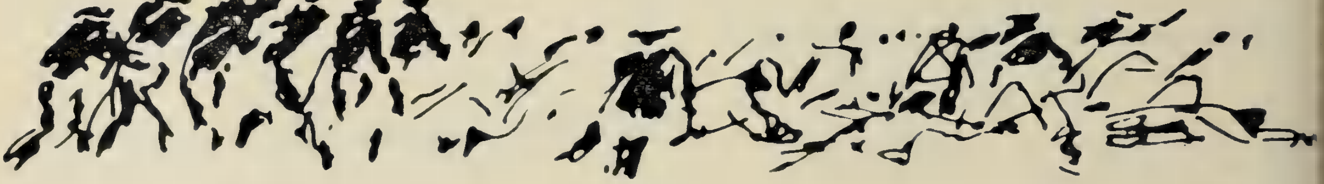
COMPANY • PUBLISHERS
114 W. ILLINOIS STREET • CHICAGO, ILLINOIS 60610

This advice sounds like the resolution once introduced into the French legislature, calling on all rascals immediately to leave France. More significant than any NATION exhortations to businessmen to act nobly was a paragraph that appeared in the journal in July, 1890. No change, it said, had been so marked within the history of THE NATION (that is, since 1865) as the transfer to wealthy men of the political and social influence formerly shared, if not absorbed, by men of literary, oratorical or professional distinction. This comment suggests a reason for Godkin's inability, despite his brilliance, to offer adequate solutions for the social problems of the eighties and nineties. Godkin conceived of the laissez-faire system as one in which the businessman's desire for profits would be tempered by his awareness of values higher than monetary ones. But with the businessman himself become a paragon in the land, what was there to restrain him? Surely not government intervention.



THE NATION'S FRUSTRATED sense that both labor unions and business corporations were acting against the public interest was indicated in an editorial inspired by the Homestead trouble of July, 1892. The management of the Homestead, Pennsylvania plant of the Carnegie Steel Company had hired Pinkerton men to break a strike, the strikers had fought back with guns and dynamite, there had been deaths and injuries on both sides, and the governor of the state had sent the whole National Guard contingent to Homestead. THE NATION observed that the workers had in this case obtained considerable sympathy from the "classes socially above them," and proceeded to explain why. It was not, certainly, because of any justice in the workers' claim to ownership of the mills, or because their conduct had been legally or morally defensible. It was rather, said THE NATION, that the country was at last awakening to the abuses of the protective tariff. Businesses such as the Carnegie Steel Company had long been claiming that their workers benefited from tariff protection; at Homestead, however, management had demonstrated its lack of interest in the workers' welfare, had brutally announced it would discharge whom it pleased, and pay what wages it pleased. In one of the harshest denunciations that Godkin's NATION ever made of a business corporation, this editorial declared that the company's "plea for American laborers" > was a mean and contemptible pretence, designed simply to enable them to enrich themselves by utilizing the credulous patriotism of the American people.

It did not take long for THE NATION to shift its emphasis, during that 1892 summer of labor trouble, to those "organizations of dubious character," the trade unions, which were trying to gain advantages for their members "at the expense of outside laborers." Clearly, however, THE NATION's editors were dismayed by the "mere anarchy"—in Yeats's sense, not the limited political one—that had been "loos'd upon the world." The closing years of the nineteenth century were the darkest that THE NATION had seen, the darkest that it was to see until the second World War. Abroad, it found that the United States was joining Britain, Germany and Russia as a colonial power; at home "protected" trusts and monopolistic labor unions seemed to be grabbing as much for themselves as they could.

It is notable that each time t "radical" William Jennings Bry was the Democratic Presidential ca didate—in 1896, 1900 and 1908- THE NATION turned away from t Democratic Party which it had beg supporting in 1884. Grover Clev land was THE NATION's kind Democrat, and so was Judge Alt B. Parker, a low-tariff man who r against Theodore Roosevelt in 19 But Bryan, particularly in 189 seemed to THE NATION and ot "respectable" Eastern journals, dangerous demagogue. His advoca of the free coinage of silver—whi THE NATION considered immoral and his standing (if not actually ru ning) on a platform endorsing the come tax principle, condemning t use of the injunction in labor disput and promising "stricter control" trusts and railroads, evoked a frenzi response in the weekly's edito pages. The journal referred to t "mad proceedings" of the Democra nominating convention, and was i patient for the stamping out of "inc diary doctrines" in the November el tion. THE NATION's attitude Bryan's defeat in 1896 was the sa as that expressed by the New Y Tribune:

> There are some movements so ba some causes so depraved, that neit victory can justify them nor def entitle them to commiseration. T wicked rattle-pated boy, posing vapid vanity and mouthing rott ness, was not the real leader of t league of Hell. He was only a pup in the blood-imbued hands of Altg the anarchist and Debs the rev tionist. . . .

THE NATION sighed with relief in November 5, 1896 issue that country had been saved from changing the Constitution and Supreme Court for the "decrees" men like Governor Altgeld, Debs and Bryan. Bryan himself, said THE NATION, had probably inspired more error than any man in public life who had not actually committed murder. But a generation later, Morison and Commager were to call Bryan, in their history, "the common denominator of the American people of his generation." Surely the evils which he and Altgeld and Debs denounced were real. During each year of the 1890s, one man out of every 50 working in the mines in Pennsylvania was injured; one of every 400 was killed. In the year 1893, one of every ten operating railroad employes was injured in some way; one of 115 was killed. In many states, the only limitation on child labor was the requirement—often loosely enforced—of school attendance. The fundamental Populist protest, represented by the Bryan candidacy of 896, was well conveyed by Vachel Lindsay:

> There were real lines drawn:
> Not the silver and the gold,
> But Nebraska's cry went eastward > against the dour and old,
> The mean and cold.

For THE NATION and the New York Tribune, Bryan's defeat meant the avoidance of catastrophe; for Vachel Lindsay, sixteen years old in 1896, it was > Defeat of my boyhood, defeat of my > dream.

By 1900, the dominant political issue was imperialism, and THE NATION, contemptuous of McKinley, supported him only because Bryan was the alternative. By 1904 THE NATION was back in the Democratic camp because Parker, "sound" on economic issues (he had been Cleveland's law partner), was running against the jingoistic Theodore Roosevelt. Bryanism had receded in the Democratic Party, but to THE NATION Roosevelt was almost

> . . . . the young dude cowboy, > Who hated Bryan, then aped his > way. . . .

Roosevelt, the pragmatic politician, deriding as "muckrakers" such writers as Ida Tarbell, who published her "History of the Standard Oil Company" in McClure's, and Ray Stannard Baker, who focused on the railroads in the same magazine, and Thomas Lawson, whose "Frenzied Finance" in Everybody's was a study of the copper trust, still looked at the muck that they raked up. THE NATION could not help looking, wished it weren't there, and viewed with apprehension the plans for doing something about it. The Roosevelt victory over Parker in 1904 brought to Washington what Rollo Ogden described two years later in THE NATION as "The Muck-rake Congress." It had been characterized, said Ogden, by a series of "exposures" and by much shouting and threatening—all this was the very essence of muckraking. But Ogden conceded that

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY
FUND

"... a nonprofit foundation specializing in research and public education on vital issues of the day, with an emphasis on economic and social questions and international affairs."

Some Studies Now in Progress:

A GEOGRAPHY OF THE UNITED STATES with an atlas
Research Director: George H. T. Kimble

THE INDUSTRIALIZED URBAN ENVIRONMENT, illustrated
Research Director: Allan Temko

THE PERFORMING ARTS
Research Directors: William J. Baumol and William G. Bowen

SOUTH ASIA
Research Director: Gunnar Myrdal

Earlier Studies Include:

AMERICA'S NEEDS AND RESOURCES J. Frederic Dewhurst and Associates

EUROPE'S NEEDS AND RESOURCES J. Frederic Dewhurst and Associates

TROPICAL AFRICA
(now out of print) George H. T. Kimble

MEGALOPOLIS
Jean Gottmann

The Twentieth Century Fund publishes its own studies, and has a Standing Order Plan that offers convenience and substantial savings for libraries, teachers and interested citizens. Further information may be obtained from without the muckraking legislators there would have been no railway bill—the Hepburn Act of 1906 made rate regulation possible for the first time in United States history—and no meat inspection law. Ogden might also have noted that without Upton Sinclair's novel, The Jungle, describing the grim conditions in Chicago stockyards, the meat inspection law would probably not have been passed in 1906. As for the Hepburn Act, THE NATION had not been especially enthusiastic about the measure while it was being debated in Congress during the winter and spring of 1906. Conceding that some government rate supervision was necessary, the journal stressed the importance of the principle of judicial review: the railroads, THE NATION argued, should have the right to fight in the courts what they deemed unfair rate prescriptions by the Interstate Commerce Commission. When passed, the Hepburn Act included a provision for judicial review, but the act as a whole was condemned as altogether inadequate by such a progressive as Senator LaFollette because the Interstate Commerce Commission was not empowered to evaluate railroad properties and the cost of service. Only on the basis of such evaluation, LaFollette contended, could "reasonable" rates be determined. THE NATION, "utterly unsympathetic to" men like LaFollette, was still insisting in 1906 on the overriding importance of one economic measure: downward tariff revision. At one point in the debate on the Hepburn Act, the weekly accused Roosevelt of giving up chances for tariff revision in order to get railway rate supervision. "A birthright," said THE NATION, "has thus again been sold for a mess of pottage." Thus laissez faire, the policy of letting business alone, was the journal's fundamental position even in the era of the super-trust, the age of J. P. Morgan.
THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND • 41 East 70 Street • New York, N. Y. 10021

THE LET-ALONE policy, however, was still not to be applied to labor unions. On this point, most respectable men, including most federal judges, held the views expressed by THE NATION. In a decision that grew out of the Danbury Hatters' strike of 1902, the union's attempts to secure a nationwide boycott of Loewe hats was declared a violation of the Sherman Act, which outlawed combinations in restraint of interstate trade. In another case, involving a St. Louis stove company, the A. F. of L. was forbidden by a federal court injunction to carry out a boycott; for defying the injunction, Gompers and other officials of the A. F. of L. were declared in contempt of court and sentenced to prison. When in 1908 Gompers (whose sentence, like that of the other officials, was never carried out) denounced the courts' interpretations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act as denying to organized labor the right of existence, THE NATION complacently remarked:

> The only change recently made is to decide, as the Supreme Court has at last done, that boycotting is illegal under the Sherman Act, as it always has been illegal at common law.

THE NATION went on to condemn organized labor for crying out when the same "even-handed justice" was applied to its "ruinous acts" as was applied to illicit action by such a trust as Standard Oil. But the weekly, which had rejoiced over President Grover Cleveland's smashing of "anarchy" in the 1894 Pullman strike, and which had denounced the Mine Workers Union during the anthracite coal strike of 1903, was, like most of the press, less than fair to labor. Putting its emphasis heavily on violence and intimidation of scabs by the unions, THE NATION sadly failed to see what drove the unions to desperate acts. John Mitchell, leader of the anthracite mine workers, charged in his book, Organized Labor (1903), that much of even the very low wages > was never paid in cash to the mineworkers. There were in vogue many systems for cheating the men. . . . The size of the ton increased, so that 2,900 and even 3,190 pounds came to be considered a ton, while the price remained at the same level . . .

This is just the kind of point that T NATION was later to make again ar again, after it was taken over in 191 by Oswald Garrison Villard. Villar as early as 1905, published an artic —"The Growth of Socialism"— THE NATION which conflicted shar ly with the opinions of Wendell Phi lips Garrison, then editor of the weel ly, and of writers like Rollo Ogde and Fabian Franklin. Commentir on the development of socialis among the American masses (1905 the syndicalist Industrial Wor ers of the World, a far more radic organization than the A. F. of I was formed), Villard said that tl Socialists had been "confirmed in the error" by the shamelessness > with which managers of public-se vice corporations have debauched tl commonwealth. Our bold speculato in street railways and in gas and ele tric lighting have laid heavy and dir hands on governors and legislato mayors and aldermen.

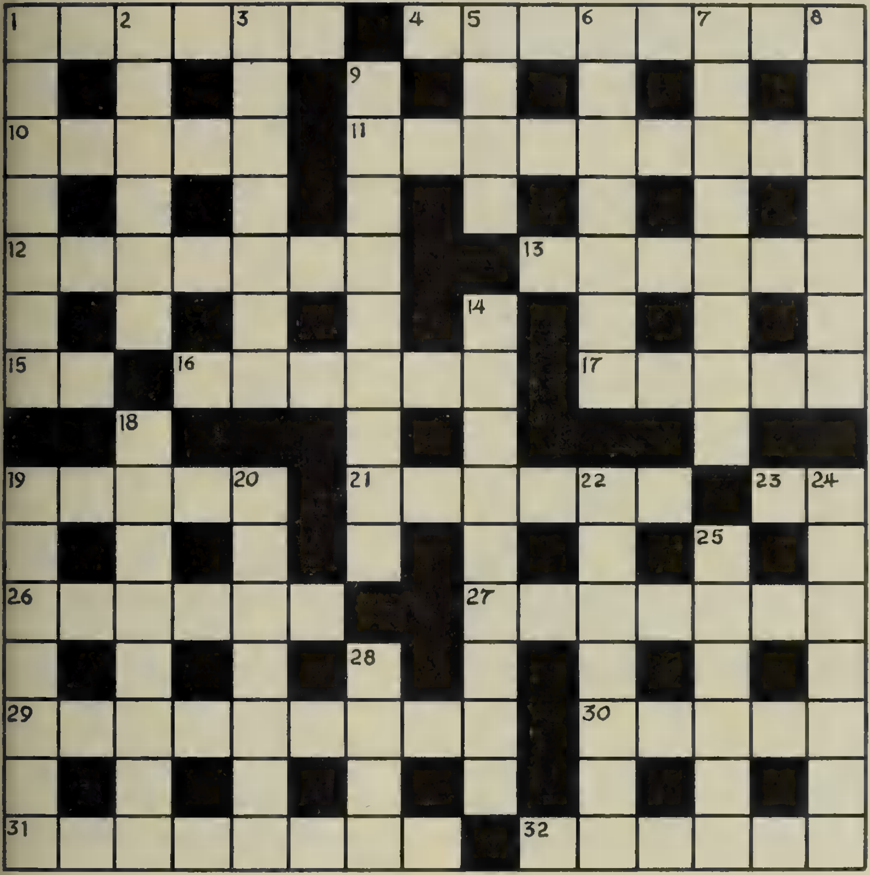
Then, referring specifically to the i vestigation in New York City of t practices of the Consolidated G Company, Villard spoke of a mono oly's manufacturing gas at thirty fifty cents a thousand feet and selli it for a dollar, and juggling with t pressure "in order still further swindle the consumer." No one c be surprised, said Villard, if "men their haste seize the weapon of m nicipal ownership." The directors the Consolidated Gas Company, "n such frothy demagogues as Euge V. Debs," were the real leaders the crusade for socialism. This la guage, used by Villard in 1905, i minds one somewhat of Bismarc and it is interesting to note that V lard's German-born father admir Bismarck and was his house gu during a visit to Germany. Bismar had stolen the German Socialis thunder through what Harold La well would call "rejection by part incorporation" of their program. V lard, who unlike Bismarck was cynic, gradually became warmly sy pathetic to the moderate Socialist

Crossword Puzzle

JAMES J. STORROW, JR.



ACROSS:

1 Countryman's chief of center (6)
4 Sang to me of the end of the world (8)
10 Symbolic flyer with arms, olive-bearing (5)
11 Of pap and Russia—even Steven agreed (4, 5)
12 Nearly 600 rodents: an extreme case (7)
13 Penetrate FPA's midriff (6)
15 Brief state of Independence (2)
16 "Y" girls gruesomely upset (6)
17 "Honey Fitz" to J.F.K. (5)
19 Can't give more than this, can I? (2, 3)
21 Take a flyer in America, Russia—or Greece (6)
23 Heard the news? Dad's back! (2)
26 Accept—you're a rat if you don't! (6)
27 Label lumber, Filipino type (7)
29 Get the wind up—worse if you're 30 (9)
30 Lost a seat (2, 3)
31 Old Hundred scattered in their seats, no doubt (8)
32 It's in the UN that I hear you challenge (1, 5)

DOWN:

1 Let the Benedictine go—a good sound from the hills of America (7)
2 Somewhat tattered sleeve of a noble lord (6)
3 That each one may be one: a reason for 19 (7)
5 We do to live, and, I hear, use for death (4)
6 Hi-fi fan may flip for this (7)
7 Dam burst in Oct. (8)
8 No diller, no dollar; a thinker he (7)
9 In which chap spies moon travellers (5, 4)
14 Sandy site for royal houses (9)
18 A digestion like this needed for C-rations (4, 4)
19 Bound in like lions, they say—for 1 down? (7)
20 Sinister Red? (7)
22 President (generally) indicates Govt. aid (7)
24 Call an insect for ceremonial event (7)
25 '67 folly from Russia—a fine state! (6)
28 Takes two to make one (4)

(Answers on page 335)

Grove Press

has barely begun its first century. But it has already made a century's-worth of American publishing history—with books like these:

WILLIAM BURROUGHS
Naked Lunch

JEAN GENET
Our Lady of the Flowers

ROBERT GOVER
One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding

FRANK HARRIS
My Life and Loves

ROLF HOCHHUTH
The Deputy

D. H. LAWRENCE
Lady Chatterley's Lover

HENRY MILLER
Tropic of Cancer
Tropic of Capricorn
Black Spring
Sexus, Plexus, Nexus

JOHN RECHY
City of Night

HUBERT SELBY, JR.
Last Exit to Brooklyn

—as well as works by SAMUEL BECKETT, FRIEDRICH DÜRRENMATT, HAROLD PINTER, BERTOLT BRECHT, BRENDAN BEHAN, and many other creative leaders whose names are less well known today than they will be tomorrow!

GROVE PRESS
80 University Place, New York, N.Y. 10003

A kind of prelude to the definitive 1918 change in The Nation occurred some seven years earlier, around 1911. At this time, Paul Elmer More, the Sanskrit scholar and "new humanist," was editor of the weekly, but Villard as managing editor of the Evening Post was beginning to put his own stamp not only on the Post but on The Nation, which reprinted much Post material. Villard noted in his autobiography, Fighting Years, that The Nation and the Evening Post had supported Woodrow Wilson in "his fight to democratize Princeton undergraduate life." In March, 1910, when the two men met during an ocean voyage from Bermuda to the United States, Villard promised Wilson full support if he should decide to run for the governorship of New Jersey. Wilson had been an avid reader of Godkin's Nation, and his liberalism in 1910 seemed to be of Godkin vintage. But Villard was also more of a Godkinite in those days than he was to be in 1920, and he was impressed by Wilson as a man. According to Villard, the Evening Post exercised considerable influence on Wilson after he became governor of New Jersey because it was the only newspaper he read.

Surprised and gratified by Wilson's vigorous treatment of New Jersey bosses and New Jersey problems, Villard joined a widespread movement in the press to boom him for the Presidency. A Villard article, "Governor Wilson's Candidacy," in the August 17, 1911, Nation, praised Wilson for his frankness in attacking the "money power" in a speech at Harrisburg. But Fabian Franklin of the Evening Post, much less favorably impressed by Wilson, published a piece criticizing the New Jersey governor for attacking President Taft's policy on trusts without offering a clear alternative. Was Wilson for letting the trusts alone? Franklin asked. Or was he for a "root-and-branch plan" of destruction? The difference in tone between these two articles illustrates the tension that was to be felt at 20 Vesey Street (to which the Evening Post and The Nation had moved in 1908) during the next few years. Conservatives like Franklin, Paul Elmer More, and Stanley Went could not abide Villard's "radicalism."

Villard kept on pushing Wilson's Presidential candidacy. A letter printed in the December 3, 1911, Nation reported the results of a straw ballot election at Oberlin College: Wilson was an easy leader with 261 votes, LaFollette came next with 82, Taft was third with 60 and Roosevelt fourth with 17. Villard, who had just published a biography of John Brown, must have been encouraged by this endorsement of the Virginia-born Wilson at an institution so closely associated with the Abolitionist movement. According to Wilson's biographer, Arthur S. Link, Villard was at this time "unquestionably the leading white champion of Negro rights in the United States," and became Wilson's "chief adviser on the race question in the summer of 1912." Villard and W. E. B. DuBois, editor of the NAACP magazine The Crisis, were disappointed by Wilson's failure to commit himself to a desegregation policy in government bureaus. But Villard hoped for progress on this score with Wilson in the White House.

On some other issues, Wilson's accession to the Presidency brought immediate progress. One of these issues was the tariff. The Nation had been disappointed by Taft's acceptance of the high Payne-Aldrich tariff of 1909, and looked forward to a change under Wilson. It came with the Underwood tariff of 1913. While not a free trade measure, it provided for the kind of revision which The Nation had been urging since 1865.

If the United States Congress had at last come around to The Nation's tariff views, the journal had by 1913 come to accept a measure that the country as a whole clearly wanted: the progressive income tax. Rollo Ogden's objection, back in 1894, to such a tax had been that it was confiscatory. In 1913, while regretting that the burden was not more widely distributed (only 425,000 persons, the weekly estimated, would pay an income tax), The Nation found it a reasonable way to make up the deficiency in Federal revenue caused by tariff reductions.

To a conservative like Paul Elmer More, The Nation seemed to be changing markedly. But while the journal's attitude toward organized labor altered to the extent that the unions were not brutally denounced as they once had been, the magazine was by no means pro-labor. It was not, for example, particularly happy about the Adamson Act of 1916, which established an eight-hour day on all interstate railways. And, significantly, the Evening Post's and The Nation's support of Wilson rather than Hughes in 1916 was based partly on the belief that Wilson would be in a better position to "handle" the demands of labor than would be the candidate of the "party of capital."

Villard, unlike his editors, had by 1916 become disenchanted with Wilson, chiefly because of the President's adoption of a military preparedness policy. His article in a July, 1916, Nation called "The President and Foreign Affairs" stated bluntly that the President didn't know enough about them. If Wilson had ever settled down to six months in Germany he would be in a far better position to deal with the German leaders Villard also thought it a pity that the President had not spent some time in Latin America. Clearly, although The Nation had been only mildly critical of United States intervention in Haiti and Santo Domingo (the weekly objected to naval censorship of the press), Villard was distressed by what seemed to him a continuation of Taft's dollar diplomacy. In September, 1916, with the Evening Post and Nation declaring for Wilson, Villard decided to vote Prohibitionist. This split between Villard and the members of his own staff wa

Does your library talk? It should...It can.

Point of Order

The sensational film documentary of the Army-McCarthy hearings has been praised as "one of the most extraordinary documents of our time" (Cue magazine). The Original Sound Track Recording relives each gripping event in one of the most fascinating albums ever made. KOL 6070/KOS 2470*

Volume I—I Can Hear It Now

From the 1933 inauguration of FDR to the surrender of the Japanese aboard the "Missouri" in 1945, here are the voices of the men who dominated this era: Will Rogers, Senator Huey Long, the Duke of Windsor, Fiorello La Guardia, Mussolini, Hitler and many more. ML 4095

Volume II—I Can Hear It Now

The events of the post-war years, 1945-1949, are captured in incredible detail—V-J Day, La Guardia's comic strips broadcast, Churchill's "Iron Curtain" speech, the birth of the State of Israel, the Berlin airlift, the Alger Hiss case and others. ML 4261

Volume III—I Can Hear It Now

Embracing the era from 1919-1932, first-hand accounts of Wilson's fight for the League of Nations, the Scopes Trial, Lindbergh's flight, the Sacco-Vanzetti case, prohibition, Al Smith's "wet" campaign and other historic occasions are pinpointed with exciting precision. ML 4340

In White America

Utilizing excerpts from actual documents, folk music and hymns, six skilled actors trace the history of the American Negro from the era of slave trade in the 18th century to the integration attempt at Little Rock High School two centuries later. Includes authentically illustrated booklet.
KOL 6030/KOS 2430*

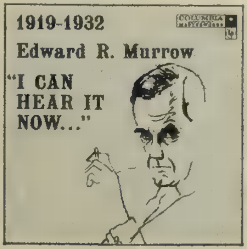
Eleanor Roosevelt

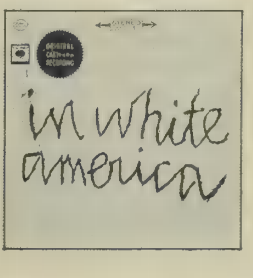
Eleanor Roosevelt spontaneously and intimately recalls her life with FDR—from their first meeting, to his nomination in 1932, to the problems of child raising in the White House. This deluxe two-record set includes articles by Adlai Stevenson and David T. Bazelon. O2L 314

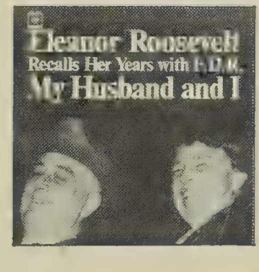
Winston Churchill

Churchill's finest and most moving speeches—words that altered the course of history and will live as long as English is spoken.
This special memorial album, with commentary by Edward R. Murrow, includes a 16-page book tracing Churchill's career in text and photographs.
KOL 7000

THE ORIGINAL SOUND TRACK RECORDING
STEREO
POINT OF ORDER!







The Sound of History on Columbia Records

*Stereo
®"COLUMBIA," MARCAS REG. PRINTED IN U.S.A.

symptomatic of the general unrest at the offices of the daily and the weekly.

After the United States entry into the World War, the fissure widened. Rollo Ogden, managing editor of the Evening Post, was unreserved in his support of the Allied cause, while Villard was primarily interested in the rapid negotiation of a just peace. Before Villard took over the editorship of The Nation in January, 1918, the editorial situation became even more anomalous; Ogden was opposed to Villard's publication in the Evening Post of the secret treaties which had been released by the Bolshevik government of Russia. But Villard published them anyway, and at the same time took over from Harold de Wolf Fuller the editorship of The Nation. Beginning with the issue of January 31, 1918, Villard himself could determine Nation policy.

III
Literature and Ideas: 1865-1918

When Emile Zola was a young Romantic poet living in Paris, he reproached his friend Paul Cézanne for painting pictures that were "denuded of poetry." "I have never been able to make anything of this 'realism'," said Zola in 1860. While he was soon to become converted to realism, his early idealistic prejudices were those of most European and American critics throughout the nineteenth century. A book which helped to change Zola's mind about realism, Madame Bovary, was put on trial in France for immorality. Balzac's notion that the novel "should paint a possible better world" was in effect the nineteenth-century consensus on the role of all the arts.

William Dean Howells, the nineteenth-century American novelist most closely associated with the reaction in this country against "ideality" in fiction, was a rigorous censor of his own "realism." His own children read his stories, he wrote to John Hay in 1882, and therefore he could not describe "palpitating divans." Since Howells' American contemporaries (there were more daring realist-rebels in Europe) felt the same inhibitions, the most inflammatory love scene in American fiction of 1882 may have been that of the leave-taking of a girl and her suitor in Howells' A Modern Instance:

> At the door he bent down his head and kissed her. "Good night, dear—friend."
>
> "Good night," she panted; and after the door had closed upon him, she stooped and kissed the knob on which his hand had rested.

In 1892, an American weekly, the Independent, warned that The Princess of Cleves, the French seventeenth-century classic, should not be put in the hands of American girls. The same journal found Tess of the D'Urbervilles dangerous to the moral fibre of young readers, even though Hardy was "no Tolstoi, picturing lechery to the last particular, no Zola reveling in filth."

The 1903-1904 report of the New England Watch and Ward Society contains a piquant item that will serve to complete this brief sketch of the cultural milieu in which The Nation was an intellectual force. "One of the most interesting and important cases we have ever had," said the report, "was that of a weekly newspaper in the Syrian language published in Boston." Informed that a certain number of this paper "contained obscenities," the Watch and Ward Society arranged for their rendering into English by a Harvard professor, then presented the translation to a judge, > who granted a warrant upon which the editor and publisher was arrested, and 682 copies of the newspaper were seized, 210 being of the objectionable issue.

Such nineteenth-century Nation reviewers as Henry James, Eliot Norton, T. S. Perry and John R. Dennett were not chiefly concerned with the morals of children, young girls, and Syrians living in Boston, but in an intelligent way their criticism of literature reflected the "idealistic" prejudices of the age. When the editc of The Nation announced in the 1865 prospectus their intention promote a higher standard of cri cism, they meant primarily that t weekly would not "puff," freely a vertise books—as most newspape and magazines then did—but revie them disinterestedly. The Nation i tended to propagate, in Matthe Arnold's terms, the best that w known and thought in the world-intended to apply idealistic standar with fine discrimination. A review,
The Nation's first issue, of Arnol Essays in Criticism, noted the a thor's "truly noble purpose":
"share with his fellows the pleasu of a higher and richer intellect life." Such terms as "noble," "hig er," "ideal" and "poetic" recur
The Nation's criticism througho the 1865-1918 period, even if the is a subtle shift during the early ye of the twentieth century to a "N Humanist" concern with "restrain control of impulse, the "inner checl

The Nation quite rapidly beca known as an organ of intellig criticism. William Dean Howells, n vously awaiting the weekly's p nouncement on one of his own wor wrote to Henry James in 1869: "H rible, isn't it, to have only one cri for 40,000,000 of people?" Char Dudley Warner, who with M
Twain wrote The Gilded Age, cal
The Nation the "weekly Day Judgment"; and it is suggestive the impression The Nation quic created in 1865 that the New Y Tribune could describe it as bei "mainly devoted" to literature, wh it treated with "impartiality a scholarship." There were also so sharply unfavorable reactions. Tl in 1885, a disciple of Walt Whitma named William D. O'Connor refer to The Nation as "that icicle in caves of darkness, dripping its c drip."

Whitman had certainly recei the cold drip treatment from He James in a November, 1865, revi of Drum-Taps, a volume of poems

THE AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY LIBRARY

Always the best in their field—books in the AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY LIBRARY

General Editor:

Crane Brinton

Books in this series, begun under the joint editorship of Sumner Welles and Donald C. McKay, combine soundness and objectivity with straightforward presentation and readable style. New titles are being constantly added, and old ones are revised and kept up to date. Each volume is written by a leading expert on a vital area. Library Journal calls the series "valuable"; Nation calls it "admirable." Here are some of the current titles.

New in the series:

THE UNITED STATES AND THE ARAB WORLD

By William R. Polk

A member of the Policy Planning Council of the State Department, Mr. Polk begins his book with an exposition of the basic human and natural factors integral to an understanding of this critical area, continues with an episodic history of the Arabs, and concludes with a detailed analysis of the present and probable future relationship of the Arab States with America. Maps. $5.95

New, revised editions:

THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN

By Edwin O. Reischauer

"If an American of today can read only one book on Japan, this is the one it should be," said the Saturday Review fourteen years ago, when this famous book by the now U.S. Ambassador to Japan first appeared. This evaluation applies with equal force to the new third edition. Map. $6.50

THE UNITED STATES AND ITALY

By H. Stuart Hughes

When this book was first published, The Christian Science Monitor said, "This is one of the most concise and informative books to appear on Italy since the end of Fascism." The N. Y. Times Book Review called it "excellent . . . there is nothing [else] in English that is both comprehensive and up to date . . . a first-rate job." Mr. Hughes has revised, updated, and enlarged his now-classic book. $5.95

Some recent publications:

THE UNITED STATES AND ISRAEL
by Nadav Safran $5.95

THE UNITED STATES AND NORTH AFRICA
by Charles F. Gallagher $5.50

THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOUTHWEST PACIFIC
by C. Hartley Grattan $5.00

THE UNITED STATES AND CHINA Revised Edition, Enlarged
by John K. Fairbank $5.95

THE UNITED STATES AND INDIA AND PAKISTAN Revised Edition, Enlarged
by W. Norman Brown $5.95

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138

spired by the Civil War. The review, which James in his later years was ashamed of, accused Whitman of egotism, mindlessness and vulgarity. The "democratic, liberty-loving, American populace," wrote James, was a "great civilizer," and had not sustained a monstrous war in order to "put up with spurious poetry afterwards." Here was, in Philip Rahv's terms, the "paleface" condemning the "redskin" who could write a line like

> Hungering, hungering, hungering, for > primal energies and Nature's > dauntlessness.

E. L. Godkin was to say in a NATION essay that the progress of mankind from barbarism to civilization could be seen in the difference between a wigwam and a lady's parlor. Henry James, reading Whitman in 1865, apparently smelled smoke rising from a savage camp. The elderly James, who read Whitman's poetry aloud to Edith Wharton, doubtless wished that there had been more fire—even if less refinement—in his own life.

THE EARLY NATION was consistently hostile to Whitman's poetry—as well as to that of Baudelaire and Swinburne. James called Baudelaire "unwholesome," declaring that in Les Fleurs du mal, > there must be stinking corpses and starving prostitutes and empty laudanum bottles in order that the poet shall be effectively inspired.

Swinburne, along with Dante Gabriel Rossetti, THE NATION considered a member of the "neo-pagan school of writers in England"; these poets were admittedly skillful in a technical sense, but they were morbidly preoccupied with sex.

Tennyson, on the other hand, was a poet the NATION critics liked. His tribute to Virgil—"Thou that seest Universal Nature moved by Universal Mind"—points to what THE NATION sought in the arts. Arthur Hugh Clough, whose "Say Not the Struggle Nought Availeth," Winston Churchill stirringly quoted in a World War II speech, was also considered an admirable poet. His verses were "healthier" than those of Matthew Arnold. And William Morris, upon publishing The Earthly Paradise, was called a "supremely healthy writer" who "moves, melts and delights." THE NATION's use of "healthy" to describe writers it liked may remind us of Mary Petty's New Yorker cartoon bearing the caption, "You're a very sick poet"; it is possible, however, that critics a hundred years from now will be unsympathetic to twentieth-century praise of alienated writing.

The novelist most admired by the NATION of the sixties, seventies and early eighties was Ivan Turgenev, whose works became known in the United States by the roundabout route of English translations of French translations from the Russian. Turgenev was, said T. S. Perry, a "poetic" realist, successful in the novelist's highest labor—the conception and delineation of character—and successful too in suggesting truths rather then insisting ponderously upon them. In short, whereas an Anthony Trollope was excessively, "photographically" realistic, Turgenev achieved the Aristotelian aim of "verisimilitude." The only objection THE NATION lodged against Turgenev was that he was too "melancholy." Consistent with the journal's predilection for poetically realistic fiction (as in Björnstjerne Björnson's charming Arne) was its admiration of a spiritualized rendering of nature in art. Thus, the weekly's art critic gave the following advice to a young painter:

> He must look within for his inducement to work, and must find it . . . in the feeling which he probably has, that there is a higher and nobler beauty in nature than he has painted or drawn as yet.

There is a parallel between the early NATION's taste in the arts and its position on the most urgent intellectual problem of the middle and late nineteenth century—the relationship between Darwinism and religion. Such contributors to THE NATION as John Fiske and Asa Gray certainly accepted and propounded the Darwinian theory of evolution, but they did not accept the materialism of Tyndall and T. H. Huxley. Nature, the journal asserted, was transformed through the process of natural selection, but the process itself was spiritual in nature; as THE NATION put it in 1876:

> . . . . we doubt very much whether any one has ever listened in a candid and dispassionate frame of mind to the evolutionists' history of the globe without finding that it had deepened for him the mystery of the universe, and magnified the Power which stands behind it.

THE NATION's theistic Darwinism was a via media between materialism and dogmatic theology, just as its advocacy of poetic realism in the arts was a "middle" position between naturalism on the one hand and romantic idealism on the other.

To THE NATION's dismay, naturalism became an increasingly popular mode in fiction during the eighteen-seventies and eighties. The journal's attitude toward the "experimental" novels of Zola and his school was like that of Tennyson in "Locksley Hall, Sixty Years After":

> Authors—essayist, atheist, novelist, realist, rhymester, play your part,
> Paint the mortal shame of nature with the living hues of Art.
>
> . . . .
>
> Set the maiden fancies wallowing in the troughs of Zolaism,— > Forward, forward, ay and backward, downward too into the abysm.

Zola's influential novel, L'Assommoir, was reviewed in the NATION by Auguste Laugel, a young Frenchman whom Godkin had engaged in 1865 to send him letters on French politics, society and literature. To Laugel, L'Assommoir was a "revolting" story, which he had "quit"

> as I should have gone out of a dissecting room; and I have breathed the fresh air of one of Lamartine's "Meditations."

Laugel was a good nineteenth-century Liberal, and he wondered whether Zola was a "friend of the people, or an enemy of republican in-

INFORMATION & UNDERSTANDING

Using virtually every means of communication, working through its worldwide enterprises,
Time Incorporated endeavors to bring information and understanding to people everywhere.

TIME/LIFE

Time • Life • Time International • Life International • Life en Español • Fortune • Sports Illustrated • Panorama
President • Time/Life News Service • Time/Life Books • Silver Burdett Company • Time-Life Broadcast
Printing Developments, Inc. • East Texas Pulp and Paper Company • TIME/LIFE Building, New York 10020

stitutions." What would become of a generation fed upon a literature whose sole object was to photograph life and vice? To THE NATION and other genteel critics, it was not at all clear that Zola considered the novel —as he emphasized in an 1892 interview—an extremely high "means of expression" which he had chosen as > the form in which to present to the world what I wish to say on the social, scientific, and psychological problems that occupy the minds of thinking men. . . .

(Zola also had the humility to observe, "It is true that I sometimes ask myself if this is the rôle of the novel after all.") Just a few years earlier, a NATION critic had spoken of the pernicious effect of fiction like Zola's on the reader's morale: naturalistic novels, in short, were unhealthy. The one point on which THE NATION could agree with Zola was the Dreyfus case and anti-Semitism; THE NATION denounced the Jew-baiting of Edouard Drumont in the eighties, and in 1898 Godkin published a piece called "Voltaire and Dreyfus," in which he praised both Voltaire's courage in defense of oppressed innocence, and his persistent efforts to show French lawyers that their lack of legal rules of evidence was the root of judicial inequity. Although these efforts had not really been successful, the Dreyfus case was still a great tribute to Voltaire: "Without him we should probably not have had even the intellectuels" that is, Zola and the others who came to Dreyfus' defense.

In reviewing fiction that had a social purpose—like Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward—THE NATION was inclined to take a tolerant view so long as the writing was not "vulgar." Thus without agreeing with Bellamy's conception of the good industrial society, the NATION critic commended the author's original treatment of the theme of utopia, and observed that writing of a better world is "one of the good offices of romance." Even in its treatment of a non-fictional work like Henry George's Progress and Poverty, whose point of view THE NATION clearly opposed, the weekly displayed respect for George's moral purpose. And while THE NATION'S laissez-faire individualism prevented it from proposing effective curbs on the ruthlessness of a Carnegie, the journal's review of his Triumphant Democracy called him an unmitigated philistine. Although NATION writers in the nineteenth century believed little could be done to mitigate the ferocity of the business world, they sought in books, both fictional and non-fictional, a high ideal.

It is significant in this connection that NATION reviews of such respectable authors as George Eliot, Thomas Hardy, William Dean Howells and Henry James often pointed to their "un-poetic" treatment of material. They tended too much toward "analysis," "dissection," the use of the "scalpel." Sainte-Beuve had said in a discussion of Flaubert that novelists were becoming anatomists; THE NATION agreed, and while it found Madame Bovary a powerfully "moral" work, and "Un Coeur Simple" comparable to Turgenev's fiction ("and to say that is to give it the highest praise") the weekly kept looking wistfully backward to George Sand and Hawthorne.

Henry James respected Hawthorne, and greatly admired George Sand and Balzac. Ironically, however, THE NATION often found James's early fiction over-analytical. (Thomas Wentworth Higginson's remark that THE NATION "never spares its own contributors" is strikingly applicable to James's case).

Curiously, the very fiction that James was writing when he denounced Whitman's lack of refinement was found by the NATION to have an "enveloping atmosphere of . . . voluptuousness." Although James Russell Lowell found several years later that James had "tone" and "self-restraint," the NATION'S tendency was to consider him interesting but "painful." It was a pity that he had completely abandoned the "realm of romance," with its heroes and its dramas. A review in 1886 of James's Bostonians and Howells' Indian Summer sums up pretty well the weekly's attitude toward their early fiction. On the one hand, their novels would enable "our descendants" to "reconstruct the society of which we form a part"; on the other hand, Howells unfortunately avoided drama and deep feeling, and James's analyses impeded the progress of the narrative.

LATER HENRY JAMES—The Ambassadors, The Wings of the Dove, The Golden Bowl—THE NATION reviewed with puzzlement and qualified admiration. Like Henry's brother William THE NATION found itself wishing for something clear, in the novelist's earlier manner. Annie R. M. Logan, reviewing those three difficult books, had all she could do to make out what was going on in them And she indicated that when she did "make out" the stories, she found them shocking enough to deserve to be told obliquely. In 1910, on the occasion of Mark Twain's death, F. J Mather, Jr., published a NATION piece called "Two Frontiersmen,' contrasting Twain and James. James he said, could be considered a frontiersman of the inner life as Twain was out of the outer life. In a NATION article written after James's death in 1916, Stuart Pratt Sherman indicated that while the novelist would always have a small group of ardent admirers, his "aesthetic idealism" "sins against the diversity, the thick rotundity, the integrity of life." Simeon Strunsky took a similar position, comparing James unfavorably with both Tolstoy and the "solid" Howells. It was as typical of "the age" for the "pre-modern" NATION to prefer Howells to James as it is for most critics nowadays to find James's subtle probing more "relevant" than Howells' direct representation.

AN INTERESTING LETTER to THE NATION early in 1890 indicates both the weekly's admiration for Tolstoy and the reservations it had about some of his work. Isabel F. Hapgood, author of the letter, had been asked person

BOOKS FOR INFORMATION AND INSIGHT

THE POLITICS OF WAGE-PRICE DECISIONS

A Four-Country Analysis

by Murray Edelman and R. W. Fleming

Here is a multi-faceted analysis of the way in which Italy, Germany, Great Britain, and The Netherlands have attempted to exert a restraining influence on price and wage levels since World War II. It includes a comparison with the U. S. that throws light upon current American wage-price decisions and policies. 331 pages. $6.75.

THE SYMBOLIC USES OF POLITICS

by Murray Edelman

The symbolic manifestations, purposes, and uses of politics are revealed in this provocative analysis of the institution of politics and man as a political animal. The author particularly explores the meanings for large publics of the acts and gestures of leaders, of the settings in which political acts occur, of the language styles and the phrases that permeate political discussion and action, and of law enforcement activities. 201 pages. $5.00.

NATIONAL PARTY PLATFORMS, 1840-1960: SUPPLEMENT, 1964

compiled by Kirk H. Porter and Donald Bruce Johnson

Civil rights, extremist groups, and other planks in the Republican and Democratic platforms were major issues in the 1964 presidential campaign. This quadrennial supplement to our National Party Platforms, 1840-1960 ($10.00) contains the complete platforms of the Democratic, Republican, Prohibition, Socialist Labor, and Socialist Workers parties. 7¾ x 10 in. 58 pages. Paper, $1.95.

MAGAZINES IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Second Edition

by Theodore Peterson

Here is an enlarged and revised edition of a prize-winning book that has become recognized as the standard work on American magazines in the 20th century. "It covers the end of Crowell-Collier magazines, changes in the digest field, the swift rise of 'Playboy,' and other recent developments." — Advertising Age. Illustrated. 484 pages. $7.50.

AND 10 MORE ILLINI BOOKS

JOHN LOCKE AND THE DOCTRINE OF MAJORITY-RULE

by Willmoore Kendall

". . . a highly important, perhaps a revolutionary book . . . bound to remain a landmark in the study of Locke's political philosophy." — American Journal of Sociology. IB-21. 144 pages. $1.25.

THE FRAMING OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

by Joseph B. James

Today's civil rights demonstrations focus attention as never before on the actual intent and purposes of the framers of the 14th amendment to the Constitution. IB-22. 232 pages. $1.45.

THE MIND AND SPIRIT OF JOHN PETER ALTGELD

Selected Writings and Addresses

edited by Henry M. Christman

The most significant of Altgeld's public statements on key social questions. Much of what he had to say is as valid today as it was when he was alive. IB-23. 192 pages. $1.25.

A HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES WEATHER BUREAU

by Donald R. Whitnah

A fascinating history of the political and other storms which frequently have threatened the U. S. Weather Bureau from its birth to the present day. IB-24. 11 illus. 288 pages. $1.75.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IN ENGLAND, 1476-1776

The Rise and Decline of Government Controls

by Fredrick Seaton Siebert

A brilliant history of the rise and decline of the concept of governmental control over the circulation of ideas. IB-25. 428 pages. $2.25.

FREEDOM AND COMMUNICATIONS

Second Edition

by Dan Lacy

". . . an important analysis of current American mass media. . . . Lacy is one of the nation's most astute students of the freedom to communicate." — The Progressive. IB-26. 112 pages. $ .95.

THE EARLY DEVELOPMENT OF HENRY JAMES

by Cornelia Pulsifer Kelley, with an intro. by Lyon N. Richardson

". . . one of the most basic and perceptive contributions to Jamesian scholarship . . ." — Lyon N. Richardson. IB-27. 320 pages. $1.95.

LAW IN THE SOVIET SOCIETY

edited by Wayne R. LaFave

New information and frames of reference are provided in these seven essays dealing with various aspects of the role of law in Soviet socio-political development and international relations. IB-28. 312 pages. $1.95.

BEYOND THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON

The Lives of Four Africans

by Edward H. Winter

". . . provides unusual insights into the impact of the West on aboriginal African society." — Washington Post. "One of the most fascinating documents to come out of Africa for years." — The Spectator. IB-29. 8 illus. 296 pages. $1.75.

THE HISTORY OF DOCTOR JOHANN FAUSTUS

by H. G. Haile

Here is a new English version of the fantastic tales about the famous 16th-century German necromancer and sorcerer, together with an essay revealing the book's history and significance. IB-30. 24 illus. 120 pages. $1.45.

Order from your bookseller or UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS PRESS · URBANA

ally by Tolstoy to translate his Kreutzer Sonata. She was an admirer of Tolstoy as a man and as a writer, and had tried to get American publishers to bring out both War and Peace and Anna Karenina in 1881, five years before American readers were "treated to the mangled versions of those works, through the French." But she had failed, one Boston publisher having objected: "No one in Russia knows how to write except Turgeneff, and he is far above the heads of Bostonians." Miss Hapgood had declined to translate the Kreutzer Sonata, on the grounds that this anatomy of a marriage was "too frank and not decent." However quaint her decision may seem to present readers, it was quite consistent with the attitudes of most literate Americans of her day. One of the defects found in Nathan Haskell Dole's translations of Tolstoy into English was that certain passages had simply been omitted: Dole acted as censor as well as translator. According to NATION critics, however, Dole was also incompetent. Thus Mrs. C. B. Martin lamented in a review, "It makes the heart bleed to see the havoc that is made with beautiful things." Fortunately, Tolstoy's works were "great enough to rise superior to misrepresentation"; comparing Turgenev's admirable Smoke and Tolstoy's Anna Karenina, Mrs. Martin found that whereas Turgenev's people and events were distinctively Russion, Tolstoy conveyed the universal through the particular:

> No one will ever pause to inquire Anna Karenina's nationality; she will be accepted unquestioningly, in her weakness and remorse, as a world type . . .

Tolstoy, of course, underwent a religious conversion, repudiating his "worldly" works, and in 1898 the NATION's French correspondent, Auguste Laugel, used Tolstoy's What is Art as a stick with which to beat the Decadents and Symbolists. Tolstoy had described his "stupor" at an exhibit of "modern" art, where among other astonishing things he had seen a face painted entirely blue. The Russian writer also criticized, to Laugel's satisfaction, Richard Wagner's merging of the genres of music and poetry: to Tolstoy, this was a "counterfeit" of true art. Laugel wished that Tolstoy had been harder on another Symbolist, Stephane Mallarmé, but noted with quiet glee that What is Art was considered blasphemous by the modernists.

LAUGEL'S POINT OF VIEW was essentially that of other NATION writers toward the Symbolists, whom Yeats described as in reaction against both the rationalism of the eighteenth century and the materialism of the nineteenth century. The Symbolist movement had come to perfection, said Yeats, in Wagner, in the English Pre-Raphaelites, in such French writers as Mallarmé and Maeterlinck. Yeats, himself a part of the movement, believed it to be the only one "that is saying new things." But what Edmund Wilson has described as the Symbolists' attempt, through "a complicated association of ideas represented by a medley of metaphors—to communicate unique personal feeling," did not suit THE NATION's taste for general human truth. When Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who had helped arrange for the posthumous publication of Emily Dickinson's poetry, wrote about her poems in THE NATION, he noted primarily such "realistic" details as her references to American birds. Today, Emily Dickinson is seen as more like the Symbolist Mallarmé (her "certain slant of light . . . that oppresses like the heft of cathedral tunes" is hardly "representational") than like such a romantic realist as John Greenleaf Whittier. But Higginson would have been startled by the comparison to Mallarmé. He was capable, however, of praising Verlaine for bringing "a new element of melody into French verse," even if like Swinburne he dealt more than was necessary with the "nauseous." While the translator of Verlaine, Miss Gertrude Hall, had not caught the "Dantesque directness" of "Colloque sentimental," she had still "rescued the best of this soiled man of genius from the worst."

THIS WAS ABOUT the farthest reach of NATION sympathy for the Symbolists. During the decade of the nineties, such American counterparts or imitators of the English Yellow Book as Mlle. New York, The Chap-Book, and The Philistine (which took a smack in its first number at "ponderous Howells") added spice to magazine journalism by publishing Symbolist and Decadent poetry, fiction, and art. But THE NATION found such "coming" writers as Huysmans and Gabriele D'Annunzio "unclean". Many present-day readers have a similar reaction, but what is most significant about THE NATION's treatment of literature is the lack of sympathy for works not in the Balzac-Turgenev-Tolstoy tradition of lucidity and rationality. In his introduction to Diana of the Crossways, Arthur Symons praised George Meredith as a Symbolist not interested in "the narration of the little, colourless facts of modern English society"; the NATION critics did not advocate such narration, but regarded the "little, colourless facts" as a starting point for a good novelist.

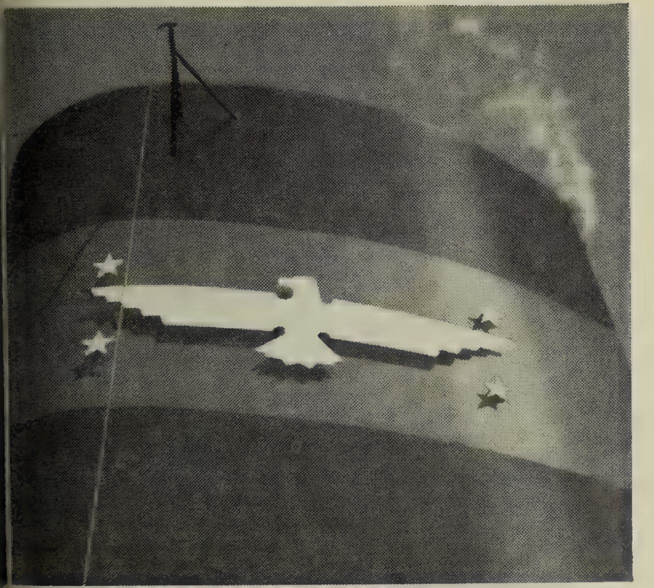
During the early years of the twentieth century, when Paul Elmer More began to contribute to THE NATION, and particularly after he became editor in 1909, the weekly became a voice of the "New Humanism." More and Irving Babbitt were the two most prominent members of this "school," but Frank Jewett Mather, who wrote chiefly on art for THE NATION, and O. W. Firkins (who reviewed poetry) and Stuart Pratt Sherman (who wrote on literature and cultural matters) also belonged to it. These critics emphasized the need, both in literature and in life, for ethical control, an "inner check" of natural impulse. According to the New Humanists, Jean-Jacques Rousseau and the Romantic movement had exalted the individual at the expense of the community, had apotheosized impulse at the expense eason. Naturalism in literature—work of Zola and his followers—but Romanticism on all fours, such a philosophic movement as ;sonism as well as such social ements as anarchism and syndi- m were equally expressions of modern lawlessness. While The ion of the late nineteenth century been relatively friendly to Rous- (the philosopher-mathematician rles Sanders Peirce had observed Nation discussion of him that iment played an important role in , The Nation of the early twenti- century denounced him and all vorks. When More reviewed Hol- k Jackson's book, The Eighteen- ties, he argued that the whole dent movement, of which Oscar le, John Davidson, Ernest Dow- and Francis Thompson were a was a product of the assertion of rights of "personality."

> ersonality was to assert itself in the irection of an unlimited and unquestioned expansiveness, in the claim of the individual to be purely and intensely himself, in the free pursuit of those emotions and sensations which are at the root of division among mankind; while denying those rights of man, in the classical sense, which mean the subordination of the individualizing desires to the commonalty of the law of reason.

More went on to say that the main literary source of this perversion at present was undoubtedly the group of "powerful Russian writers, with their congeners in Scandinavia and the other Northern countries. . . ." Among the writers he condemned was Tolstoy—his humanitarianism More found as repellent as Nietzsche's "Superman" doctrine—and Strindberg. But the book on which More concentrated his fire was Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment:

> Somehow we are to be lifted up by sympathizing with a madman worshipping humanity in the person of a girl of the street.

Not many contemporary writers were wholeheartedly praised by The Nation during the years when More was a dominant editorial influence. The weekly's reviewers (men like H. W. Boynton, Frank Jewett Mather, Jr., H. I. Brock) did, however, admire the work of both Joseph Conrad and Willa Cather. Both were essentially "conservative" in their emphasis on the individual's character, and on his moral response to his world. H. W. Boynton contrasted Conrad in a 1914 essay with a "group of brilliant irresponsibles"—Shaw, Chesterton, Arnold Bennett—whose attitude was, "Amuse the brutes." In Conrad's works it was the "hapless struggle of man with the universe which lifts his imagination . . . clear of the mere unpleasantness of pathos, fairly to the plane of tragedy." Willa Cather, Boynton praised in an interesting article called "Realism and Recent American Fiction," which resumed what various Nation critics—Stuart Pratt Sherman, Mather, Warner Fite



World Traveler.

s eagle gets around—around the Orient, and around the ld. Great President Liners make regular round trips n San Francisco to Hawaii, Japan, Hong Kong and the lippines. They also sail around the world, calling at ports in 22 countries. Stopovers, tours and sea/air com- itions can be arranged on all routes.

AMERICAN PRESIDENT LINES

ıational Building • San Francisco, Calif. 94108

With best wishes for continued success in arousing the social conscience of America.

EDWARD LAMB ENTERPRISES, INC.

TOLEDO, OHIO

and Harold de Wolf Fuller, had been saying on the subject: all of them had agreed that true realism "interprets, creates, transforms raw fact into something more pregnant"; realism employs facts not to document life, but to embody it. This was the realism of Willa Cather, whose "artist"-novel, The Song of the Lark, Boynton contrasted in another NATION review with Dreiser's The Genius. While Dreiser's book tells us, said Boynton, about Eugene Witla's brilliant mind, Witla is actually an extremely dull fellow, whose morals are less distressing then his manners. In The Genius was to be found "romantic welter" (not the "sincere realism" of Sister Carrie and Jennie Gerhardt, books which—somewhat surprisingly—THE NATION favorably reviewed), whereas The Song of the Lark was "finished work," uncluttered by details, in short a "noble" novel.

Consistent with this praise of Cather and Conrad was Frank Jewett Mather's approbation of Cézanne's art. An impressive selection of oils and water-colors by Cézanne was exhibited early in 1910 in New York, and Mather contrasted his work with that of the luminists, who seek "the effects that occur only once." (We may recall THE NATION's objections to the literary Symbolists, partly on the same grounds). Cézanne > seeks what is eternally true of every scene . . . its skeletal organism, the underlying geometry that makes it of a certain size and mass and depth.

Mather's two-part review of the famous 1913 Armory Show was quite unsympathetic to the un-Cézanne-like tendencies of Picasso and Picabia; the review failed to refer specifically to Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase; but Mather was generally unimpressed by this new art. Here was the "welter" which Boynton found in Dreiser's The Genius, and which other NATION writers found in the 1912 industrial strike at Lawrence, Massachusetts.

FEW WERE THE examples of "restrained" classic art to which NATION critics could point with New Humanist pride. Robert Frost's North of Boston displayed an "inner check," said O. W. Firkins, but Frost had taken the wrong road in Mountain Interval. Stoddard Dewey, now French correspondent for THE NATION, wrote appreciative articles about the poetry of Emile Verhaeren—perhaps, said Dewey, the greatest French poet since Hugo and Charles Péguy. It is notable that both Péguy and Verhaeren were, in an important sense, "moralists"—in contrast to Amy Lowell, John Gould Fletcher, and other "Imagists," to whose poetry the pre-1918 NATION was cool.

AS FOR THE "NEW" novel, James Joyce's "free use of privy-language" in Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man distressed Boynton, who conceded that the book exhibited an "ingrowing and indeterminate idealism." Harold de Wolf Fuller, reviewing Lawrence's Sons and Lovers in 1913, found "charm and pathos" in Mrs. Morel's struggle to maintain the ideals which she had had before marriage, and condemned Paul's affairs as "the indulgence of an egotist, whose egotism has no large transforming power." The modern novel, in short, seemed well off the classical trolley.

The "quantification of impulse" which the pre-1918 NATION habitually deplored in contemporary literature and art, was in part a consequence of the "new psychology" associated with Sigmund Freud and Carl Jung. THE NATION's opinion of these newfangled ideas was clearly expressed in an article headed "Psychology as Pseudo-Science," which reviewed Freud's Wit and its Relation to the Unconscious and Jung's Analytical Psychology:

> This sort of thing serves well enough for those who are content with metaphors as explanations . . . but when it is paraded as a respectable description of the rarer values in experience, reducing those experiences to the forms of quantities and energies, it cannot be too plainly labelled as nonsense.

THE NATION's temper, from 1 to 1918, was certainly not mod The weekly's predispositions similar to those of such contemp ries as The Atlantic Monthly and old Dial. Nineteenth-century A ican intellectuals were inclinec have "refined" tastes and in comments on both art and pol tended to emphasize the import of individual character. But Fr Proust, Joyce and Faulkner in our time made it as diff for most of us to think in quite t terms, as Carnegie and Rockef and Morgan made it for "indivi character" to play a really effe role in social and economic lif was chiefly to the problem of th terrelationship between the indivi and a complex society that NA criticism, both literary and poli began to address itself in 1918.

IV

Renaissance and Reform: 1918-1

One of A. J. Liebling's piece the wayward press referred to the-one-hand-this-on-the-other-h that" writing. Oswald Garrison lard received in 1925 a letter Ellery Sedgwick, conservative e of The Atlantic Monthly, that c be described in Liebling's te Sedgwick thanked Villard for a ing to write an article "which we cussed so briefly at the Cent then went on:

> I heard from an unpreju source the other day that THE NA was doing better than ever. In of my violent disagreement wit more fantastic phases of your and industrial creed, I will say it is incomparably the best w paper in the country.

Villard himself was of contr tion all compact. Like his mo who in 1914 led the Women's F Parade down Fifth Avenue to U Square, and his abolitionist gr father, William Lloyd Garrison, lard opposed war and fought social reforms. He helped to f both the National Association fo Advancement of Colored People e American Civil Liberties Union. n the other hand, Villard was a entleman entrepreneur: son of a ailroad builder, Henry Villard, he et fellow graduates of Harvard at ubs like the Century and the Uni- ersity, he respected "good families" espite his experience of intense big- try among them, and he somewhat uixotically sought the advertising of ig business in an effort to make a nancial success of THE NATION, hose political "radicalism" made it bnoxious to the business community.

The conflict in Villard between atrician and social reformer is well lustrated by THE NATION's printing August 1920, while he was on oliday, an editorial headed "Take very Empty House!" The editorial as written by William MacDonald, hom Villard had persuaded to leave history professorship at Brown to ecome a NATION editor, and read in art as follows:

> The Tenement House Commissioner of New York City, Mr. Frank Mann, was quoted some two weeks ago as saying that the shortage of residence apartments in the city aggregated 40,000. Mayor Hylan was reported to have said that the figure was too low and should be nearer 100,000; while Mr. Edward P. Doyle, secretary of the Mayor's Housing Conference Committee, put the shortage at 160,000. . . .
>
> Everybody knows not only that there is no building, but why there is no building. High prices of land, labor, and material in the cities have made it impossible to build at a profit unless the owner can be assured of a high rental; and rentals, thanks in part to scarcity, in part to the high cost of building, and in part to atrocious profiteering by landlords, have about reached the limit of human endurance. . . .
>
> All this spells calamity. A population without homes means not only inconvenience; it means sickness and exposure and suffering for men, women and children; and it may mean death. Without greater forbearance and self-restraint than a houseless population has ever yet exhibited, it also means riot, disorder, and crime. What is the government doing about it? Nothing whatever as yet that can have any appreciable effect for many months to come. . . . Meantime, the country is short a million houses or apartments, and the day of crisis is at hand.
>
> There is one thing that should be done at once in every large city in which the housing problem is acute. That is to take possession of every unoccupied house, or building, or apartment that is fit or that can be made fit for human habitation, and make it available for the people who need homes. There are hundreds of houses in every large city that are unoccupied. Some of them have been unoccupied for years, as their boarded doors and windows testify. Some are the superfluous houses of the superfluous rich; some are the town houses of well-to-do owners who pass all of the year in the country or abroad. There are stores and shops and lofts which are vacant, in which families could be housed. In a crisis such as now confronts us, no man has a moral right to close the doors of a building which he does not use; and if he will not rent at a fair rate, the municipal government should not hesitate to take possession, fix a fair rental, and let the people in.

Villard later wrote that THE NATION's blast "bowled me over when I saw it." This comment, however, appears in a footnote to a passage in his autobiography which reads:

> . . . We of THE NATION set ourselves to printing as able and informative a journal as possible, without regarding the question of cost. I am proud of these fighting issues, whatever their errors.

Since MacDonald's proposal, if adopted, would have cost him a house, Villard's reaction is extremely tolerant. He was clearly too much the patrician ever to become the "Bolshevik" his enemies labelled him, but he was sufficiently concerned about human suffering to employ the kind of man who could write, "Take Every Empty House!"

An article in the Outlook and Independent in March, 1929, discussed Villard in terms of "conflicting heredities." Villard was to take issue with this thesis, but there probably is truth in it. From the abstinent, antislavery grandfather, William Lloyd Garrison, Villard did perhaps "inherit" his puritan reformism; from Henry Villard, his Bavarian-born father who had become a star Civil War reporter, and later a president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and who enjoyed a glass of wine, he may have

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY PRESS

Fund Raising in the United States ITS ROLE IN AMERICA'S PHILANTHROPY
by Scott M. Cutlip

". . . a thorough history of a genuinely American institution. . . . A readable piece of sociology that provides some stark insights into our present culture."
— Wall Street Journal $12.50

Philanthropy in the Shaping of American Higher Education by Merle Curti and Roderick Nash

The history of private support of higher education in America — its advantages and dangers. $8.50

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Brunswick, New Jersey

In the tradition of

THE NATION

★

FRONTIER

A liberal monthly magazine

Now in its sixteenth year

GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Publisher

★

FRONTIER
1434 Westwood Blvd.
Los Angeles, Calif. 90024

derived his gusto and his interest in business affairs. His businessman "blood" thus made him pay Nation contributors (who generally considered it an honor to be published in the journal) a cent a word, while his "reformer" blood made him print articles about economic exploitation in the Pennsylvania coal fields.

Fanny Garrison Villard, his mother, attended the first gymnastic class for girls in Boston. One day in 1863, her brother introduced Henry Villard to her at the gym and although the young war reporter was not a teetotaler like her father, she married him a few years later. She did, however, ask her son never to drink alcoholic beverages, and easily obtained his pledge of abstinence. The fact of division in his father's house on this question may largely explain The Nation's editorial attitude toward Al Smith's wetness during the 1928 Presidential campaign. Villard wrote then:

> One may regret with all one's heart, as does the writer of these lines, that being in an exalted position, he cannot set an example of abstinence to the millions whose State he governs, but at least one knows where he stands.

This was not the attitude of those dogmatic reformers who—as William Allen White said of their role in Kansas—first took away men's slaves, then took away their liquor. Editors who worked under Villard, like Lewis Gannett, Joseph Wood Krutch, Freda Kirchwey and Ernest Gruening, attest in conversation and written reminiscences to Villard's admirable respect for opinions and attitudes different from his own. Krutch notes in More Lives Than One that the Nation staff "almost without exception represented the very tendencies which made him uneasy," and that Villard "allowed us to treat his opinions with sometimes ribald disrespect." At a Nation luncheon for two members of the British Labor Party, D. H. Lawrence—who, Krutch remarks, probably had been invited "at the insistence of one of us younger staff members"—replied to an earnest question of Villard's with a comment that doubtless proved more shocking than "Take Every Empty House!" Villard's question "And now, Mr. Lawrence, won't you tell us what you think we should do to save the world?" was answered, "I thought, Mr. Villard, you understood that I hoped it would go to pieces as rapidly and as completely as possible."

Villard wanted light, not Lawrence's dark gods, but it is interesting to note that when The Nation established in 1921 a board of honorific "Contributing Editors," the "reactionary" Nietzschean H. L. Mencken was invited (by Carl Van Doren) to join it, and—to his own bewilderment—did. Listed with him as Contributing Editors were Anatole France (Lewis Gannett got permission to use his name), J. A. Hobson (the British "institutional" economist), Robert Herrick (a friend of Ernest Gruening), and the German Professor Friedrich William Forster, who had in his own country publicly opposed World War I. Hobson and France were politically much closer to Norman Thomas, who in 1921 became a Nation associate editor, than they were to Mencken, or for that matter to Albert Jay Nock, the ultra-individualist who had been with The Nation in 1918-1919, and who was in 1935 to publish a book entitled Our Enemy, the State. This line-up is brilliant, certainly, but puzzling to anyone with a rigorously logical mind. "Liberalism" in the twenties, however, had an iconoclastically libertarian connotation; and a shock of recognition passed among men and women who, however much they disagreed as to positive political programs, shared a dislike of the abuse of power, and of what they saw as stupid and hypocritical censorship. The ambience during the twenties is beautifully evoked in a letter written by Lewis Gannett:

> . . . my nine years there were the richest experience of my life. It was an exciting staff to work with; a part of it may have been that we all appreciated one another. We felt we were working at the hub of the universe, and there was an element of truth in it. The top writers of the day, some of the leading political figures, a strange group of business-men friends of OGV—passed through the office; and every June the best editors of the best college magazines streamed in, hoping for jobs. We felt we were battling the world, an uphill struggle, but we had no sense of hopeless doom.

> . . . In England and Germany (and, to the extent that I have ever been heard of at all, in France and Italy) I am regarded as a highly typical American — in truth, as almost the archetype of the American. And it is the fact that here at home I am often denounced as the worst American unhung. The paradox is only apparent. The explanation of it lies in this: that to most Europeans the United States is still regarded naively as the land of liberty par excellence, whereas to most Americans the thing itself has long ceased to have any significance, and to large numbers of them, indeed, it has of late taken on an extreme obnoxiousness. I know of no civilized country, indeed, in which liberty is less esteemed than it is in the United States today; certainly there is none in which more persistent efforts are made to limit it and put it down. I am thus, to Americans, a bad American, but to Europeans, still unaware of the practical effects of the Wilson idealism and the Roosevelt saloon-bouncer ethic, I seem to be an eloquent spokesman of the true American tradition. It is a joke, but the joke is not on me.
> — H. L. Mencken, The Nation, 1923

It should be added that if Villard paid his staff low wages, he was notably generous in sending Nation editors on tours of inspection abroad. Thus Gannett took a trip in 1926 to China, then across Turkestan to Russia and western Europe. Krutch, two years later, was sent to tour the theatre in the major European capitals, and particularly in Moscow, where he obtained an interview with isenstein. Both editors sent back ticles to THE NATION about their ips, but Krutch remarks that "general education was the chief purpose" f the expeditions.

One more conflict in Villard derves to be mentioned. At the age of elve he wrote a letter from Berlin, here his father was recuperating om an illness, in which he emphazed that at the school he was atnding, "we don't use guns." The rd "guns" was underlined three nes. Here was his pacifism, in germ. t Villard, like his father, became expert on military matters: his st contribution to THE NATION in 94, dealt with the military contation of Spaniards and Moors in rthern Africa; he did research tord a Master's degree at Harvard the first American Secretary of ar, Henry Knox; and during the -World War I years he conducted column on army matters in the w York Evening Post which disayed knowledge > so sound and so comprehensive, that general officers of reputation respected his dicta and solicited his conclusions.

meron Rogers, who made this mment in his Outlook and Indendent article, added that if Villard d not become a journalist, he would obably have been an eminently cessful soldier. In his own autobiraphy, Fighting Years, Villard rerks that it was not until the Amerin conquest of Cuba and the Philines, > with its needless waste of life and, in the archipelago, shocking cruelties, that I arrived at my anti-war position. I liked soldiering in peacetime so much that it was a clear case of reason triumphing over sentiment and inborn liking.

Was it only a coincidence that the father of the girl he married in 1902 had been a captain in the Confederate army?

By 1915 Villard's pacifism was so widely known that Henry Ford, hoping to "get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas," invited him to sail to Europe on the "peace ship." Seeing the bizarre aspect of Ford's scheme, Villard refused to be associated with it. However, because Villard had attended the press conference at which Ford announced his plan, Villard was linked to it in the public mind. He later felt that the whole "Oscar II" enterprise had helped discredit the pacifist cause during World War I.

Post-World War I

Villard, we have noted, had been ardently pro-Wilson during the 1912 Presidential campaign. Though disappointed by Wilson's failure, as President, to end race segregation in the federal government, and by his interventions in Latin America, Villard retained influence within the administration as late as 1915. Speaking to Joe Tumulty, Wilson's private secretary, just after the sinking of the Lusitania, Villard asserted that a country might be "too proud to fight," that there were better ways of settling international disputes than by mass killing. The phrase, "too proud to fight," immediately found its way into a Presidential speech. But in a NATION article published after Wilson's death in 1924, Villard asserted that the President had not maintained a vigorous defense of American neutrality. A powerful State Department note to Great Britain protesting against the seizure of our ships on the high seas had—Villard declared—been emasculated beyond recognition in the White House. And five months after the successful culmination of his 1916

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★
We, in our 34th year of service to America's great industries and organizations, salute
THE NATION
on its first ★ ★ 100 years ★ ★

Direct Mail
PRINTING COMPANY
a division of Direct Mail Envelope Co., Inc.
448 WEST 16th STREET • NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10011
TELEPHONE: AREA CODE (212) WAtkins 4-0500
★ ★ ★ ★ 21 ★ ★ ★ ★

For 100 years The Nation has fought exploitation, poverty and racism in the United States. For 30 years District 65 has waged the same fight in New York City. We share with The Nation its pride in the past, and its commitment to the future.

DISTRICT 65

R. W. D. S. U.

AFL-CIO

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

"he-kept-us-out-of-war" campaign, (Villard, incidentally, voted for the Prohibition Party candidate) Wilson asked Congress for a war declaration. The evening before he made that speech, the President had told Frank Cobb of the New York World that "the spirit of ruthless brutality" would now enter the "fibre of our national life." What Wilson thus accepted as an ugly necessity, Villard could never really accept. Some weeks before the declaration of war, he had warned in THE NATION that free speech and a free press would be the first casualties. Josephus Daniels, Wilson's Secretary of the Navy, notes in his Cabinet Diary for Saturday, March 17, 1917, that Villard had called to talk about a pending Censorship Bill:

> He said that if the bill were passed he might go to jail. I replied: In some circles your being put in jail would be a very popular act.

These were the circles whose members asked Villard's little daughter if she were ashamed of her disloyal, "pro-German" father. Actually, in the same spirit in which other pacifistic Americans joined the ambulance corps, Villard wanted to enter some non-military government service; he declined Herbert Hoover's invitation to join the Food Administration only because he found the Evening Post's financial position too precarious to allow him to leave New York.

In the summer of 1918, once THE NATION was completely independent of the Evening Post, the weekly began to hit hard at manifestations of the "spirit of ruthless brutality." A teacher in Iowa, it reported, had been "painted yellow by a mob" on suspicion of being disloyal; a woman from Benton, Illinois, had been ridden on a rail by a mob of Liberty Leaguers for alleged pro-Germanism; a member of the executive committee of the I.W.W. had been hanged in Montana by a masked mob. Even a "pro-War" radical, one of Ohio's leading citizens, had been kidnapped and horsewhipped. An ugly legal treble accompanied the mob-violent bass of this wild music. Summarizing what was done by trial judges and appellate United States courts during the war, Professor Zechariah Chafee has written:

> It became criminal to advocate heavier taxation instead of bond issues, to state that conscription was unconstitutional though the Supreme Court had not yet held it valid, to say that the sinking of merchant ships was legal, to urge that a referendum should have preceded our declaration of war, to say that war was contrary to the teachings of Christ.

Many conscientious objectors were subjected to humiliation, and some were actually tortured. The NATION reported in its issue of December 7, 1918, that at one barracks, conscientious objectors had been made to stand during the first week with their hands crossed at their breasts, and during the second week made to hang by their wrists. Among those so treated was Evan Thomas, Norman Thomas' brother. Officially admitting that these things had been done, Secretary of War Baker put an end to them during the first week of December.

The war shackled minds as well as bodies. Virtually every paper of socialist or anarchist persuasion was banned from the mails; The World Tomorrow, edited by Norman Thomas, and published by the Fellowship of Reconciliation, was stopped. In September, 1918, an issue of THE NATION, which had not previously been harassed, was excluded from the mails by order of Postmaster-General Burleson. His excuse was an article in that issue, "The One Thing Needful," criticizing the dispatch by the government of Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, on a mission to French and English labor organizations. The article protested that what was needed was not to "sell" the war to labor abroad, but to learn its opinions: "Why not let European labor speak freely for itself?" Woodrow Wilson strongly condemned Burleson's action at a Cabinet meeting on September 17, and the ban was lifted the f lowing day. At the same time, T World Tomorrow was issued order permitting it to continue. T New Republic for September noted that no part of the suppress number of THE NATION contain criticism of government policy > that would compare in freedom a vigor with the criticisms of the Llo George government and its polic published by the English Nati Why is it that the British governme after four years of the most dang ous responsibility, still observes a t eration of criticism which seems d gerous to us?

Little attention was paid by the N York press to Burleson's arbitrary a but the New York Herald seized t opportunity to advertise its o patriotism:

> "Damn the NEW YORK HE ALD!" says the Kaiser, in order the HERALD seized and suppress The HERALD is a 100 per c American newspaper. To hell w the Kaiser!

Villard knew that against the "w madness" on the home front, not ev the most vorpal sword was an a quate defense. But he had hopes t the "peace without victory" so no desiderated by Wilson in a speech January 22, 1917, would prev that madness from enveloping world again. His definitive, bit disenchantment with Wilson was result of what he saw as the Pre dent's complete surrender of ideals embodied in the Fourt Points. These points, first set forth Wilson in January, 1918, were tended both to induce the Cen Powers to sue for peace, and to c vince people everywhere in the w that the war was indeed being fou by the Allies to save democra They included a demand for dip macy in the public view—"o covenants openly arrived at"; a d laration that the "treatment accor Russia by her sister nations in months to come will be the acid of their good will"; and a call for establishment of a league of nati give "mutual guarantees of political l territorial integrity to great and all states alike." Yet a few months er, American troops joined troops the Allied powers in landing at ious points in Russia and Siberia, ensibly to prevent the Germans m seizing Allied stores. The NA- ON indignantly asserted that no > high-sounding protestations of disinterestedness on the part of the United States and the Allies . . . can hide the fact that the democracy for which the world is to be made safe, along with the right of national self-determination . . . . are now to be offered to the Russian people with the backing of military force.

few days after the signing of the nistice, a NATION editorial, "Choose This Day," declared that Wilson, o had yielded to the "inexcusable, ndering invasion of Russia," had w to decide between fighting the perialists and yielding to them and king to the level of a Roosevelt or Taft.

While these NATION criticisms of lson are sharp, Villard clung ough the winter and early spring 1919 to the hope of a just peace Versailles. Following the President Europe in December, 1918, he was pressed by the tremendous acclaim the enunciator of the Fourteen ints. Italian peasants, Villard ca- d to THE NATION, "to-day burn ndles before his picture." From ris, in January, Lewis Gannett re- rted the making over of all the front ges of the city's papers in honor of lson's arrival. Gannett, however, d done more than glance at the nt pages; he noted Figaro's edito- l "interpretation" of the Fourteen ints which held that they were not n commandments," and refused to ablish "a premature likeness be- een Moses and Wilson." This was o Clemenceau's line: the bitter ench premier was to tell Henry ickham Steed, editor of the London mes, that Wilson "thinks himself first man for two thousand years o has known anything about peace earth."

READERS OF THE February 22 NATION learned from Villard that the League of Nations was turning out in practice to be essentially an association of five governments:

> The world situation demands far-reaching readjustments; the peace conference offers us instead certain anachronous political and military devices, calling them a league of nations.

The same issue of THE NATION carried William MacDonald's report of an interview in which Senator Borah of Idaho had declared himself utterly opposed to any kind of international agreement which involved any sort of surrender of sovereignty on the part of the United States. "Our presence in Russia," Borah had said, "is a fine example of our undertaking to police Europe." Borah's objections to American entry into the League were distinctly more "isolationist" than Villard's, but one sees taking shape early in 1919 the political alliance among persons of divergent views—Henry Cabot Lodge, Borah, LaFollette, Villard—against the treaty Woodrow Wilson was to bring home.

As late as April 26, Villard—although by now persuaded that the great powers were simply making decisions at Versailles to suit themselves—had relatively kind words for Wilson: he was > the only one of the Big Four who has really desired to create a better world.

But when the treaty was published in May, THE NATION printed an editorial by William MacDonald, "The Madness at Versailles," that remains a classic of vituperation. It began with restraint:

> It was not to be hoped that there would be a generous peace. The wickednesses of the German armies were too obvious, the bad faith of the German Imperial Government had been too clearly demonstrated to admit of any settlement which did not impose heavy penalties and exact specific and ample guaranties.

But MacDonald went on to call the peace just concluded one of "undisguised vengeance," repudiating

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD:
Pacifist at War
By Michael Wreszin

The engrossing biography of the crusading editor who a generation ago transformed The Nation from a sedate literary review into the vigorous liberal journal it is today. A progressive idealist and passionate believer in peace, Villard made "more acres of public men acutely miserable per unit of circulation than any other editor alive. . . ." Yet, though he fought in the forefront of liberal political movements, his deeply felt pacificism led him, in his old age, to put keeping America out of war ahead of beating Hitler.

352 pages $6.95

THE POPULATION CRISIS:
Implications and Plans for Action
Edited by Larry K. Y. Ng
Stuart Mudd, Co-Editor

Twenty-eight leading scientists, humanists, and statesmen, including Julian Huxley, Eugene R. Black, Arnold Toynbee, Alan F. Guttmacher, Hermann J. Muller, and others, investigate objectively the potentially catastrophic consequences of overpopulation and offer realistic measures to avert them. Published for the World Academy of Art and Science

375 pages paper $2.95

THE ADDICT AND THE LAW
By Alfred R. Lindesmith

"The proposal made by Alfred R. Lindesmith . . . could provide help for all addicts. It is guaranteed to stir up considerable protest. A scholarly, well argued, partisan statement . . . a public service of the first order."—Michael Harrington, Book Week
350 pages $7.50

INDIANA UNIVERSITY PRESS
10th & Morton Streets
Bloomington, Indiana 47401

> every generous word that Mr. Wilson has ever uttered regarding Germany, flies in the face of accepted principles of law and economics, and makes the very name of democracy a reproach.

Documenting his charge that the treaty was an "international crime," MacDonald pointed to the overwhelming burden of reparations imposed on a Germany deprived of the territories whose wealth might have helped to pay them. He also asserted that the envisioned disarmament of Germany was "wholly negatived, so far as moral value is concerned," by the absence of any provision for the disarmament of the Allies and their associates. Of the five Great Powers, two were at the mercy of the other three (France, England and the United States), and these could enforce their will upon all the countries in the League of Nations. The discriminatory tariffs, whose reform Wilson had urged in the Fourteen Points, remained. And Wilson, said MacDonald, stood discredited and condemned, and—"strange transformation"—supported by the staunch and voluble champions of the established economic order. But MacDonald did not despair:

> Versailles has forced men into two camps, the radicals and the reactionaries. Heaven grant that the revolution may be peaceful, and that it may destroy only to rebuild!

A few months later, in The Economic Consequences of the Peace (which Harold Laski reviewed in THE NATION) John Maynard Keynes said many of the same things. He too believed that Wilson, after leading men everywhere to hope for a "peace without victory," had settled for a peace that contained the seeds of another war. Attempting to explain what happened at Versailles, Morison and Commager point primarily to "the menace of Bolshevism that hung over Paris like a dark cloud":

> At one point Hungary went Bolshevik, rumors that Germany and Italy were slipping kept coming in, the entire bourgeois-capitalist world was terrified! Any peace was better than prolonging the uncertainty, and if America deserted the Allies would not Bolshevism reap the profit?

One need not accept Villard's view of Wilson as a "criminal," or Dos Passos' brilliant, biased picture of "Meester Veelson" in 1919, to understand the feelings of those who thought they had once stood with him high on a mountain, and seen spread out before them a fertile land of vines and fig-trees and ploughshares—and not a sword in sight.

In the United States after the war, "Reds" replaced "Huns" as the primary objects of public disapproval. There were violent anarchists in the United States in 1919, and during that year the Communist Party and the Communist Labor Party were formed. But there was also Eugene V. Debs, the Socialist leader who was dismayed when he heard of Bolshevik cruelties in Russia, and whose philosophy of life was expressed in a speech to the judge who sentenced him to jail for his public condemnation of the war:

> Your Honor, years ago I recognized my kinship with all living beings, and I made up my mind that I was not one whit better than the meanest on earth. I said then, and I say now, that while there is a lower class I am in it, while there is a criminal class I am of it, and while there is a soul in prison I am not free.

Thus Debs paraphrased Jesus.

TO VILLARD AND THE NATION, th imprisonment of Debs was anoth symbol of Woodrow Wilson's fal Villard, in an obituary essay, was t write on Wilson in 1924, that he ha come into American political life "a if in response to prayer," and d manded an end to the "exploitati of the people by legal and politic means." He had said that "the ma ters of the government of the Unite States are the combined capitalis and manufacturers of the Unit States." Yet a few years after he ha used this language the House of Mo gan was his close ally, and Debs wa in jail. To what extent, one wonder was the warmth of THE NATION sympathy for labor during the strik that swept the country during 191 related to Villard's disenchantme with the man who had once pro claimed a New Freedom? Villar was at the end of the war distinct more conservative on economic ma ters than were NATION editors lik Mussey and MacDonald; and it easier to imagine him deriving emo tional satisfaction from his editor treatment of (for example) the Sea tle general strike, than it is to believ he read their articles with intellectu approval.

The Seattle general strike of Fe ruary, 1919, occurred within the ge eral context of post-armistice lab discontent. Howe and Coser no that during that year there we strikes by 25 per cent of the worki class, and "long, hard, and bloo clashes between the unions and variety of strikebreaking agencie
The Seattle strike differed in at lea two respects from other strikes, su as those in steel and coal. It was general strike (and was label
"Bolshevik" partly because of thi and it was conducted without v lence. In a recent study, Robert Friedheim has pointed out that t
Seattle branch of the American Fe eration of Labor was at the time the strike notably more radical th the national leadership. The lo

A. F. of L. dominated the strike, in which all Seattle labor, including the membership of the I. W. W., participated. Friedheim also emphasizes hat Seattle labor, in adopting the general strike strategy, which had been employed in Europe but not

Readers of The Nation do not need to be reminded that for a half century it has opposed socialistic dogma as energetically as it could; and it will continue to oppose it. But in the present premises it is concerned with preserving to every law-abiding citizen and organization the right to present for public consideration his ideas, no matter how erroneous they may appear. The democracy that cannot preserve that right for its minorities cannot live. It is the men who are denying that right, and not the Socialists or I. W. W.'s, who are the most dangerous enemies of the social order to-day.

For we live indeed in perilous times. Privilege in Russia and Germany has dissolved, and in Great Britain is on the brink of dissolution. The people have lost faith in their rulers and leaders. Let not our privileged classes imagine that the United States is immune. Signs multiply that precisely the same unrest is working here. Deny men the right to discuss their grievances and to redress them through changes in the law, and you develop the temper recently expressed by one of the Socialist leaders:

> I, for one, have severed all relations with the enemy. I have stopped signing petitions or other instruments of a pleading nature. I will endorse demands only. It is time that we came out in the open. . . . We must isolate ourselves — fight alone. This is the method by which we will be able to demand — not beg — our rights.

We adjure the holders of privilege and power solemnly to consider whither their present course of repression leads. Perhaps it is not even yet too late.

— Editorial, The Nation, 1919

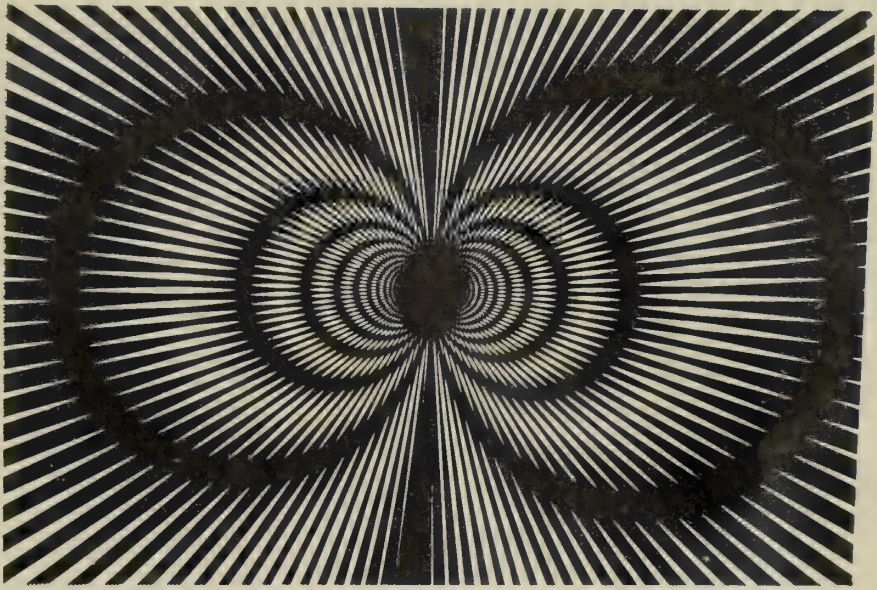
Every shade of opinion in the New York Journal-American



It's the only true newspaper forum in New York . . . featuring columnists who write without restriction as they view the political scene. Take your choice of liberals, conservatives, or middle-of-the-roaders. They're all in the Journal-American.

WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR. speaks for the conservatives
JOHN CHAMBERLAIN covers the political spectrum
FRANK CONNIFF reflects liberal Democratic thinking
GEORGE DIXON considers the human side of Washington news
LESLIE GOULD develops the conservative financial viewpoint
WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, JR. takes an independent stand
SEN. JACOB K. JAVITS sees issues from the liberal Republican side
MARIANNE MEANS writes about the personalities in political issues
LEO MONSKY analyzes issues from the intellectual angle
RUTH MONTGOMERY specializes in Washington political figures
VICTOR RIESEL presents the opinions of labor
PAUL ROBERTS ferrets out Communist sympathizers
BISHOP SHEEN shares his Catholic point of view
ROBERT S. SPIVACK comments on personalities that move events
PIERRE HUSS views news from inside the UN
WILLIAM S. WHITE reports objectively on national and international issues

Above design created from Moire pattern [illegible] 70719, manufactured by Edmund Scientific Company, Barrington, New Jersey.

previously in the United States, did not have revolutionary aims. In fact, it appears to have had no clear goals at all. For the overwhelming majority of the strikers it was, Friedheim declares, a vehicle through which they could "let off steam":

> Seattle workers saw hostile forces or outright enemies in every direction—the United States government and its troops, its agent Charles Piez, Ole Hanson's city hall regime, obdurate shipyard owners, the threatening Seattle employers and their open-shop movement, the hostile middle class of the community.

According to Friedheim, it was largely the role of a mysterious Russian, Leon Green, and an inflammatory editorial by Anna Louise Strong, and the general sympathy of union labor to the Bolshevik regime in Russia (in which attitude they were joined by most American "liberals" in 1918-19) which resulted in the red-tagging of a strike that proceeded from bitter free-floating discontent rather than from a design to establish a soviet government.

Discussing the strike in a long NATION piece in March, 1919, Associate Editor William MacDonald emphasized the role played by the strike committee as the real governing body in Seattle for five days:

> When the question of milk for the sick persons and babies arose, the strike committee saw to it that a necessary supply was delivered. When hospitals asked to have their laundry work done as usual, the strike committee authorized a laundry it deemed best suited to continuing operations. . . .

This does not sound revolutionary; MacDonald observed, however, that organized labor's unqualified claim to declare a general strike, implied a theory of social and industrial organization absolutely incompatible with the theory implied by the city and state's claim that such a strike could be put down by force. And MacDonald went on to declare that a successful general strike, as distinguished from the one that had taken place in Seattle, would in fact be political and economic revolution. MacDonald (unlike both Samuel Gompers of the A. F. of L., and Oswald Garrison Villard) frankly looked forward to such an eventuality. The reader of this MacDonald piece could easily conclude that THE NATION favored revolution by general strike. He would be wrong, for THE NATION's casually pluralistic policy under Villard led to the printing of articles by MacDonald or Nock or young Raymond Swing, which did not necessarily reflect the "editorial" opinions of the journal. Thus in the same issue in which the MacDonald piece on the Seattle strike appeared, there was published an article by Raymond Swing on "The Catholic View of Reconstruction." This was devoted to a description of an economic program set forth by four bishops who were members of the National Catholic War Council. The program emphasized such reforms as the abolition of child labor, the enactment by State legislatures of legal minimum wage laws, and—until wages had reached a higher level—the provision of social insurance against illness, old age, and unemployment. But the program presupposed the continuation of the capitalist system of private ownership, and stressed not the sharing of wealth but the creation of it. Swing himself indicated that he favored an economic system in which cooperative enterprise, endorsed by the bishops, was extensive, in which management was in the hands of engineers, in which the state absorbed "excess gains." The tone of Raymond Swing's article is much more "Fabian," much more moderately "Lib-Lab" than is that of MacDonald's. Henry Nevinson, editor of the London Nation, once described the New York NATION as "a conservatively liberal paper." Villard liked this definition, and in his correspondence with prospective financial contributors to the weekly he used to stress the similarity between the modern NATION and that of Godkin. But one difference between the two should be stressed: Godkin did not publish, except in the correspondence columns of the journal, opinions sharply at variance with his own. Arthur G. Sedgwick, a prolific contributor to Godkin's NATION, remarked that the ideas governing the conduct of the paper were essentially those of the editor, and that even the style, "by a constan influence and association," became "more and more his." If Villard had been a man less divided against himself, his journal's views would be much easier to define than are those of THE NATION from 1918 to 1933 but it is difficult to believe that a more consistent NATION would have been equally interesting.

DESPITE THE PROBLEM of definition it would be possible to describe the NATION's general orientation in 1919 as follows: dedication to the defense of civil liberties; commitment to wha it regarded as social justice—notably to government regulation of monopolies and to the support of labor's righ to organize and bargain collectively determination both to oppose American entry into the League of Nations, and to press for world-wide disarmament and free trade. These were to remain key NATION themes during Villard's editorship. If we add that the journal strongly supported non-violent movements for independence on the part of countries like Ireland and India, and that it strongly opposed American intervention in Haiti, Santo Domingo and Nicaragua we have a fairly good notion of wha the journal saw as major issues, and of the spirit in which it approached them.

THE NATION'S CONCERN with civil liberties after World War I was focused particularly on persons accused on Red Radicalism, and—notably in the Sacco-Vanzetti case—on persons accused of crime largely because of their radical associations During the World War, the American Union Against Militarism, of which Lillian Wald was chairman, and whose membership included Villard Jane Addams, Crystal and Max Eastman, John Haynes Holmes, and Rabb for intelligent, thought-provoking, courageous journalism is certainly as great as that of 100 years ago, when THE NATION was founded.

TODAY'S NEED

Significant and important during its first century, we hope the magazine's influence continues to grow.

CONGRATULATIONS . . . .
CARRY ON!

OCT. 17, 1916

International Union of Mine, Mill, & Smelter Workers

A. C. SKINNER President	ASBURY HOWARD Vice-President	IRVING DICHTER Secretary-Treasurer

To
THE NATION

Congratulations on
THIS, ITS 100TH ANNIVERSARY, and Best Wishes for the Next 100 Years of Service to the Liberal and Labor Movements of America.

NEWSPAPER GUILD OF NEW YORK

OLIVER PILAT	President
THOMAS J. FAY	First Vice-President
BERNARD STEIN	Second Vice-President
EUGENE CONNOLLY	Third Vice-President
THOMAS J. MURPHY	Executive Vice-President
JOHN E. DEEGAN	Secretary-Treasurer

On behalf of the Officers and 800,000 members of our Union, may we express sincere good wishes to the NATION on the occasion of its 100th Anniversary. A century is a long time to fight for the causes of right thinking and social justice and we congratulate today's editors, and those who have gone before, on all the good they have accomplished in a hundred years.

May the year 2065 find the NATION at the same stand, still writing courageously and with intellectual vigor, about the subjects which matter to our Nation and its people.

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers

JOSEPH D. KEENAN, International Secretary	GORDON M. FREEMAN, International President

Stephen Wise, established a civil liberties committee with Roger Baldwin as director. When the American Union Against Militarism disbanded because of differences of opinion in its ranks about the war, the civil liberties committee reorganized under Baldwin as an independent National Civil Liberties Bureau. Thus for the first time in American history there was an organization corresponding to the French League for the Defense of the Rights of Man. When Baldwin was released in 1919 from the jail where he had been serving a sentence as a conscientious objector, Norman Thomas threw a party for him at his home on East 17th Street in New York. Over ice cream and cake, a group of radicals and liberals (Villard among them) talked over plans to transform the Civil Liberties Bureau into an American Civil Liberties Union. Commenting in February, 1920, on the reasons for the establishment of the ACLU, The Nation referred to Attorney General Palmer's "deportation delirium," and to the need to preserve the rights of free speech and peaceable assembly "in industrial conflicts." While the old Civil Liberties Bureau had been primarily engaged in defending the rights of allegedly "pro-German" pacifists, the chief function of the American Civil Liberties Union would be to protect the rights of laborers. (It should be noted that in the course of its history, the ACLU has actively defended the rights of persons of all shades of political opinion, from the extreme left to the extreme right.)

Lucille Milner, a well-to-do Southerner who for twenty-five years was secretary of the American Civil Liberties Union, notes in her Education of an American Liberal the diversity of political and economic thinking among those who came together in this organization:

> . . . . men and women as far apart as Harvard law professor Felix Frankfurter and William Z. Foster, radical leader of the steel strike; Helen Keller, Joan of Arc of the blind and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, of the I. W. W.

The New York State Lusk Committee, which had investigated "radical" propaganda, and considered ways and means of keeping it from the schools, took a dark view of the American Civil Liberties Union. Thus in an index at the end of the second volume of its report, Felix Frankfurter was identified as "of Harvard and the Civil Liberties Union," while Laurence Todd was listed because of his "correspondence with Roger Baldwin." In the same tendentious index, Charles A. Beard was said to have withdrawn from the Columbia Faculty "because of radicalism," and Jane Addams was identified as having been praised in George Sylvester Viereck's magazine. Albert de Silver, a fundamentally conservative lawyer who was Vice-Chairman of the ACLU, discussed the Lusk-Stevenson report at length in the July 13, 1921, issue of The Nation. He emphasized the report's failure to distinguish among various shades of radicalism, and found highly significant the Lusk Committee's conclusion that the activity of several unions in the garment industry constituted "the real danger to American government and the structure of American society and its institutions." De Silver noted that those unions—the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the ILGWU, the Amalgamated Textile Workers,—had > not only brought order and reasonably tolerable conditions out of the chaotic and sweated industry, but have increased its production standards as well.

Perhaps the most extraordinary charges in the four volumes of the report, said de Silver, were those devoted to the spread of socialism in educated circles. The report displayed an incapacity to understand > the intellectual position of a well-informed and liberal-minded person. If one believes in international understanding one must in some sly way be trying to promote international revolution. If one opposed the American entry into the war one doubtless had German gold dangling in one's pockets, if only it could be proved. . . .

A few weeks earlier, The New Republic had observed in an article headed, "By Stevenson Out of Lusk," that the report > presents a discussion which, if not entirely authoritative in regard to the conditions with which it deals, will certainly remain the classic record of the state of mind in which as a matter of history those conditions were reflected.

That "state of mind" was also reflected by the Justice Department raid of June 21, 1919, on the socialist Rand School in New York. The New York World said that the raid was "chiefly on ordinary rights of free speech, and is thus calculated to produce quite as much Bolshevism as it suppressed." In tragi-comic form the psychopathic fear of radicalism was manifested during a trial of Communists at Boston in 1920; writing in The American Mercury in January, 1924, Harry Elmer Barnes declared that > the government expert on radicalism unwittingly branded a section read from "The New Freedom" as good Communist doctrine and just cause for the deportation of the author.

The saddest and most shameful exemplification of the "state of mind" to which The New Republic referred was the treatment accorded two Italian-born anarchists, Sacco and Vanzetti, who were accused and convicted of having murdered a paymaster and guard at South Braintree, Massachusetts, on April 15, 1920, and who were executed on August, 1927. In November, 1950, the New Bedford Standard-Times published a report based on an interview with the seven surviving members of the Sacco-Vanzetti jury; each of the jurors, according to the report, had declared that the verdict of guilty was a just verdict, that the trial judge was eminently fair, and that the "so-called radicalism of the defendents played absolutely no part in the verdict." Yet thirty years to the day after the execution of the two men, a letter published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and signed by men who now held widely divergent views, quoted one of Vanzetti's final letters from the death cell:

> What I wish more than all else in this last hour of agony is that our case and our fate be understood in their real being and serve as a tremendous lesson to the forces of freedom so that our suffering and death will not have been in vain.

The signers of the letter were Roger N. Baldwin, Gardner Jackson, Aldino Feliciani, John R. Chamberlain, Howard Lindsay, Eugene V. Rostow, Arthur M. Schlesinger, John Dos Passos, Eugene Lyons, Norman Thomas and Gerald W. Johnson. They pointed out that Gutzon Borglum had cast that sentence of Vanzetti's on his large bas-relief of the two men, and that a standing offer of the sculpture had been made > to the Governor of Massachusetts and the Mayor of Boston by a committee of prominent citizens which included Albert Einstein, CIO President Philip Murray and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In September, 1921, after the conviction of the two anarchists for the South Braintree murders, THE NATION published "Sacco-Vanzetti—a Reasonable Doubt," a long article which noted that both men had been carrying loaded revolvers at the time of their arrest, that both had lied about various matters, including their movements on the night of the arrest, and that both had evaded the draft in 1917. The article also noted that shortly before their arrest, an anarchist named Salsedo, who had been apprehended in New York and for whose defense they were collecting funds, had suddenly died. (John Dos Passos, in a pamphlet called "Facing the Chair," published in 1927 in an effort to save the men's lives, described Salsedo as "the anarchist printer whose body was found smashed on the pavement of Park Row under the windows of the New York offices of the Department of Justice, where he and his friend Elia had been held without warrant for eight weeks of the third degree.") Fearing a government raid after Salsedo's death, Sacco and Vanzetti were at the time of their arrest on their way to warn anarchist friends to hide literature that might make trouble for them. THE NATION article, after reviewing trial testimony favorable to Sacco and Vanzetti, cited the opinion of three Boston newspapermen, that the "guilty" verdict was not justified.

UNDER MASSACHUSETTS law, motions for a new trial had to be made to the trial judge himself. But the partisans of Sacco and Vanzetti were sure that the judge, Webster Thayer, was prejudiced. When, in October, 1924, Thayer denied all motions by the defense, THE NATION observed that the probability of his having been biased at the trial was now greatly strengthened. After Sacco and Vanzetti were sentenced to death in the spring of 1927, THE NATION cited six affidavits that pointed to prejudice on Thayer's part. The highly respected Frank P. Sibley of the Boston Globe had described Thayer's gossip with reporters in these terms:

> During the early stages of the trial when the talesmen were being examined and during one of the walks from the Dedham Inn to the Court House, Judge Thayer proceeded to discuss Attorney Moore, one of the lawyers representing the defendant, Sacco. This subject seemed to excite him considerably and, among other remarks he exclaimed: "I'll show them that no long-haired anarchist from California can run this court!" During the progress of the trial he frequently referred to the counsel for the defense as "those damn fools." On several occasions he said: "Just wait until you hear my charge."

Time magazine, which regularly published its comments on the Sacco-Vanzetti case under the heading, "Radicals," observed on April 18, 1927, that when Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested the United States was "on a rabid radical hunt"; Time also noted that the jury had been asked by the prosecution to do its duty "as did our boys in France," and called this an effective plea in view of the

Commentary*

a continuing higher education

*Commentary is "one of the best periodicals in the world."
C. P. SNOW

COMMENTARY, Dept. NA-1
165 East 56th St., N. Y., N. Y. 10022

For New Subscribers Only
Please send Commentary for the next eight months at the special rate of $3.87 (regular rate $8 a year).
☐ Extra issue! Enclose $3.87 now and we will extend subscription to nine months.

Name__________

Address__________

City_____ State_____ Zip_____

Outside U.S.A.—add $1.00 per subscription. Please use separate sheet for gift subscriptions.

1865

The Civil War came to an end. But the depression that followed cast a dark cloud of uncertainty over America. The world of intellectual thought, ideas and communication was stymied by drastic Federal cuts in mail service which created a national scandal. Yet 1865 was also the year a significant new publication was born. It filled an educational need in a troubled republic emerging from conflict; eager for learned opinions, ideas and thought. It reflected, weighed and analyzed the apprehensive years ahead. It presented authoritative critical opinion of major political issues facing America and the world. It conveyed information, education and inspiration that linked many of the country's best thinkers together by mail. And for 100 years since, the mail of thousands of others has regularly included:

THE
NATION

Circulation Associates, Inc., a firm dedicated to mail communication in general and business mail in particular, is proud to have served this oldest journal of critical opinion for nearly a quarter of a century. During the past 23 years of The Nation's most progressive growth, Circulation Associates has addressed and mailed 1,044 issues, totaling close to 30,000,000 individual copies that have stimulated intellectual thought all over the world. Handling countless subscription mailings in addition to maintaining a steadily growing list of influential readers, Circulation Associates has seen first hand why The Nation is such a cultural leader of opinion, insight and enlightment in the mails. The Nation today is truly a graphic monument to the educational contribution and accomplishment of business mail in a free society's far reaching postal establishment. And as this historic Centennial issue goes into the mail, Circulation Associates salutes a great postal as well as literary heritage . . . with sincere best wishes for The Nation's continued success in the dynamic century ahead.

1965

fact that Sacco and Vanzetti were pacifists as well as radicals. On April 25, Time reported without editorial comment the assertion by Liberals that the foreman of the jury had said before the trial to a friend who believed Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent: "Damn them, they ought to hang anyway."

ON MAY 3, 1927, the condemned men petitioned Governor Fuller of Massachusetts for clemency, and in its issue of May 4, THE NATION addressed a letter to the Governor, declaring that millions all over the world would "see another Dreyfus case in the plight of Sacco and Vanzetti." The letter also noted that while courts of appeal in New York and other states could rule on new facts, or alleged facts offered by convicted persons, the Massachusetts Supreme Court could not do this; it was thus prevented from studying the 1925 confession to the Braintree murders by a prisoner named Madeiros. As the Sacco-Vanzetti case stood, said THE NATION letter, the men might be executed on the basis of evidence that had come before only one judge.

Through a petition printed in its May 18 issue, THE NATION put pressure on Governor Fuller to appoint a committee to revise the evidence submitted at the 1921 trial. Signatures poured in from universities all over the country: the Naval Academy, Harvard, Brown, Michigan, the University of Iowa, and Clark University were among those represented. On June 1, Fuller did appoint an advisory committee, composed of President Lowell of Harvard, President Stratton of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and a judge named Robert Grant. Partisans of Sacco and Vanzetti now saw a chance that the men might be saved. As THE NATION went to press on August 3, Fuller was writing his decision, and the weekly declared that it would be heard around the world as surely as the shot at Concord. In its next number, dated August 17, the journal bitterly assailed the Governor, whose denial of clemency revealed his complete inability to "rise above the setting in which great wealth had placed him." John Dos Passos, along with Gardner Jackson, Edna St. Vincent Millay and Heywood Broun, tried desperately to obtain a stay of execution. An eleventh hour telegram to President Coolidge was signed by Villard, David Starr Jordan, Alexander Meiklejohn, Arthur Garfield Hays, Ida Tarbell, Carl Van Doren, John F. Hylan and others. No answer came. Captain Alfred Dreyfus, ill and old in France, issued a moderately phrased appeal: "When doubt exists, it is fighting providence to commit the irreparable."

IN ITS LAST ISSUE before the execution, THE NATION pleaded for "A Decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind," and cited the conservative London Times declaration that whether the condemned men were guilty or not, "the prolonged suffering which they have undergone during seven years under the sentence of death makes them fit objects for pity." THE NATION's editorial took note of the general sympathy for the condemned men throughout Europe:

> Why should not Governor Fuller pay "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" and commute or pardon these men? . . . We are aware, of course, of the ignorant and thoughtless multitudes of well-to-do citizens all around us who are saying "Let those damned foreigners pay attention to their own affairs. We can take care of our criminals and will be thankful if the press of Europe will kindly mind its own business." Unfortunately for those who speak thus appeals for justice refuse to stay within the boundaries of any one nation . . .
>
> Americans should be the last to protest against foreign opinions upon a domestic affair. What country was it that sent a warship to bring to this country Louis Kossuth, the man who was trying to overthrow the government of his native land by force of arms? What country was it that welcomed Garibaldi? If it be declared that these are not similar cases because those were political revolutionists, in what country was there a tremendous outpouring of public opinion in the Dreyfus case? Was not the American press united in demanding a new trial for Dreyfus? Then there is an American citizen who still lives in the city of Washington, John Hays Hammond. He was legally condemned to death for his efforts to overthrow the government of the Transvaal. Was it not an outpouring of American, English and Continental sentiment which made possible the release from prison of this reprehensible American who set out to make private war upon a friendly country?—he, by the way, was one of the first to congratulate Governor Fuller on his decision against Sacco and Vanzetti! We could pile up cases, but these will suffice. The truth is that no nation is strong enough or righteous enough to defy an aroused international public sentiment.

After the execution, Villard's editorial "Massachusetts the Murderer," solemnly warned that the international relations of the United States, and its moral standing throughout the world, would be profoundly affected for a decade to come. In September, THE NATION printed a copy of a letter written to Lucien Price of Boston by Romain Rolland, who had been awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1915. Sacco and Vanzetti, said Rolland, > take their places in the pantheon of the martyrs of the civilized world. There, for centuries, one will still speak of Sacco and Vanzetti as one speaks still of Jean Calas. But Sacco and Vanzetti have not found in America their Voltaire!

The separation of the United States by oceans from Europe and Asia, while fortunate for the country in its early life, had led Americans to be relatively unconcerned about the impact abroad of domestic events. Communists outside the country as well as within it exploited the Sacco-Vanzetti case, as they have exploited every social crime and folly committed in the United States. Mussolini, ironically enough, in view of his treatment of left-wing opponents, was also able to capitalize on the execution of two Italian workers. THE NATION had stressed since the days of Godkin the interrelationship of domestic and international affairs. Villard's journal maintained tradition, frequently calling attention to the fact that violations of civil liberties at home undercut our reputation overseas. Thus, in April, 1919, Robert L. Duffus wrote in THE NATION that the United States had gone to the Peace Conference with two exceptions to the rule of political democracy which Woodrow Wilson wanted universally applied:

> These are her exclusion of the Negroes of the South and the Oriental population of the West from the rights of citizenship, the first by a tacit toleration by the Federal Government of the unconstitutional acts of State Governments, the second by direct Federal legislation.

In order to give Negroes at least a minimum of physical security, THE NATION pressed hard for federal antilynching legislation; in one of its 1922 editorials supporting the Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill, the journal declared that brutalities like those that had recently occurred in several Southern states would be impossible "in any of the European countries or smaller Caribbean nations toward which we assume such a lofty attitude." The point is important: it is not simply racial violence for which the United States is criticized abroad (where violence, if less frequently racial, is also done) but the contrast between these savage acts and our complacent preachments to others.

Perhaps the most notable NATION comment on federal discrimination against Orientals came from Villard in 1924. Coolidge had just signed the "abominable" National Origins Act, one of whose provisions—directed specifically at the Japanese—excluded from the United States all aliens ineligible to become citizens. Villard asserted that Grover Cleveland (one of his heroes) would have vetoed the bill with a message to stir the country; this Act > strikes a deadly blow at the peace of the Pacific, imperils many of the gains of the Washington Conference, insults needlessly a proud, high-spirited people, and provides the excuse for a league of yellow people against the whites. The natural step now would be the withdrawal of every American missionary from China and Japan.

The world's cities may yet become fit habitations for man

The Scientific American issue of September, 1965 is devoted to the single topic of Cities.

From the sampan "city" of Hong Kong to the great metropolis of New York, there is inadequate housing, pollution of air and water, traffic congestion, social dislocation and emptiness of life.

These and other afflictions will become more severe in number and dimensions as the rush to the cities continues.

By the end of this century, more than half of the people of the world will live in cities.

This single topic issue of Scientific American will explore the hope advanced by science and technology that the world's cities may yet become fit habitations for man.

You can obtain your copy of this issue at selected newsstands or as part of a one-year subscription to Scientific American for $7.00.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN

415 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10017

Villard's reference to the Washington Conference of 1921-22 points to one of THE NATION's major concerns. A French man of letters, Alain, spoke for Villard's generation of humane liberals when he said, "La droit vit d'imposer, la gauche vit de convaincre." Such statesmen of the nineteen-twenties as Ramsay MacDonald, Gustav Stresemann, and Aristide Briand shared the conviction that another war must be avoided, that international differences must be settled through rational discussion. Since irrational aggressiveness plays a large part in human life, and since rational discussion cannot solve all the problems that lead men to make war, it is easy to scoff at the notion of "outlawing" war which Villard and many other pacifists embraced. But the pacifist can reply to all scoffers that they consent in their "realism" to live in a hell of which the flames will eventually consume us all. Refusing to fight under any circumstances, the pacifist risks watching his family killed as he stands by, but he could be described as an individual too highly developed to adapt to the conditions under which savages must live.

Villard was not actually a thoroughgoing pacifist. He had bought Liberty bonds after the United States entered the war, and THE NATION certainly had not counselled non-resistance to the Central Powers. But he firmly believed that the United States should not have become involved in the first place, and at the 1919 peace conference he thought he saw at work the same villainous secret diplomacy that he believed responsible for the outbreak of the conflict in 1914. Michael Wreszin in his Oswald Garrison Villard: Pacifist at War, cites a letter to Villard from Francis Nielson (a generous financial supporter of THE NATION) charging that the system of secret diplomacy had caused not only the war but the > numbing and blinding of the wit and understanding of men whose intellect should have been sharpened by the terrific events which have brought ruin to Europe.

In August, 1919, THE NATION published an article by A. A. Berle, one of nine members of the secretariat of the American Peace Commission who had resigned in protest against the betrayal of American ideals by the Versailles treaty. Disarmament, said Berle, and the future ordering of public and private life on the theory that peace would endure, had been perhaps the greatest hope of the warring peoples. But by surrendering his own principles, Wilson had "pointed the world back to the path of terror and tears."

The belief that acceptance of the Treaty of Versailles by the United States Senate would help to bring on another war led Villard's liberal internationalist NATION to support the "all-out" Senate opponents of ratification: liberal isolationists like Borah and LaFollette, and a militaristic internationalist like Henry Cabot Lodge. After the definitive defeat of the treaty in March, 1920, THE NATION called for a new conference to bring about a genuine, democratic League of Nations. But Borah, in a Senate speech back in December, 1918, had expressed the feelings of many Americans after the war:

> Are we to have our security determined by the fifty-seven varieties of nations in Europe? [Is] their judgment better and wiser than the judgment of a homogeneous people imbued with a love of peace and a love of country?

Villard did not like Borah's isolationist side, but there was another side, which made the Idaho Senator call for a disarmament conference with Britain and Japan. Great Britain, whose alliance with Japan had created bad feeling in the United States (THE NATION had discussed the danger of a British-American war) actually proposed the conference, and it met at Washington late in 1921. THE NATION's response to the agreements reached there was mixed. Villard was strongly in favor of the "outlawry" of war, a plan proposed by a Chicago lawyer named S. O. Levinson. Instead of deciding to outlaw war and establish a code of international law, the great powers conferring at Washington agreed to cut down their construction of battleships. Four of the powers—France, Great Britain, Japan and the United States—signed a loose collective security agreement. THE NATION was not much impressed by the promised diminution of battleships, whose military effectiveness it questioned. But at least this seemed an advance in the right direction. As for the Four Power Treaty of collective security, THE NATION was distressed that it might involve us in the use of military force; peace depends, said the journal after the Senate had ratified the treaty, > upon the abolition of the grievances of exploited races and classes and the substitution of cooperation among peoples for imperialist rivalries or imperialist alliances at the expense of the weak.

This was to be THE NATION's basic position throughout the Villard period, although there was backing and filling on specific points such as the question of the United States' joining the World Court. The World Court seemed to its advocates an important step toward that codification of international law which Villard and other pacifists wanted. Villard had difficulty deciding where he stood on this issue, and as late as February, 1926, THE NATION admitted receiving many queries as to its position. The journal proceeded in "once-and-for-all" language to say that it was > in favor of a World Court with obligatory jurisdiction in legal question, but depending only upon its moral authority for the bringing of disputants into court and for the enforcements of its decrees. We desire a court absolutely separated from the League of Nations, controlled as it is by a group of three or four powerful countries.

The United States should seek to "outlaw war," said THE NATION, and not join any court that would contemplate the creating of war in given contingencies. Shortly before the journal thus defined its editorial posi-ion, it had published a series of three rticles by its Washington corre-pondent, William Hard, who warned gainst United States entrance into he World Court. One of his arguments was that the United States had o "Locarno" agreement forbidding s to make war on any of the Caribean countries "which so often hear he tread of our marines." Walter Lippmann, sharply disagreeing with Hard, sent THE NATION a reply pubished on January 26—which oberved that two million Americans ad taken part in a war on European oil, and that nothing we had done in he Caribbean > ever drew us into such a frightful mess as did somebody else's sins in the Balkans.

THE NATION's position was that noody's sins should have drawn us into he World War: war was, quite simly, wrong. Villard opposed collecive security, which implied willingess to go to war, not only in the wenties but in the days of Hitler. When the Nazis began to march, Villard could only say that the Allies' ailure to disarm after the World War ad helped bring on the disaster. During the twenties he had no symathy for the French insistence on he need for protection against a reurgent Germany; when France inaded the Ruhr in 1923 THE NATION harged that the French were acting ike Prussians. In November, 1932, it ejected Premier Edouard Herriot's lan to create an international army nder the control of the League of Nations as "another bold attempt on he part of France to extend its poitical control over continental Euope." And a few weeks later THE NATION declared that no agreement igned by the United States at the disrmament conference meeting in Geeva should "in any way obligate us o be ready to guarantee France's afety."

UNITED STATES POLICY in the Caribean, to which Hard had referred in is articles on the World Court, was een by Villard's NATION as putting in doubt the value of the 1928 Kellogg-Briand pact:

> For the enlightenment of readers of THE NATION who fear that Mr. Kellogg's outlawry of war may interfere with Mr. Coolidge's own friendly little war with Sandino in Nicaragua, we hasten to extend the assurance on no less authority than Mr. Kellogg himself that there is no cause for worry.

Hard had already pointed out that we had simply ignored a decision of the Central American Court of Justice that our 1916 treaty with Nicaragua violated the rights of Costa Rica and Salvador; no American President, said Hard, would ever take any important question of ours to the World Court.

United States occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo was also held by the journal to be in violation of another country's rights. Early in 1922 Villard sent Ernest Gruening (who was to become head, in 1934, of the United States Department of the Interior's division of territories and island possessions) to Hispaniola for an on-the-spot investigation. Gruening reported in THE NATION that there were three political groups in Haiti: the first saw the American occupation "for what it was": a wholly selfish assault on the liberties of a friendly, independent state; the second group wanted the occupation to end, but also desired unselfish American assistance; the third group, to which the "puppet government" of Haiti belonged, was willing to connive with the Occupation. Haitian laborers were paid twenty cents a day, but the population as a whole—with the exception of the intellectuals—was docile. Haiti had agreed, as the Dominican Republic (under an honorable president) had not, to a treaty establishing a virtual American protectorate. Gruening suggested that a bill which had been introduced in the United States Senate, calling for "withdrawal and abrogation of the treaty," showed us the way out of a discreditable affair. Later in 1922 THE NATION charged that the editor of the Haitian newspaper Nou-

Important
RANDOM HOUSE
Books

CRISIS IN BLACK AND WHITE
By CHARLES E. SILBERMAN
Cloth $5.95; paper $1.95

DANGER ON THE RIGHT
By ARNOLD FORSTER and BENJAMIN R. EPSTEIN
Cloth $4.95; paper $2.95

WHO SPEAKS FOR THE NEGRO?
By ROBERT PENN WARREN. $5.95

THE MAKING OF A QUAGMIRE
By DAVID HALBERSTAM. $5.95

THE SLAVES WE RENT
By TRUMAN E. MOORE. $4.95

MISSISSIPPI BLACK PAPER
Preface by HODDING CARTER III
Introduction by REINHOLD NIEBUHR
Cloth $4.95; paper $1.95

THE PROTESTANT ESTABLISHMENT
By E. DIGBY BALTZELL. $6.95

Coming:

FREEDOM – WHEN?
By JAMES FARMER. $4.95

RECLAIMING THE AMERICAN DREAM
By RICHARD CORNUELLE. $4.95

THE POWER OF LIFE OR DEATH
By MICHAEL V. DISALLE. $4.95

LINDSAY: A MAN FOR TOMORROW
By DANIEL E. BUTTON
Cloth $4.95; paper $1.95

Now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE
457 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10022

velliste had been imprisoned by the occupation for "protesting against the impending $40,000,000 loan which is to rivet Haiti's shackles in perpetuity."

AMERICAN INTERVENTION IN Hispaniola, begun by President Theodore Roosevelt with the intention of paying off Haitian and Dominican debts to European countries, and deepened by Woodrow Wilson's landing of Marines in order to forestall German or French seizure of the island, was a manifestation of both "big stick" and "dollar" diplomacy. Philander C. Knox, President Taft's Secretary of State, quite openly advocated American intervention in Central America for the benefit of American businessmen. And while during the nineteen twenties, according to John Edwin Fagg in Latin America, a General History, the United States built public works in Haiti, established pure water supplies, created hundreds of clinics and hospitals, built schools, taught farmers scientific methods—all of this (Fagg notes) was offset by the accompanying population boom. And Fagg deplores, as did The Nation articles during the twenties, the segregationist practices of the American military.

Norman Thomas, who in 1921 had become a Nation editor, wrote to Villard on May 5, 1922, of the success of a Haitian mass meeting in Carnegie Hall. Senator Borah, at his own suggestion, had spoken, and Thomas thought that Villard could "take a lot of pride in the fact that The Nation, single-handed, created whatever of right understanding there is of this matter." Thomas added that he was proud to be connected with The Nation, and "proud of what Ernest [Gruening] with Lewis' [Gannett's] help, did in pushing the meeting."

A few weeks later, Thomas wrote to Villard about another issue with which The Nation became concerned during the early nineteen-twenties: the Irish nationalist movement. Thomas' description of an editorial he had just written indicates the journal's point of view: pro-Irish, but pacifist. Early in 1920, William MacDonald had sent The Nation a series of articles from Ireland, one of which observed that he was able to travel freely there largely because of the journal's reputation "as the staunch friend of Irish freedom." In another piece, MacDonald described the two wings of the nationalist Sinn Fein—a pacifist wing and one that was willing to use violence. MacDonald also described a secret organization called the "Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood," that might be responsible for the prevailing lawlessness. Subsequent Nation reports confirmed MacDonald's impression that Sinn Fein had in fact become the government of southern Ireland, but that the organization was seriously split. In 1922 the extreme advocates of independence refused to accept the Irish Free State, whose establishment was the result of negotiations between Eamon de Valera and British Prime Minister Lloyd George.

The Nation's condemnation of the ensuing violence occurred against the background of participation by Norman Thomas and other public figures like Jane Addams and Senator George W. Norris in the so-called "Villard Commission" on conditions in Ireland. The 1921 report of the Commission had strongly denounced British policy—and the 1922 outbreaks by Irish nationalists were embarrassing to the Commission members. Norman Thomas, in the letter to Villard mentioned earlier, said that while nothing in Ireland had been as black a disgrace as the pogroms "of Protestant and British antecedent," there was no excuse for the Irish leaders' defence of militarism. Some Nation readers objected, as Thomas knew they would, to its criticism of the nationalists—one letter called the journal "Tory"—but The Nation insisted in a September, 1922 editorial that the Irish nationalists should adopt the methods of Gandhi.

THESE METHODS were not, however widely adopted in the Western worl during the turbulent twenties an thirties. In 1928 and 1929 there wer bloody clashes between Arabs an Jews in the British mandate of Palestine; during the riot of August, 1929 more than one hundred people wer killed, and The Nation castigate the Arabs for their intolerance toward the "carefully regulated Jewis immigration" into the mandate. Bu in discussing Palestine, the journa criticized chiefly the British, wh "appear to have promised Palestine which they did not yet possess, successively to the Arabs, the French an the Jews." Instead of relying on th Balfour Declaration, the Jews shoul "work out a method of dealing directly with the Arabs."

Many of The Nation's reader were Jewish, and some of them objected in letters to the weekly agains what they considered its tendency t condone Arab attacks on the Jews The magazine replied in an editoria of January 8, 1930, which made fou points: 1) the association of Zionism with British imperial interests wa very unfortunate; 2) under existin conditions Jews could not expect, an ought not to ask for, the politica domination of Palestine; 3) the Jew ought to be protected against Ara attacks; 4) the permanent structur of Zion must be built on a foundatio of mutual understanding betwee Jews and Arabs. Supporting the position of Dr. Judah Magnes, The Nation said:

> . . . . the only way for those wh have been wronged in Palestine is th way, not of vengeance, but of forgiveness and reconciliation.

To this, one reader of The Natio replied, "Through your devotion t the ideal of pacifism, you have become blinded to the actual facts o the Palestine situation."

In one of the "Issues and Men columns he continued to contribut to The Nation after giving up editorial control of the journal in 1933, Villard praised Soviet Russia for establishing Biro-Bidjan as a Jewish Au nomous Region. Ludwig Lewisohn vho in the early twenties had been he Nation's drama critic) hotly re-ied that the Jews did not want to a lost tribe, "babbling dialectic aterialism in Yiddish." Villard iould use his influential voice, he id, to persuade the British colonial fice to renounce its "niggardly imigration policy that has already oduced a labor shortage in Palesne."

illard's compliment to Russia on iro-Bidjan was consistent with his nerally sympathetic attitude toward e Soviet "experiment." The Nation essed all through the twenties for nited States recognition of the Soviet nion, and after Roosevelt's election in 1932 the weekly hoped that his attitude toward Russia would be "more liberal than that of Herbert Hoover." Villard, however, was more troubled than Louis Fischer, the journal's chief writer on Russia, by the Soviets' "liquidation" of their opponents. Villard's 1929 series of articles, "Russia from a Car Window," was generally appreciative in tone, but in the last article he declared that the Soviet rulers had "blundered" in using violence and terror; they "cannot, I believe, have the sympathy of liberals the world over as long as they pursue this policy." Fischer, who some years later contributed an essay to The God That Failed, was in the twenties so much impressed by the economic accomplishments of Soviet Russia that he acquiesced in what he later found to be a horror. Soviet justice, he wrote in 1931 on the occasion of a Moscow trial, "is actuated almost entirely by motives of expediency and pragmatism and not at all by motives of revenge." In view of the pathological aspects of much Western "anti-Bolshevism" during the twenties, Fischer's attitude, and that of other Nation writers like Mussey and MacDonald, is understandable insofar as it was a defense reaction. (Fischer later wrote, "I liked the Soviets because they were an experiment in the interest of the downtrodden majority, because they destroyed the privileges of the powerful few, because they were weak, and because the world's conservatives and reactionaries opposed them.") But insofar as it implied a belief that justice was "nothing but" the pragmatically determined will of a regime, it sanctioned the framing of Dreyfus and the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti.

> A civilization is whole and complete. The Jewish village in the valley of Jizreel, the Jewish cooperative colony under the shadow of Mount Hermon, the Jewish merchants of Tel-Aviv and Jerusalem, the young men and women who are building roads and draining marshes — these are, after all, the material of the new Jewish culture. These people, working in a world of their own, from clean and unspoiled beginnings, are apt to produce that now forgotten value — the purely Jewish culture. In all other countries, in all other colonies, the Jew comes to add and to adapt. He is nowhere free to be himself; he must be that which an established civilization will permit him to be. With the best will in the world a nation welcoming the Jew cannot remove the tacit pressure and demand of its civilization and culture on the individuality of the Jew. But in Palestine the Jew can, for the first time since his dispersion, enter again into direct relation with his foundations. No one there stands between him and the first principles of life. He is back on the soil in every sense of the word: it would perhaps be better to say that he is back on the earth.
>
> — Chaim Weizmann, The Nation, 1924

Domestic Issues

On the evening of March 13, 1928, The Nation held a dinner to celebrate its tenth anniversary under the editorship of Oswald Garrison Villard. Roger N. Baldwin, James Weldon Johnson, Florence Kelley, Heywood Broun, and Freda Kirchwey gave short

LOOK AWAY FROM DIXIE

Frank E. Smith. The author of Congressman from Mississippi and a leading liberal spokesman for the South describes the devastating effect of racism on Southern life. $3.25

THE SOUTHERNER and WORLD AFFAIRS

Alfred O. Hero, Jr., World Peace Foundation. A far-ranging analysis of the change in Southern attitudes toward world affairs over the past 30 years.
692 pages. $12.00

D-DAYS AT DAYTON

Reflections on the Scopes Trial

J. R. Tompkins, editor. Essays by John Scopes, Roger Baldwin, Kirtley Mather and others reexamining the issues of the famous "Monkey Trial" in Dayton, Tenn. November. $5.00

JIM CROW'S DEFENSE

Anti-Negro Thought in America, 1900-1930

I. A. Newby. Details the rise and fall of the concept of innate Negro inferiority among scholars, theologians, and scientists.
$6.50

WILLIAM FAULKNER OF OXFORD

James W. Webb and A. Wigfall Green, editors. Forty personal recollections of Faulkner by family, friends, and neighbors, with many new photographs. The most revealing book yet.
$4.95

From your bookseller

LOUISIANA State University Press
BATON ROUGE

It has remained for the American Museum of Natural History in New York City to publish to the world the latest and most heinous Bolshevik atrocity. Beside the Museum's stuffed specimen of the European bison a placard proclaims: "Described by Caesar, hunted by Charlemagne, and exterminated by the Bolsheviki." The full story of cruelty and hate is further elaborated by an explanation that the European bison had gradually become reduced in numbers, until at the beginning of the World War there remained only a herd in Lithuania, protected by imperial edict, and a few in the Caucasus Mountains. "During the World War of 1914–1918," says the Museum's historian, "the Lithuanian and Caucasian herds are reported to have been exterminated, partly for food and partly for the sake of killing animals that had been protected by royalty." Curiously enough, the history of the American bison runs counter to this. Our "buffalo" hit it off well enough with our Reds, surviving readily until 100 per cent Americanism arrived on the prairies with gunpowder, a desire for furs, and the doctrine that to kill game for food was sordid while to destroy it for fun was sport. But this man Lenin had better watch his step from now on. He was only annoyed when the chancelleries of Europe took after him, but if our societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals get going, they won't stop until they have chased the chief Sovieteer down the Nevski Prospekt, thrown a net over his head, and packed him off to the Bide-a-Wee Home. Our humane societies, in defense of the European bison, will yet have those Bolsheviki buffaloed.

— Editorial, The Nation, 1921

talks. Then Villard, introduced by John Haynes Holmes as the "Happy Warrior," made a speech emphasizing the disappearance of the press as a profession, and a rushing trend toward monopoly. In order to show why a journal like THE NATION was greatly needed, he said:

> . . . . at the NATION dinner in Philadelphia on Wednesday night last, Congressman La Guardia got up and told that almost unbelievable and moving and soul-rending story of the conditions which he had witnessed with his own eyes in the Pennsylvania coal fields, of the suffering of one hundred thousand American citizens, of the starving children. . . . And when he wound up his statement of the findings of the facts of the United States Coal Commission of five years ago, that there could be no way out if the ownership of the mines was not taken over by the Government of the United States; although he said that in the presence of five reporters, not one word of that speech appeared in the press of Philadelphia the next day.

THE NATION's circulation had never been large, and while it zoomed from about 9,000 when Villard took it over in 1918 to above 40,000 by the end of 1919, the weekly could never compete in this domain with the Saturday Evening Post. But it had subscribers abroad and in every part of the United States—almost as many in the Middle West as in the North Atlantic states—and it made an impression on people's minds. Frank P. Walsh, a liberal lawyer, contributed an article on the railroads to THE NATION when its circulation was down to 27,000; at the same time, he published a similar piece in his syndicated Hearst newspaper column. The Hearst article he never heard anything about, but he was kept busy answering the telephone on the day that THE NATION appeared. He observed: "People who counted, editors, assorted reformers, and lobbyists pro or con read THE NATION and reacted to it. They had to keep up."

ALONG WITH THE New Republic, The Survey, and The Dial (which in 1918 transformed itself from a Chicago-based journal of the arts to a magazine of opinion published in New York) Villard's NATION dealt with precisely such issues as the one discussed by Fiorello H. LaGuardia at that Philadelphia dinner. Concerned from 1918 on with the chronic crisis in the coal industry, the magazine in April, 1922, criticized the mine operators for making a strike inevitable by refusing, in open repudiation of a contract, to confer with the miners on a new wage scale. The journal contrasted the government's refusal to intervene on the side of labor with its energetic intervention on behalf of the mine operators during the strike of 1919. The coal operators' breach of their contract was also denounced by The Survey which cited an important body of facts gathered by the Division of Industrial Studies of the Russell Sage Foundation. From 1890 to 1921, the bituminous mines had been idle an average of ninety working days a year; in eleven years, the loss of working time, and thus of miners' wages, had averaged over one hundred days—more than a third of the working year.

While The New Republic cautiously proposed an elaborate policy of regulation of the coal industry, it noted that the "immaculately and consistently" conservative Philadelphia Public Ledger had regarded at least with complacency a widespread demand for nationalization. THE NATION, pointing to the dangers of government bureaucracy, inefficiency, and despotism (Villard's NATION was, after Palmer and under Harding, understandably fearful of what "nationalization" might mean) spoke favorably of a plan set forth in a pamphlet of District Number 2 of the Miners Union. In essence, the plan provided for government control of the mines, which would be clearly separated from the administration of them. The administrators would be experts, not politicians.

All this did not during the conservative 1920s produce any political effect, but it was the kind of thinking that animated much of Roosevelt's New Deal program.

The general mood of Americans during the decade that followed the Armistice was symbolized by a comment in the maiden issue of Time, dated March 3, 1923. Warren G. Harding, said the weekly news magane, was not a "superman" like heodore Roosevelt or Wilson, but he as "important and successful as the mbodiment of the American idea of umility exalted by homely virtues nto the highest eminence." He was the actuality of the schoolboy no-on that anybody has a chance to be resident."

That was the trouble. When the eapot Dome scandal broke, THE ATION observed in a piece called A Business Administration," that e were getting a delightful picture f what a business government really as. The NATION comment that > wherever business touches government, as it has touched it in every Republican and most Democratic administrations, corruption is inevitable reminiscent of what Godkin had id at the time of the Credit Mobilier velations, except that the laissez-ire Godkin had emphasized the orruption of business by govern-ent.

MERICANS WERE EVIDENTLY not uch interested in the giving away f their natural resources to the oil terests—despite the excellent re-orts by Paul Y. Anderson in the St. ouis Post-Dispatch and THE NA-ION. THE NATION was looking into n unclear crystal ball when it predicted that the Coolidge candidacy was now impossible. Coolidge knew when to choose to run. La Follette, whom THE NATION warmly supported for President in 1924 (Ernest Gruening, who had been an editor from 1920 to 1923, directed La Follette's publicity during the campaign), made a strong third party showing, but his Progressive movement faded after his death in 1925. Villard had lamented La Follette's inability to see the necessity of free trade, but had applauded his clear condemnation of the Ku Klux Klan (which the Democratic convention had been unable to condemn) and his anti-monopoly, pro-conservation economic policy. It is significant of one of the problems of American liberalism that LaFollette did not oppose the harshly nativist immigration bill of 1924. The intellectuals of THE NATION and The New Republic were not in tune with many of their Mid-West "constituents" who exhibited along with their progressivism a certain know-nothingism.

SEVERAL HISTORIANS of the twenties have remarked that Americans were much more interested in automobiles than in politics. On a hot day, one could take a spin to the country, and there be cool with Coolidge. The Presidential candidacy of Norman Thomas in 1928 must have seemed irrelevant to almost everybody but people who engaged in thinking. Even Villard could not bring himself to support his friend. THE NATION had tried in a modest way to start a boom for Senator Norris, who had fought to keep Henry Ford from obtaining Muscle Shoals, but when this came to nothing Villard began giving lots of space in THE NATION to articles about Al Smith. "A Final Word" from Norman Thomas, in the form of a letter in the November 7 NATION, made the point that while the weekly's political position was "adequately covered by the Socialist platform," THE NATION had still refused to announce for him. Caught between Thomas, whose program he support-

Kennedy
by THEODORE SORENSEN

The Special Counsel to the late President tells the story of Kennedy's eleven years in public office as no one else can tell it. One of the most important works of history our century has produced.
Coming October 5. $10.00

Dark Ghetto
DILEMMAS OF SOCIAL POWER
by KENNETH B. CLARK

A distinguished Negro social psychologist who grew up in Harlem examines the life, hopes, fears, frustrations of the urban Negro today. "An indispensable contribution."—Book Week. Foreword by GUNNAR MYRDAL. $4.95

Science and Human Values
by J. BRONOWSKI

A revised and enlarged edition of one of the most influential books the celebrated scientist-humanist has written. It includes his famous BBC broadcast: The Abacus and the Rose: A New Dialogue on Two World Systems. $3.00

Galaxies, Nuclei and Quasars
by FRED HOYLE

Recapitulating a decade of development in astro-physics, one of the greatest living scientists also deals with the most exciting topics current in the field. With remarkable illustrations. $4.95

At all bookstores

1817 Harper & Row

Coolidge

ed but whose "Socialist" label he shied away from, and Smith, who was wet but liberal and who had a chance to win, Villard finally voted in agony for Smith. He may have been decided in part by a Nation poll of its subscribers, who gave Smith 6,872 votes, and Thomas 2,830. That Hoover ran third with 2,784 indicates both that liberals were more favorable to him than they were later to be, and that many readers of The Nation were less radical than the not-quite-consistent journal gave the impression of being.

ON OCTOBER 23, 1929, The Nation (of which Henry Mussey was again, after ten years, managing editor, and of which Arthur Warner, Paul Blanshard and Dorothy Van Doren were associate editors) began publishing a series by Stuart Chase called "Prosperity. Believe It or Not." Chase sought to distinguish between various indices of prosperity, and emphasized that in human terms the United States was not nearly as well off as it was in business terms. To a measuring of prosperity in terms of commercial profits, Chase preferred a qualitative standard: the extent to which people enjoyed the life more abundant, combining security and leisure with a flourishing of the creative arts.

Thomas, Hoover and Smith

Consistent with the view Chase expressed just before the crash was the one expressed by Lewis Mumford two years after it came. Contributing to a Nation series whose title, "If I Were a Dictator," was emblematic of the crisis atmosphere of the times, Mumford combined the aim of providing for the material needs of the populace with a libertarian and richly aesthetic point of view. In describing his utopia, he said:

> Though the words over the door of our state are discipline, corporate responsibility and socialization, once we step over the threshold we will write Emerson's word: whim.

If Albert Jay Nock had contributed to this series, he might have quoted his beloved Rabelais: "Fay ce que vouldras." Despite the differences between Mumford and the strongly individualist Nock, both were using libertarian language. An important difference between the pre-Depression and the post-Depression Nation was that libertarianism and "diversity" were on the whole most central to Villard's journal, while economic security and the fight against right-wing totalitarianism were the dominant themes of the weekly under editors like Kirchwey, Lerner and Bendiner. The difference was less between human beings than between the ages (the word is not too strong) in which they edited The Nation.

When Villard began in the late twenties to think of retiring as editor-in-chief, he hoped that Lewis Gannett would succeed him. But Gannett, now with the New York Herald-Tribune, declined. Villard thought of Dorothy Thompson (then married to Sinclair Lewis, who had frequently contributed to The Nation), but that plan didn't work out either. Finally, he turned over the management of the weekly to a board of editors, all of whom had previously served on The Nation: Freda Kirchwey, Joseph Wood Krutch, Henry Hazlitt, and Ernest Gruening. Villard was to continue to write a weekly column, in which he would be free to say whatever he wished. This arrangement produced a "drama" during the late thirties which will be discussed later.

> The American official and executive group does not desire the comfort and convenience of the American individual. And what is more, we have one of the clumsiest systems of communication between individuals, and unorganized groups of individuals, that exists in any allegedly representative government. Apart from our tendency to put up with anything, and our instilled duty to be humorous instead of taking action, the normal American has no idea whatsoever as to how he should or can deal with any executive infamy. That, I take it, is part of the price we pay for having our national capital tucked away in a corner. The English who do most things badly are at least able to get at their rulers. Someone takes little Whiff or old Jiblet out on a golf-links and wrings his figurative neck; someone knows so-and-so and the matter gets a few moments' attention. Anything causing inconvenience to ten or twenty thousand literate people can be got on the floor of the House of Commons in, I should say, forty-eight hours. In the United States this could only happen if the issue affected some very large organized business.
>
> — Ezra Pound, The Nation, 1927

One of the very last pieces that Villard wrote as editor of The Nation, in the fall of 1932, dealt with the choice between Hoover and Roosevelt as one between the kettle and the pot. Under Hoover, troops had been used to move the bonus army out of Anacostia Flats, and the great power companies were becoming more and more powerful. But Roosevelt seemed to have nothing but buoyancy of spirit to combat master evils.

Villard at last threw his support to Norman Thomas, and planned after the election to push a non-Socialist third party movement. Under its new editors, THE NATION was to find that Roosevelt had incorporated the ideas of LaFollette and Thomas and Veblen and Keynes so skillfully the country was not much interested in anything dissenters offered. Partly because Villard had fought so hard for causes during his "fighting years," the causes became part of a main stream, and Villard was left rather dry on the left bank.

V

Literature and Ideas, 1918-1933

An "International Magazine of Arts and Letters" called Broom began publication in Rome in 1921. Matthew Josephson explains, in Life Among the Surrealists, that the name of the periodical was taken from a passage in Moby-Dick: "What of it, if some old hunks of a Sea-captain orders me to get a broom and sweep down the decks? . . ." Melville's Ishmael goes on to ask, "Who ain't a slave?" but he is only slightly daunted, and there is a jaunty freedom in his voice. Some American artists and intellectuals, with little money in their purses, actually ishmaeled it around Europe during the post-World War years. But wherever they were, they tended to "make it new" in poetry, painting, music, criticism. The anarchy of modern art said more to them than did Arnoldian culture (which Ezra Pound spelled "Kulchur.")

Josephson, who had studied at Columbia College before going off to Europe, recalls that in 1919 Raymond Weaver—then a young instructor—had almost been fired by Nicholas Murray Bütler for speaking with extreme enthusiasm in class about the works of Oscar Wilde. A

Books of Enduring Interest from Harcourt, Brace & World

Thurman Arnold
FAIR FIGHTS AND FOUL
A Dissenting Lawyer's Autobiography $5.95

Adolf A. Berle
THE AMERICAN ECONOMIC REPUBLIC
$4.50 hard cover edition $1.65 paperbound edition

Violet Bonham Carter
WINSTON CHURCHILL
An Intimate Portrait $8.50

John Connell
WAVELL Scholar and Soldier $8.75

Louis Hartz
THE FOUNDING OF NEW SOCIETIES
$6.50

Granville Hicks
PART OF THE TRUTH✻
An Autobiography $5.95

Bruce Hutchison
MR. PRIME MINISTER: 1867-1964
$7.50

Louis W. Koenig
THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE
$9.50

Perry Miller
THE LIFE OF THE MIND IN AMERICA
From the Revolution to the Civil War $7.50

V. S. Pritchett & Evelyn Hofer
NEW YORK PROCLAIMED
$15.00

W. G. Rogers
WISE MEN FISH HERE
The Story of Frances Steloff and the Gotham Book Mart $5.95

Richard H. Rovere
THE GOLDWATER CAPER
$3.95

James W. Silver
MISSISSIPPI: THE CLOSED SOCIETY
$4.75

Hudson Strode
JEFFERSON DAVIS: TRAGIC HERO
$7.50

John Maynard Keynes
THE GENERAL THEORY OF EMPLOYMENT, INTEREST, AND MONEY
$6.00 hard cover edition $2.95 paperbound edition

✻ Published under the direction of Hiram Haydn

petition circulated by Josephson and signed by some of the senior students had helped save Weaver's job. It was also during 1919 that Weaver, whose pioneer biography of Melville was to help revive the author of Moby-Dick, published an article in THE NATION on the Melville centenary. If Oscar Wilde had at least been whispered about by people who professed to be shocked when his name was spoken out loud, Melville had simply been ignored during the late 19th and early 20th century. Critics on the pre-Villard NATION, like More and Babbitt and Mather, had said little about American writers anyway, although Willa Cather passed muster. Now came Weaver and said that Moby-Dick "reads like a great opium dream," that the conversations in it remind one of Dekker, Webster, Massinger, and Fletcher, and that if one will forget logic and common sense, > and "abandon himself"—as Dr. Johnson would contemptuously have said—to this work of Melville's, he will acknowledge the presence of an amazing masterpiece.

In this great book Weaver found both the comic and the "satanic" spirit.

Weaver's reasons for praising Moby-Dick make one think of T. S. Eliot's criticism. Eliot admired the Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists to whose work Weaver compared Moby-Dick, and he found in Baudelaire's poems a satanic quality, a belief in "damnation," which made it possible to think of Dante when reading him. Tastes in criticism had changed since Henry James wrote in THE NATION that Baudelaire's flowers of evil were not evil at all but disgusting. In the 1920s, the writers and painters who were dreamers or "fools of God" or who exhibited Nietzschean energy, seemed "relevant," as saner artists did not. Whitman at last came into his own among American critics. Percy H. Boynton, in an appreciative 1919 NATION essay, recalled a description by genteel Barrett Wendell of Whitman's "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry": hexameters "trying to bubble through sewage." That was in A Literary History of America, published in 1900. But, said Boynton, Whitman had influenced poets like Moody, Masters, John Gould Fletcher, and Untermeyer; and Wytter Bynner had written:

> Somebody called Walt Whitman > Dead!
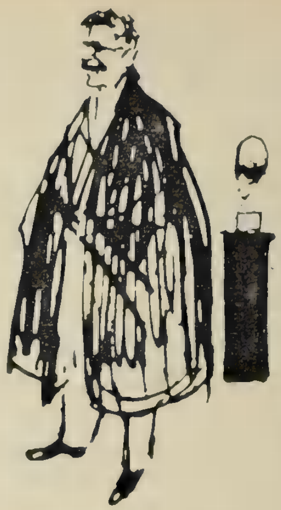
> He is alive instead,
> Alive as I am. When I lift my head,
> His head is lifted.

Not all American critics were, or suddenly became, avant-garde at the end of World War I. T. S. Eliot was part modernist, part classicist: he praised passionate and "experimental" writing, but insisted, in "Tradition and the Individual Talent," on "impersonality" as a virtue of great art. Irving Babbitt, in Rousseau and Romanticism (1919) and Democracy and Leadership (1924), attributed modern unrestraint in literature and society to the exaltation of "nature" at the expense of civilized "standards." This New Humanist view was to be expressed in some NATION articles during the twenties, but it was clearly a minority position at 20 Vesey Street as it had not been in the days of Paul Elmer More's editorship. Stuart Pratt Sherman, whose articles in More's NATION, and whose course in Matthew Arnold at the University of Illinois, had won him a reputation as an able member of the New Humanist school, was by 1918 shifting toward a middle ground between the Party of Culture and the Party of Nature. A clear indication that the "new" NATION was sympathetic to the modernism so harshly denounced by Babbitt and More was the tone of E. Preston Dargan's article, "The Range of French Romanticism," late in 1918. Dargan observed that romanticism was, with classicism and realism, one of the three great manifestations of the French genius in literature; each of these manifestations was "relatively excellent." One can hear Babbitt snorting.



Stieglitz

Another sign of the cultural weather at THE NATION was Jacob Zeitlin's review of Waldo Frank's 1919 volume, Our America. Zeitlin called attention to Alfred Stieglitz's 1904 opening in New York of a studio where he gave Americans their first taste of modern European art: Matisse, Picasso, Braque, et al. (These were the painters whose work Frank Jewett Mather in the old NATION had found repugnant.) In Stieglitz's studio at 291 Fifth Avenue, said Zeitlin, "beauty in all its forms found true votaries, and from here its gospel was disseminated." Waldo Frank, said Zeitlin, was the "rapturous press agent" of the new movement in the arts, while Leo Ornstein, James Oppenheim, Randolph Bourne, and H. L. Mencken had led the revolt against convention on various fronts: music, poetry, the discussion of ideas, and literary criticism. Most of these men, incidentally, in addition to Van Wyck Brooks, Robert Frost, John Dos Passos, Amy Lowell, John Reed, and Vachel Lindsay, had been associated with The Seven Arts, a "little magazine" devoted to pacifism and to free expression, whose life (November 1916-October 1917) was as brief as its pages were alive.

An appropriate title for an essay descriptive of what American artists and intellectuals were doing during and after the first World War would be "From One Village to Another."

o Greenwich Village (or the Left ank) they went from their homes in llinois or Ohio or Idaho. Carl Van oren, literary critic of THE NATION etween 1919 and 1922 (and him-elf a Mid-Westerner who moved to ew York), discussed the "revolt" rom the first of these villages in one f his articles. The language Van oren used to describe the Spoon iver Anthology, from which he said e newest style in American fiction ated, is significant: Masters had dis-layed "a greedy gusto for life, a ide imaginative experience, tumul-uous uprushes of emotion and ex-ression, an acute if undisciplined in-lligence, great masses of the verita-le stuff of existence." (Irving Bab-itt, who once referred contemptu-usly to Mencken's "gustos and dis-ustos" would not have enjoyed Van oren's prose.) Sinclair Lewis' Main treet also exhibited "gusto" as well s photographic accuracy and excel-nt mimicry. Zona Gale, Edith harton, and F. Scott Fitzgerald ere other "bright barbarians," said an Doren, who had revolted against e village. Their books—Miss Lulu ett, The Age of Innocence, This ide of Paradise, indicated that tradi-ons which once governed, no longer eld. It is notable that when, in a ATION series on "Contemporary ovelists," Van Doren spoke of Wil-am Allen White he praised his "bubbling energy," and that he found enry Blake Fuller's "deficiency in assion" compensated by his "free, enetrating intelligence." The atmos-here of this literary criticism is open" like that of William James's ragmatism. The comment made in a 929 number of THE NATION by Scott uchanan—who was of a different hilosophic school—that John Dewey ad "infected the eternal verities ith time," is strikingly evocative of e new élan in literature and ought.

No works of art more clearly sym-olized the "modern" point of view in both aesthetic and philosophic rms) than Joyce's Ulysses and T. S. liot's Waste Land, both published in 1922. Of Ulysses, Gilbert Seldes said in THE NATION that it was the culmination of the novel as created by Flaubert and Henry James, and probably indicated the turn the novel would take into a new form. The work was a gigantic "travesty," which burlesqued the Odyssey as the Greek satyr-play had burlesqued the tragic cycle to which it was appended. Joyce had written an "epic of defeat," > in which there is not a scamped page nor a moment of weakness, in which whole chapters are monuments to the power and the glory of the creative intelligence over the chaos of uncreated things, and a triumph of devotion, to my mind one of the most significant and beautiful of our time.

In the late fall of 1922 Seldes reviewed The Waste Land, which he found to be the "complement" of Ulysses. Eliot's poem gave "some indication of the inner life of such a poet" as Joyce had created in the outward-turning Stephen Dedalus.

At about the same time that Joyce and Eliot were gliding in the stream of consciousness, Proust was writing his roman fleuve. Reviewing the first

COMPLIMENTS FROM

GALTON PAPER CO., INC.

Newsprint suppliers

to THE NATION

NAACP

salutes

The NATION

On its Century of Editorial Leadership in the Struggle for Equal Rights for All

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
20 West 40th Street New York, N.Y., 10018

six volumes of À la Recherche du Temps Perdu in THE NATION, Ellen Fitzgerald commented that memory had never before been so clearly demonstrated to be the mother of the Muses. Proust "analyzes every analysis," she said, then analyzes again and yet again. Her remark that he had employed Henry James's ideal of saturation, of squeezing the subject, is particularly interesting in view of the fact that James had been a puzzle to critics in his own day. During the late 19th and early 20th century THE NATION regarded him as a "painful" and difficult writer, but after his death in 1916, more and more Jacobites came to light candles at his altar.

Certainly there are striking differences among the authors praised by THE NATION during the post-war years: Sinclair Lewis, Proust, and Eugene O'Neill (whose plays both Ludwig Lewisohn and his successor as a NATION drama critic, Joseph Wood Krutch, admired) exhibited different kinds of sensibility. But each of them was in his own way coming to grips with the problems of that chaotic modern life which More and Babbitt denounced. "The world with the lid off," was More's characterization of the 1914-1918 slaughter, and that is how he regarded most of the new art. He wanted to put the lid back on, while the serious writers and artists tried to transmute the ugly reality they saw into beauty. For some of them, artistic beauty—and truth—was the only stable thing that remained in the world.

André Gide was perhaps the twentieth century writer who most troublingly evoked the instability of life. Although Clifton Fadiman's 1925 review of The Counterfeiters emphasized the aesthetic aspects and "emotional impact" of this "pure novel," Gerald Sykes was in a 1931 NATION piece to see Gide primarily as a critic, a moralist. Gide's admirers, said Sykes, > feel that his peculiar distinction lies in his way of emphasizing the moral content of literature, which comes from his well-known fascination with the problem of good and, especially, evil.

Paul Claudel's effort to convert Gide to Catholicism, as revealed in their correspondence, is in itself a criticism of Gide's work from a very different point of view. What modernist critics applauded as an "honest" attempt on the part of Gide—and Thomas Mann—to confront evil, more traditionalist critics deprecated as an unhealthy preoccupation with it.

THERE WAS NATION criticism during the Villard period (incidentally, Villard's own literary tastes were quite "old-fashioned," and conflicted with his editors' advanced views even more than his "conservative" political liberalism clashed with their more radical orientation) which tended to be neither "New Humanist" as in the journal's days of More, nor "psychologico-sociological," as Edmund Wilson described the stance of Joseph Wood Krutch. A critic like More and a critic like Krutch (or Lewisohn, or Carl Van Doren) had this much in common: they both related literature directly to life. Allen Tate, however, was one of the so-called "new" critics who were concerned above all with the structure and texture of a work of art. Even if saturated in history—many of the New Critics were also the conservative Southern agrarians who in 1930 published I'll Take My Stand—they focused their attention on what others might call the "ae thetic aspects" of the work, and wh they regarded as the very essence it. Consider Tate's NATION review Dos Passos' Manhattan Transfer. contained a great deal of "excelle prose," and was something new: ' breathless movie scenario." On tl other hand,

> . . . . since Mr. Dos Passos h limited his sensibility to the dilige registration of appearance and h not proposed an aesthetic proble you will find that none is solved.

Whereas most other critics during t 1920s talked about the plot a theme of fictional works, Tate habit ally stressed technique and tone. liked Hemingway's "pointillistic" our time, but found in The Sun Al Rises a falling into sentimentalit For Tate, what an author said w the way he said it.

While THE NATION remain chiefly a journal of criticism duri the Villard years, it also published great deal of poetry, more than ever had before. Among the po whose work appeared in the week were Padraic Colum, Edna St. Vi cent Millay, E. A. Robinson, Babe Deutsch, Robert Frost, Allen Ta Hart Crane, James Rorty, Archiba MacLeish, and Robert Graves. Ma Van Doren, literary editor of T NATION from 1924 to 1928 (as brother, Carl Van Doren, had be from 1919 to 1922) recalls in Autobiography Villard's objections some of the poems he chose to pri they were "difficult" or they we "not hopeful." Although "the Bos was a warm-hearted libertarian politics, his bourgeois realism son times got on Van Doren's nerves. one occasion, the literary edi shouted back, "Mr. Villard, you do know a god-damned thing about etry!"

DURING THE MIDDLE twenties T NATION briefly experimented w the publication of fiction, and fo longer period there was an ann NATION poetry contest. This was w in 1925 by Eli Siegel with a Wh man-like poem called "Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana." Prizes always make many people unhappy, but this one produced a flurry of letters disputing the jury's decision —and another flurry defending it.

Among other special initiatives taken during the Villard period was a "These United States" series, for which Ernest Gruening was responsible; he asked authors like Sinclair Lewis, Sherwood Anderson, Willa Cather, H. L. Mencken and Robert Herrick to write about their native states. The essays they contributed to THE NATION later appeared in a two-volume book. A second important series, published in 1924, was called "New Morals for Old" (the title must have sent a shiver up Villard's spine). Bertrand Russell contributed an essay in which he referred to a study of the ethical valuations of American college students: it seemed that they considered Sabbath-breaking more wicked than lying, and extra-conjugal sexual relations more wicked than murder. Optimistically, Russell declared that moral precepts, "like everything else," could be improved.

That they could stand improving, the 1925 "monkey trial" in Dayton, Tennessee, also seemed to indicate. Joseph Wood Krutch, who had grown up in Tennessee, went down to report on the trial for THE NATION. The moral failure he found there was chiefly that of the educated people who did not wish to make sacrifices in order to withstand public pressure. "There is scarcely one [native son]," wrote Krutch, > who has the courage to stand up for what he thinks and knows instead of flying quickly to cover lest he might have to sacrifice to his convictions some political advantage or some material gains. . . .

The year in which the Tennessee high school teacher was tried for teaching Darwin's theory was also an annus mirabilis in American literature: Arrowsmith, An American Tragedy, The Great Gatsby and Manhattan Transfer all appeared in 1925. And all of them depicted an America in which the bigotry and cowardice Russell and Krutch had noted were widespread. In Arrowsmith, Krutch found that Lewis had surpassed Babbitt and Main Street:

> He has described once more . . . . the difficulties which beset the idealist, but he has also qualified his thesis by saying, in effect, that these difficulties are not absolutely insurmountable, and this means, in a word, that he has chosen a more important hero than he has ever chosen before.

Carl Van Vechten spoke of Jay Gatsby's "passionate idealism," which rendered his rather cheap personality "pathetically appealing," and in reviewing An American Tragedy, Krutch noted that Dreiser's story implied the "failure of the most pretentiously moralistic nation of the world to live in the main by any law but the law of the jungle." Thus each of these reviews pointed to a sharp conflict between ideals and realities in American life, a conflict which Krutch spoke of as "tragic." His own use of Dreiser's term is interesting in view of the fact that a few years later he was saying in The Modern Temper (1929) that tragedy was impossible in the mechanistic modern world.

One of the few hopeful events of 1929 was the opening of the Museum

I believe that the substitution of a scientific for a religious technique in the production of virtue may prove to be of enormous importance. Moralists hitherto have been extraordinarily unsuccessful in producing the type of character that they said they desired. The growth of psychology and biochemistry is likely to give us in the not too distant future a far greater power of molding character than mankind has ever hitherto possessed. Like the power over inanimate nature, this new power over human nature may be used either for good or for evil. I do not profess to know in which way it will be used, but if it is used for evil, our scientific civilization will not long survive.

— Bertrand Russell, The Nation, 1931

The Day of the AMERICANS
by Nerin Gun
$5.95

A famous European journalist, himself a prisoner in the Nazi prison camp of Dachau, writes with enduring sentiment of the life there, and the day they all waited for: the day of the Americans . . . and liberation!

ADAM CLAYTON POWELL and the Politics of Race $6.50
by Neil Hickey and Ed Edwin

What makes the controversial Congressman from New York's Harlem tick? Two top journalists weave truth from the fabric of fact and there emerges an enlarged picture of THE MAN . . . projected against the background of his time.

At all bookstores or Fleet—230 Park—N.Y.C.

The most dangerously outspoken book ever smuggled out of Russia

WARD 7 by VALERIY TARSIS

This extraordinary document—autobiography thinly disguised as fiction—tells the sensational story of a writer imprisoned in a lunatic asylum for daring to denounce Soviet Communism. An impassioned diatribe against Communism, it is a suicidal cry of anguish from a writer who would rather be heard than cautious...a brave and shocking book.

At bookstores $3.50
DUTTON

of Modern Art, which Lloyd Goodrich discussed in an excellent NATION piece. The foundation of the Museum, he observed, "marks the final apotheosis of modernism and its acceptance by respectable society." And in something of the enlightened nationalistic spirit of Emerson's "American Scholar" address, Goodrich called upon Americans to become aware of the art of their own country. He praised the directors of the new museum for planning to alternate between exhibitions of American and foreign art, and emphasized that the public, while familiar with even second-rate works from France, knew little of modern German, English, Italian, Spanish, Belgian, Dutch, Russian, or Mexican art.

Then the Depression came. The first two volumes of John Dos Passos' U. S. A. were published in 1930 and 1932, and Henry Hazlitt—who became literary editor of THE NATION in 1930—said in his review of the second volume, which he preferred to The 42nd Parallel:

> If we compare Dos Passos with other of our leading novelists, we find no one who is his superior in range of awareness of American life.

More conservative politically than other members of THE NATION staff (although he favored Norman Thomas in 1932), Hazlitt was an able literary critic. He strongly attacked dogmatic Communist literary criticism, but saw the truth that was in Dos Passos' bitter, brilliant, radical 1919.

William Faulkner's Light in August, published in 1932, was as depressing in its own way as any of Dos Passos' fiction. But Dorothy Van Doren, reviewing it in THE NATION, found in the love affair between Joe Christmas—who is, or thinks he is, part-Negro—and the white Joanna Burden, "humility, contempt, pride, remorse, and ecstasy." It would be possible to discuss Light in August much more in terms of its "social" theme than the reviewer did: but her sensitive, humane response to Faulkner's characterization and style and tone represents the central tendency of NATION criticism during the 1918-1933 period—the years before the 20th century went completely insane.

VI

Kafkaesque: 1933-55

THE POOR OF SANTO DOMINGO cried out to American Marines in the spring of 1965: "Tenemos hambre!" ("We are hungry!") The streets of American cities did not ring with such cries in 1932, but the wretched inhabitants of "Hoover Valley," an abandoned reservoir in Central Park, New York, fed on stale bread. In 1933, at least twenty-nine people in New York City alone died of starvation. Hunger weakened others, and hastened their deaths. There was no mass voter desertion of the Republican and Democratic parties in the 1932 election. But the depression did induce many people who later became safely liberal or conservative to vote for the Socialist Thomas or the Communist Foster.

In December, 1932, a magazine called Common Sense was launched by a group of intellectuals who declared that "a system based on competition for profit can no longer serve the general welfare," and who called for a constitutional convention "to adapt the principles of the American Revolution of 1776 to modern needs." Founded chiefly through the efforts of Alfred M. Bingham, who at Yale Law School four years earlier had been head of a Hoover for President organization, Common Sense listed among its contributors Stuart Chase, John Dos Passos, A. J. Muste, V. F. Calverton, John T. Flynn, James Rorty, and George Soule. Their hopes for a complete renovation of the American political system were more radical than those of Oswald Garrison Villard, but in 1932 Villard saw Hoover and Roosevelt as kettle and pot, and wanted to help build a new political party. THE NATION's muckraking reporter, Paul Y. Anderson, was more optimistic than O. G. V. about a Roosevelt administration, but his sobriquet for the Democratic candidate—"Friendly Frank"—was only a shade more complimentary than the Common Sense description of the President-elect: the "laughing boy from Hyde Park."

The new editors of THE NATION as of January, 1933—Freda Kirchwey, Joseph Wood Krutch, Henry Hazlitt (who was to leave before the end of the year) and Ernest Gruening (who in 1934 would resign to become editor of the New York Evening Post) foresaw no dramatic change under Roosevelt. In THE NATION of January 4, there was an article by John Dewey in which the philosopher of instrumentalism spoke of the newly founded League for Independent Political Action. Turning the other cheek to Thomas's smack in THE NATION of December 14 that the L. I. P. A. held "an intellectualized version of a watered-down socialism," Dewey reported that the League was calling for a conference of all progressive and radical groups in 1933. The League, said Dewey, wanted to avoid "slurs" on the middle class, and opposed the "defeatist" view that no effective political action was possible until most of the population had sunk into the "proletariat."

Two months later, Roosevelt's dynamic inaugural address and his rapid-fire legislative attack on the country's major problems quieted talk of a new party. The money changers, Roosevelt assured the country in his March 4 inaugural speech, had fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization:

> We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit.

"The Faith of Roosevelt" was the title of THE NATION editorial that greeted this address. The President's words "had something of the challenge, the symbolism, and the simplicity of the trumpet blast." The editorial underlined particularly Roosevelt's assertion that our "greatest primary task" was to put people to work. There seemed implicit in his words an understanding that "the anged times demanded a new tech- que and a basically new approach the problems of society.”

HE PREVIOUS ISSUE of THE NATION d expressed general approval of e new Cabinet. The appointment Tom Walsh as Attorney-General as particularly gratifying to the urnal, which ten years earlier had plauded his role in exposing the eapot Dome give-away. (When alsh died suddenly, just after being pointed, THE NATION indicated at his replacement, the brilliant wyer Homer Cummings, could nev- fill his shoes.) Harold Ickes was, the journal's opinion, a superb oice for the Interior Department, d the selection of Frances Perkins Secretary of Labor was “a cause profound jubilation.” Oswald arrison Villard, who years before d marched in a feminist parade, lightedly emphasized in his new ssues and Men” column the first-oman-in-the-Cabinet aspect of the pointment. He declared that no atter what the future held in store the Roosevelt administration, he ould always be grateful for this act. he editors of THE NATION did not ult and rejoice over the rest of the abinet. While they had “the highest spect” for the new Secretary of tate, Cordell Hull, they were un- ppy about the selection of the con- rvative William H. Woodin as Sec- tary of the Treasury, and of Dan- l C. Roper—who had been repre- nting Cuban sugar interests in ashington—as Secretary of Com- erce. Still, the journal declared, > it is the general spirit of the Cabinet which counts, and since it will be dominated by Mr. Roosevelt, we cannot but feel that, as a whole, it will be progressive and forward-looking and able to grapple intelligently with the crisis which confronts the country.

> For eighteen months unemployment has been spreading poverty and acute suffering through industrial and agricultural areas alike. No one yet knows when the present economic disaster will be brought to an end. The illusory prosperity and feverish optimism which marked preceding years have given way to fearful economic insecurity and to widespread despair. These eighteen months have revealed the hypocrisy of the President's pledge of cooperation toward the attainment of economic security. The Administration's efforts to attain economic security have consisted of attempts to minimize the seriousness of the depression, of bold assurances that steps which would restore prosperity were about to be taken, and of a woefully unsuccessful program to stimulate private or local agencies to undertake tasks which the Administration was determined to shirk.
>
> — Senator Robert M. La Follette,
> The Nation, 1931

The post-1918 NATION was not in e habit of praising a new adminis- ation. The weekly had vigorously pported only one recent Presiden- al candidate: La Follette, in 1924 -and he had run third. But Roose- elt now seemed to have much more an an ingratiating smile. In its issue March 22, THE NATION commend- d him for courage in insisting upon the continuance of the Senate inquiry into banking practices, “the very inquiry which, according to fearful conservatives, is supposed to have weakened confidence before the bank holiday.” Ferdinand Pecora, the counsel of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, was to be highly praised in THE NATION “Honor Roll” for 1933 for his exposure of “scandalous malpractices in the world of finance.” In the course of these hearings, Charles Mitchell (who was later indicted), A. H. Wiggin, Clarence Dillon, Winthrop Aldrich, Thomas Lamont, George and Richard Whitney all took the stand. The most dramatic moments of the inquiry were those of the confrontation between Pecora and the younger J. P. Morgan. “Unperturbed by the lordly apparition,” writes Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., in The Coming of the New Deal,

> Pecora ($255 a month) consulted his notes and pursued his inquiries. One afternoon he asked whether Morgan had paid any income tax in 1930. The room, alive a moment before with a hum of whispers, grew

Reminiscences of a Stock Operator by Edwin Lefevre

Here is one of the most fascinating, readable and instructive books on the stock market ever written. First published in 1923 and long out of print, Reminiscences has been eagerly sought after by investors who have paid high prices for worn, second-hand copies.

Written in fictional form but paralleling Wall Street operations of Jesse Livermore, one of the greatest Wall Street operators of all time, Reminiscences is regarded by many as MUST reading. It is packed with fascinating anecdotes and stock market wisdom that are astonishing, timely and useful today, whether on “stop loss orders”, “when to buy and sell”, and much more. A new introduction by Benton W. Davis highlights many lessons for today's investor.

“Anyone interested in the stock market is bound to be kept up long past his bedtime once he dips into Reminiscences. It is fascinating reading . . . contains some real gems of stock-market wisdom.” FORBES Magazine

Reminiscences is a book you won't put down—that you will enjoy reading—and that will bring you countless nuggets of stock market wisdom. Send only $5.00 for your examination copy to American Research Council, Dept. NR-1, Larchmont, N. Y. Read it a full month. If you don't find it one of the most entertaining and valuable stock market books you have ever seen, send it back for full refund. You risk nothing. Send today!

read the paper of PROTEST against WAR IN VIETNAM
subscribe to the NATIONAL GUARDIAN
10 weeks for $1
NATIONAL GUARDIAN ▪ 197 East 4th St.
New York, N. Y. 10009

> abruptly silent. Reporters near Morgan seemed to hear his heavy gold watch ticking the seconds away. After a pause, Morgan replied, "I cannot remember."

The Roosevelt administration apparently "meant business" in an un-Coolidge-like sense.

THROUGHOUT THE "One Hundred Days" from March to June, 1933, THE NATION was friendly to the President's program, but pressed for a more radical attack on the depression. Norman Thomas' March 22 NATION article, "A Socialist Program for Banking," expressed what was essentially the journal's point of view: since banking risks were now being assumed by the government, the government should acquire ownership of the banks. In the same article, Thomas called for some degree of inflation (or "reflation") in order to attack unemployment through public works and maintenance allowances. Some weeks later, Paul Y. Anderson commented that Roosevelt's hesitation to "prime the pump" through a large federal works program had thus far been the most discouraging aspect of his administration. "Put People to Work!" cried THE NATION on May 17, charging that except for the employment given to 250,000 men in the forestry camps, and in various trades through the recent legalization of beer, "the Roosevelt program has to date included no serious effort to strike at the root of our trouble." Along with an insistence on the urgent need for an extensive housing program, the demand for an all-out campaign to put people to work was a persistent NATION theme during Roosevelt's first four years.

> Now that the crisis has yielded slightly to emergency measures, it is imperative that the new Administration should go to the bottom of the whole complex disaster and lay enduring foundations for a new financial and economic system. And it would be well for President Roosevelt to press to the full the unique strategic advantage given him by the magnitude of the disaster.
>
> The dramatic closing of every bank in the United States has emphasized the primarily financial nature of the greatest failure in American history. The catastrophe—whose end is not yet—may justly be ascribed to the assumption of control of the nation's life by the money power. Just before assuming the Presidency, Woodrow Wilson warned the American people that the "money monopoly" dominated the country, that it controlled our entire system of credit, that all our activities were in the hands of a few men who "by very reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom." Twenty years ago Louis D. Brandeis wrote even more prophetically, "We must break the money trust or it will break us."
>
> We have not broken it and it has broken us. . . .
>
> —Editorial Review, The Nation, 1933

Ernest Gruening, who was to accept an important post in the Department of the Interior, had higher hopes for Roosevelt in 1933 than did some of his NATION colleagues. But his NATION review of Roosevelt's collected campaign addresses, Looking Forward, indicated that it was only under the "most rigorous interpretation" of the President's conceptions and implied pledges that "the old idea of America as a land of greater promise and greater opportunity than any other nation on earth may still be achieved." Gruening was not concerned only with the fulfillment of the promise of economic equality: could that equality be achieved, he asked, without the loss of civil liberty? Gruening believed that it could be, but he was pointing to a real danger. Among the early supporters of the New Deal were Father Coughlin and Huey Long. Both of these demagogues, as Raymond Gram Swing later pointed out in several NATION articles, had great mass appeal. Most of the planks in Father Coughlin's platform, Swing noted, were taken directly from the Farmer-Labor Party program, and Huey Long had a fairly impressive record of popular social accomplishments as governor of Louisiana. Yet Coughlin's program of "social justice" included no reference to civ liberties, and Huey Long's contemp for the parliamentary process was a great as Mussolini's. It also seems pe tinent to recall that Lincoln Steffer expressed in his Autobiography a much admiration for Mussolini as fc Lenin, and that Vincent Sheear while revolted by the hysteria an criminality of the Fascists, could ca fascism "a kind of rehearsal in tim for the truly 'total' state, an introduc tion to the design into which the fu ture must probably fall." That a ma of Sheean's intelligence and sensibi ity could say this in the early thirtie was a notable sign of the times.

> Romance, friends and brothers, is not dead. We still live in the land of opportunity and Something May Turn Up tomorrow. Witness the story of Charles Kane. Mr. Kane, once a resident of Worcester, Massachusetts, had been out of a job for ten weeks; he was walking from New York to Poughkeepsie, looking for work on the way; just south of Hartsdale he stubbed his toe. Being impelled by this to look toewards, he saw a leather valise at his feet; the valise happened to contain $13,000 worth of jewelry belonging to a rich lady of Greenwich, Connecticut, who subsequently rewarded Mr. Kane with $1,000. This story, which appeared in the New York Times, will doubtless be copied by every newspaper in the country. It will set the revolution back several years; it will be a blow to the Communists and Socialists; and if Mr. Hoover were politically astute he would immediately seize upon it for campaign material. For every member of the near-unemployed who can still buy a newspaper and who will therefore read the story will say, "There, but for the merest turn of the wheel of chance, walked I. My chance may come tomorrow. I shall not yet despair, and while I am about it I may as well vote the Republican ticket."
>
> — Editorial, The Nation, 1932

THE POSSIBILITY OF a New Deal tur to the Fascist right was raised b

THE NATION—and other liberals—chiefly in discussions of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Although Paul Y. Anderson saw this law as part of a general administration program that had come "as if in answer to the liberals' prayer," an article in the same August, 1933, issue of the journal was not sanguine about the "voluntary" aspect of the NRA:

> A patriotic appeal may be effective as long as the emergency is acute and business is worried, but an industrial system cannot run on patriotism. . . .

If industry refused to cooperate voluntarily in the establishment of equitable codes, then the government would have to resort to force—and this would be the beginning of fascism. But there was a way to avoid the dilemma: the government should "take over and operate for the benefit of the people the steel and coal and other great industries." Oswald Garrison Villard expressed the same fear of fascism that the editors did. In September, 1933, he wrote:

> . . . . if NRA fails, and the emergency compels, we may yet see Franklin Roosevelt go to the Fascist right as easily as to the radical left.

Villard had already been deeply disappointed by the failure of the London Economic Conference during the summer of 1933; a failure which he had blamed on our high tariff economic nationalism, as well as on that of the other participating countries.

THE NATION's basic attitude toward the NRA, and indeed toward the New Deal in its first phase, was indicated early in 1934: after seven months of existence, the NRA had preserved or increased the total earnings of various low-paid workers, but had proved unable to spread work so as to absorb more than a fraction of the unemployed. This situation was unlikely to improve > so long as our recovery program is designed, as now, to save capitalism rather than to eliminate the profit system as a method of conducting industry.

Consistent with this advocacy of a Socialist approach to the economic crisis was THE NATION's support of a bill introduced by Senator Frazier of North Dakota to set up a $120,000,000 federal marketing corporation for the purchase and sale of farm products, and for the regulation of the price spread between producers and consumers. THE NATION observed that while the AAA was continuing to plan for the control of farm production, the Frazier proposal—supported by consumer groups and by Norman Thomas—placed emphasis on the improvement of distribution.

A letter written to THE NATION just five years later—in May, 1939—is interesting in light of the journal's socialist orientation on domestic problems. The letter came from a Beacon Hill Bostonian in reply to a NATION request for a subscription. Declining to subscribe, the writer said that while he thought the journal "quite sound on the vast majority of public issues which you discuss," he felt that the magazine had lately become "rather provincial in its outlook. . . . Your writers write largely from the New York point of view . . . and that must necessarily hurt your influence greatly beyond the city limits." He cited, as an example of provincialism, a NATION article called "Vermont Prefers Floods," which had referred to a quarrel between Senator Aiken and the War Department over methods of flood control. Many Vermonters, said the letter-writer, agreed with Aiken's view that the issue was "simply and solely the insistence of the federal government that it can take from us what it chooses, without any regard at all for our wishes or our rights." Freda Kirchwey, then editor-in-chief of THE NATION, replied that while the title of the offending article was intended to be satirical, the article did fail to take account of the independence and pride of Vermonters. This exchange of letters brings an important problem into focus: can effective government planning be reconciled with an unselfish local autonomy? Can we have both socialism and Vermont?

A partial answer to the question was provided by the Tennessee Valley Authority, of which THE NATION frequently spoke as the one unqualified success of the New Deal. David Lilienthal, for many years a director of the agency, noted in TVA: Democracy on the March (1944) that beyond the right of eminent domain,

NEW FROM SCRIBNERS

THE HIGH VALLEY

Kenneth E. Read. A work of rare literary value: a distinguished anthropologist records two years spent among the natives of stone-age New Guinea—and candidly reports the impact on himself. Photographs. $6.95

AMERICAN WOMEN

Margaret Mead and Frances B. Kaplan, editors. The Report of the President's Commission—established by the late John F. Kennedy — on the Status of Women and other Publications of the Commission. Introduction and Epilogue by Dr. Mead. Charts. $6.95

THE AGELESS CHINESE

Dun J. Li. "China . . . is playing a more important role . . . than it has in more than a century. That fact makes particularly welcome this one-volume history that presents the essential facts of the Chinese people's complex path over more than 3,000 years." — HARRY SCHWARTZ, The N. Y. Times. Illustrations, maps. $8.95

HONESTY IN THE CHURCH

Daniel Callahan. The author of The Mind of the Catholic Layman now urges Catholics to speak their minds within the Church. "Callahan has placed the actions of clergy and laity alike under a searing scrutiny." — ROLAND E. MURPHY, O. Carm. $3.95

USSR: A Concise History

Basil Dmytryshyn. A dispassionate survey of the Soviet Union, from "the experimental twenties" to "the cosmic sixties." Includes Khrushchev's "De-Stalinization" speech and the 1964 Suslov speech on the Sino-Soviet split. Illustrations, maps. $8.95

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

TVA planning for the development of the region was in no significant particular enforceable by law. Lilienthal observed that although this lack of power to enforce plans had disturbed many students of the enterprise, > we have continued to rely wholly upon . . . the ways of contract, persuasion, incentives, encouragement, methods based on the people's confidence in TVA's comprehension, its good faith, and the quality of its technical leadership. I feel strongly that the admitted limitations of voluntary methods, distressing and tragic as their consequences sometimes are, do not invalidate the wisdom of a minimum of coercion in carrying out plans for resource development. For coercion is insatiable. . . .

A NATION article in October, 1934, by Raymond Gram Swing (who had just joined the weekly's editorial staff), indicated that TVA, instead of constituting a "big government" threat to the individual or to the region, had set the people free. Swing's article was pitched to the completion of the deal by which the Knoxville district was to receive cheap electricity from the Tennessee Valley Authority. Knoxville thus > throws off the embarrassing clutches of the utility company which has made the sale of electricity the pretense for dipping into its customers' pockets for unearned funds. The city will now own its own distribution system, and pay for it out of rates far below what it ever paid before. And the whole region can rejoice over a voluntary reduction in recent months of power rates by private utility companies amounting to $16,000,000 a year.

Swing was, in effect, describing the realization of the dream of Progressives like Senator George W. Norris (who had fought hard for public power during the Coolidge and Hoover years) and the late Senator Robert M. LaFollette. There were tensions, of course, within the TVA: Lilienthal's "grass-roots approach" was not that of Arthur Morgan, who had been influenced by Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward and who favored strong centralized control, nor of Harcourt Morgan, who was friendly to the private power interests.

THE NATION also had its tensions, although they were not exactly comparable to those of the TVA. At Vesey Street, there was an increasingly sharp divergence between the views of Oswald Garrison Villard and those of Freda Kirchway and other members of the editorial board. While a definitive split did not occur until June, 1940 (when it was occasioned by intense disagreement over foreign policy), a brouhaha broke out over Roosevelt's Supreme Court reorganization plan in 1937. It should first be mentioned that in 1935 Villard had sold THE NATION to The Nation Fund, Inc., a foundation established by Maurice Wertheim, a philanthropic banker. Villard continued, however, to contribute his weekly column, "Issues and Men." Since 1933 there had been several masthead changes, and during the spring of 1937 the editorial lineup was as follows: Editors—Freda Kirchwey, Joseph Wood Krutch, Max Lerner; Associate Editors—Margaret Marshall, Maxwell Stewart; Editorial Associates—Heywood Broun, Alvin Johnson, Oswald Garrison Villard.

WHILE THE NATION had been sharply critical of Roosevelt for what it regarded as his failure to make an all-out attack on the depression, the journal was even more perturbed by the Supreme Court's right-wing assault on the New Deal. In January, 1937, THE NATION set forth its position with regard to the Court, which had virtually invalidated the National Industrial Recovery Act in 1935, and the Agricultural Adjustment Act in 1936. The most important point in THE NATION's plan for dealing with the situation was one it had previously advanced: a Constitutional amendment should be set in motion, giving Congress clear power over the regulation of agriculture, labor and finance. But when the President, shortly after referring in his Second Inaugural Address to "one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished," suddenly proposed that Congress authorize the President to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, THE NATION backed him. An editorial, "Purging the Supreme Court," called Roosevelt's attack on "government by senility" a "brilliant tour de force," and asserted that while his plan was not the best one, it > does not change the relation of the Court to Congress. There can be no question of its constitutionality. It neither seeks to curb the court nor (despite the current impression) pack it, for if the judges retire there is no increase in numbers. Rather it purges the court by removing the infirm, and therefore (by a rough and imperfect logic) the least fit.

TVA: Lilienthal and the Morgans

The "senility" of judges was not really the issue, but THE NATION was right about the constitutionality of the Roosevelt plan. Villard, however, strongly disagreed with the editors' position. Turning his attention from Haiti and Santo Domingo, which he had been discussing in "Issues and Men," to the Supreme Court fight, he asked, "What is the Nation Coming to?" He also desired a reform of the Supreme Court, but by amendment of the Constitution, as THE NATION (he pointed out) had been suggesting for some time. A couple of weeks later, Maurice Wertheim, who had respected the editorial independence of the weekly, published in it an open letter recording "my own persona dissent from your editorial policy on the President's Supreme Court program." Wertheim continued:

> THE NATION has lost itself in unjudicial partisanship at a moment when I, for one, should like to see it come out, like Senator Wheeler Oswald Garrison Villard, and many other liberals, and say to the President, "Enough of this camouflage enough of these attempts to discredit your adversaries as "defeated lawyers"; we like your objectives, but we don't like your methods. You can now attain your objectives with no sacrifice of American principles if you will not be stubborn. And if tha be treason, make the most of it.

Whereupon Heywood Broun, who

ad had his own page in THE NATION nce 1935, erupted:

> I do not know whether I will come again to this pasture. I'm getting a little sick of THE NATION's policy of fair play, and everybody must be heard whether or not he has anything to say. This isn't an amateur tennis-match. It's a fight, and the well-being of masses of men and women depends upon the result. . . . Even an open mind needs to pull down the window at certain times or it becomes less a mind than a cave of the winds.

Two months later, in the issue of ne 12, Wertheim announced the le of THE NATION to Freda Kirchey. The difference of opinion on e Supreme Court question was typ-al, he indicated, of the divergencies etween the editors and himself. Edirial and financial control of the urnal, said Wertheim, should be mbined. And so for the second me since 1935 THE NATION changed ands. But Heywood Broun was not peased. Time magazine for Sep-mber 20 reported that the "twin eystones" of the United States lib-al weekly press, The New Republic
d THE NATION, had just been aken by a small editorial crisis.
eywood Broun had switched from HE NATION to The New Republic,
d the first news Freda Kirchwey ad had of the move was when The ew Republic sent copy for an exange advertisement in THE NATION
nnouncing the acquisition of Broun.
reda Kirchwey's "good-natured epiph" (as Time called it) in THE NA-ION had pointed out that the editors d Broun saw eye to eye on the urt proposal, and that > we differed from him only in believing that it merited debate and that the opposition had a right to be heard. . . . We wish him well, but . . . we suspect that the spirit of fair play may search him out and plague him in the pages of The New Republic as well.

The policies of THE NATION and he New Republic were sufficiently milar to lead many people to won-er why the two weeklies did not erge. Replying in July, 1938, to a tter which raised that question, reda Kirchwey first pointed to the niority of THE NATION, then oberved that The New Republic was heavily subsidized whereas "we are practically self-supporting." Furthermore,

> The two magazines do differ a good deal in their views, particularly on the subject of collective security. Neither publication cares to lose its identity.

Villard had always taken pride in the fact that THE NATION struggled to make a financial go of it—with infusions of aid from him and fellow-stockholders in the enterprise. The New Republic lived a more carefree financial life. Subsidized at its birth by Willard Straight, it continued to receive generous support from his widow after his death in 1918. The tone of The New Republic was different from that of THE NATION: while the Villard-Wertheim-Kirchwey weekly fought vigorously for causes—a writer in another magazine once referred to its "old insurgent spirit . . . its ability, even when clearly wrong, to make men think"—The New Republic was cerebral and cool. THE NATION, especially during the thirties, gave the impression of carrying the fight into Union Square and Jersey City; The New Republic seemed to be making intelligent, progressive comments on the struggle from a fifth-floor office.

Freda Kirchwey's comment on differences between the two journals on the subject of collective security points to a paradox: THE NATION, pacifist under Villard, became interventionist in response to the Nazi-Fascist threat of the 1930s; The New Republic, strongly pro-Wilson and in favor of our entrance into the first World War, was disillusioned by the Treaty of Versailles, and became and remained pacifist until Hitler's 1940 Blitzkrieg. Thus, each of the two liberal weeklies occupied the previous foreign policy position of the other during the years immediately preceding World War II.

SHORTLY AFTER VILLARD took over THE NATION in 1918, he established an International Relations Section, which was to present, fortnightly, "current thoughts on economic and political problems abroad for the purpose of focusing the attention of thinking America upon the factors essential to winning the war and es-

NORTON

Important books on civil rights

OUR FACES—OUR WORDS

LILLIAN SMITH

"Estimable . . . a book of monologues and photographs, and what the photographs do not show, the monologues tell, and in a dozen voices, black and white."—N. Y. Times Book Review. The publisher's profit from the sale of the book is being contributed to CORE. Cloth, $3.75.
Paper, $1.50

STEP BY STEP

By Members of the Fayette County Project. Edited by Douglas Dowd and Mary Nicholas. Photographs by Nick Lawrence. How Cornell University students carried out a civil rights program in a Tennessee county. "Important." —Book Week. Both authors and publisher are contributing their income from this book to the project.
Cloth, $3.75. Paper, $1.25

MISSISSIPPI: THE LONG HOT SUMMER

By William McCord. "Probably the best available treatment of the Movement, particularly in its realistic appraisal of future prospects."—New York Review of Books. $4.50

THEY SHALL OVERCOME

Introduction by SAUL BELLOW

This is a CORE report to the American conscience. All royalties and the publisher's profit from the sale of the book are being contributed to the CORE Scholarship Education and Defense Fund. Illustrated. $3.95

At all bookstores

W. W. NORTON & COMPANY, Inc.
55 Fifth Avenue, New York

tablishing an enduring peace." Villard organized an "Advisory Council" for the I.R.S., composed of such prominent persons as James Harvey Robinson, Gilbert Murray, André-Louis Chevrillon of Paris, and the American Winston Churchill. When Freda Kirchwey, a young Barnard graduate, applied to the Nation for a position in August, 1918 (she had been working for the New York Sunday Tribune), she wrote that she had heard of an opening with the International Relations Section. She landed a job, and was put to work clipping foreign exchanges. The section, which was first published on October 5, 1918, proved a financial burden, eventually dwindled to a page, and finally disappeared in 1932. But interesting documents and background articles on international affairs appeared in it, and Freda Kirchwey's experience proved useful to her. Although she was to have a variety of responsibilities at The Nation under Villard—she became successively associate editor, managing editor and, briefly, literary editor—her chief interest was in foreign affairs. In the late 1930s it was she, along with Maxwell Stewart, Max Lerner and Robert Bendiner, who moved The Nation away from pacifism to support of collective security. Villard, while detesting Hitler, could not forget the "madness at Versailles," which became a kind of obsession with him. During the period of the Anschluss and the Munich Pact and the invasion of Poland and the Blitzkrieg he was horrified but isolationist in his "Issues and Men" column, while The Nation editors became more and more "engaged". Their relationship with Villard was comparable to that which developed between the editors of L'Express and François Mauriac after De Gaulle became President of the Fifth Republic. Mauriac's "Bloc-Notes" on the last page of the French weekly presented De Gaulle as a providential figure, while the editorials of Françoise Giroud and Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber denounced the General as an autocrat. There were some readers of L'Express—as there had been of The Nation—who relished the "debate" as democratic, and there were others who objected that a journal of opinion should speak with one editorial voice. Mauriac eventually left L'Express for Le Figaro Littéraire; Villard finally quit The Nation (to which he had first contributed in 1894) and joined the America First Committee.

Villard's valedictory in the June 29, 1940 Nation was both angry and sad; it said, in part:

> . . . . I regret . . . that my retirement has been precipitated . . . by the editors' abandonment of The Nation's steadfast opposition to all preparation for war, to universal military service, to a great navy, and to all war, for this in my judgment has been the chief glory of its great and honorable past. . . . My own making over of The Nation when I became editor in 1918 pained many of its devoted readers. Yet I can truthfully claim that under my guidance it held to the fundamental principles of the founders and was conducted in their spirit, in fullest support of their correct conception of what the liberal world should be.

JUST AS VILLARD here invoked the spirit of his uncle, Wendell Phillips Garrison, and of E. L. Godkin, first editor of The Nation (although Villard knew that his own "liberalism" was not exactly theirs), Freda Kirchwey in her 1949 obituary essay on Villard spoke of a Nation "continuity of which some of my colleagues may be less aware." The spirit of a journal, she asserted, > is something apart from its specific beliefs, even if he would have disputed it. . . . This spirit has remained to inspire new crusades on new issues. . . .

This is true, but the specific character of Kirchwey's Nation was different from that of Villard's and of Godkin's. Villard was a pacifistic moralist whose opposition to imperialism and whose belief in free trade bespoke a wish for an ultimate federation of the world. Godkin's denunciation of colonial ventures and his advocacy of a low tariff had been based on utilitarian "good sense." By the 1930s, the worlds of Godkin and Villard seemed remote to Freda Kirchwey and most of her Nation colleagues. The Japanese militarists, Mussolini's Fascists, and Hitler's National Socialists were contemptuous of both "good sense" and morality. Their basic law was that war is the health of the state. To a moralist lik Villard, their brutal pragmatism wa uncomfortably paralleled in Frankli D. Roosevelt's treatment of our u traconservative Supreme Court. Vi lard's moralism enabled him to b consistent in his denunciations—h wrote of the "legal murders" by Stali of his opponents—whereas the prag matic liberals sought, often in ar guish, to discriminate among brutal ties of state that had to be tolerate and those for which there was n possible excuse. Thus, while Fred Kirchwey was right in speaking of persistent Nation crusading spiri she and Villard lived in different un verses of discourse.

During the early 1930s, both Vi lard and his editors saw fascism a the greatest immediate threat to civi ization. Villard's denunciation of th Treaty of Versailles, and his condem nation of the French occupation (the Ruhr in 1923, did not blind hi to the growing menace of Hitler's Na tional Socialists. It is true that whe Hitler gained absolute power i March, 1933, The Nation harke back to Woodrow Wilson's failure

> The world safe for democracy? . . those in control of [Germany's] de tiny represent, in part at least, th most odious forms of big-busine and large-landowner control as the existed during the regime of th Kaiser, but are committed to un versal military service, rearmamen and every one of the forms of mil tarism against which Mr. Wilsc called all Americans to fight.

It is also apparent that The Natio had many pro-German readers, wh had come to the weekly during th years of Villard's editorship. Early i January, 1934, The Nation com mented in these terms on a recent de velopment in Germany:

> From time to time The Nation ha been taken to task by its readers b cause of what they consider its i temperate condemnation of the Na government in Germany. Neverth less, it cannot help viewing with th utmost concern the new German la for the sterilization of the unfit. one could imagine a committee (entirely unbiased and equally com petent scientists to decide which (their fellow-human beings should b deprived of the ability to propaga their kind, one might conceivab endorse the proposition. Nothing th the Nazis have done so far inspir over forty years of serving the banking needs of the community

The Amalgamated Bank of New York

11-15 Union Square ▪ Member: Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Member: Federal Reserve System

GREETINGS

on the 100th anniversary of THE NATION on the 25th anniversary of a publisher who has built one of the most powerful lists of poetry, criticism, fiction in this quarter-century

Publishers of

Edgar Bowers, Alvaro Cardona-Hine, J. V. Cunningham, Elizabeth Daryush, Donald F. Drummond, Vardis Fisher, N. V. M. Gonzalez, Lindley Williams Hubbell, Maude Hutchins, Janet Lewis, Edward Loomis, Frederick Manfred, Thomas McGrath, Samuel French Morse, Anais Nin, James Schevill, Harvey Shapiro, Alan Stephens, Allen Tate, Frank Waters, Yvor Winters famous Swallow Checklists original Poets in Swallow Paperbooks original Fiction in Swallow Paperbooks New Poetry Series and Sage Books (sub-imprint publishing significant books of all types about the American West and Southwest)

ALAN SWALLOW
2679 So. York, Denver, Colo. 80210

The International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union

Is proud to join in this salute to the Nation honoring:

Ten Decades of Honest Journalism and Courageous Commentary

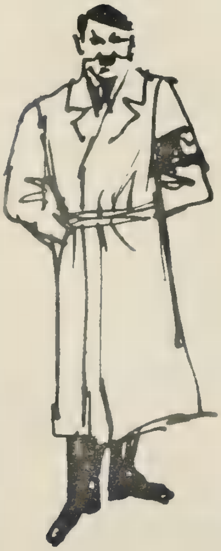
The ILWU continues to seek through collective strength, social planning and community action to build a GREATER SOCIETY—in which mankind will live in a peaceful, disarmed world; and the largest share of the advances of the machine age will work for those who work for a living. A world in which civil rights and full liberty are shared by every race and creed and credo; in which each child has the right to an education to meet his every need, each youth a job and guaranteed income; each older person a creative and dignified retirement. This is what trade unionism is all about. Such are the realistic goals the Nation—and its current editor Carey McWilliams—have kept alive during its century. We are still a long way from finishing the job that must be accomplished.

HARRY BRIDGES	J. R. ROBERTSON	LOUIS GOLDBLATT
President	Vice President	Secretary-Treasurer

the hope that they are either competent or unprejudiced.

That was comparatively mild criticism, but The Nation had also published Ludwig Lewisohn's article on the May 10, 1933 burning in Berlin of about 20,000 "un-German" books. (William L. Shirer notes in The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich that the works of Thomas and Heinrich Mann, Albert Einstein, Erich Maria Remarque, Jack London, H. G. Wells, Freud, Proust, Zola and Gide were consumed in the bonfire. Paul Joseph Goebbels—Doctor of Philosophy—proclaimed: "The soul of the German people can again express itself. These flames not only illuminate the final end of an old era; they also light up the new.") Lewisohn observed that the Nazi crackdown on dangerous ideas had led to the banning of performances of Schiller's Don Carlos, a play whose whole point was exemplified in the cry to the Spanish king: "Sire, give us liberty of thought."

Richard Neuberger, the future United States Senator from Oregon, who in 1933 was beginning a journalistic career, published in the October 4 Nation a long article on Hitler's "New Germany." And at the beginning of 1934, The Nation's Honor Roll for the previous year included Calvin B. Hoover and Edgar Ansel Mowrer, authors respectively of Germany Enters the Third Reich and Germany Sets the Clock Back; Arthur Garfield Hays, the New York attorney who had attempted to secure just treatment for the defendants in the Reichstag fire trial; and Alvin S. Johnson of the New School for Social Research, who had brought ousted German professors to the United States and established them as the staff of a University in Exile.



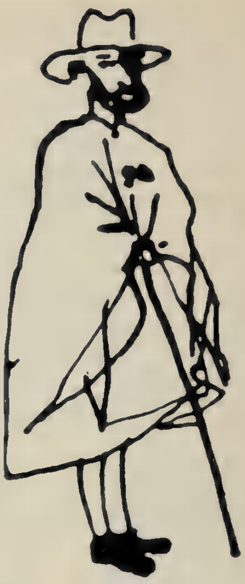
Villard, hoping against hope even after the Nazi blood purge of June 30, 1934, wrote in the August 1 Nation that he did not believe the German people would in the long run stand for the likes of Hitler. But the Nazis had now consolidated a regime against which the animadversions of humane men had virtually no effect. The failure of the League of Nations to take effective action against Japan after its Manchurian aggression, and the League's inability to enforce economic sanctions against Italy during Mussolini's war on Ethiopia, greatly encouraged Hitler. The Nazi dictator was certainly aware that many people in England, France and the United States felt as Villard did in an article about the League and the Italian aggression against Ethiopia:

> . . . . I feel that the nations involved are more than justified if they attempt now, even at the risk of war, to find a substitute for it in the economic boycott, in measures short of war provided they go into the undertaking with the determination that they will refuse to be drawn into actual hostilities even in the face of overt attack.

In other words: apply economic sanctions against Mussolini, but don't fight back if he then makes war on you. Did "the nations involved" include the United States? Villard equivocated here; The Nation's editors, on the other hand, did clearly refer to American responsibility in an editorial of January 1, 1936. Blaming the United States as well as Britain and France for not acting collectively to stop Italy, The Nation said:

> The coming weeks will test not only the League's ability to maintain the principles of collective action in the face of heavy pecuniary losses for each of the member nations, but also America's sincerity in declaring that it desires to avert war.

This was an "advanced" position, for the Neutrality Act had been passed in 1935, and was to be amended in February, 1936, to prohibit the granting of loans to belligerents. The mood of Congress was much more like Villard's than like that of The Nation's editorial board.



THE NAZIS' MOVE IN March, 1936, to remilitarize the Rhineland, in contravention of the Locarno Pact, was met by The Nation with another plea for the imposition of sanctions against Mussolini: this would seem "the surest way" to discourage Hitler from launching his widely heralded drive toward the Soviet Ukraine. Even the United States, said the journal, would probably throw its influence behind a League that took its obligations seriously. Here again the editors were advocating a much more vigorous policy than was Villard, who published in The Nation of April 1 an obfuscatory article in which he said:

> I hear it said, it is easy to criticize, but what would you do. Fortunately, I am not compelled to decide. But I do know this, that the time has come for the League and the former Allies to act with great vigor, with the same daring and aggressiveness with which Hitler has acted. They can at least match his flagrant defiance of the public opinion of the world by some plain truths as to just how far they will permit him to go before, in self-defense, they decide to put on sanctions, to send Germany to Coventry.

That is, the League might eventually have to say to Hitler, in Justice Shal-ow's words, "Well, the truth is, . . . ou live in great infamy."

It could be replied in defense of illard that if moral force and eco-omic sanctions had been steadily pplied by the League of Nations itler would never have begun his ilitary adventure. But in 1936 the orld was faced with a fait accompli, nd Hitler was poised for his drive to he East. The Nazi dictator was not imply a Father Coughlin—against hose anti-Semitism, incidentally, Vil-ard spoke out vigorously and well.

F THE CONTRADICTIONS of Oswald arrison Villard, who wanted to re-ist evil but not beyond a certain oint, were evident in his reactions o the Fascist menace, the ethical di-emma of the pragmatic liberals was anifest in their own equivocations n the Moscow trials. The liberals nd radicals of THE NATION and oth-r journals who more or less excused he travesty of judicial process during he mid-thirties had become sym-athetic to Soviet Russia in the first lace because of the apparently hu-ane promise of the Bolshevik Revo-ution. The cruelties of the Revolu-ion and the Civil War seemed com-arable to those of the French Revo-ution, which had not been a pleasant arty. Then, during the twenties, ith "reaction" rampant in the United tates, the Soviet Union seemed to any people the marching wing of he Progressive movement. Hitler's ise to power, and the thuggery of his rown-shirts, made the Communist all for a united front sound like an lementary counsel of survival. Many ro-Soviet Americans took the posi-ion, with regard to the Soviets' denial of civil liberties, that Roger Baldwin did in an exchange of letters with Joseph Wood Krutch. Krutch, a member of the NATION board of editors, joined the American Civil Liberties Union, but declared in a note accompanying his membership dues that he "would be happier if I were convinced that the majority of members really believed in civil liberties as such. I wonder if Roger Baldwin does?" Elmer Rice, to whom Krutch's note was addressed, turned it over to Baldwin, who a few days later replied that he did "believe in applying without discrimination the right to carry on any propaganda whatever without interference, regardless of the political or economic philosophy involved." He went on to say that his economic views were "left," and that he could therefore support the Soviet dictatorship, "which tolerates no civil liberties." While he opposed dictatorship in principle, > the Soviet Union has already achieved economic liberties far greater than exist elsewhere in the world. In the long run the only ground on which liberty can be securely based is economic.

In another letter, replying to Krutch's response that "free criticism is the only thing which could possibly prevent any dictatorship or bureaucracy from becoming completely corrupt," Baldwin said that he could tolerate the terrorism and highly concentrated political power of the Soviet regime "only as preferable to the concentration of power in capitalist countries." THE NATION, in January, 1938, publishing Krutch's correspondence with Rice and Baldwin, described the letters as "an interesting, if casual, commentary on a problem of immediate importance in a period of social unrest." Krutch thought the matter much more significant. In More Lives Than One (1962), the autobiography in which he reprinted the correspondence, the former editor and drama critic of THE NATION indicated that he thought some of his NATION colleagues as well as Roger Baldwin had accepted "double standards, and also double talk." Krutch noted too that in December, 1961, Baldwin had written:

> Both events and experience long ago brought me to reject the views I expressed in these letters in 1934. They were the product in part of fears aroused by the rise of the Nazis, in part by the Marxist notions of working class forces as the base for greater freedom, and wishful thinking about the Russian revolution and the Soviet dictatorship.

THE NATION's comments on the trials in 1936 of Kamenev, Zinoviev and other members of an alleged conspiracy satisfied neither libertarians like Krutch nor The New Masses. When the trials began in August, Max Lerner pointed to an apparent contradiction between the new Soviet

Fp

NEW from The Free Press

NEW CAREERS FOR THE POOR

The Nonprofessional Revolution in Social Science

By Arthur Pearl and Frank Riessman

In practical, nonutopian terms, this book demonstrates how four to six million careers can be developed for subprofessionals in social work, teaching, nursing, etc. "Only with the inventive and creative social thinking of the kind found in NEW CAREERS FOR THE POOR can we hope to win the war against poverty."—Michael Harrington, author of The Other America

September 1965 $5.95

MEN OF IDEAS

A Sociologist's View

By Lewis A. Coser

A trenchant history of intellectual life, the conditions necessary to its existence, and the institutions around which it has formed. "Mr. Coser has a fine sense of history, a strong commitment to the contemporary, and a keen eye for the relevant . . ." —Joseph Epstein, The New Republic

March 1965 $6.95

AMERICAN NATIONAL SECURITY

A Reader in Theory and Policy

Edited by Morton Berkowitz and P. G. Bock

Focusing on the scope and substance of national security, these articles from leading political scientists, economists, sociologists, and others make a vital contribution to emerging theory in an important field.

January 1965 $9.95

THE INTELLIGENCE OF DEMOCRACY

Decision Making through Mutual Adjustment

By Charles E. Lindblom

The author argues persuasively that effective government does not necessarily require a relatively high degree of central control, that dispersion is quite consistent with rationality, and that fragmented decision making can be self-coordinating.

April 1965 $7.50

Available at your bookseller or directly from the publisher
THE FREE PRESS
A DIVISION OF THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10011

constitution, which Louis Fischer had described as inaugurating "a new era in Soviet civil liberties," and the "impression one gets of the implacable pursuit of the Trotskyites by the Stalin government." But on second thought, the editorial indicated, the contradiction was resolved: as far as economic security in Russia was concerned, the Constitution represented an accomplished fact; in the domain of civil liberties, however, the Constitution represented the goal toward which Soviet life was moving.

The tone of a Nation editorial of October 10, 1936, was quite different. "Strange trials," it called the proceedings in which sixteen men "repeated, confirmed, and seemed to revel in confessions of guilt." Like all the important political events preceding it, said the editorial, this one had been conducted in a manner foreign to democratic ideals of justice. The pretrial conduct of the government-controlled press had been particularly shocking. Trotsky, who had been accused at the trial of conspiring with the German Gestapo to bring about the assassination of Stalin and the overthrow of the regime, "was entitled to his day in court." The journal noted that partisans of Trotsky were trying to bring a court action in Norway, where he was now living, to defend him.

The New Masses concluded that The Nation was either plain dumb or a tool of the Trotskyites. Trotsky, it happens, had been reproached by the chief of the Norwegian Passport Office for contributing an article to The Nation about the "revolutionary" situation in France. In protesting against this reproach, Trotsky characterized The Nation as a "bourgeois-democratic" journal. This seems closer to the truth than The New Masses description.

ON JULY 17, 1936, SHORTLY after the capitulation of Ethiopia to Mussolini, Franco launched his "crusade" against the Spanish republic. The policy of Britain, France and the United States during the Spanish Civil War was to be defined in such terms as "neutrality," "embargo" and "nonintervention." Thus, the defense of the Republic against a Franco heavily aided by men and materiel from Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy, was left to Loyalists supported to some extent by Stalin, and helped by volunteers from various countries, many of whom crawled into Spain on their hands and knees. Within the Loyalist ranks, there was a bitter conflict between those who advocated a "Popular Front" with the Stalinists—Russia being the only great foreign power that was aiding the Government—and those who were in varying degrees hostile to the Stalinists. The anarchists and the Trotskyite P. O. U. M. party were violently opposed to the Popular Front, and the Socialist Party was split. A report from Spain by Henry Buckley that The Nation published early in October, 1936, described "Spain's War Cabinet" as including three right-wing Socialists—Prieto, Negrín and García—who stood much closer to the Republicans than to the Communists; three left-wing Socialists—Caballero (the popular Premier), del Vayo, and Galarza; and two Communists—Uribe and Hernandez. The Anarchists, said Buckley, were the only important group omitted, and he reported talk that they had not been able to agree among themselves on a representative. Buckley's further observation that this was a war government, not one designed to carry on a social revolution, is significant. Throughout the Civil War, the Stalinists in Spain were to pursue a relatively "conservative" social policy in order to solidify the Popular Front, while many of their left-wing opponents were to demand extensive social reforms.

The Nation received most of its Spanish Civil War reports from Louis Fischer, who had come to deplore Soviet domestic policy, but who still approved of Soviet foreign policy. Russia's help to the Loyalists, he later wrote, "was in sharp contrast with the stupid, scandalous pro-Franco behavior of the democracies." But the author added, in The God That Failed, that ultimately "the heads of the Loyalist government were convinced, on the basis of substantiated facts, that almost all the important military and civilian Soviet citizens who served so well in Spain were executed or exiled on their return home."

> On December 27 one of the planes of my squadron was brought down in the Teruel region—behind our lines. It had fallen very high, at about 2,000 meters above sea level, and snow covered the mountains. In this region there are very few villages; it was only after several hours that the peasants arrived and began constructing stretchers for the wounded and a coffin for the dead.
>
> When all was ready, the descent began. There were no roads, only mule paths. The old peasant women, who in this region almost all have sons in the militia, had decided to accompany the wounded But it was not only the peasant women. The entire populace followed behind us, coming single file down the narrow mountain path. At each one of the villages through which we passed the people were waiting; and each village, when the wounded had passed by, was emptied of its inhabitants. When we reached the first large settlement in the valley, there too the people stood waiting before the low walls of the Spanish town. They gazed in silence at the first wounded—those wounded in the legs; they were used to such things. But when those who had been wounded in the face were carried past—men with flat bandages where their noses should have been, their leather tunics still covered with coagulated blood—then the women and children began to cry. I raised my eyes; the file of peasants extended now from the heights of the mountain to its base—and it was the grandest image of fraternity I have ever encountered: those abandoned villages, that entire people following men wounded for their sake, men whom they had never seen before, descending like a procession out of ancient times, while their sobs, mounting in the great silence of the gorge, made a sound like the roar of an underground river.
>
> —André Malraux, The Nation, 1937

Anita Brenner, an American inte lectual who early in the 1930s h abandoned the Communist Party pos on, took issue in a letter to THE ATION (July 3, 1937) with the jour-al's account of an uprising in Cata-nia. Asserting that Fischer, on hose information THE NATION had lied, had apparently derived his ory from the Communist press, she rongly attacked his statement that e Anarchists and the P. O. U. M. ad sabotaged the war, and that they anted to collectivize small property.

he also quoted a Pravda statement
f December 17, 1936, that a purging
f Trotskyites and Anarcho-Syndicalt elements had begun in Catalonia.
he described the political situation n the anti-Franco side in terms of a onflict between a Republican-right ing-Socialist-Communist coalition nd a group consisting of left-wing ocialists, Anarcho-Syndicalists, and
. O. U. M. (It may be observed here hat Largo Caballero, a left-wing Soialist, had recently been replaced as remier by Juan Negrín, a moderate ocialist who was willing to cooperate ith the Communists, and that Del ayo—although a "left-wing Social-st"—also favored cooperation with hem, and served in the Negrín cabi-et as Foreign Minister.) Clearly sid-ng with the latter group, Anita Brener declared that nothing less than he Spanish revolution itself hung in he balance.

HE NATION SHOWED ITS traditional espect for opinions different from its wn by publishing sharp criticism uch as this; the journal's "Popular ront" point of view, however, reained unchanged. A November 13, 937, article by Maxwell Stewart bean by conceding that the recent ussian executions, political trials members of the "Trotskyite Center" were tried in January, 1937), and mass arrests had shocked the outside world; but Stewart then declared that while it was difficult to believe that all he persons convicted had been guily, foreigners had always tended to underestimate the depth of hatred that the former bourgeoisie had for the Soviets. Other countries too, said Stewart, had experienced difficulty in closing the gap between theory and practice in the sphere of individual rights. Clearly, the sympathetic attitude of THE NATION and many American liberals toward the Communists in Spain was an aspect of this Popular Front atmosphere. (When Ellery Sedgwick, editor of The Atlantic Monthly, returned from Europe to sing Franco's praises, few pro-Loyalist liberals were inclined to engage in debate on the relative merits of the Anarchists, the P. O. U. M., and the Communists.) One of the clearest symbolic expressions of American liberal sentiment during the Spanish Civil War was the generous response to THE NATION's appeal for contributions to send an ambulance to the Loyalist forces. On July 30, 1938, the journal announced that the fund had been over-subscribed and that the ambulance was on its way to Spain.

THE NATION also tried to secure military aid for the Loyalists through a repeal of the Embargo Act and a revision of the Neutrality Act as applied to Spain. But if THE NATION was in 1938 emphasizing more and more the need for collective security with teeth in it against Franco, Hitler and Mussolini, the American public was clearly not ready to renounce isolation. Neither were the governments or the people of Britain and France: in September, 1938 (having effected his Anschluss with Austria the previous March), Hitler obtained the Sudetenland at a conference to which neither Czechoslovakia nor Russia, which had offered aid to the Czechs under the terms of a 1935 treaty, was invited. THE NATION declared that Czechoslovakia was "the new Spain."

SINCE THE EARLIEST months of the Nazi regime, THE NATION had been urging the liberalization of American immigration laws to admit refugees from Nazi persecution. After the Nuremberg decrees of 1935 deprived the German Jews of civil rights, the journal commented very frequently on the sinister implications of the Nazis' "racial" policy. An article published in October, 1937, for example, declared bluntly that for the Jews of Germany the choice was between emigration and death. As the Nazis began to extend their domain beyond the borders of Germany, the problem of refugees became even more urgent. Yet Henry Pratt Fairchild, who was a liberal on issues other than immigration, wrote to the

THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS

By David Horowitz

Coming at a time of growing disillusionment with American foreign policy, this carefully documented study of the cold war challenges the basic assumptions on which our policy has been based since 1944. "He has understood the moving forces in the world as few have."—D. F. FLEMING. "An important book and a courageous one."—BERTRAND RUSSELL. 448 pp. $6.95

THE URBAN NATION: 1920-1960

By George E. Mowry

"This story of the growth of the American people from a semi-rural to a highly urbanized society is fascinating and absorbing.... A triumph of scholarly distillation and graceful writing."—ARTHUR S. LINK, Princeton University. This is the fifth volume in The Making of America series, General Editor, David Donald. 320 pp. $5.00

MAYAKOVSKY

Translated and edited by Herbert Marshall

Whether its subject is love, Lenin, or bureaucracy, the poetry of Vladimir Mayakovsky, "laureate of the Revolution," is probably the greatest to come out of Russia in modern times. This beautifully translated collection, the most extensive in English, includes 38 pages of drawings by the poet, 12 in color. Introduction by Sir Maurice Bowra. 432 pp. $10.00

THE PEACE CORPS: A Pictorial History

Edited by Aaron J. Ezickson

Introduction by Sargent Shriver

A magnificent book of text and pictures about the peaceful Americans at work. This beautiful volume—with over 325 photographs of Volunteers and the Asians, Africans, and South Americans they work and live with—speaks eloquently of the spirit which in some areas is changing "Yankee go home" to "Send us more Peace Corps Volunteers." 8½ x 11 176 pp. $6.95

At your bookstore

HILL & WANG

141 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10010

editors of The Nation on October 26, 1938—after both the Anschluss and the Munich pact—to ask for an explanation of the following comment in the October 22 issue:

> Surely a nation of 130 million could absorb two or three times this number [23,500] without economic disaster.

What, asked Fairchild, did The Nation mean by "absorb?"

> Do you mean to add a certain number of refugees to the ten or twelve million American residents already unemployed or on relief rolls? If so, why not say so plainly?

The Nation replied to Fairchild, in a letter dated November 2, that of course even a "reasonable number of refugees" admitted to the United States would experience problems in finding jobs.

> A certain proportion, it is true, might find its way to the relief rolls. But the cost of supporting a few thousand refugees from persecution ought not to overwhelm us even in a time of economic distress: at least . . . we are able as a nation to carry this burden better than most of the other countries into which the refugees have been moving. This does not mean that an effort should not be made to find places of refuge where economic opportunities would be greater and the pressure of unemployment less.

This letter set forth an agonizing problem in clear terms. Certainly it is a human responsibility either to relieve suffering directly or to make "an effort . . . to find places of refuge" for persecuted people. Yet in spite of the consequences of the failure of the United States and European countries to admit more than a small number of refugees, the Fairchild attitude persists. It is exemplified by the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952, and it has been steadily combated by The Nation.

> Adolph Hitler has been in complete control of the Reich only since March 5, but in this short time he has created a new Germany—a Germany in which freedom and democracy dare not even ask to live. His uniformed followers terrorize the few citizens who have the courage to protest against persecution and repression and thousands of others whose only fault is that they belong to a race or follow a calling which is displeasing to the dictator and his party. The police stand by, indifferent or powerless, while members of the Hitler storm-battalions vent their rage against Jews or Communists or liberals. . . . Jews are subject not only to physical violence; many thousands face a more cruel fate through loss of their right to follow certain trades and professions. A strong movement is on foot to bar Jewish lawyers from the courts; Jewish professors are driven from their classrooms; Jewish actors are prevented from appearing; famous Jewish conductors are refused a hearing. Before this terror large numbers of Germans are fleeing across the borders into Austria, Poland, and Switzerland, but only those of independent means and moderate views are sure of escape. Communists are turned back and Jews find no welcome in the countries to the east. . . .
>
> Editorial, The Nation, 1933

Freda Kirchwey, who since January, 1936, had shared the editorship of The Nation with Max Lerner, became editor-in-chief with the issue of September 24, 1938. Lerner, the successor of Raymond Gram Swing on The Nation's editorial board, had been responsible for the front of the book—the editorial paragraphs and unsigned editorial articles; Freda Kirchwey had edited the signed articles in the middle of the magazine; and Joseph Wood Krutch, together with Margaret Marshall, had edited the literature and art section. In a foreword to It is Later Than You Think, a book he published shortly after leaving The Nation, Lerner declared:

> The great political task of our generation is the task of giving economic content to democracy and of keeping power in a collectivism from becoming tyrannical. . . . If there is any passion in this book, it is the passion for making democracy militant enough and collectivism democratic enough to survive.

Most of The Nation editors in 1938 would probably have used similar words to describe their political co mitment. Robert Bendiner, who came managing editor in Janua 1938, observed in a letter discussin possible Nation piece on the Social Party, that "The Nation has years been closer to the Sociali than to any other single group." C tainly the journal's domestic progr had been similar to that of Norm Thomas; Thomas, however, was vocating during the late thirties isolationist foreign policy, and dri ing (like Villard) into an uncomfo able alliance with America Firste
The Nation, on the other hand, came increasingly insistent af Munich on the need for a stro stand by the western democracies a Russia against the emboldened Naz
But England, France and the Unit States were still chiefly concerned avoid war, and in August, 193 Molotov—who several months e lier had taken the place of Maxi Litvinov, apostle of collective sec ity, as Soviet Foreign Minister-signed the Non-Aggression Pact wi Ribbentrop. The subsequent invasi of Poland by the Nazis—and th sharing of the spoils with the Sovi —followed by the Russian invasi of Finland, inspired Robert Bendi to write a mordant "Glossary 1940," which was published in t February 10 (Seventy-Fifth An versary) issue of The Nation. E plaining "Imperialism," Bendi said:

> Nothing that statesmen do lifts th > to quite the same evangelical pit > as the well-planned plundering > some lesser state. The legions of > Caesars came, saw, and conque > in the name of the Pax Roma > Britain and France manfully took > the white man's burden of filchi > half the world's wealth from help > natives. We "civilized 'em with > Krag" in the Philippines and "bur > ed 'em off" in the name of go > roads and hygiene in Haiti and Sa > Domingo. Mussolini set Ethiopia > fire and hanged its leaders so tha > could share in the grandeur that > Rome's. The Mikado's troops mas > cred several million Chinese stric > out of "friendship." And the R > Army has been dropping therm > bombs from Helsinki to Petsamo > way of what Pravda calls "frater > assistance to the Finnish peopl > Until recently the Germans presen > a refreshing contrast. With no mo > reputation to defend, they were artlessly predatory. Deutschland über Alles, Aryan supremacy, divine right to rule, even Lebensraum, were all the honest language of the jungle. . . . Now all that is changed. . . . Henceforth when Göring's aces bomb open cities, when SS men shoot Czech students and flog Polish Jews, they will have only one thought in mind: the building of a Socialist Europe.

endiner also took note of the Soiets' denunciation of the Finns as semi-Fascists."

> The understanding Soviets admit that the Nazis do have droll customs, but it would be the grossest folly . . . to deal with them forcefully. . . . But these Finns with their cooperatives and their elected governments. Semi-Fascists, that's what they are, and fire and sword aren't good enough for them. There ought to be a League Against War and Semi-Fascism. Probably there will be.

mbrose Bierce was not more skillilly ironic in his Devil's Dictionary.

HE NATION DID NOT neglect doiestic matters during this period. he journal's "Honor Roll" for 1939 raised Steinbeck for dramatizing, in he Grapes of Wrath, and Carey Mcilliams for documenting, in Factoes in the Field, the desperate plight the migratory farm worker in Caliornia. The Roll also included both judge of the Federal District Court Baltimore, for his decision requirg the payment of the same wages to egro teachers as to white, and the AACP attorneys who had argued e case. During the summer of 1940, nathan Daniels, editor of the liberal aleigh News and Observer began ntributing a column to THE NATION lled "A Native at Large." His first iece began:

> In Chapel Hill, which is a North Carolina village as well as the University of North Carolina's town, Paul Green and Richard Wright work at one table dramatizing Wright's Native Son for production by Orson Welles this fall. . . . Green is a Southerner of white, Southern-farmer stock. Wright wrote his grim Chicago story to show the effects on a Negro of the social and economic problems confronting his race. Green, rejecting Hollywood, has remained in his South, where among white men and Negroes those problems begin.

During the grim summer of 1940, after Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium and France had fallen to the Nazis, THE NATION published a series of articles by Max Lerner under the heading, "The War as Revolution." Lerner cited Rauschning's term, "the revolution of nihilism," to describe the Nazis' organization of destructive forces, and then tried to explain the significance of the movement. One of the conclusions Lerner drew was that the nation-state had failed as an economic unit. He predicted that after the war, small nations > will become economic satellites of large and powerful empires, or will have to combine with other small nations, not into a diplomatic bloc, but into a working economic and administrative community.

Lerner was saying that, in effect, Hitler's "New Order" constituted a hideous version of the continental or even hemispheric economies that the future was bound to bring.

Another point made by Lerner, that the most important war going on was the one "between the Fascist and the democrat in every one of us," is interesting in the light of a discussion in THE NATION'S pages between Freda Kirchwey and one of the associate editors, Maxwell Stewart. Kirchwey, who was obviously expressing the view held by nearly everyone in THE NATION offices, asserted that the United States had no satisfactory alternative to universal military service. We had to face the possibility that Britain (then standing alone against the Nazis) might be defeated, and Kirchwey asserted there were fewer dangers of reactionary control in a conscript army than in a professional one. Maxwell Stewart's argument that we needed no large army, and that universal military service would create a dangerous mentality, was apparently based largely on memories of World War I. Freda Kirchwey, aware of the memories, declared in her article that "the Left . . . must make the struggle against Hitler an honest fight for the faith it lives by." Some weeks later, with the passage of the Selective Training and Service Act, the United States adopted, as it never had before, peace-time conscription. To Oswald Garrison Villard, this meant the use of Fascist

MR PRESS MONTHLY REVIEW PRESS

announces publication of

THE SOCIALIST REGISTER, 1965

Edited by

Ralph Miliband & John Saville

second of a series of annual volumes analyzing contemporary issues and ideas

Partial list of authors:

ISAAC DEUTSCHER
K. S. KAROL
GEORGE LUKACS
HARRY MAGDOFF
SEAN O'CASEY

Publication Price: $6

SPECIAL

Both 1964 & 1965 vols. only $8

Send orders with payment to:

MONTHLY REVIEW PRESS
333 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK 10014

Good books from Vanderbilt

CHINESE COMMUNIST EDUCATION
Records of the First Decade
Edited by Stewart Fraser $10.00

THE LAST HERO
And Other Poems
by Louis Coxe $4.00

MAN IN ESTRANGEMENT Comparison of the Thought of Paul Tillich and Erich Fromm Oct
by Guyton B. Hammond $5.00

WATER RESOURCE INVESTMENT AND THE PUBLIC INTEREST
by Robert H. Haveman Nov
Foreword by Senator Proxmire $6.00

DONALD DAVIDSON
An Essay and a Bibliography
by Thomas Daniel Young and Dec
M. Thomas Inge $4.00

VANDERBILT
University Press
Nashville • Tennessee
37203

methods to fight fascism. To the editors of The Nation in 1940, it seemed the only way, however dangerous to "the democrat in every one of us," to save our democracy from madmen.

One of the points most persistently made in The Nation after the fall of France in June, 1940, was that the United States should officially recognize De Gaulle's Free French movement, and end all diplomatic connections with the Vichy regime. In one of many articles criticizing our recognition policy, Freda Kirchwey wrote in September, 1941, that if the Nazi order were established in France the responsibility would rest largely on our shoulders. We had refused to extend any sort of public recognition to De Gaulle "even as the head of the Free French forces fighting Hitler." On the contrary, we were arranging to send oil to Madagascar, one of Vichy's colonial outposts.

Louis Fischer, who had become completely disenchanted with Stalin's regime after its pact with the Nazis, called in strong moral terms in April, 1942, for a severance of our relations with Vichy: "America must have a clean record toward France. It must not be recorded that we helped Laval sell out France to Hitler." The journal bitterly criticized the State Department for the decision to cooperate with Admiral Darlan rather than with the Free French during the invasion of North Africa; and Freda Kirchwey declared that with few exceptions—she named Edward R. Murrow, Walter Lippmann, Dorothy Thompson—American liberals had shamefully adopted the view "that military expediency and political wisdom are identical." In January, 1945, a few months after the United States had finally recognized De Gaulle's government, The Nation published an article by Jules Moch, a member of De Gaulle's Cabinet. Moch declared that the State Department's misunderstanding of French psychology had proved costly during the war. The Department > placed its money on Darlan and Giraud, and lost; it bet against De Gaulle and lost again. It believed that there would be a split between France and the Committees of National Liberation set up in London and Algiers; it was wrong. It rectified its position finally by giving up the idea of establishing an AMG in France which would have been catastrophic for Franco-American friendship, and recognizing De Gaulle's provisional government.

At a dinner in February, 1944, celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of her association with The Nation, Freda Kirchwey declared that the journal would work for a "New Deal for the world" that was "more far-reaching and consistent than our own faltering New Deal." The Nation had supported Roosevelt for a third term, and was to support him for a fourth, but the specific proposals Freda Kirchwey made at this dinner indicated how great a gap there was between the weekly and the President. In the domain of foreign policy, Freda Kirchwey urged that the United States break off relations with Fascist Spain, and do everything possible to favor the reestablishment of the Spanish Republic: only in this way, she maintained, could Spain be brought into the Allied coalition. She called for American support for free people's movements in every occupied country; for open doors to every refugee able to escape from Europe; for united support by the Allies for the development of a Jewish national homeland in Palestine; and for the development of closer relations between the United States and those Latin American countries which had free governments. In the area of domestic policy, she urged government planning for expanded production and full employment after the war, as well as for large-scale housing projects, and public power and farm projects. She also called for the passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill to extend Social Security benefits and to guarantee adequate medical care to all. Other items on her domestic program were: full representation of labor in all government departments and agencies; the abolition of "such obviously Fascist devices" as the Dies, Kerr, and Smith committees; the elimination of every form of legal discrimination, political or economic, against any racial or religious group, and the initiation of a deliberate program of education throughout the United States designed to overcome prejudice.

This program indicated the gener direction of Nation policy during tl postwar years, but the atmosphe of the cold war, and the expend tures for it during the late forties ar the fifties, prevented, even if it ha otherwise been possible, the fulfil ment of the domestic portion of tl program; and while the establishme of the state of Israel answered the ca for a Jewish national homeland, tl United States made no particul effort to do any of the other thin which The Nation's editor ha recommended.

At the end of the war, Th Nation vigorously supported tl United Nations, but declared, tv months after the bombing of Hir shima and Nagasaki, that the atom bomb had made imperative the esta lishment of a world government. order for this to happen, "psych logical disarmament between tl United States and Russia" was nece sary. The United States, said Th Nation, was "rightly apprehensi about the increasing intransigence Russia when any issue affecting Ea ern Europe is raised," but we ou selves had vast plans for milita bases in the Pacific. The only ro to peace was an agreement wherel each side "would have to recogni that only through the sacrifice particular and unilateral schemes security can a genuine system mutual trust be achieved."

Since the early 1940s J. Alvar Del Vayo, former Foreign Minist of the Spanish republic, had edit a "Political War Section" of t weekly. After the war, he becan European editor, then foreign edit and also became the subject of inten controversy at The Nation a among Nation readers. Del Va was a left-wing Socialist who duri the Civil War had fallen out w members of the Spanish Social Party over the question of coope tion with the Communists. In book, The Last Optimist (1950) I Vayo said:

> I have never made any secret of sympathies for the Russian Revo tion; . . . in the Socialist party have advocated unity of action w the Communists against Fascist reactionary attempts to seize pow

Del Vayo was not completely uncritical of the Communists in his NATION articles; discussing the European Socialists in December, 1946, he said that they must find a way to work with the Communists "without being swallowed up or dominated by them," and that the "French masses dislike many aspects of Soviet foreign policy." But, just as American "cold warriors" during the late forties and early fifties exhibited a strong tendency to blame all of the world's ills on the Communists abroad or in the United States, so Del Vayo was inclined to hold American foreign policy chiefly responsible for threats to world peace. Certainly the "hawks" have played a dangerous role in the United States since the end of World War II; Walter Lippmann recently recalled in his syndicated newspaper column that back in the late 1940s > when the cold war had begun, when Stalin was at his worst, I was invited to lunch in the Pentagon with a high official. The object of the lunch was to persuade me to write articles in favor of launching a preventive war against the Soviet Union.

Lippmann then observed that he did not write the articles, > but the luncheon made a profound impression on me, particularly in the years which have followed during which the Soviet Union has emerged from Stalinism.

One may safely guess that there were few advocates of preventive war among readers of THE NATION. But many reasonable readers, who were far from taking what E. L. Godkin called the "pugilistic view" of international relations, found Del Vayo too much inclined to give the Russians the benefit of every doubt. His was not the only NATION voice on foreign affairs, and the Eighty-Fifth Anniversary issue of the journal, dated December 16, 1950, contained twenty-five articles expressing diverse views on the subject, "Peace with Russia: Can it be Negotiated?" H. Stuart Hughes's essay accepted the necessity of the "containment" policy, but declared that containment of Russia did not exclude the possibility of negotiation:

> A sensible foreign policy can be based on the recognition that Communists—on both sides of the iron curtain—have real and pressing reasons for being what they are.

Hans Morgenthau, Isaac Deutscher, R. H. S. Crossman, and Claude Bourdet were among the contributors to this symposium, which raised a question that was widely considered taboo in the America of 1950. Neither the Korean war nor the special "anti-communism" of Senator Joe McCarthy made the time propitious for talk of peace.

IN THE MONTH of February, 1951, Clement Greenberg, who had been regular art critic for THE NATION between 1943 and 1949, sent to The New Leader, a Socialist weekly, a letter which he had addressed to THE NATION, and which Freda Kirchwey had refused to publish. The letter, published by The New Leader in its issue of March 19, charged that Del Vayo's column was conducted in such a way as to parallel the Soviet propaganda line and that THE NATION was, in effect, "committed" to the service of the Soviet government. THE NATION immediately instituted a libel suit, as it had warned The New Leader it would if the Greenberg letter were published, against both Greenberg and The New Leader. In its issue of March 31, THE NATION stated that it had not published the Greenberg letter because the statements it contained were clearly false and defamatory; a periodical has a public as well as a private duty, said THE NATION, not to spread untrue and malicious statements.

In September, 1955, the suit was finally settled without cost to any party, on the following basis: THE NATION publicly stated that the Greenberg letter had "contained improper charges and allegations beyond the area of legitimate discussion and dissemination"; The New Leader publicly said that it had not intended to commit an act of defamation, but "according to their conception of free journalistic discussion, to express their vigorous objection to the contents of the Del Vayo column in THE NATION."

Del Vayo remained Foreign Editor of THE NATION until 1955, when he retired from that position and became European correspondent of the week-

NEW DIRECTIONS
BOOKS

Cocteau

THE INFERNAL MACHINE & OTHER PLAYS by Jean Cocteau. Orpheus, Knights of the Round Table, Oedipus Rex, others. $6.50

Levertov

O TASTE AND SEE by Denise Levertov. Recent poems by The Nation's poetry editor. $3.00; Paperbook, $1.50

Lorca

FIVE PLAYS: Comedies and Tragicomedies. The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife, Don Perlimplín, The Billy-Club Puppets, Doña Rosita the Spinster, The Butterfly's Evil Spell by Federico García Lorca. $4.95

Merton

GANDHI ON NON-VIOLENCE: Selected Texts from "Non-Violence in Peace and War," edited, with an introduction, by Thomas Merton. Paperbook, $1.50

Montale

SELECTED POEMS of Eugenio Montale. Bilingual edition of Italy's major modern poet, edited, with an introduction, by Glauco Cambon. $5.00; Paperbook, $1.75

Pound

A LUME SPENTO and Other Early Poems by Ezra Pound. Rare, and some recently discovered, poetry from Pound's "Venetian period" (1908). Illustrated. $5.00

Pound & Spann

CONFUCIUS TO CUMMINGS edited by Ezra Pound and Marcella Spann. An anthology of world poetry. $6.75; Paperbook, $2.75

Thomas

DYLAN THOMAS'S CHOICE edited by Ralph Maud and Aneirin Talfan Davies. An anthology of poetry spoken by Dylan Thomas. Boxed gift edition. $5.00

Send for free complete catalog.

NEW DIRECTIONS
333-6 AVE., N. Y. 10014

ly. At present, THE NATION's European correspondent is Alexander Werth, who has been contributing regularly to the journal for many years.

There was disagreement among NATION readers as to whether or not the journal should have published and replied to the Greenberg letter. But on another controversial issue the journal had widespread public support. In July, 1948, THE NATION was banned in the public schools of New York City; this move followed the publication in 1947 and 1948 of articles by Paul Blanshard that sharply criticized various policies of the Roman Catholic Church. Among those who opposed the ban there were people who objected on various grounds to what Blanshard had said or to the way in which he had said it, but who insisted that the basic issue was the right of freedom of inquiry. Archibald MacLeish became chairman of an Ad Hoc Committee to Fight the Ban, whose members included Henry Seidel Canby, Lewis Gannett, Christopher LaFarge, Herbert H. Lehman, G. Bromley Oxnam, Eleanor Roosevelt, and J. Raymond Walsh. Organizations that joined in the fight included the American Civil Liberties Union, the Authors League, the Teachers' Union, and the Teachers' Guild. While the efforts of an impressive segment of the American intellectual and cultural community were not quickly crowned with success, the ban was finally lifted—in January, 1963.

IN ADDITION TO pressing for an end to the cold war, and supporting the United Nations against international chaos, THE NATION has given particular attention since 1945 to the problems of civil liberties, civil rights, and automation. The weekly praised Truman in 1948 for his civil rights stand (it had praised him in 1947 for his veto of the Taft-Hartley Labor Law), but opposed his loyalty program—which it later looked upon as pre-McCarthyism. THE NATION endorsed no Presidential candidate in 1948; Freda Kirchwey observed in a January editorial that if Henry Wallace were to make a strong run he would probably send a reactionary Republican to the White House and throw several good progressives out of Congress. She also noted that labor was not supporting Wallace, and that a third-party movement would fall into the hands of the Communists, "whose decisions are controlled by interests unrelated to the needs and desires of Henry Wallace's 'common man'. . . ."

In June, 1950, a few months after McCarthy had launched his attack on the State Department, the editor of THE NATION wrote of "The McCarthy Blight":

> Perhaps Senator McCarthy is teaching us a necessary lesson. As a people we have been innocent long enough, regarding as fantastic the notion that we, like Germans or Russians or Argentines, could be governed by the power of slander and denunciation. Today, the informer, having been used too freely by the law and so given audience and respectability, is turning on the law, his unproved charges spread on the record countered only by the denials even from high officials of the government itself.

THE NATION endorsed Stevenson for President in 1952, expressing confidence in his essential democracy and liberalism, but also voicing concern over what it considered his exaggeration of the danger of communism in America. Eisenhower, of whom THE NATION was to have a better opinion in the late fifties, was strongly criticized for his endorsement of Senators McCarthy and Jenner.

Early in December, 1952, THE NATION published an editorial called "Anti-Semitism and Power Politics," in which it commented both on the purge of former leaders of the Czech Communist Party, and on the sentencing to death of the convicted spies, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg:

> The Rosenbergs were found guilty of espionage, not treason, and the offense was committed at a time when Russia was an ally in World War II. Even in treason cases the death penalty has been imposed only twice by our civilian courts; it has never been imposed in espionage cases. The Rosenbergs are entitled to mercy as individuals. . . . But none of these considerations justifies in any way the attempt of the Communist Party to exploit the issue of anti-Semitism in the Rosenberg trial while remaining silent about its use as an instrument of Soviet policy at Prague. For such tactics we have only contempt. The "Great Zionist Conspiracy" unveil at Prague will not find many take in this country, unless it be amo the more gullible followers of Gera L. K. Smith. . . .

In 1954, the Supreme Court su plied what Carey McWilliams calle a "fine antidote to the blight of M Carthyism and kindred fevers"—t decision outlawing segregation American public education. Wi pride and humor, McWilliams d clared:

> The decision was especially welcon at this time since it enabled us an our friends abroad for the first tin in some years to be equally and s multaneously enthusiastic about a important announcement from Wasl ington.

But THE NATION found in Apri 1956, that the civil rights progra presented to the Congress by Eise hower was less comprehensive tha the one Truman had recommende in February, 1948.

While continuing throughout th late fifties and early sixties to su port the drive for civil rights in a parts of the country, THE NATION h also attempted to come to grips wit the complex problem of automatio An article in April, 1955, suggeste a shorter work week, rather than guaranteed annual wage, as a dire answer to automation. In 1958, th British scientist Bronowski, lookin forward to the year 2000, predicte that all the repetitive tasks of industr would be taken over by machines. "W simply waste our time," he said, " we oppose this change; it is as inev table as the year 2000 itself—an just as neutral."

The facts are neutral; the value that are to govern them, as Bronows was indicating, will be determined b men. THE NATION attempted, durin the post-war years, to point us towar future that will be a time for men nd not, in Malraux's words, "a time contempt."

VII

Literature and Ideas: 1933-1955

HE NATION SAID AFTER Thorstein eblen's death in August, 1929, that en schoolboys now knew about onspicuous consumption" and the her ideas set forth in The Theory of e Leisure Class. The St. Louis soalites who in the winter of 1931 ayed at being poor by holding a overty ball" probably did not innd to illustrate Veblen's thesis. But eir party, of which THE NATION ve a brief account, must have conituted for many thinking people one ore sign of social rot. Some of these eople had even been able to agree ith Michael Gold's attack on Thornton Wilder's fiction: "Where are the cotton mills, and the murder of Ella May and her songs? Where are the child slaves of the beet fields? Where are the stockbroker suicides, the labor racketeers or the passion and death of the coal miners?" The New Republic, which in October, 1930, published this denunciation by the editor of The New Masses, received so many letters about it that after several months it called off the controversy "on account of darkness." Henry Hazlitt's counterattack on Gold in the November 26, 1930, NATION declared:

> Hardly have we emerged from a wave of humanist criticism, which rated a work of fiction low or high in direct relation to the amount of will-to-refrain exhibited by its hero, than we are hit by a wave of Communist criticism, which hoots or hails a work of art in proportion as it seems to oppose, ignore, or support the opinions of a German economist who died in 1883.

Hazlitt asserted that Gold's proletarian literary standard would collapse the reputations of Goethe, Shakespeare, Racine, Sophocles, Aeschylus and Homer.

A year and a half later, Edmund Wilson wrote in The New Republic that the Gold-Wilder case marked the eruption of the Marxist issue out of radical literary circles into the field of general criticism. "It has now become plain," he said, "that the economic crisis is to be accompanied by a literary one."

The nostalgia of the American business community for the "never-never land" of pure laissez faire is doubly ironic. In the first place, the business community sought, as long as it could, to bend political power to its ends, violating every principle of free enterprise. The tariff policy of the Republican Party is certainly not in harmony with the principles of laissez faire; nor were such devices as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which, originally conceived in the Hoover era, was designed to bail out some of the weakest units of American business. Protests rose against the use of political power in economic life when the masses began to use it to broaden their economic opportunities, to check the centralization of economic power, and to assure basic economic security. The American business community tried desperately to prove the truth of the Marxist theory that political power is always the slave of the dominant economic power. The theory was refuted through the discovery by the common people that their political power could be used to redress economic imbalances.

—Reinhold Niebuhr,
The Nation, 1950

DURING THE 1930s, the terms of intellectual discussion tended to be "commitment" rather than—as in the 1920s—"criticism," "order" rather than "freedom," "group" or "collective" rather than "individual." Few intellectuals joined the Communist Party, but many felt obliged to define their relation to it. Granville Hicks charged in The New Masses in 1937 that some four years previously the book-review section of THE NATION had seceded from the rest of the magazine, and had remained in rebellion. THE NATION said in reply that it was not divided, and it called "unjustified" Hicks's charge "that we have deliberately selected anti-Communist reviewers" for books dealing with Communist policy or with Soviet Rus-

BOOKS FROM TEXAS

Communism in Mexico
A Study in Political Frustration

By Karl M. Schmitt. An examination of the unsuccessful efforts over the past 35 years to create a Soviet-style society in the United States' nearest neighbor to the south. $6.00.

Memoirs of Pancho Villa

By Martín Luis Guzmán. Translated by Virginia Taylor. The exciting narrative of a lonely, hungry, rebellious youth who became the scourge of the Mexican Revolution, the leader of thousands of men, and a hero to the masses. Illustrated. $8.50.

Essays in the Philosophy of History

By R. G. Collingwood. Edited with an Introduction by William Debbins. Eight essays by a distinguished philosopher and historian who tried throughout his life to bring about a rapprochement between philosophy and history. $5.00.

Innocence and Power
Individualism in Twentieth-Century America

Edited with an Introduction by Gordon Mills. A discussion by seven distinguished scholars representing the disciplines of anthropology, economics, government, history, literature, and philosophy. $4.75.

Other Inquisitions

By Jorge Luis Borges. Translated by Ruth L. C. Simms. Essays covering an extensive range of topics by a man who is considered Argentina's outstanding contemporary writer. $4.75.

University of Texas Press
Austin, Texas 78712

sia. “We have tried,” said The Nation, > to avoid obviously partisan reviewers, and this means that we have deliberately chosen non-Communists to review such books. What earthly end could be gained by inviting “a party spokesman,” as Mr. Hicks proposes, to review books on communism or allied subjects? . . . “Spokesmen” are not critics. . . . The fact is, the area of free criticism is narrowing around our feet. Those who do not write as spokesmen for the Communist line too often reveal themselves as spokesmen for some other—opposition partisans fully as biased, and therefore fully as untrustworthy, as critics. But there are writers who still remain outside the intellectual trade barriers that surround the various totalitarian camps, and in dealing with controversial books we shall do our best to choose our reviewers from among them.

While there was no “secession” by The Nation’s book-review section, it is true that Joseph Wood Krutch, Dorothy Van Doren—who was an associate editor of the weekly until 1936—and Margaret Marshall were less committed to radical social reform than were the editors of the front of the magazine—Freda Kirchwey, Maxwell Stewart, Arthur Warner and, in the late thirties, Max Lerner. The general orientation of The Nation’s literary criticism was humanistic (not “new” humanistic), in the sense that books and plays were discussed in the light of human, rather than “class” or “state” or purely aesthetic interests.

Nation articles on art also reflected this point of view. Walter Pach, discussing in August, 1933, a Museum of Modern Art exhibition that began with pictures painted after the death of Delacroix, linked individual talent to a tradition:

> To see the glorious works of Cézanne and Renoir, Redon and Dégas, is to be convinced that there is no break with the genius of the earlier time. . . . One continues with the three splendid canvases by Seurat, and again one feels that the complete range of paintings from a profound constructive plan at the start to exquisite control of nuances at the finish, remains open to modern man.

In the next number of The Nation, Suzanne LaFollette criticized what she regarded as the unintelligently nationalistic policy of a group called “the Advance American Art Commission.” Part of its policy, she said, seemed to be the announcing of its “regret” when a foreign artist was engaged to decorate an American building. Among the artists the Commission most regrets, said Suzanne LaFollette, > are the two foremost modern fresco painters, Rivera and Orozco (whose American ancestry, by the way, goes back far beyond that of any member of the Commission).

Good artists know, she observed, that it is much more important that art shall be good than that it shall be national.

While Pach wrote in praise of what the Marxists tended to consider “bourgeois” tradition, and Suzanne LaFollette deprecated an unwise nationalism in art that she compared to the nationalistic movement in industry and commerce, Joseph Wood Krutch wrote with discrimination about sociological plays. In October, 1932, he praised both John Howard Lawson’s Success Story—it was “something to put one’s teeth into”—and the new Group Theatre for producing it. A few months later, however, he was sharply critical of Elmer Rice’s We, the People. Krutch began his review by saying that those who consider art a weapon need styles as revolutionary as their intentions, “and they have not developed them.” We, the People, while engaging our sympathies and concern for the problems of a group of individuals, did not carry the process of typification far enough “to make them pure symbols.” If the drama of social forces was to deal effectively with them, “it must do it so clearly that the human beings involved will seem to us more than merely rather colorless individuals.”

Clifford Odets, Krutch found in 1934, had succeeded in developing a form appropriate to his art-is-a-weapon belief. In Waiting for Lefty, the talented author of Awake and Sing had written a “soapbox” drama that was an effective equivalent of soapbox oratory. Krutch clearly was not swept away by Odets’ message, but admired this young playwright who had “the full courage of his conviction.”

The Nation published left-wi reviewers as well as traditional h manistic ones. Clifton Fadiman, coı paring Hemingway to Byron in January, 1933 piece, found a “ne of fatality” in both writers. This ne was “a kind of splendid, often ve beautiful, disease of the imaginati noticeable during periods of soc decay.” Taken together with Fa man’s characterization of Hemin way as “the frontiersman of the loi heart and biceps,” this observati reminds one of Malraux’s dictu about men who were both active a pessimistic: they tended to becor Fascists. Fadiman did not make a prediction about Hemingway’s po tics, but stressed the disparity b tween the beauty of his style and t morbid aspect of his subject matt

William Troy approached Hemin way from a different angle in a view of Winner Take Nothing. Wh criticizing Hemingway’s increasi

> The one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Horatio Alger has passed uncelebrated in these columns. Apparently it passed equally unnoticed in a good many others, for the Children’s Aid Society was moved by the general lack of excitement to investigate the state of Alger’s fame in the ranks of the youngest generation, and has come to the conclusion that the man who was once by far the most popular writer for boys in America has fallen very low indeed. . . . Putting aside the nice ethical questions involved in the effort to evaluate the exact degree of moral beauty to be discovered in the general injunction “Be good so you can get rich,” it is to be observed that all Alger’s insistence upon the duty of thrift did not prevent him from being extremely improvident or from dying poor, and we are inclined to believe that the effect of his work could be pretty accurately measured by its effect upon him. If detective novels and gangster movies do the youth of the land no more harm than the Alger books did their fathers good, then the youngest generation is safe.
>
> — Editorial, The Nation, 1932

fondness for morbid subjects and abnormal characters—he "is in danger of becoming as fin de siècle as his contemporary, William Faulkner"—Troy found him "preeminently the type of pure artist, concentrated on experience and on its disciplined expression in literature."

Just as The Nation offered its readers both Fadiman and Troy on Hemingway, so it presented both Edward Dahlberg's violent attack (in an unfavorable review of Caldwell's God's Little Acre) on John Dos Passos, and Lionel Trilling's vigorous retort. Dahlberg referred to the "meretriciously naive vernacular" of 1919, to the "blear-eyed camera eye," and a "sprawling, perforated narrative, dappled and dimpled with girlish Joycisms, which is as competent as the unheightened journalese of Dodsworth, one of Sinclair Lewis' worst novels." Trilling objected to Dahlberg's "summary execution of most of his fellow-writers of proletarian literature," and also accused Dahlberg of quoting as Dos Passos' own opinion a passage from the Modern Library introduction to Three Soldiers that Dos Passos had clearly intended to be an "ironical description of the discreditable artistic philosophy of thoughtless, second-rate novelists."

Still another comment on Dos Passos and 1919 (The Nation, incidentally, had put the book on its Honor Roll for 1932), was Charles Yale Harrison's article, "Proletarian Literature Sans-Culottes," which pointed out that 1919 had been criticized by Communists both in Russia and the United States because "this astonishingly original novel failed to end on a note of class struggle."

Jacob Zeitlin's article celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of Montaigne's birth was by implication an attack on Communist ethical standards. Montaigne, said Zeitlin, had placed the principle that would enable men to give some order and meaning to their lives in "the conscience of the individual." The French essayist had held that beauty, not usefulness, was the criterion of a good action.

There is a kind of cousinship between this humanism and the "new" humanism of Babbitt and More. But the modern Nation's literary editors had a lively appreciation of bread, wine and sex, and their style was relaxed as well as controlled. An editorial in December, 1933, welcomed the legalizing of both liquor and Joyce's Ulysses, and noted that copies of Ulysses, carried on the hip, "gave young collegians a kind of prestige comparable to that achieved by a pocket flask." The Nation regretted only that it had not been possible for Federal Judge Woolsey to expose a legal fiction: whether or not Ulysses stirred the sex impulses was not, said the journal, the real issue. "At least half the recognized diversions of mankind" were intended to stir those impulses to a greater or less extent; if the law were to attempt to interfere with such diversions, "it would be necessary . . . to raid the very dances sponsored by the Young Women's Christian Association."

Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer was barred from the United States by the legal fiction to which The Nation referred. It was, however, bootlegged by American tourists who picked it up in Paris and who, once they docked in New York, could go to see Tobacco Road. Krutch, reviewing the play (whose long run was a sign of shifting public taste: Abie's Irish Rose had been the hit of the twenties) said that the mood dominating Caldwell's writing was that of "a grotesque and horrible humor." How had Caldwell been able to make his repulsive material funny? Krutch decided that the characters in Tobacco Road were so nearly subhuman that their actions were almost without human meaning; thus one could feel detached from them, and laugh. Krutch was troubled by the "ambiguity" of Caldwell's point of view, but took a "keen professional interest" in Caldwell's talent.

> Until something else more urgent arises to draw people together and as long as the little fellow can pay his dues, the professional organizers will continue to lead Elks and Redmen and Veiled Prophets and Mystic Shriners and Legionnaires and their wives and little ones in brainless antics, decked in fatuous costumes, behind really excellent marching bands (that's one thing we do well) from convention city to convention city across the country. And steadily the American passion for a smooth-running machine, if nothing else, will tend to eliminate troublesome ideas, outstanding personalities, and dissenters who ask awkward questions about how and in what direction the parade is being led.
>
> —John Dos Passos, The Nation, 1936

Marxist critics had difficulty sharing the grotesque laughter of Caldwell, which seemed to negate the possibility of "changing life." Louis-Ferdinand Céline's Journey to the End of the Night also presented a problem to Marxists. Haakon Chevalier, reviewing the book in The Nation, was greatly impressed by > the extraordinary imagery, the inexhaustible flood of metaphor by which everything that it touches is recreated. With this goes a language more personal, rich, pungent, and brutal than anything that has come out of France, possibly, since the sixteenth century.

FREE COURSE in ECONOMICS

OFFERED AS A PUBLIC SERVICE

A 10-lesson course that will help you understand today's problems–taxes, inflation, wages, slums, poverty. Based on the masterwork Progress and Poverty by Henry George, which grows more timely with every year.

100 YEARS AGO Henry George first attracted public attention with a moving editorial on the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. His ideas on justice and freedom developed steadily and culminated in the writing of Progress and Poverty–a work which has won the praises of Louis D. Brandeis, Albert Einstein, John Dewey, F. D. Roosevelt, and many others.

COURSES BY CORRESPONDENCE —CLASSES IN MANY CITIES
WRITE FOR INFORMATION

MAIL COUPON TODAY!

HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL
50 E. 69th St.
New York, N.Y. 10021

(Chartered by the University of the State of New York)

Please send me information about your FREE course in Economics.

Name__________

Address__________

But Chevalier was "a little appalled" to find that Céline got no farther than a mere statement of the intolerable wretchedness of the masses:

> The most despairing thing about this book is the author's complete lack of political orientation. It seems as if he himself had been, like his hero, morally crushed.

Different in tone was Lionel Abel's discussion of Malraux's fiction. Abel commented that the novels of Lawrence, Proust, Joyce and Mann were negations of the reality of the individual, and that the Marxists see in these works "nothing but the decay of the bourgeois world." Malraux's proletarian heroes, however, were highly individualized: Malraux's individualism consisted in "weaving into oneself the mechanical actions of a mass man with the necessity to remain distinct and know oneself as such." Able then observed:

> If this were an impossible ideal—and Malraux has shown us men realizing it—we might expropriate the expropriators and make of society a lyric of equilibrium without anyone ever attending to the felicity of being a man.

A PUBLISHER IS KNOWN BY THE ISSUES HE RAISES . . .

THE BLACK ANGLO-SAXONS

Prof. Nathan Hare, Howard U.
Critical introduction by Prof. Oliver C. Cox, Lincoln U.
Cloth $3.95. Paper $1.95

BITTER END IN S.E. ASIA

Victor Perlo and Kumar Goshal
Introduction by Carl Marzani
Paper $1.95

PROSPERITY IN CRISIS

A Critique of the Welfare State
Dr. Joseph M. Gillman
Cloth $5.00

GIDEON'S ARMY

The Third Party of 1948.
Prof. Curtis D. MacDougall, Northwestern U.
Introduction by Prof. H. H. Wilson, Princeton U.
Volume 1 (now ready) $6.50—3 volumes boxed $19.50

At most book stores or order directly

Upon request, we will send a descriptive catalogue, and, with our compliments a copy of THE CONSCIENCE OF THE SENATE ON THE VIETNAM WAR—28 pages from the Congressional Record by nearly 20 Senators opposing escalation.

MARZANI & MUNSELL
100 W. 23rd St., N.Y., N.Y. 10011

This interesting review reflects not dogmatic optimism, but a hope that the proletarian revolution would not simply substitute mass men for selfish individual egos. Thus Abel's intellectual position was somewhere between that of Chevalier and that of Krutch. Chevalier, who could feel the power of a pessimistic book, found pessimism itself a fault. Krutch, doubtful that "singing tomorrows" would ever come, was able to laugh at and somewhat uneasily admire a virtually hopeless play.

IN JANUARY, 1935, a NATION editorial called "For Art's Sake?" stated a proposition that probably would not have surprised most careful readers of NATION criticism. To attempt to choose, said the editorial, between art for propaganda and art for art's sake was to create a completely unreal dilemma:

> The question is not whether art should exist for humanity, but what it is that art can do for that humanity to which it so obviously belongs.

Krutch had given an answer to that question in Was Europe a Success? Art was > essentially a form of rationalized and extended Contemplation, designed primarily to render more vivid and assimilable those experiences which are capable of being enjoyed for their own sakes.

"Disinterestedness" was necessary for the rendering of such experiences.

As if in response to Krutch, R. P. Blackmur's NATION review of It Can't Happen Here questioned the value of disinterestedness in a time of crisis. Sinclair Lewis' book, he conceded, was a weapon of intellect rather than a novel; there was "nowhere in it the ultimate persuasiveness of language as an art," but there was much "vehemently presented fact which at the ripe time does as well." It Can't Happen Here held a lesson for American liberals: in a comparatively stable society the liberal could "afford to be disinterested and is most valuable so," but in a disintegrating society he must act. Blackmur was not defending "art as propaganda"; he was saying that Lewis' book, while hardly art, was excellent propaganda, and that in 1935 (the time of Hitler, Huey Long, Coughlin) liberals had better pay attention to it.

Max Lerner's review, in 1936, of The Big Money, somewhat resembled Blackmur's piece. The important difference was that Lerner considered Dos Passos an excellent artist as well as a social analyst. But it was primarily Dos Passos as "the Veblen of American fiction," and Dos Passos' "belief in American life" that interested Lerner. One of the "Camera Eye" passages, said Lerner, "contains affirmation as well as irony":

> I go home after a drink and a hot meal . . . and ponder the course of history and what leverage might pry the owners loose from power and bring back (I too Walt Whitman) our story book democracy.

To Lerner, Dos Passos' art was not "disinterested" and "contemplative" but partisan and activist. Blackmur had called It Can't Happen Here a lesson for American liberals. Lerner was saying something like this abou The Big Money.

William Troy proceeded fron what could be called the "opposite" point of view in his discussion o Faulkner's Absalom, Absalom! Troy indicated that he did not share Faulkner's "vision of existence" but saic that "to reject the vision is not necessarily to reject the book." (It is unlikely that Blackmur and Lerner, i they had rejected the "visions" of—respectively—Lewis and Dos Passos would have bothered to write th reviews discussed above.) Absalom Absalom! said Troy, "possesses th awful impressiveness that comes fron exhausting any attitude or vision however wrong and one-sided, of it last measure of intensity."

THE GREAT IMPRESSION that Fran Kafka's works have made upon botl European and American intellectual is probably due to the fusion o "rightness" and intensity in his vision William Phillips, reviewing The Tria (1937) in THE NATION shortly befor becoming editor of The Partisan Review in its anti-Stalinist phase, said o Kafka:

> . . . . It is a tribute to his power that already admirers of his wor > are using his discoveries to identify certain situations and entanglements in their own environment as typically Kafkian.

t is notable that Kafka, who died in 924, was to seem increasingly releant during the years that followed he English translation of Der Prozess. George Bernanos' Diary of a ountry Priest, which had more in ommon with Kafka's fiction than vith contemporary naturalistic works, vas reviewed by Justin O'Brien at the nd of 1937. O'Brien compared Beranos to Dostoevski, observing that he priest who was the unheroic hero f the Diary—and of all of Bernanos' vorks—had "the same complexity, he same sudden illuminations, and he same naïveté of soul" as Dosoevski's characters.

The atmosphere of the works of ernanos and Kafka was to seem nore "real" to most serious post-Vorld War II novelists than the atnosphere of The Grapes of Wrath 1939). But Louis Kronenberger, at he end of a review in which he had listinguished between what was trong (the "superb tract" was "thorughly animated fiction") and what vas weak (Steinbeck was "still selfndulgent, still undisciplined") in the iovel, observed:

> . . . . one does not take leave of a book like this in a captious spirit. One salutes it as a fiery document of protest and compassion, as a story that had to be told, as a book that must be read. It is, I think, one of those books —there are not very many—which really do some good.

ronenberger, like Blackmur in his eview of It Can't Happen Here, was nore impressed by the immediate iuman importance of the book he vas discussing than with its artistic imitations. He probably would not iave bet on the prospects for The rapes of Wrath under the aspect of ternity, but he evidently thought hat this moving book about displaced harecroppers might inspire some acion on their behalf.

N ATTEMPTING TO SUM up THE NATION'S approach to literature during he 1930s, we may say this: the cenral tendency was to treat books "disnterestedly," to judge them in terms of their success in fusing form and ontent. Another tendency was to value books chiefly—although not solely—insofar as they constituted effective social weapons. The critics who adopted the second approach had become somewhat impatient with "traditional" humanistic standards because those standards did not seem to take account of social changes and upheavals. A book that was unsatisfactory in terms of traditional criteria might help (so many of these critics believed) to bring about salutary social change.

During and after World War II, European and American literature reflected increasingly the preoccupations of men and women who found themselves in a "Kafkian" world. Traditional standards of behavior somehow seemed inapplicable, yet other standards appeared to be worse. Arthur Koestler's Darkness at Noon (1941) and George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949) illustrated these feelings. Louis Salomon, reviewing Koestler's novel in the NATION, said:

> . . . the most amazing thing about the book . . . is the austere economy with which Mr. Koestler has compressed one of the most crucial dilemmas of totalitarian political philosophy into a compact, meaty novel . . . presenting at once a vividly conceived personal tragedy and an ideological conflict of the first magnitude.

Diana Trilling found Orwell's apocalyptic vision brilliant, but was disturbed by the book's "implacable tone and the enormous pressure it exerts upon the readers." She would not ask for "quietism as the method of combating the passions which are destroying modern life," but she wished there were > more of what E. M. Forster calls the "relaxed will" in at least those of us who, like Mr. Orwell, are so acutely aware of the threats of power.

Salomon's and Diana Trilling's reviews exemplify a widespread tendency among critics during the forties and after. They became chiefly concerned about the brutal uses to which power could be put, and about a queer change that seemed to have taken place in the quality of life. Louis Kronenberger wrote an essay after the war in which he, like Diana Trilling, contrasted the "relaxed" will

"The Time of Justice

. . . has now come. I believe sincerely that no force can hold it back. It is right in the eyes of man and God that it should come. And when it does, that day will brighten the lives of every American." Words for our time . . . for all time. President Johnson's message delivered to a joint session of Congress on March 15th is now available on with the excessive modern intensity, and Clifton Fadiman commented on a general "decline of attention" to the printed word. An anxious intensity combined with distractedness seemed to be the public mood: it was not one which favored either traditional humanism or the social criticism of the thirties.

E-4310

MGM RECORDS

MGM Records is a division of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Inc.

Lionel Trilling, who in the thirties had been chiefly a "social" critic of literature, became primarily a "moral" one; his NATION review of Richard Wright's autobiographical Black Boy (1945) observed that the sociological aspect of this "remarkably fine book" was > the field—I will not say merely the field—for a notable exercise of the author's moral and intellectual power.

Wright had not made himself simply a "sufferer," an object. He was a subject, "the same kind of person as his reader, as complex, as free."

Trilling's language, the context of his reference to "subject," and "object," point to his interest in existentialism. Joseph Wood Krutch, on the other hand, began his December, 1946 review of Sartre's play, The Flies, by saying, "Of existentialism I knew only what I read in the papers—including THE NATION." He went on to say that so far as he could see, existentialism > neatly combines the disadvantages of religious faith with those of nihilistic atheism. It seems, in other words, to assert moral responsibility while at the same time insisting that virtue has no reward, and it thus enables M. Sartre to revive the ancient proclamation, "There is no God and I am his prophet."

Krutch noted the difference between the reaction of an American audience, which considered the play a tour de force, and that of a Parisian one to which The Flies "obviously means something." To Krutch, existentialism was essentially "a state of nerves." He continued to admire O'Neill's plays, and in a review of The Iceman Cometh, said that what set O'Neill apart from other playwrights was "a depth of passionate sincerity, an intensity of emotional conviction, almost monumentally impressive."

Diana Trilling, who had found Orwell too intense, praised Sartre's "relaxed command of language" in The Age of Reason, and found it "a document in an extraordinarily interesting moral research." But she was worried about the implications of Sartre's philosophy: might not the existentialist "choose the State . . . might not the final act of freedom be the free choice to give up all purely personal freedom?" The questions remind one of those raised by Lionel Trilling in The Middle of the Journey.

Diana Trilling admired and liked The Victim, partly because Saul Bellow had challenged the clichés of "progressive thought" in this novel about the ambiguous relationships between a Jew and an anti-Semite. Essentially, what both Lionel and Diana Trilling were looking for in literature was a kind of moral virility combined with disinterestedness.

Like many other critics who during the 1930s had placed a high value on "commitment," they now found
"independence" more importa
Rolfe Humphries' NATION revi praising Ezra Pound's Pisan Can declared that they were "beautifu written," and with humorous but liberate independence, he commente
"Whatever idiocies he may have ba bled into the Fascist radios . . .
Ez, in my opinion, has never been traitor to the republic of letters. . .

A lecture on philosophy provokes a riot, with hundreds crowding in and thousands turned away. Books on philosophical problems preaching no cheap creed and offering no panacea but, on the contrary, so difficult as to require actual thinking sell like detective stories. Plays in which the action is a matter of words, not of plot, and which offer a dialogue of reflections and ideas run for months and are attended by enthusiastic crowds. Analyses of the situation of man in the world, of the fundaments of human relationship, of Being and the Void not only give rise to a new literary movement but also figure as possible guides for a fresh political orientation. Philosophers become newspapermen, playwrights, novelists. They are not members of university faculties but "bohemians" who stay at hotels and live in the cafe—leading a public life to the point of renouncing privacy. And not even success, or so it seems, can turn them into respectable bores. . . . The name of the new movement is "Existentialism" . . .

—Hannah Arendt, The Nation, 1946

Not all NATION criticism during t decade after the war was in the v of revised humanism (such as that the Trillings) or traditional humani (like that of Krutch). An essay Camus, by René Blanc-Roos, prais the savagely ironic plays, Calig and Cross-Purpose, but dismiss The Stranger as a French equival of Of Mice and Men, and found T Plague far inferior to "what I think certainly the best French novel of t 1940s, Aragon's Les Voyageurs l'Impériale." Blanc-Roos' revi harks back to the social criticism the 1930s.

What was perhaps most evident
THE NATION's criticism, as in cri cism elsewhere during the postw years, was its tentativeness in the d cussion of values. Critics could ag that it was admirable for a writer be independent and morally c cerned, but they were not sure w kind of relationship he could or sho establish with his society. The "n criticism," which virtually exclu from discussion anything outside t
"work itself," was not much rep sented in THE NATION's book views. Many reviewers, howev wondered just what, "out there," tion was related to.

S. Lane Faisen, in a NATION view of André Malraux's Voices Silence, declared that the artist, " matter what his time and place, is t true communicant of basic value
But the question remains: what ba values can artists now believe in? a review in 1957 of Camus' The F
Harvey Goldberg wrote:

> In the Resistance Camus confront > history with his comrades a > emerged with affirmation. It was > a movement of absolute purity eit > in action or motive, but it faced > common enemy and made a coll > tive protest. . . . The historic pr > ess cried out for the understandi > of a Camus!

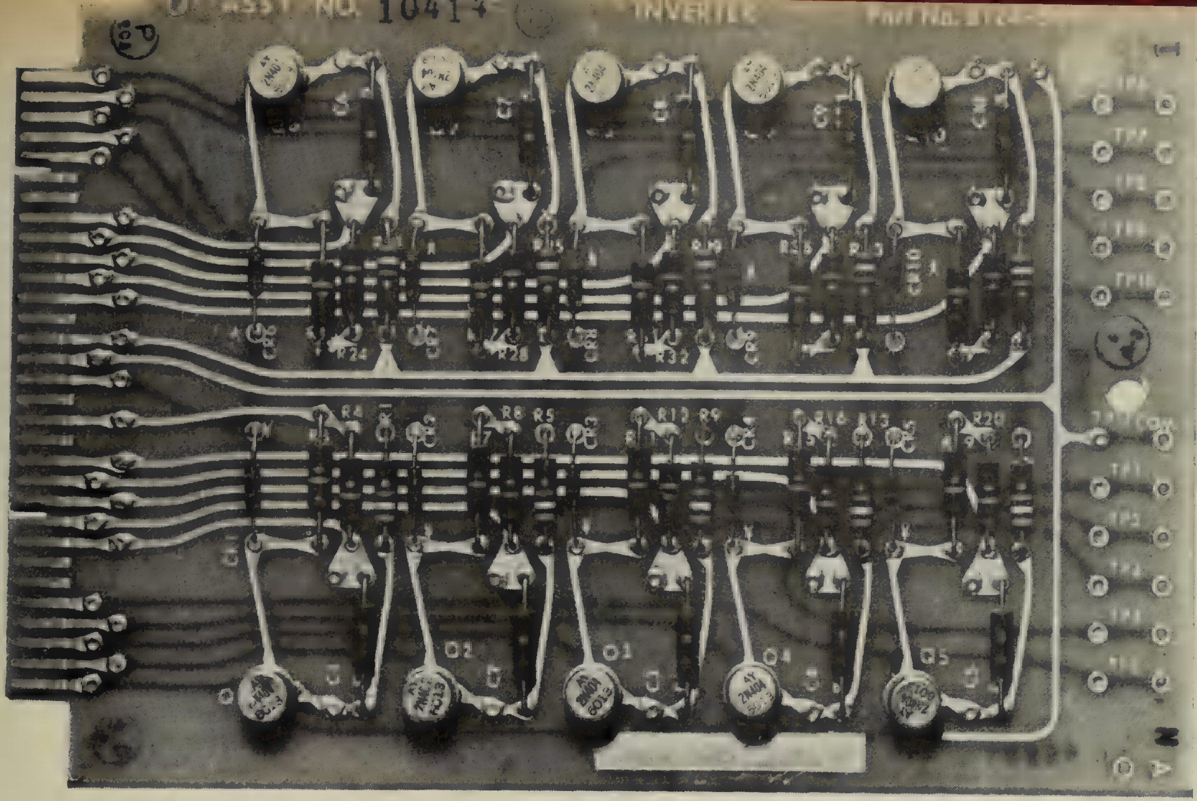
Goldberg does not speak for all N



When this circuit learns your job what are you going to do?

For one thing, you'll be looking for another job. And a different kind of job at that. Today, new machines and new methods are eliminating some jobs permanently. They do the work better and more efficiently than men.

That's progress. But progress is also creating new jobs, new opportunities for those who can qualify. Just remember . . .

You won't get tomorrow's jobs with yesterday's skills

To qualify for tomorrow's jobs, you'll need new skills, new abilities. And you can get them by re-training now.

Don't wait for a circuit to replace your job . . . and you. Start re-training now . . . and have a better job before it happens. For information about re-training for tomorrow's jobs, visit the local office of your State Employment Service.

Train now for tomorrow's jobs

Published as a public service in cooperation with The Advertising Council

TION reviewers; many of them would agree, however, that only through a humane collective attack on the problems of our savage world could art become a fully human achievement.

> Almost all formalities, within recent years, have followed into oblivion the dropping of cards and the paying of dinner calls. The rate of disuse is very rapid. When a famous and quite simple-mannered English author visited this country last summer, he found and relished the warm and easy human relations which his books had long urged on his own compatriots. But here his imagination was quickly outdone by reality. Going up to his host at the end of a pleasant evening, he uttered his thanks in a few direct words, only to find another guest at his elbow who waited until he had finished and then chimed in with an emphatic "Check!"—whereupon their host acknowledged the double courtesy with: "Take it easy, boys!"
> —Jacques Barzun, The Nation, 1948

VIII
A Backward and Forward Glance

In 1943, Freda Kirchwey transferred ownership of THE NATION to a nonprofit corporation, The Nation Associates, in which she asked subscribers to enroll as members at from ten dollars to one hundred dollars a year. The Associates, whose director was a dynamic woman named Lillie Shultz, constituted—along with the readers of the weekly—THE NATION's chief financial support until 1955. In that year, the increasing difficulty of financing the journal led to its sale: the issue of September 17, 1955, contained the announcement that Freda Kirchwey had resigned as Editor and Publisher, to be succeeded by George Kirstein and Carey McWilliams as Publisher and Editor, respectively. Kirstein had previously been executive vice-president of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York; McWilliams, a lawyer and sociologist, had been on THE NATION's staff for a decade and an occasional contributor since the nineteen twenties.

Two and a half years before the change of ownership, Margaret Marshall, who had joined THE NATION in 1928 and been Literary Editor since 1937, ceased to be a member of the staff. Even before becoming Literary Editor, Miss Marshall had—like Joseph Wood Krutch—opposed THE NATION's position on the Moscow trials. She recalls, however, having had a free hand as editor of the literature and art pages, and observes that she published many pieces by writers who, during the thirties, forties and fifties, disagreed with THE NATION's stand on foreign affairs. In its issue of January 17, 1953, THE NATION announced "a series of changes which we believe will produce a more effective journal as well as a more economical one." Among the changes was the departure of Margaret Marshall, who had "been responsible for the integrity and high standards maintained by the book section." Miss Marshall agrees that THE NATION needed to economize in 1953, but strongly believes that as an employee who had handled every job on the weekly, she should have been offered one of the remaining editorial posts. She declined an invitation to stay on as drama critic because she did not wish to acquiesce in what she saw as an attempt to bring the book section in line with the rest of the paper. On January 31, 1953, THE NATION published a letter from one of its readers who feared that with Margaret Marshall's departure the book and art pages would lose their independence. The editors replied that politics had nothing to do with the case, "as we hope to prove week by week." The book section, they said, would continue to be "fully as authoritative and independent as it has been throughout its honorable history." The fact that such independent critics as Krutch, Merle Curti, Lewis Leary, Carlos Baker, Edmund Wilson and Irving Howe contributed to THE NATION after January, 1953, can be cited as a fulfilment of this promise. On the other hand, many readers of THE NATION remained convinced that Miss Marshall's dismissal was quite unjustified.

Krutch, who had been drama critic since 1937, was by 1953 living in Tucson, Arizona, for reasons of health; he was succeeded by Haro Clurman, a founder and director the Group Theatre. From 1952 1963, the Managing Editor was Vi tor H. Bernstein, a newspaperma who, among other posts, had serve as foreign editor and foreign corre pondent of PM and The Star. Th weekly had no Literary Editor unt
December, 1955, when Robert Hat (who is now Managing Editor) to charge of the Book and Arts Sectio Before joining THE NATION, Hat had had extensive editorial experienc including a stint as film reviewer an Literary Editor of The New Repu
lic. Benjamin Boretz is now the jou nal's music critic, a position occupie for many years by B. H. Haggin, a thor of Music for the Man Who E joys Hamlet. Among the predece sors of Max Kozloff, present art crit at THE NATION, were Cleme Greenberg and S. Lane Faison.
new departure for the weekly und McWilliams was the appointment of science editor, Carl Dreher, wh writes many of the unsigned editori paragraphs. Denise Levertov selec poetry for the THE NATION, an Grandin Conover is now Litera Editor.

THE NATION HAS CHANGED exte
sively, and not changed, since 186
The most significant shift occurre in 1918, when Oswald Garrison Vi lard transformed the journal fro one devoted chiefly to the transmi sion of culture to one that grapple with the problems of its day, an treated books and works of art as v tal things. THE NATION's business h never been primarily to report fact but to interpret them from its ow point of view, and to attempt to a fect in some measure the course events. The journal has not su cumbed to suburbanization of t heart. The many special reports Fred Cook during the last deca include articles on "Capital Punis ment," "The F. B. I.," "The Sha of New York," "The C. I. A.," "Ju gernaut" (on the growing milita industrial complex), and "The U tras" (on the radical right wing in t United States).
THE NATION has devoted partic lar attention during recent years the problems of automation, civ

Chimbote, Peru

Chimbote, Peru two years after the Peace Corps

The Peace Corps doesn't work miracles. Don't expect any.

The work is hard, the hours long—but the progress is slow. Two years later not much has changed in Chimbote—on the outside.

Inside, a lot has changed.

A child learned the alphabet and pretty soon will know how to use it.

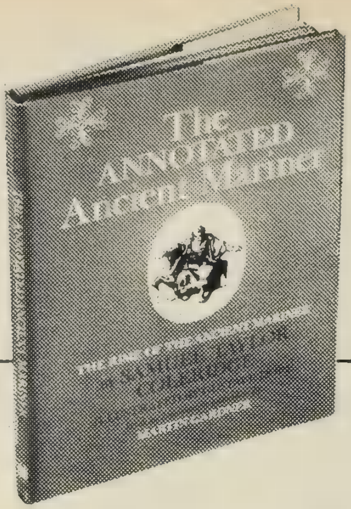
A soccer team was organized to ease some of the monotony, the soul crushing monotony of poverty. And they're winning.

A health clinic was started. Maybe it won't solve all the medical problems of Chimbote, but at least it's a start.

These aren't miracles—only a start. And for the Peace Corps Volunteers that follow, the job of easing this community into the twentieth century might be a little easier. These are things the picture can't show. If you think you can take on a job where progress is never too obvious, put yourself in the picture.

Write: The Peace Corps,
Washington, D.C. 20525.

Published as a public service in cooperation with the Advertising Council.



"A collector's delight"*

*"I have just acquired a handsome new edition of this classic ballad with 40 wonderful illustrations by Gustave Doré . . . It is a work of scholarship . . . As in The Annotated Alice, (that delicious compendium of Wonderland and Looking Glass lore, also published by Potter), Martin Gardner contributes a perceptive introduction and a final chapter of 'Interpretations', summing up the critical attitudes of rival scholars . . . This is the most exhaustive study of Coleridge's cryptic masterpiece since Livingston Lowes' The Road to Xanadu. It was a stroke of editorial genius to bring back the old Doré plates, unavailable for several decades."—VINCENT STARRETT, Chicago Tribune.

"A beautiful edition . . . a delight." —PETER S. PRESCOTT, Women's Wear

"The list of credits is long and indicative of this book's intrinsic worth and beauty . . . Martin Gardner weaves the poem together as we've never had it presented before. The folio size makes the Doré illustrations bigger, gloomier and more dramatic than in normal presentation."—ROY NEWQUIST

"A notable contribution to letters" —ALEXANDER C. BROWN

The Annotated Ancient Mariner

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner

By SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Introduction and Notes by MARTIN GARDNER
Illustrated by GUSTAVE DORE, Includes the first published version of "The Rime," and a selected Bibliography.
$7.50, now at your bookstore

CLARKSON N. POTTER, INC.
Publisher

rights, medical care and the conservation of natural resources. The journal has also denounced neo-colonialism from Hungary and Suez to Santo Domingo and Vietnam, called for recognition of Communist China because it exists, and urged that the countries of the world make the United Nations a strong force for the maintaining of peace.

It is clear that the human beings who have edited THE NATION have not always made wise decisions. But one hopes that the oldest weekly in the United States will survive for many years as an independent journal, struggling—in the words of the French philosopher, Emmanuel Mounier—against the "established disorder." For only in a just and free society could the good life be other than a dream.

Acknowledgments

The works of more writers than I can name here have helped make possible the writing of this history. Some of my debts are indicated in the text. The following list is intended to supplement these references, but includes only sources either cited or directly drawn upon in the essay.

Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left. New York, 1961, 1965.
Alba, Victor. Historia del Frente Popular. Mexico, D. F., 1959.
Armstrong, William M. E. L. Godkin and American Foreign Policy, 1865-1900. New York, 1957.
Bailey, Thomas A. A Diplomatic History of the American People. New York, 1940.
Beale, Howard K. The Critical Year. New York, 1930.
Chafee, Zechariah. The Blessings of Liberty. Philadelphia, 1956.
Dakin, Arthur Hazard. A Paul Elmer More Miscellany. Portland, Me., 1950.
Dakin, Arthur Hazard, Paul Elmer More. Princeton, 1960.
Faulkner, Harold U. The Quest for Social Justice, 1898-1914. New York, 1931.
Godkin Papers, Harvard University
Haskell, Daniel C. The Nation, V
1-105. Indexes of Titles and Con butors. 2 Vols. New York, 1951-Holt, Henry. Garrulities of an Octog
arian Editor. Boston, 1923.
Josephson, Matthew. Zola and His Ti
New York, 1928.
McCall, Samuel W. Thaddeus Steve
Boston, 1899.
Milner, Lucille. Education of American Liberal: an Autobiograp
New York, 1954.
Mitchell, Edward P. Memoirs of Editor: Fifty Years of Americ Journalism. New York, 1924.
The Nation Papers, Harvard Univers Nevins, Allan. The Evening Post:
Century of Journalism. New Yo 1922.
Ogden, Rollo. ed. Life and Letters
Edwin Lawrence Godkin. 2 Vols. N York, 1907.
Pelling, Henry. American Labor. C
cago, 1960.
Raleigh, John Henry. Matthew Arn
and American Culture. Berkeley, 19 Rifkin, Lester Harvey. "Edwin L. G kin and The Nation." Unpublish Ph. D. dissertation, Brown Univer ty, 1959.
Rose, Willie Lee Nichols. Rehearsal
Reconstruction: the Port Royal E periment. Indianapolis, 1964.
Sklar, Robert A. "Two Liberals Confr
the New Deal, 1932-1936." Unpu lished seminar report, Harvard U versity, 1961.
Slosson, Preston. The Great Crusa and After, 1914-1928. New Yo 1930.
Sterne, Richard Clark. "Political, Soc and Literary Criticism in the N York Nation, 1865-1881: A Study Change of Mood." Unpublish
Ph. D. Dissertation, Harvard U
versity, 1957.
Thomas, Hugh. The Spanish Civil W
London, 1961.
Villard Papers, Harvard University
Wecter, Dixon. The Age of the Gr Depression, 1929-1941. New Yo 1948.
Weeks, Robert P. Commonwealth
Sacco and Vanzetti. Englewood Cli
N.J., 1958.

Two passages from the Villard Pap are published by permission of t Harvard College Library.

I also wish to thank the followi persons, who kindly answered questio about The Nation, or about various pects of American history: Robert Be diner, John Cournos, Abraham S. Eise stadt, Tilden G. Edelstein, Frank Freid
Lewis Gannett, Senator Ernest
Gruening, Howard Mumford Jon
Horace Kallen, Freda Kirchwey, Geor
G. Kirstein, Joseph Wood Krutch, M
Lerner, Louis Lyons, Carey McWillian
Margaret Marshall, Norman Thom
Mark Van Doren, James Wechsler.

Forthcoming in October
on MR SPECIAL
THE LYMAN LETTER: NEW LIGHT ON EMILY DICKINSON & HER FAMILY
by RICHARD B. SEWALL

A new chapter in the lives of Emily and Lavinia Dickinson as revealed in the correspondence of Joseph Bardwell Lyman (1829-1872)

THE MASSACHUSETTS REVIEW
AMHERST, MASS.
$1.50 a copy—$5.00 a year

INDEX OF ADVERTISERS

Abingdon Press 5
Amalgamated Bank of N.Y. . . 315
Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America 263
Amalgamated Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen 267
American Broadcasting Company . . . . . Inside front cover
American President Lines 281
American Research Council . . 309
Automation-Retraining 331
Bollingen Foundation 265
Book-of-the-Month Club, Inc. 6 & 7
Charleston Gazette, The 267
Circulation Associates, Inc. . . . 294
CBS Television Stations 12
Columbia Records 273
Columbia University Press . . . 335
Commentary 293
Consumers Union 255
Cornell University Press 9
Coward-McCann, Inc. 260
Dell Publishing Company 263
Direct Mail Printing Company . 285
District 65, Retail, Wholesale Department Store Employees 285
E. P. Dutton & Company 307
Electrical Workers, International Brotherhood of 291 Fleet Publishing Corporation . . 307
Free Press of Glencoe, The 317
Frontier 283
Galton Paper Company, Inc. . . 305
Greenbrier, The 258
Grove Press, Inc. 271
Harcourt, Brace & World 303
Harper & Row 301
Harvard University Press 275
Henry George School 327
Hill & Wang, Inc. 319
Houghton Mifflin Company . . . 243
Indiana University Press 287
International Business Machines Corporation 249
Edward Lamb Enterprises, Inc. 281
Library of Urban Affairs 253
Little, Brown and Company Inside back cover
Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, International . . 315
Louisiana State University Press 299
Lytton Savings and Loan Association 254
Macmillan Company . . . Back cover
Marzani & Munsell 328
Massachusetts Review 334
David McKay Company, Inc. . . 256
MGM Records 329
Mid-Century Book Society, Inc. 336
Mine, Mill, & Smelter Workers, International Union of 291
Monthly Review Press 321
NAACP 305
National Guardian 309
New Directions 323
New Republic, The 257
New Statesman 259
New York Journal-American . . 289
New York Times, The 2
Newspaper Guild of New York 291
Newsweek 1
W. W. Norton & Company 313
Peace Corps 333
Clarkson N. Potter, Inc. 334
Prentice-Hall, Inc. 5
Random House 297
Henry Regnery Company, The . 267
Rural Electric Cooperative Association, National . . . . 10 & 11
Rutgers University Press 283
St. Louis Post Dispatch 13
Scientific American 295
Charles Scribner's Sons 311
Alan Swallow 315
Teamsters, The International Brotherhood of 251
Time, Inc. 277
Twentieth Century Fund, The . 269
United Automobile Workers . . 247
University of Chicago Press . . . 8
University of Illinois Press 279
University of Texas Press 325
D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc. 261
Vanderbilt University Press . . . 321
Viking Press, The 4
York Gazette and Daily, The . . 245
Yugoslav Information Center . . 263

SOLUTION TO CROSSWORD PUZZLE

ACROSS: 1 Farmer; 4 Megatons; 10 Eagle; 11 Pari passu; 12 Drastic; 13 Pierce; 15 Mo.; 16 Grisly; 17 Yacht; 19 My all; 21 Icarus; 23 AP; 26 Ratify; 27 Tagalog; 29 Hurricane; 30 At sea; 21 Senators; 32 U Thant

DOWN: 1 Freedom; 2 Raglan; 3 Elector; 5 Earn; 6 Amplify; 7 Obstruct; 8 Student; 9 Space ship; 14 Dynasties; 18 Cast Iron; 19 Marches; 20 Leftist; 22 U. S. Grant; 24 Pageant; 25 Alaska; 28 Pair

The Columbia Encyclopedia is an ideal reference book for home and office

In one volume

$49.50 at all bookstores

The Mid-Century Book Society invites you to take for $1 each

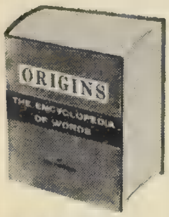
Any 3 encyclopedias, reference volumes, bestsellers or sets worth up to $52



53. ORIGINS: THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORDS by Eric Partridge. 970 pages. Ret. price $16.00

260. PERVERSE CRIMES IN HISTORY by R. E. L. Masters and Eduard Lea. Unabridged. Ret. price $9.50

704. THE FAMILY MOSKAT. I. Bashevis Singer. ANTI-SEMITE & JEW, J. P. Sartre. Ret. price $9.95

[illegible]. NORMAN MAILER. An American Dream. Controversial best-seller! Acclaimed and damned! Ret. price $4.95

259. THE LETTERS OF F. SCOTT FITZGERALD. 615 pages, photos. Ret. price $10.00

306. TEMPLES, TOMBS & HIEROGLYPHS. The Story of Egyptology. Barbara Mertz. Illus. Ret. price $6.95

282. THE HUNDRED DAYS. Antony Brett-James. Napoleon's last campaign. Ret. price $6.50

253. THE DEMONS. Helmito von Doderer. The monumental German novel. Two volumes. Ret. price $13.50 ■

207. THE CRADLE OF EROTICA. Allen Edwardes & R. E. L. Masters. Sex in the Levant. Ret. price $9.50

324. MARQUIS DE SADE, complete Justine and other writings. 1st American edition. Ret. price $15.00

266. BARTLETT'S FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Latest edition, 1,614 pages. Ret. price $10.00

283. MACMILLAN MEDICAL CYCLOPEDIA. Over 1,000 pg., profusely illus. New 23rd edition. Ret. price $7.95

268. MRS. GRUNDY: Studies in English Prudery. Peter Fryer. Illustrated. Ret. price $6.75

705. TERRY SOUTHERN, FLASH & FILIGREE. I LOST IT AT THE MOVIES, Pauline Kael. Ret. price $11.00

261. A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY OF THE VULGAR TONGUE. Eric Partridge Ret. price $7.95

279. THE COMPLETE BOOK OF GAMES by Darwin A. Hindman. 2000 games. Illus. 768 pages. Ret. price $6.95

269. COMPLETE TALES OF HENRY JAMES. Vols. 7 & 8. 932 pages. Ret. price $11.90 *

276. MUSSOLINI: A Study in Power by Ivone Kirkpatrick. 726 pages, photographs. Ret. price $10.00

275. LES NUITS DE PARIS by Restif de la Bretonne. 18th Century vignettes. Ret. price $5.95

293. NOTHING PERSONAL. Photographic essay. Richard Avedon, James Baldwin. Ret. price $12.95

132. DICTIONARY of Slang and Unconventional English. Eric Partridge. 1362 pgs. Ret. price $16.00

[illegible]. CONTEMPORARY QUOTATIONS. James B. Simpson. 1,300 world figures speak. Ret. price $6.95

149. A WORLD ON THE WANE by Claude Levi-Strauss. Tribal life in the Amazon. Illus. Ret. price $12.50

707. TOM WOLFE, Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby & Klapp, SYMBOLIC LEADERS. Ret. price $11.45

281. THE [illegible] ON THE [illegible] [illegible] by Murray Schumach, TV censorship. Ret. price $6.95

[illegible]. INCOGNITO. Petru Dumitriu. Savage novel of life in a "Red Paradise." Ret. price $5.95

246. ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE GREAT QUOTATIONS. George Seldes. 893 pages. Ret. price $15.00

267. BOSIE: Lord Alfred Douglas, His Friends & Enemies, by Rupert Croft-Cooke. Ret. price $7.50

13[illegible]. RIMBAUD [illegible] BAUDELAIRE. Enid Starkie. Two biographical volumes. Combined Ret. price $20.00 *

[illegible]. THE SWORD-BEARERS: Supreme Command in W.W.I. Correlli Barnett. Ret. price $7.50

187. JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY. Selections by E.L. McAdam, Jr. and George Milne. Ret. price $6.50

706. WILLIAM S. BURROUGHS, Nova Express & GAMES PEOPLE PLAY, Eric Berne, M.D. Ret. price $10.00

Counts as one selection*

THE MID-CENTURY BOOK SOCIETY NA-9
400 Community Drive, Manhasset, New York 11030

Here are my three selections. Bill me just $1.00 each. Their numbers appear in boxes below.

Each month I will receive the Mid-Century Review which describes the current monthly selection and alternates. I can let the current selection come, choose from alternates, or buy no book that month. As a member, I will buy just two additional selections or alternates in the coming year. For every selection or alternate I buy, I get FREE one Bonus Book Voucher worth $4.00, which I may exchange at once (with usually $1.00) for any Bonus Book of my choice. NO RISK: If not perfectly delighted with your book shipment, return it within 10 days and your membership and all charges will be canceled immediately. Offer not good outside Continental U.S.A.

WRITE NUMBERS OF [illegible] BOOKS IN BOXES

Print Name ____________________

Address ____________________

City ______________ State ______________ Zip ______

Build a library of lasting value—at savings which, through substantial price discounts and free Bonus Book Vouchers (worth $4.00), can total as high as 80%!

YES, take any three of these reference works and bestsellers, retail value up to $52.00, for just $1.00 each.

As a member of The Mid-Century Book Society, you will be offered major works of fiction, books by the "great names" and by burning new talents; thought-provoking (and sometimes highly controversial) bestsellers—books of depth and substance the judges of "big book clubs" wish they could select for their mass market. Also historical works and studies of human behavior; great biographies, diaries and letters of creative personalities; beautiful volumes of art; satires—and even a suspense novel of surpassing quality now and then.

Big price discounts! Bonus book bargains (with every purchase)—Combined savings up to 80%!

From hundreds of books, you are required to buy just two in the coming year — at substantial membership savings which can total as much as 80%. With every purchase of a selection or alternate, you are given a Bonus Book Voucher worth $4.00. You can exchange these vouchers at once, together with a nominal sum (usually $1.00) for any Bonus Book of your choice. The books shown on this page are typical of the Bonus Books available — without waiting. But now, mail coupon to get your three selections for just $1.00 each.

SEP 25 1965

THE NATION

September 27, 1965 . . 35c

THE NONSTUDENT LEFT

Hunter S. Thompson

Greece: WHAT THE PALACE FEARS . . . . Constantine Poulos

Kashmir: THE UN'S PERILOUS CHANCE . . . . Anne Weill-Tuckerman

Can We Live With Our Cars?

Elinor C. Guggenheimer

THE TYRANNY of CHARITY Wendell Berry

LETTERS

Dream worlds

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Carey McWilliams' marvelous editorial on Watts [The Nation, Aug. 30] coupled its two great events, Rodia's towers and the riot.

A year ago, I was one who went to see the former, rock blind to the ugly simmer in the environing slum. The one-man cathedral of self-assertion eerily assembled the junk of California around a European memory; the dream world of Southern California, like that other American dream world, the Old South, discharged its contempt for the past in the brutal contempt manifest in the lethargic, mock-pastoral slum. . . . If Southern California is to persist in its drive to be the launching platform of extra-terrestrial life, it will have to find an equivalent of Rodia's constructive genius to remove its mounting detritus. Richard Stern

Saucery

Clinton, Mass.

Dear Sirs: In view of the caliber of many of those who have the courage to report seeing these things, it hardly behooves Mr. Daniel Cohen to imply ["The Return of Flying Saucers," The Nation, Sept. 13] that all such persons are deceived or that those of us who are interested in getting at the truth are "nuts." I am one who saw "flying saucers" myself, back in February of 1952. . . . They were three huge silver disks, flying in a V formation, hovering, changing speeds, etc. . . .

As a member of NICAP and one who had a part in its organization, I must say that I resent the tone of Mr. Cohen's article and I also resent the fact that my favorite magazine should have published it. . . . I prefer to remember that Dr. Albert Einstein, when questioned about this subject is reported to have said: "These people are seeing something. . . ."

Albert H. Baller, Minister
German Congregational Church

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: Your readers should not mistake Daniel Cohen's shotgun attack on saucerers for a calm, objective appraisal of the existing evidence of UFOs.

Last year we published a serious, well-documented, 200,000-word report, "The UFO Evidence," which was submitted to every member of Congress. It contained all of our best accumulated evidence up to that time. It also contained an accurate statement of our positions and "beliefs" (if Mr. Cohen prefers that word to "hypotheses"). . . .

The crackpots and con men, who inevitably are dragged into skeptical articles, really are irrelevant. . . . If Mr. Cohen cannot distinguish between crackpots and competent people, irrelevant mystical blatherings and logical arguments, we can. Pardon us for being discriminating. . . .

Richard Hall
Acting Director
National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP)

Beauty

Johnson, Vt.

Dear Sirs: Congratulations and thanks for the poem by Robert Duncan in your issue of Sept. 13. It's a beauty.

Hayden Carruth

Svenska Vietnamkommittén

Stockholm

Dear Sirs: A Swedish Vietnam Committee (Svenska Vietnamkommittén) was formed in Stockholm on August 19. It has at its start about sixty members, mostly well-known personalities in Swedish cultural life.

The aims of the committee are:

(1) To work for peace in Vietnam in accordance with the principles set down in the 1954 Geneva Agreements.

(2) To promote negotiations among all parties concerned, especially between the U.S.A. and the National Liberation Front (Vietcong).

(3) To support the strivings of the Swedish Government to help bring about peace in Vietnam.

(4) To pressure the U.S. Government (together with similar movements in other countries).

(5) To undertake a humanitarian action for the people of Vietnam.

(6) To spread accurate information on Vietnam.

(7) To assist Vietnam when the reconstruction of the country begins.

(8) To keep in touch with similar organizations in all countries.

The executive committee of the Svenska Vietnamkommittén includes as chairman, Stiv Jakobsson (chairman of the Swedish World Peace Mission); as vice chairman Hans Haste (a publisher); as secretary Jan Berglund (general secretary of the Youth Peace Society); and Bertil Svahnström (editor of Freden, chairman of the Swedish CND); Göte Jacobsson (captain in the Swedish army); Thomas Gerholm (a student).

The Svenska Vietnamkommittén is grateful for all information on medical aid programs, etc., and on ways and means for humanitarian actions in Vietnam. Please write to Bertil Svahnström, International Secretar
Svenska Vietnamkommittén, Jungfr
gatan 30, Stockholm Ö.

Bertil Svahnströ

THE
NATION

Monday, September 27, 1965
Volume 201, No. 9

In this issue

EDITORIALS

149

ARTICLES

151 Kashmir:
The UN's Perilous Chance
Anne Weill-Tuckerman

154 The Nonstudent Left
Hunter S. Thompson

158 Greece:
What the Palace Fears
Constantine Poulos

161 The Tyranny of Charity
Wendell Berry

164 Can We Live with Our Cars'
Elinor C. Guggenheimer

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

167 The Goals of the Group
D'Arcy McNickle

168 Reflections on Gaols
Norval Morris

170 The Birthday Dream (poem)
James Dickey

171 Mad Old Man and the Sea
Harold Clurman

172 Preview of a German Controversy
George K. Romoser

175 Films
Robert Hatch

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 176)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Sept. 27, 1965. Vol. 201, No.

The Nation is published weekly (except in Ju and August, when biweekly) by The Nati Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A.
the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Aven
New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class posta paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two yea
$18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 ext per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is quired for change of address, which cannot made without the old address as well as the ne

EDITORIALS

Who Said Irrational?

War is deplorable, and suddenly a large section of the American press and the commentators have found a war to deplore. Max Lerner calls the Pakistan-India conflict "the absurd war . . . fought by the wrong enemies, with the wrong weapons, over the wrong issues." Newsweek's caption on the same topic is "Senseless War on the Subcontinent." The New York Times heads its editorial "The Irrational War" and finds the cost out of all proportion to any possible gain. But actually, insofar as any war can make sense in the modern world, this one does—on the Pakistani side at least. It is an exceedingly inconvenient conflict for the United States, with its foreign policy shaped by the anti-Communist obsession and the defection of Pakistan as a paid-in-advance ally against the Soviet Union and Red China, but why should the Pakistanis dance to our tune when they are convinced that it no longer serves their interests?

The Pakistan-India controversy has been festering for seventeen years. It is as real a dispute as one can well imagine. It involves one of the basic ingredients of war—land. India has possession of territory, part of which certainly belongs to Pakistan. This Kashmir real estate, important in itself, is important also in connection with water rights, a vital element in irrigation projects. Millions of Indians and Pakistanis are hungry, and actual famine impends in both countries. War may make matters worse for one or both, but it cannot be said that there is nothing to fight about.

The same applies to the equities of the matter. When the Hindu maharajah of Kashmir decided to join India after the partition of 1947, war broke out, the UN intervened, Kashmir was divided, with India getting the major share, and a plebiscite was to be held to allow the predominantly Moslem Kashmiri to decide which country they preferred to join. India has successfully evaded this agreement, to the great frustration of successive Pakistani governments. Now, instead of merely stalling on the plebiscite, the Indian Government has incorporated Kashmir as an integral part of India. Prime Minister Shastri proclaims: "Kashmir is part and parcel of India . . . no power on earth can force us to surrender it." This is a declaration of force, and force begets force.

These considerations do not embrace all the issues nor tell the whole story. Part of Kashmir is indisputably Indian ethnically, part is indisputably Pakistani. Another part would apparently like to be independent of both countries but if forced to make a choice would probably opt for Pakistan. The right is not all on one side, but one can understand the Pakistanis' frustration. They have been more patient than governments usually are.

If we are looking for a truly senseless war on which to vent our righteous indignation, the American operation in Vietnam would seem to be an unbeatable choice. All but the most ardent war hawks wish we had never got into it, but with every week our commitment becomes larger and withdrawal more difficult. Our objectives are obscure. We do not want land, we do not want people, we already have enough bases in Asia. We maintain that we are fighting for the freedom of the people of South Vietnam, most of whom are indifferent or hostile to us, with only an unpopular minority committed to our cause. Such friends as we have we are in the process of alienating; one does not gain favor among a people by devastating their country, even in the name of all that is sacred. We are the victims of our own delusions, such as the "falling domino" theory, and the notion that the Chinese Reds will take fright when they see what we can do to the Vietnamese. If a reductio ad absurdum of war is sought, the place to look is not in India or Pakistan or Kashmir, but in the unhappy country on which our Army, Navy and Air Force are wreaking a senseless havoc.

Arms Diplomacy

The processes by which the armed forces classify information as secret are themselves secret. Thus the Pentagon has decreed that the amount of military aid we have given Pakistan and India is not to be revealed to the public which pays for these exports. However, the facts are known in a general way. Rep. James A. Haley (D., Fla.) says that in the past decade Pakistan has received $1.2 billion in military aid, India about one-tenth of that. Rep. Paul A. Fino (R., N.Y.) makes an estimate of a total of $2 billion of military aid for the whole subcontinent. Whether the smaller amount or the larger is correct, the outlay is well over a billion, with the Pakistanis getting the larger share, not because their cause was just, but because the Indians were reluctant to take sides with us against the Chinese and Russian Communists and the Pakistanis seemed a better investment.

In the case of Turkey and Greece the figures on military aid are accurately known. Senator Gruening points out that we have given $2.5 billion in military assistance to Turkey, and $1.7 billion to Greece. As the Pakistanis and Indians are now using our hardware against each other, the Turks and Greeks have similarly diverted U.S. weapons from their intended purpose, and may do so on a larger scale in the future.

Another possibility, equally unpleasant, is in prospect. As Constantine Poulos points out in this issue (p. 158) the Communists have come back strongly in Greece, fifteen years after their defeat in the civil war. American military aid may be used by Greeks against Greeks. If so, it is not difficult to predict which Greeks will be firing from American tanks and aircraft and which Greeks will be on the receiving end. Of course that would be no novelty. In Latin America and elsewhere American military aid, both in weapons and training, is calculated to aid the haves against the have-nots.

Such calculations can be hazardous, however, as the India-Pakistan situation shows. We armed both nations against communism, but they are fighting each other. Even more ironically, we are seeking the cooperation of a great Communist power, the USSR, in an effort to end that war, which is inconvenient for them as it is for us. Presumably, if this joint endeavor proves to be successful, the United States will then once again belabor the impossible Russians with might and main.

Meanwhile, the inscrutable Chinese watch and wait. They might be less inscrutable, and perhaps no more resistant to reason than other nations, if ours were not an arms diplomacy with but a single objective—putting down communism wherever it raises its head. Newsweek, which finds the Pakistan-India war so senseless, is beginning to show some sense in its appraisal of such a diplomacy. "The fighting," it comments, "uniquely demonstrated the frustrations—and the risks—of a foreign policy that turns largely on the single, controlling principle of anti-communism." Even so. But must it take so long to learn the facts of life? A single collection of Nation articles may be cited, just to show that "journals of opinion"—not The Nation alone—are often also journals of prophecy. Here is the list:

"The Ramparts We Rent," by O. Edmund Clubb, January 26, 1957; "Doctrine for Mideast Disaster," by Geoffrey Barraclough, March 2, 1957; "Muddle in Southeast Asia," by W. Macmahon Ball, March 16, 1957; "Gun Fever in Latin America," by Claudio Veliz, March 30, 1957.

How much loss of life and treasure, how much frustration and humiliation, could have been saved in the eight years since these essays appeared if a more enlightened policy had been followed! And what disasters could be avoided in the future.

National Embarrassment

The government's harassment of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers has become a national embarrassment. In 1956, fourteen officers and representatives of the union were indicted on a charge of "conspiring" to violate the non-Communist-affidavit provision of the Taft-Hartley Act. The case was tried in the midst of a bitter six-month strike in 1959 and resulted in convictions, although Section 9(h)—the non-Communist-affidavit provision of the Taft-Hartley Act—had been repealed six months before the trial took place! This conviction was reversed on appeal. The Justice Department then elected to retry the case—in 1963—and this conviction was sustained on appeal.

In the course of several later trials and appeals, five defendants were acquitted and three, who pleaded nolo contendere, were given suspended sentences. The entire elected leadership and staff of the union has testified under oath, before the Subversive Activities Control Board, that they are not Communists. The sixteen years of litigation have been, of course, an enormous drain on the union's resources. Today a wide range of AFL-CIO unions have indicated their support of the American Civil Liberties Union's amicus brief urging the Supreme Court to take jurisdiction. The case should be reviewed but, better still, it should be dismissed. "It is difficult," as Norman Thomas has pointed out, "to resist the conclusion that [in this case] the government was willing to do a little union-busting in the name of anti-communism, under the forms of law."

Passing the Buck

No one accuses the automobile manufacturers of being solely or even principally responsible for traffic fatalities and injuries [see "Can We Live With Our Cars?" by Elinor C. Guggenheimer, page 164]. They could, however, save thousands of lives yearly, and reduce the almost equally appalling toll of crippling injuries, by putting safety foremost in car design, instead of relegating it to some lower priority. The companies overstress the role of the driver in accidents, thereby relieving themselves of the onus of putting cars on the road which will kill the occupants not only in irremediably lethal collisions, but in accidents involving quite moderate kinetic energies, against which protection is entirely feasible. This policy serves still another purpose—it diverts criticism from the emphasis on speed, power and aggression in automobile advertising, on which the industry is now spending some $270 million a year.

In this process of "murder by motor," as the American Trial Lawyers Association calls it, the National Safety Council is an accomplice before the fact. In a ritual preceding each of the big holiday weekends, the Council expresses concern that a new record in auto fatalities will be set. It then uses the new total as the base for the same announcement the following year. After the last Labor Day slaughter the president of the Council declared that "many drivers will not or cannot cope with the complexities of today's traffic" and that "far too many miles of local and rural roads present deadly hazards to even careful drivers." This is all too true, but it is only part of the truth. If ever the Council has suggested that there might be too many vehicles (86 million) on the road, or that the automobile per se might be a factor, it has escaped notice amid the steady reiteration of the Council's formula over the years.

Since the most competent driver, on the best-engineered road, may be involved in an accident, one would think that he and his passengers should be packaged to minimize the effects of the "second collision" insid the vehicle. One would think that he is entitled to tha much for the several thousand dollars he plunks down for the several thousand pounds of unnecessarily large powerful and heavy machinery to which he entrusts his life and the lives of his loved ones. One would think that the Council would say as much, if only to justify its name.

The Council's pronouncements, however uninformative, receive the same respectful attention in the papers as a papal encyclical. This year a new theory was propounded—that the comfort of the modern car might be conducive to accidents. "With windows closed, air-conditioning on, the radio playing, the car moving smoothly and quietly," the Council tells us, "there is a tendency on the part of the driver to relax too much."

That may be, but if air conditioning has become essential for the good life, and all car windows must be closed for the required lowering of temperature, it is a major hazard in itself. The window next to the driver must be open enough to enable him to hear an overtaking car. the tire noise of his own car, and any unusual sounds that may portend trouble. Every competent driver knows this; he also knows that the radio must not be allowed to drown out these signals. Overheating a car in winter can also cause drowsiness and a possible accident, and so can carbon monoxide from the exhaust. But somehow, under the system of the annual model change and sales of 9 million cars a year, the finger is always pointed at the driver, but never at the car.

Help for the Retarded

One can think of few more painful subjects than mental retardation. In some ways it is worse than insanity which, as Harry Stack Sullivan pointed out, must be regarded as a way of life. The psychotic may derive some comfort from his delusions, may have memories and passions, but the severely retarded, when they are neglected by society, suffer what amounts to total deprivation.

In his plea before the Joint Legislative Committee on Mental Retardation, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy urged that we think of the inmates of institutions for mental defectives as children — whatever the age of their bodies — who through no fault of their own are subjected to interminable mental and emotional vacuity. They have rights which a civilized society is morally bound to respect. Many can become partially or wholly self-supporting. They have a right to education adapted to their needs. The others, those who are hopelessly feeble-minded, have a right, like the hopelessly sick, to physical comfort and amusement suited to their capacity.

Many institutions for the retarded fall far short of these requirements, as Senator Kennedy found at Willowbrook State School in New York City. The "school" (it is that in name only) has 6,000 inmates. The chronic difficulties, which it shares with probably a majority of mental institutions, are shortage of staff and overcrowding. Both are remediable—the former with more difficulty than the latter, but if adequate facilities are provided, the personnel problem can be appreciably eased. If employees are well trained and well paid, further improvement is possible.

Senator Kennedy makes some valuable suggestions for administration and organization. Staff should be augmented whenever possible by students, not only in the summer but all year round. New institutions for the retarded should therefore be located near colleges and universities. Work-study programs should be inaugurated. Attendants and other personnel must receive adequate training. Just as new hospitals are now affiliated with medical schools, state schools for the retarded should be connected with elements of the state university system. Under these conditions, work with the retarded can be rewarding, both for the staff and the children in their care. For its part, society will be relieved of the shame of hiding away and mistreating some of its most unfortunate members.

KASHMIR

The UN's Perilous Chance . .

Anne Weill-Tuckerman

United Nations

The mission of United Nations Secretary-General U Thant to the Indian subcontinent represents a critical test of the international organization's ability to preserve or restore peace in the world. Never before in the history of the UN has a conflict of such potential magnitude erupted between two member states; even more to the point, never has a Security Council decision to intervene been backed by the unreserved unanimity of the membership, including all the big powers.

Thus U Thant's mission symbolizes the collective will of the United Nations, with the exception of the parties involved, to prevent two nations, totaling almost 600 million people, from launching a holocaust upon each other and endangering the fabric of world peace. Heading the peacemakers are the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, without whose agreement no real UN action in the political field has ever been possible. In the India-Pakistan conflict, the interests of Washington and Moscow coincide exactly: both fear a Chinese military intervention and both have

---

Anne Weill-Tuckerman has covered the United Nations since its inception as a correspondent for Agence France-Presse. She is also a regular political commentator for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

warned Peking (the Soviet Union in unequivocal terms) against adding fuel to the dispute. For the United States, such an intervention could extend Peking's influence over the subcontinent and strengthen an anti-U.S., anti-UN "axis" of China, Indonesia and Pakistan. For Moscow, China's open support of Pakistan, in addition to affording an opportunity for further Chinese penetration and mischief making in the non-Communist world, could provoke from the United States a large-scale retaliatory move, with atomic weapons perhaps coming into play.

The Secretary-General's efforts also enjoy the full blessing of London, Paris and the many capitals of the nonaligned world. On the other hand, his mission comes at a time when the practical peace-keeping capacity of the UN is at an ebb. The organization has just emerged from the crisis over Article 19, which, sterile and time-wasting as it was, amply demonstrated that the concept of national sovereignty and national interest still prevails over that of collective responsibility. The outcome of the Article 19 controversy proved that the UN could not force a big power to assume responsibility for a UN action which it considered against its interests, and that, as a consequence, no future peace-keeping operation could be undertaken without the assent of all the big powers, whose contribution, especially in the financial area, is essential.

The question now, in the face of the India-Pakistan conflict, is whether the UN can impose peace on two of its largest member nations against their apparent wishes, and if so, by what means. The hope of the Secretary-General and of all member states was, and still is, that the two governments would pause and reflect with him over the catastrophic consequences of an all-out war between them and would use his visit or further good offices as an opportunity to find a way out. If this result were obtained in the more or less immediate future, U Thant's prestige and that of the UN would be greatly enhanced and the year's frustrations largely overcome. It would then become feasible, in spite of recent difficulties in financing, to enlarge and strengthen the present UN military observer corps for India and Pakistan, a forty-five-man operation limited to surveillance of the 450 mile cease-fire line in Kashmir, established in 1949.

Such an outcome would be all the more impressive since India and Pakistan have clung to positions of total intransigence over the Kashmir issue for seventeen years, in and out of UN debates, engaging again and again in a "dialogue of the deaf" across the Security Council table. Only a peril of dimensions as great as the present one could bring the Council to take up the issue once more, as it did on Labor Day weekend, and again two weeks later.

Indeed, if the shadow of Peking did not loom over Southeast Asia, already bloodied by the long Vietnam war, one could almost yield to the temptation of letting India and Pakistan "fight it out," as they have shown every desire to do almost from the day of their twin independence. It would be in bad taste, but perhaps not entirely false, to state that a classic territorial conflict of this type, between two sovereign neighbors, provides a kind of relief from the puzzling complexity of the undeclared wars, liberation wars, guerrilla wars and ideological wars of the last twenty years. But aside from humanitarian considerations, which are one of the raisons d'être of the United Nations, there exists the fear that, in our age, local conflicts may not be contained for long, and may escalate in the number of countries involved or in the power of the weapons used, or both. In this connection, it is worth noting that India has argued in the recent disarmament conferences against an unconditional agreement to prevent the proliferation of nations possessed of nuclear weapons.

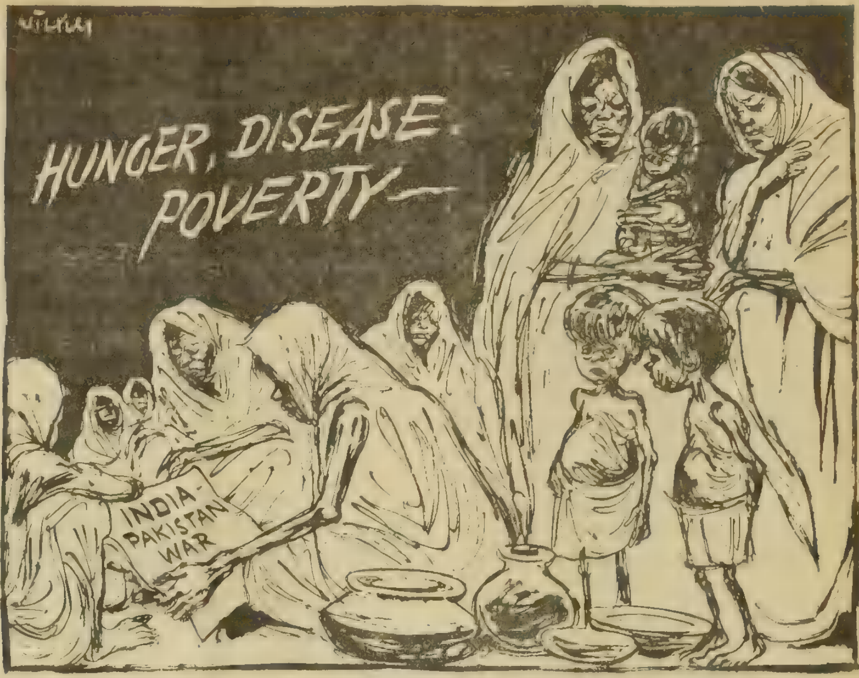
When U Thant returned to New York from his mission, India and Pakistan had not rejected his good offices but had repudiated the call of the Security Council by setting mutually unacceptable conditions to a cease-fire. The UN thus finds itself in new territory, which the San Francisco drafters had not envisaged, hypnotized as they were by the conditions of the Second World War. It will have to learn how to deal with armed conflicts which are not the result of a recognized aggression, when the parties at war reject UN services, and when the UN has no international force to "impose peace" on them. Thus, if the Thant mission ends in total failure, the organization will have to explore for the first time the full meaning of Chapter Seven of the Charter, entitled "Action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression," which deals with sanctions of diplomatic, economic, and finally military nature. In the past, such a situation occurred only once—in the case of Korea—under circumstances which cannot be repeated.

If the efforts which Secretary-General Thant has announced that he will pursue do not bear fruit in the near future, and the UN fails to act under Chapter Seven, it will have to recognize its impotence as it is forced to do presently in Vietnam, and yield its place in the peace-keeping machinery to traditional forms of national diplomatic pressure.

The Kashmir conflict, if it shows no signs of early abatement, will overshadow all the other issues to come before the twentieth session of the General Assembly which opens this month. Even earlier, there was no doubt that the session's main interest would focus on Asia, as it has focused on Africa in years past. The absence of Vietnam from the agenda is not necessarily permanent, and even if the war there is not officially inscribed in the program of the session (for that matter, the India-Pakistan conflict over Kashmir is on the agenda of the Security Council but not of the General Assembly), it will provide, with Kashmir, the living—or dying—background of all speeches by foreign ministers and all diplomatic activity in the Secretary-General's office and lobbies on the East River.

In fact, the unanimous preoccupation with the India-Pakistan conflict may mellow the sharp polemics over Vietnam which were sure to erupt in cold-war speeches on the part of the Soviet Union. (Moscow has engaged more in public denunciations of the U.S. role in Vietnam than in effective military assistance to North Vietnam or the Vietcong.)

The Soviet delegation has had little to say in the UN Kashmir debates, although it has voted with the West in sending U Thant on a



Vicky: London Evening Standard
"They Say It's a Matter of Life and Death to Us"

peace mission, and may well be even more silent on the issue of Chinese representation, which is the only "Asian" question officially submitted to the General Assembly. It is more than suspected that the Soviet bloc—or what is left of it—let pass this year its long-awaited turn for assuming the presidency of the General Assembly because it feared that it might be called upon to arbitrate a procedural debate on the admission of Communist China, and thus invite an accusation of "sabotage" from Peking, whatever the attitude of the president might have been. The strained relationship between the Soviet Union and China has now reached the stage of open break, which consolidates the tacit understanding of Washington and Moscow on a number of vital issues.

However, because of the growing recognition that no stable peace can be achieved in Asia without bringing China into the world's conclave, the question of Chinese representation in the UN, entered as an agenda item by ten countries under the title of "restoration of the legitimate rights of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations," may well provide more maneuvering and receive more concrete attention in the Assembly's public proceedings than the more vital issues of war and peace.

Already a procedural battle is shaping up between the respective supporters of reaffirmation or cancellation of a 1961 Assembly decision that any change in the representation of China at the UN requires a two-thirds majority vote. The U.S. delegation declares itself confident that the admission of Communist China will not, by a wide margin, muster even a simple majority of votes. However, this opinion is not shared by everyone, and the warlike nature of the Peking regime, advertised by Washington as a motive for increasing opposition to UN membership, may well constitute an argument in reverse. The yearly advance "nose count" on this question leads most diplomats to believe that Peking will not come in this year, but that the margin will be very small and that the inevitable moment is in sight. In the office of one news service, a full wall has been made into a chart on which red and black symbols mark the advances of Peking's diplomatic status in the 114 member states and the most recent votes on the question in UN specialized agencies. Washington's predictions were received with the greater skepticism once its miscalculations on the support it was expecting on the issue of peace-keeping finances became evident, and caused reappraisal by President Johnson and his new representative at the UN, Ambassador Arthur Goldberg.

It fell to the lot of Justice Goldberg to convince Congress that U.S. insistence on penalties against the Soviet Union and France would neither achieve results in Moscow or Paris nor be supported by a majority in the UN, and that therefore the responsibility for the continuing paralysis of the General Assembly would be laid at the door of the United States by the membership at large. He was both skillful with Congress and candid at the United Nations when he reported on the reversal of the American Government's stand.

Realism, if not pragmatism, may be key words under the new team headed by Ambassador Goldberg. Since taking up his post, the former Supreme Court Justice and Secretary of Labor has emphasized the importance he attaches to negotiations as an instrument of policy. Decision by "consensus" may be more difficult in the UN than in Washington, but the practice has been developing for some time and will certainly be encouraged by the present U.S. Administration. With it goes a large amount of discreet, if not secret, diplomacy and less flamboyant public postures.

The magnificent oratory of Adlai Stevenson will be missed in UN councils, but not perhaps the embarrassment which came from hearing the venerated liberal statesman defend courses of action which he most likely did not approve and of which sometimes he had not even been apprised, as in the Bay of Pigs incident. Ambassador Goldberg comes to the UN with the reputation of having the ear of President Johnson, a privileged situation which will bring the White House closer to the realities of the world body. Whether this relationship will allow U.S. policy to regain some of the influence it has lost in the United Nations will depend on specific issues rather than on methods, and on the evaluation by Washington, in Congress as in the Executive branch, of the future usefulness of the United Nations, now that American idealistic illusions about the world organization have been largely shattered.

As President of the Security Council this month, at the time of the Kashmir explosion, Ambassador Goldberg has had the opportunity of testing the ground under fire, with the full backing of Washington and world public opinion.

The Nonstudent Left . . . . . . Hunter S. Thompson

Berkeley

At the height of the "Berkeley insurrection" press reports were loaded with mentions of outsiders, nonstudents and professional troublemakers. Terms like "Cal's shadow college" and "Berkeley's hidden community" became part of the journalistic lexicon. These people, it was said, were whipping the campus into a frenzy, goading the students to revolt, harassing the administration, and all the while working for their own fiendish ends. You could almost see them loping along the midnight streets with bags of seditious leaflets, strike orders, red banners of protest and cablegrams from Moscow, Peking or Havana. As in Mississippi and South Vietnam, outside agitators were said to be stirring up the locals, who wanted only to be left alone.

Something closer to the truth is beginning to emerge now, but down around the roots of the affair the fog is still pretty thick. The Sproul Hall sit-in trials ended in a series of unexpectedly harsh convictions, the Free Speech Movement has disbanded, four students have been expelled and sentenced to jail terms as a result of the "dirty word" controversy, and the principal leader, Mario Savio, has gone to England, where he'll study and wait for word on the appeal of his four-month jail term—a procedure which may take as long as eighteen months.

As the new semester begins—with a new and inscrutable chancellor—the mood on the Berkeley campus is one of watchful waiting. The basic issues of last year are still unresolved, and a big new one has been added: Vietnam. A massive nationwide sit-in, with Berkeley as a focal point, is scheduled for October 15-16, and if that doesn't open all the old wounds, then presumably nothing will.

For a time it looked as though Governor Edmund Brown had sidetracked any legislative investigation of the university, but late in August Assembly Speaker Jesse Unruh, an anti-Brown Democrat, named himself and four colleagues to a joint legislative committee that will investigate higher education in California. Mr. Unruh told the press that "there will be no isolated investigation of student-faculty problems at Berkeley," but in the same period he stated before a national conference of more than 1,000 state legislators, meeting in Portland, that the academic community is "probably the greatest enemy" of a state legislature.

Mr. Unruh is a sign of the times. For a while last spring he appeared to be in conflict with the normally atavistic Board of Regents, which runs the university, but somewhere along the line a blue-chip compromise was reached, and whatever progressive ideas the Regents might have flirted with were lost in the summer lull. Governor Brown's role in these negotiations has not yet been made public.

One of the realities to come out of last semester's action is the new "anti-outsider law," designed to keep "nonstudents" off the campus in any hour of turmoil. It was sponsored by Assemblyman Don Mulford, a Republican from Oakland, who looks and talks quite a bit like the "old" Richard Nixon. Mr. Mulford is much concerned about "subversive infiltration" on the Berkeley campus, which lies in his district. He thinks he knows that the outburst last fall was caused by New York Communists, beatnik perverts and other godless elements beyond his ken. The students themselves, he tells himself, would never have caused such a ruckus. Others in Sacramento apparently shared this view: the bill passed the Assembly by a vote of 54 to 11 and the Senate by 27 to 8. Governor Brown signed it on June 2. The Mulford proposal got a good boost, while it was still pending, when J. Edgar Hoover testified in Washington that forty-three Reds of one stripe or another were involved in the Free Speech Movement.

On hearing of this, one student grinned and said: "Well I guess that means they'll send about 10,000 Marines out here this fall. Hell, they sent 20,000 after those fifty-eight Reds in Santo Domingo. Man, that Lyndon is nothing but hip!"

Where Mr. Hoover got his figure is a matter of speculation, but the guess in Berkeley is that it came from the San Francisco Examiner, a Hearst paper calling itself "The Monarch of the Dailies." The Examiner is particularly influential among those who fear King George III might still be alive in Argentina.

The significance of the Mulford law lies not in what it says but in the darkness it sheds on the whole situation in Berkeley, especially on the role of nonstudents and outsiders. Who are these thugs? What manner of man would lurk on a campus for no reason but to twist student minds? As anyone who lives or works around an urban campus knows, vast numbers of students are already more radical than any Red Mr. Hoover could name. Beyond that, the nonstudents and outsiders California has legislated against are in the main ex-students, graduates, would-be transfers, and other young activist types who differ from radical students only in that they don't carry university registration cards. On any urban campus the nonstudent is an old and dishonored tradition. Every big city school has its fringe element: Harvard, New York University, Chicago, the Sorbonne, Berkeley, the University of Caracas. A dynamic university in a modern population center simply can't be isolated from the realities, human or otherwise, that surround it. Mr. Mulford would make an island of the Berkeley campus but, alas, there are too many guerrillas.

In 1958, I drifted north from Kentucky and became a nonstudent at Columbia. I signed up for two courses and am still getting bills for the tuition. My home was a $12-a-week room in an off-campus building full of jazz musicians, shoplifters, mainliners, screaming poets and sex addicts of every description. It was a good life. I used the university facilities and at one point was hired to stand in a booth all day for two days, collecting registration fees. Twice I walked almost the length of the campus at night with a big wooden box containing nearly $15,000. It was a wild feeling and I'm still not sure why I took the money to the bursar

---

Hunter S. Thompson is a free-lance writer, now living in San Francisco. He is completing a novel, The Rum Diary, and his book on Hell's Angels and other motorcycle gangs will be published by Ballantine in the spring.

Being a "non" or "neo" student on an urban campus is not only simple but natural for anyone who is young, bright and convinced that the major he's after is not on the list. Any list. A serious nonstudent is his own guidance counselor. The surprising thing is that so few people beyond the campus know this is going on.

The nonstudent tradition seems to date from the end of World War II. Before that it was a more individual thing. A professor at Columbia told me that the late R.P. Blackmur, one of the most academic and scholarly of literary critics, got most of his education by sitting in on classes at Harvard.

In the age of Eisenhower and Kerouac, the nonstudent went about stealing his education as quietly as possible. It never occurred to him to jump into campus politics; that was part of the game he had already quit. But then the decade ended, Nixon went down, and the civil rights struggle broke out. With this, a whole army of guilt-crippled Eisenhower deserters found the war they had almost given up hoping for. With Kennedy at the helm, politics became respectable for a change, and students who had sneered at the idea of voting found themselves joining the Peace Corps or standing on picket lines. Student radicals today may call Kennedy a phony liberal and a glamorous sellout, but only the very young will deny that it was Kennedy who got them excited enough to want to change the American reality, instead of just quitting it. Today's activist student or nonstudent talks about Kerouac as the hipsters of the '50s talked about Hemingway. He was a quitter, they say; he had good instincts and a good ear for the sadness of his time, but his talent soured instead of growing. The new campus radical has a cause, a multi-pronged attack on as many fronts as necessary: if not civil rights, then foreign policy or structural deprivation in domestic poverty pockets. Injustice is the demon, and the idea is to bust it.

What Mulford's law will do to change this situation is not clear. The language of the bill leaves no doubt that it shall henceforth be a misdemeanor for any nonstudent or nonemployee to remain on a state university or state college campus after he or she has been ordered to leave, if it "reasonably appears" to the chief administrative officer or the person designated by him to keep order on the campus "that such person is committing an act likely to interfere with the peaceful conduct of the campus."

In anything short of riot conditions, the real victims of Mulford's law will be the luckless flunkies appointed to enforce it. The mind of man could devise few tasks more hopeless than rushing around this 1,000-acre, 27,000-student campus in the midst of some crowded action, trying to apprehend and remove — on sight and before he can flee—any person who is not a Cal student and is not eligible for readmission. It would be a nightmare of lies, false seizures, double entries and certain provocation. Meanwhile, most of those responsible for the action would be going about their business in legal peace. If pure justice prevailed in this world, Don Mulford would be appointed to keep order and bag subversives at the next campus demonstrations.

There are those who seem surprised that a defective rattrap like the Mulford law could be endorsed by the legislature of a supposedly progressive, enlightened state. But these same people were surprised when Proposition 14, which reopened the door to racial discrimination in housing, was endorsed by the electorate last November by a margin of nearly 2 to 1.

Meanwhile, the nonstudent in Berkeley is part of the scene, a fact of life. The university estimates that about 3,000 nonstudents use the campus in various ways: working in the library with borrowed registration cards; attending lectures, concerts and student films; finding jobs and apartments via secondhand access to university listings; eating in the cafeteria, and monitoring classes. In appearance they are indistinguishable from students. Berkeley is full of wild-looking graduate students, bearded professors and long-haired English majors who look like Joan Baez.

Until recently there was no mention of nonstudents in campus politics, but at the beginning of the Free Speech rebellion President Kerr said "nonstudent elements were partly responsible for the demonstration." Since then, he has backed away from that stand, leaving it to the lawmakers. Even its goats and enemies now admit that the FSM revolt was the work of actual students. It has been a difficult fact for some people to accept, but a reliable poll of student attitudes at the time showed that roughly 18,000 of them supported the goals of the FSM, and about half that number supported its "illegal" tactics. More than 800 were willing to defy the administration, the Governor and the police, rather than back down. The faculty supported the FSM by close to 8 to 1. The nonstudents nearly all sided with the FSM. The percentage of radicals among them is much higher than among students. It is invariably the radicals, not the conservatives, who drop out of school and become activist nonstudents. But against this background, their attitude hardly matters.

"We don't play a big role politically," says one. "But philosophically we're a hell of a threat to the establishment. Just the fact that we exist proves that dropping out of school isn't the end of the world. Another important thing is that we're not looked down on by students. We're respectable. A lot of students I know are thinking of becoming nonstudents."

"As a nonstudent I have nothing to lose," said another. "I can work full time on whatever I want, study what interests me, and figure out what's really happening in the world. That student routine is a drag. Until I quit the grind I didn't realize how many groovy things there are to do around Berkeley: concerts, films, good speakers, parties, pot, politics, women—I can't think of a better way to live, can you?"

Not all nonstudents worry the lawmakers and administrators. Some are fraternity bums who flunked out of the university, but don't want to leave the parties and the good atmosphere. Others are quiet squares or technical types, earning money between enrollments and meanwhile living nearby. But there is no longer the sharp division that used to exist between the beatnik and the square: too many radicals wear ties and sport coats; too many engineering students wear boots and levis. Some of the most bohemian-looking girls around the campus are Left puritans, while some of the sweetest-looking sorority types are confirmed pot smokers and wear diaphragms on all occasions.

Nonstudents lump one another — and many students — into two very broad groups: "political radicals" and "social radicals." Again, the division is not sharp, but in general, and with a few bizarre exceptions, a political radical is a Left activist in one or more causes. His views are revolutionary in the sense that his idea of "democratic solutions" alarms even the liberals. He may be a Young Trotskyist, a Du Bois Club organizer or merely an ex-Young Democrat, who despairs of President Johnson and is now looking for action with some friends in the Progressive Labor Party.

Social radicals tend to be "arty." Their gigs are poetry and folk music, rather than politics, although many are fervently committed to the civil rights movement. Their political bent is Left, but their real interests are writing, painting, good sex, good sounds and free marijuana. The realities of politics put them off, although they don't mind lending their talents to a demonstration here and there, or even getting arrested for a good cause. They have quit one system and they don't want to be organized into another; they feel they have more important things to do.

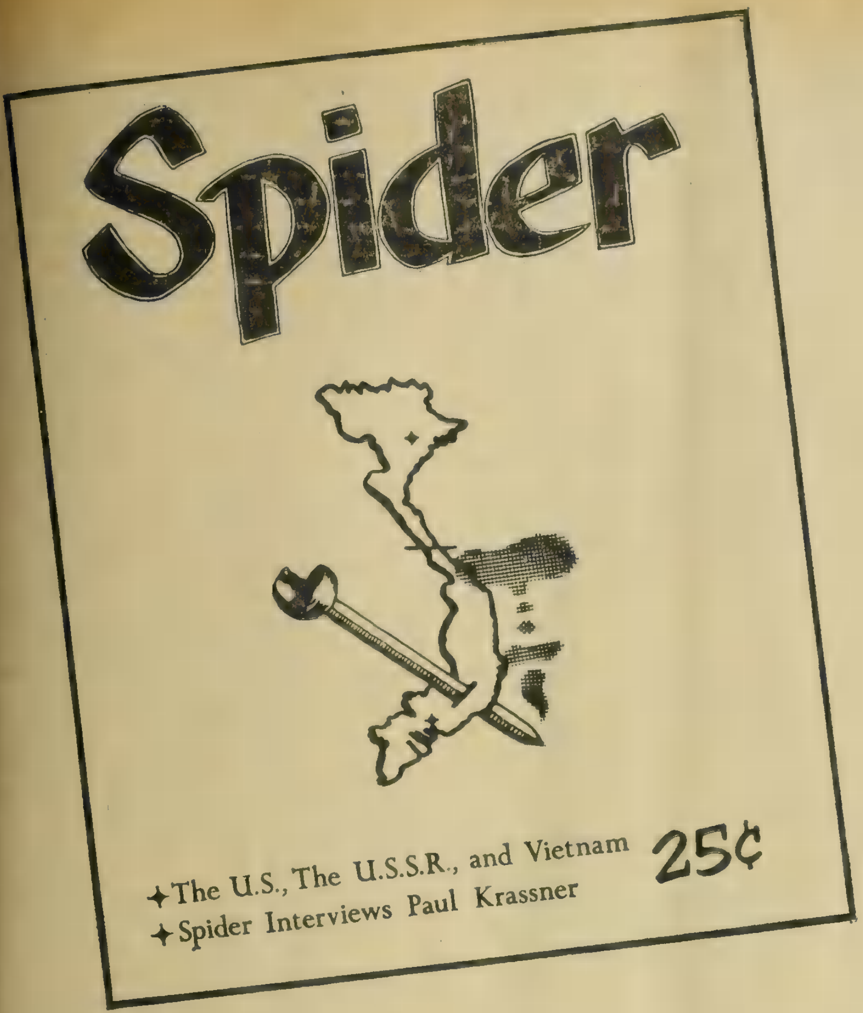
A report last spring by the faculty's Select Committee on Education tried to put it all in a nutshell: "A significant and growing minority of students is simply not propelled by what we have come to regard as conventional motivation. Rather than aiming to be successful men in an achievement-oriented society, they want to be moral men in a moral society. They want to lead lives less tied to financial return than to social awareness and responsibility."

The committee was severely critical of the whole university structure, saying: "The atmosphere of the campus now suggests too much an intricate system of compulsions, rewards and punishments; too much of our attention is given to score keeping." Among other failures, the university was accused of ignoring "the moral revolution of the young."

Talk like this strikes the radicals among "the young" as paternalistic jargon, but they appreciate the old folks' sympathy. To them, anyone who takes part in "the system" is a hypocrite. This is especially true among the Marxist, Mao-Castro element—the hipsters of the Left.

One of these is Steve DeCanio a 22-year-old Berkeley radical and Cal graduate in math, now facing a two-month jail term as a resul of the Sproul Hall sit-ins. He is doing graduate work, and therefore immune to the Mulford law. " became a radical after the 196 auto row (civil rights) demonstrations in San Francisco," he says "That's when I saw the power structure and understood the hopelessness of trying to be a liberal After I got arrested I dropped the pre-med course I'd started at San Francisco State. The worst of it though, was being screwed time and again in the courts. I'm out on appeal now with four and a hal months of jail hanging over me.

DeCanio is an editor of Spider a wild-eyed new magazine with circulation of about 2,000 on and around the Berkeley campus. Onc banned, it thrived on the publicit and is now officially ignored by th protest-weary administration. Th eight-man editorial board is comprised of four students and fou nonstudents. The magazine i dedicated, they say, to "sex, politics international communism, drugs



Spider

✦The U.S., The U.S.S.R., and Vietnam

✦Spider Interviews Paul Krassner

25¢

extremism and rock'n'roll." Hence, S-P-I-D-E-R.

DeCanio is about two-thirds political radical and one-third social. He is bright, small, with dark hair and glasses, clean-shaven, and casually but not sloppily dressed. He listens carefully to questions, uses his hands for emphasis when he talks, and quietly says things like: "What this country needs is a revolution; the society is so sick, so reactionary, that it just doesn't make sense to take part in it."

He lives, with three other nonstudents and two students, in a comfortable house on College Avenue, a few blocks from the campus. The $120-a-month rent is split six ways. There are three bedrooms, a kitchen and a big living room with a fireplace. Papers litter the floor, the phone rings continually, and people stop by to borrow things: a pretty blonde wants a Soviet army chorus record, a Tony Perkins type from the Oakland Du Bois Club wants a film projector; Art Goldberg—the arch-activist who also lives here—comes storming in, shouting for help on the "Vietnam Days" teach-in arrangements.

It is all very friendly and collegiate. People wear plaid shirts and khaki pants, white socks and moccasins. There are books on the shelves, cans of beer and Cokes in the refrigerator, and a manually operated light bulb in the bathroom. In the midst of all this it is weird to hear people talking about "bringing the ruling class to their knees," or "finding acceptable synonyms for Marxist terms."

Political conversation in this house would drive Don Mulford right over the wall. There are riffs of absurdity and mad humor in it, but the base line remains a dead-serious alienation from the "Repugnant Society" of 20th-century America. You hear the same talk on the streets, in coffee bars, on the walk near Ludwig's Fountain in front of Sproul Hall, and in other houses where activists live and gather. And why not? This is Berkeley, which DeCanio calls "the center of West Coast radicalism." It has a long history of erratic politics, both on and off the campus. From 1911 to 1913, its Mayor was a Socialist named Stitt Wilson. It has more psychiatrists and fewer bars than any other city of comparable size in California. And there are 249 churches for 120,300 people, of which 25 per cent are Negroes—one of the highest percentages of any city outside the South.

Culturally, Berkeley is dominated by two factors: the campus and San Francisco across the Bay. The campus is so much a part of the community that the employment and housing markets have long since adjusted to student patterns. A $100-a-month apartment or cottage is no problem when four or five people split the rent, and there are plenty of ill-paid, minimum-strain jobs for those without money from home. Tutoring, typing, clerking, car washing, hash slinging and baby sitting are all easy ways to make a subsistence income; one of the favorites among nonstudents is computer programing, which pays well.

Therefore, Berkeley's nonstudents have no trouble getting by. The climate is easy, the people are congenial, and the action never dies. Jim Prickett, who quit the University of Oklahoma and flunked out of San Francisco State, is another of Spider's nonstudent editors. "State has no community," he says, "and the only nonstudent I know of at Oklahoma is now in jail." Prickett came to Berkeley because "things are happening here." At 23, he is about as far Left as a man can get in these times, but his revolutionary zeal is gimped by pessimism. "If we have a revolution in this country it will be a Fascist take-over," he says with a shrug. Meanwhile he earns $25 a week as Spider's star writer, smiting the establishment hip and thigh at every opportunity. Prickett looks as much like a Red menace as Will Rogers looked like a Bantu. He is tall, thin, blond, and shuffles. "Hell, I'll probably sell out," he says with a faint smile. "Be a history teacher or something. But not for a while."

Yet there is something about Prickett that suggests he won't sell out so easily. Unlike many nonstudent activists, he has no degree, and in the society that appalls him even a sellout needs credentials. That is one of the most tangible realities of the nonstudent; by quitting school he has taken a physical step outside the system—a move that more and more students seem to find admirable. It is not an easy thing to repudiate—not now, at any rate, while the tide is running that way. And "the system" cannot be rejoined without some painful self-realization. Many a man has whipped up a hell broth of reasons to justify his sellout, but few recommend the taste of it.

The problem is not like that of high school dropouts. They are supposedly inadequate, but the activist nonstudent is generally said to be superior. "A lot of these kids are top students," says Dr. David Powellson, chief of Cal's student psychiatric clinic, "but no university is set up to handle them."

How, then, are these bright mavericks to fit into the super-bureaucracies of government and big business? Cal takes its undergraduates from the top eighth of the state's high school graduates, and those accepted from out of state are no less "promising." The ones who migrate to Berkeley after quitting other schools are usually the same type. They are seekers—disturbed, perhaps, and perhaps for good reason. Many drift from one university to another, looking for the right program, the right professor, the right atmosphere, the right way to deal with the deplorable world they have suddenly grown into. It is like an army of Holden Caulfields, looking for a home and beginning to suspect they may never find one.

These are the outsiders, the nonstudents, and the potential—if not professional—troublemakers. There is something primitive and tragic in California's effort to make a law against them. The law itself is relatively unimportant, but the thinking that conceived it is a strutting example of what the crisis is all about. A society that will legislate in ignorance against its unfulfilled children and its angry, half-desperate truth seekers is bound to be shaken as it goes about making a reality of mass education.

It is a race against time, complacency and vested interests. For the Left-activist nonstudent the race is very personal. Whether he is right, wrong, ignorant, vicious, super-intelligent or simply bored, once he has committed himself to the extent of dropping out of school, he has also committed himself to "making it" outside the framework of whatever he has quit. A social radical presumably has his talent, his private madness or some other insulated gimmick, but for the political radical the only true hope is somehow to bust the system that drove him into limbo. In this new era many believe they can do it, but most of those I talked to at Berkeley seemed a bit nervous. There was a singular vagueness as to the mechanics of the act, no real sense of the openings.

"What are you going to be doing ten years from now?" I asked a visiting radical in the house where Spider is put together. "What if there's no revolution by then, and no prospects of one?"

"Hell," he said. "I don't think about that. Too much is happening right now. If the revolution's coming, it had better come damn quick."

GREECE

What the Palace Fears . . . . .

Constantine Poulos

Athens

The Greek King's motto is "My power lies in the love of my people," but for three months now, King Constantine has had to be "protected" from some of his people by tear-gas bombs, high-pressure anti-riot fire trucks, policemen by the thousands, and army units that have encircled the city. More important, the Greek nation is in complete disarray: without, in effect, a government; with an unruly sectarian parliament, a jerry-built throne and a confused, frustrated people.

The crisis was not fortuitous, nor was it simply a consequence of the "constitutional issue"—the king defiantly usurping a prime minister's right to name his own ministers. And it was not caused by the palace's "fear of Communist infiltration of the armed forces," the armed forces having been securely controlled by the royalist-right wing for more than twenty years. What is going on in Greece is basically a power struggle.

In the elections of February, 1964, George Papandreou led his coalition Center Union to victory with a parliamentary majority of 53 per cent (the second highest in modern Greek history). The victory followed twelve years of oppressive, royalist right-wing political rule, and twenty years of oligarchic control of the nation's economy.

The Center Union's strength came from the peasants, the white-collar workers, the trade unions, the professional classes and the students. It was a loose coalition; and savoring this long-sought victory, the egocentric, octogenarian Papandreou did not wish to risk any move that would precipitously burst his dream of a glorious end for a long and checkered political career.

Consequently, he yielded to the palace demand that he appoint one of the king's men to the Ministry of National Defense. (This ministry has in all the postwar years been placed on a unique footing, being in effect regarded as part of the royal prerogative. The Greek monarchy's power lies in the loyalty of the Greek army.) Papandreou yielded further on the composition of the chiefs of staff. Again, these were men loyal to the monarchy, not to the prime minister or even to the nation. It is the same army that has rigged elections in the past—in the interest of the monarchy, its own status and the Greek Establishment.

The Prime Minister, both before

Constantine Poulos, after many years as managing editor of the Colorado Springs Free Press and as editor-publisher of the Jamestown (N.Y.) Sun, has returned to the Middle East and the Balkans, areas which he covered for The Nation during the war and postwar years. He is now a correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance.

and after his election, had promised to "cleanse" the armed forces and the brutally repressive police and gendarmerie of their predominantly pro-royalist hierarchies. He did not carry out this promise. In his election campaign he swore to expose and bring to justice the "graft and corruption" of the right-wing regime which he succeeded. He has not done so. On the contrary, he squelched parliamentary debate on this subject and sidetracked a proposed parliamentary inquiry into the preceding regime's use of "secret funds." (It is thought that these "secret funds" were largely spent on anti-Left and anti-Center activities, and in support of underground organizations of right-wing bullies and terrorists.)

Papandreou overloaded his cabinet with ministers oriented toward conservatism. His Minister of Finance gave the wealthy classes a tax cut. His Minister of Agriculture maintained high support prices for wheat and continued to purchase U.S. grain surpluses; little thought was given to the possibility of launching a structural reform of Greece's fragmented agriculture. His Minister of Labor openly sided with the anti-democratic forces of the organized labor movement. The need for careful, long-range planning was recognized, but nothing concrete was accomplished. (The Papandreou government was in power only eighteen months.)

It had been expected that the Prime Minister's son, Andreas (formerly head of the Department of Economics at the University of California, Berkeley), would direct the much needed economic programing, but his arrogance and his overbearing, premature preoccupation with politics, domestic and foreign, compromised his influence in the field where he could have proved most useful. In the process, he contributed to the estrangement from his father of many older political personalities who feared that young Papandreou's wide-ranging maneuvers presaged the establishment of a dynasty.

He is, however, a passing player in this drama, and needs to be noted only because he has become a convenient scapegoat. That he appears to have deliberately let his father down is also not too relevant.

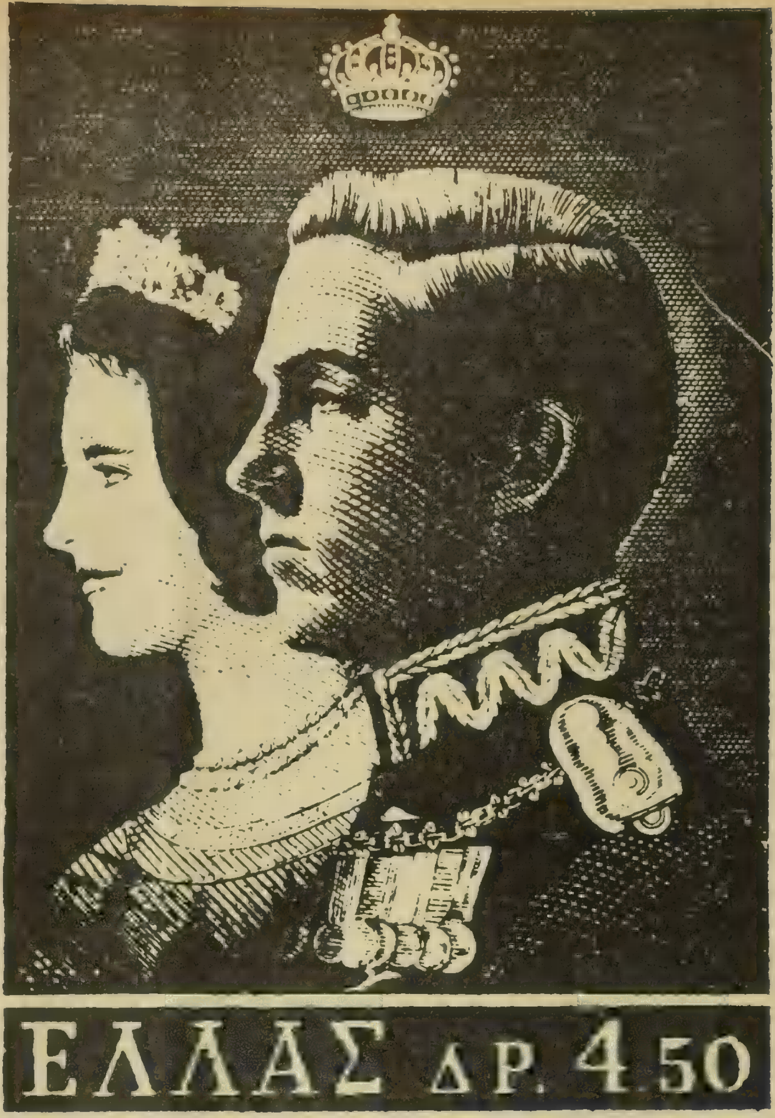
The important point is that no postwar Greek government has been able to bring about solid social and economic reform on the basis of careful long-term planning. The reason is that a few score families control more than half the national wealth. They are supported by a camp-following parvenu elite who made huge fortunes during the Nazi occupation and the subsequent U.S. aid programs. These groups easily evade taxation.

Economic growth was impressive in the 1950s, but began to sag by the end of the decade. It couldn't be sustained because the investment was mostly in the merchant fleet, roads and tourist facilities—not in directions which would help build for the future of the country. Greece's imports (largely industrial-consumer) are still about 2 to 1 over exports (largely agricultural). The export of industrial goods started its decline in 1960, and that was a figure well below 5 per cent of the total exports.

The country's economic pattern is quite obviously the creation of an unbelievably selfish oligarchy and its puny imitators—with, of course, the monarchy, the army and the antiquated, graft-ridden bureaucracy.

Bemused by a self-proclaimed sense of destiny, Prime Minister George Papandreou believed that he could set a comfortably slow pace for bringing to the Greek people the political and social justice which he had promised. His gradualism was designed to offset the fears of the palace and the Establishment.

He revamped the judiciary. With much improved wages, the judges became less subject to influences, and, when they were assured of the Prime Minister's backing against reprisals, began to give "an even break" in the courts to all classes. During Papandreou's short tenure,



"Leads one through a really impressive and magnificent selection of contributors . . . that cover 100 years of uninterrupted publication. Many of the outstanding names of the century are here."

Ralph McGill, New York Herald Tribune

100 Years of The NATION

Edited by Henry M. Christman

Introduction by

CAREY McWILLIAMS

On the occasion of The Nation's 100th Anniversary, The Macmillan Company is publishing this generous selection of memorable prose and poetry. By arrangement with the publishers, we can offer the book to Nation readers at the Special Price of $6.95.

Order today a book containing the finest pages from a magazine which, in the words of Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, leaves "no vital issues untouched."

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me (   ) copies of 100 Years of The Nation at $6.95 per copy (list price, $7.95). I enclose check for $......

Name ______________________________

Address ______________________________

City ____________ State ____________ Zip No. ____________

9-27-65

the archaic school system was considerably renovated in the direction of making free public education much more easily available. The plan also provided for free lunches in the lower grades. Technical education was encouraged; colleges outside of Athens and Salonika were proposed and plans for them set into motion. No longer were the political opinions of a grandfather, father, or older brother used to deny worthy students access to higher education. Papandreou himself held the Ministry of Education. This was not a grandstand play: his first high government post, in 1930, was the Ministry of Education under Eleftherios Venizelos. The son of a poor village priest, Papandreou received an education because his four brothers worked to support him, and thus denied themselves any education. This pooling of resources to put one member of the family through school is not unusual in Greece.

A vital factor in Papandreou's present popularity was the extension, during his eighteen months in office, of freedom of expression. Where the previous right-wing governments had prohibited political demonstrations (except when they had an anti-American flavor), Papandreou allowed them. Communist-organized "peace marches," previously banned, were carried out without hindrance or incident. The total circulation of daily newspapers in Greece increased by 200,000 after Papandreou came to power. No longer were citizens in the provinces afraid to subscribe to centrist or leftist newspapers. They were no longer listed by the gendarmerie as "Communists," nor were they harassed daily by the bully-boys of the Right. The state-owned and state-controlled radio became a much more honest medium. (There is no television in Greece.)

The program summed up in these moves may not seem earth-shaking. It provided, however, what the Greeks call an "air of freedom." It cannot be described, it cannot be spelled out—but the Greeks can "feel" it.

Nevertheless, despite Papandreou's gradualism, despite his appeasing approach to major problems, despite his conciliatory "consensus" attitudes toward the negativistic opposition — he was too much for the Establishment. Its flunkeys started sniping at him early this past spring and in July they found their aim. Papandreou's attempt to take over the Ministry of Defense for himself was the last straw. The Establishment moved.

The immature, unintellectual, mother-dominated, 25-year-old playboy King was called in and told to say his lines. He did. But nothing went according to the script. Papandreou's Center Union Party did not fall apart—neither then nor after subsequent whittling. The people, seeing their meager, new-found liberties being taken from them, were quickly aroused.

There followed a series of ridiculous maneuvers on the part of the palace and its backers to isolate Papandreou, to woo his followers, to weaken his party, to smear all his supporters as "Communists." None of these tactics has worked. Whatever the outcome of the present crisis may be (and a military dictatorship is not impossible), the basic internal struggle will continue.

The Greek people still want real political democracy and an amount of social democracy. If they have to go to the extreme Left—because they come to feel, however mistakenly, that it will satisfy their needs, demands and aspirations—they will do so. Indeed, they are doing so right now—because their government was imperiously snatched from them.

No one in Greece—except perhaps the Establishment — can answer a simple question: Why is the Communist movement so strong in Greece today? Fifteen years ago, the party was outlawed after having launched and lost a cruel civil war. Some 65,000 to 80,000 Communists fled across the northern borders. The party mechanism was completely destroyed. The few Communists who remained were imprisoned for many years, and when they came out were broken men. A ruthless Right persecuted even the slightest hint of Communist sympathy. Government departments, organizations, faculties, clergy were all "purged" of left-wing "influences." Quasi-official gangs of right-wing thugs terrorized the country while governments winked. Why, then, after fifteen years, is there a strong Communist movement in Greece?

The Establishment at present does not worry unduly about the Communists. The growing polarization of the country between extreme Right and Left, for which the palace and its backers are completely responsible, suits the Establishment well enough. It is confident that (with the help of the ever-ready army) it can handle the extreme Left. After all, both extremes use the same slogan: "It's we—or they."

What the Establishment fears most, as it now has shown, is a slow, steady erosion of its entrenched powers and privileges, by a moderate, progressive, welfare-state-oriented, worker-student-professional, bourgeois movement. It fears a bumbling, wily, mild old demagogue, who has held out his hand to the Greek people and offered them just a little bit of a better life.

The Tyranny of Charity . . . . Wendell Berry

The furniture maker is at work in the shade of some box elder trees that grow on the slope of the roadfill out at the end of his yard. Two chair posts, held by a system of pegs and wedges as in a vise, are on the puncheon bench in front of him. He is cutting the mortises into which he will later insert hewn slats to make the back of the chair. He uses a sharpened screw driver as a chisel, driving it with a heavy hand ax. Nearby is another sort of homemade vise, this one made by pinning the longer member of an inverted tree-fork into a mortise in another puncheon bench, so that the shape is roughly that of the figure 4. This he uses to hold pieces to be shaped with a drawing knife; he sits in a low chair at the end of the bench, holding his foot against the leg of the 4, by that leverage supplying the holding power of the vise.

This morning's work does not take place at any point on an assembly line. From the tree in the woods to the finished chair, the materials are handled by no hands but the furniture maker's own. In the process he uses only a few simple tools: a crosscut saw, an ax, a hand ax, a drawing knife, an auger, a pocketknife, a rasp, and the screw driver sharpened into a mortising chisel. He also has a press which he uses to set the desired curves into chair backs and rockers. One needs to see him at work in order to understand how adequately his patient craftsmanship performs tasks that are usually done now by machines.

While he works, four of his children, who have come there to the shady place with him, play with the tools he is not using or swing in the swings he has made for them in the box elders.

Held in such narrow focus, revealing only the man at work and the few primitive tools, the scene might be thought to belong to some happily simple time in the past. But it is not in the past, and it is not happy. It belongs to the coal country of East Kentucky in the summer of 1965; it belongs to the tragedy of that country and its people, and to the shame, acknowledged or not, of what some still like to call "the American way of life."

The furniture maker, who moved down onto the state road in the hope that he might sell some of his work to passers-by and travelers, lives in an old scale-house once used by a coal company to weigh trucks. The house is built of rough-sawed lumber, covered with the rather flimsy material called brick-siding; it has had no upkeep for years, and one can see that in cold weather it must be next to impossible to heat. The yard is partly a fill of coal rubble, dumped and leveled around the house, which stands bare in the hot sun. It is the most meager home site imaginable, starkly and heavily ugly, sterile and coal-stained and raw. The children who play and swing there in the shade are poorly clothed. Only the 7-year-old girl attends school, but the furniture maker and his wife will be dependent again this fall on the uneasy charity that gives away secondhand clothes. The furniture maker speaks of his distress over the presence of a "store" in the child's school. The store sells popsicles and candy and such to the children, and it is one of the furniture maker's cruel burdens, for it requires him either to send the child to school with nickels he can't afford or have the family's poverty made painfully obvious to her — and all her classmates — every day.

Wendell Berry is a poet, now living in Kentucky. His latest collection of poems is The Broken Ground (Harcourt, Brace & World).

Unable to live by his work, the furniture maker is dependent on the government's welfare program, the benefits of which are somewhat questionable, since if he sells any of his work his welfare payments are diminished accordingly, and so he stands little or no chance of improving his situation by his own effort. Only the workman's loving pride in his work can explain why he has continued to make any effort at all.

Getting out of the car there at the edge of the road, standing up to face that black yard and the bitter shambles of a house, you are inclined to forget the good you know of the place, and to be overcome by a foreboding of hopelessness that by being theirs is also mysteriously yours. It becomes a strong temptation to get back into the car and drive away, to take refuge in the thousand lies we have invented to justify the divine right to be mindlessly rich.

But once you have come upon the furniture maker at his work this initial pressing of futility is, if not replaced, at least driven back by the excellence of the workmanship being accomplished with those crude tools in defiance of the poverty of place and circumstance. And this is supported by the sight of a large well-tended garden down in the creek bottom; the furniture maker is attempting to sell some of the produce in a makeshift stand beside the road, and his wife has been busy canning and preserving.

There comes the awareness, as it still must come here and there throughout the Kentucky mountains, that as a measure of the depth of misery there still remains a height of pride — a sort of last stand of hopefulness shaped in a neat garden, a few flowers in bloom. It may be only because of this that the misery itself does not yet represent the dead end of vision. One can bear the knowledge of the furniture maker's situation because there remains in the man himself the promise as well as the hope of something better.

Though the furniture maker's house and household wear the look of long poverty that is commonplace in the region, there are significant differences between his predicament and that of most. For while most of the poor have become so because of the lack of employment, the furniture maker still applies himself industriously to his work. And while the majority are handicapped by lack of skills, the furniture maker is a consummate craftsman. While the mentality of most has been conditioned by a long dependence on coal company and union, the furniture maker is self-employed and in full possession of the discipline and pride of the craftsman who is his own boss. And in a region, moreover, which has suffered a thorough social upheaval in the change from a dependence on the land to a dependence on industry, the furniture maker came to his work by inheritance. Asked how he learned his craft, he replies: "It come to me from my ancestors."

The furniture maker's predicament is that though he has work, it is work that is very near to being useless and meaningless. He is prevented, as I have said, from using it to augment his income from the welfare program. And he is bound to the program by his inability to make a living entirely from his work. He lacks, for one thing, a dependable market. Such furniture as he makes is either not sufficiently valued by enough people to assure a market, or the affluent passers-by who are his potential customers simply refuse to believe that anything of value could be produced in such a sorry-looking place. For another thing, he is so slowed by his old tools that he could hardly make more furniture than he does even if he had more customers. It takes him, for instance, about a month to make one of the large rocking chairs that bring from $70 to $90. He can sell only three or four of these a year, and most of his time is taken up by articles from which he earns much less.

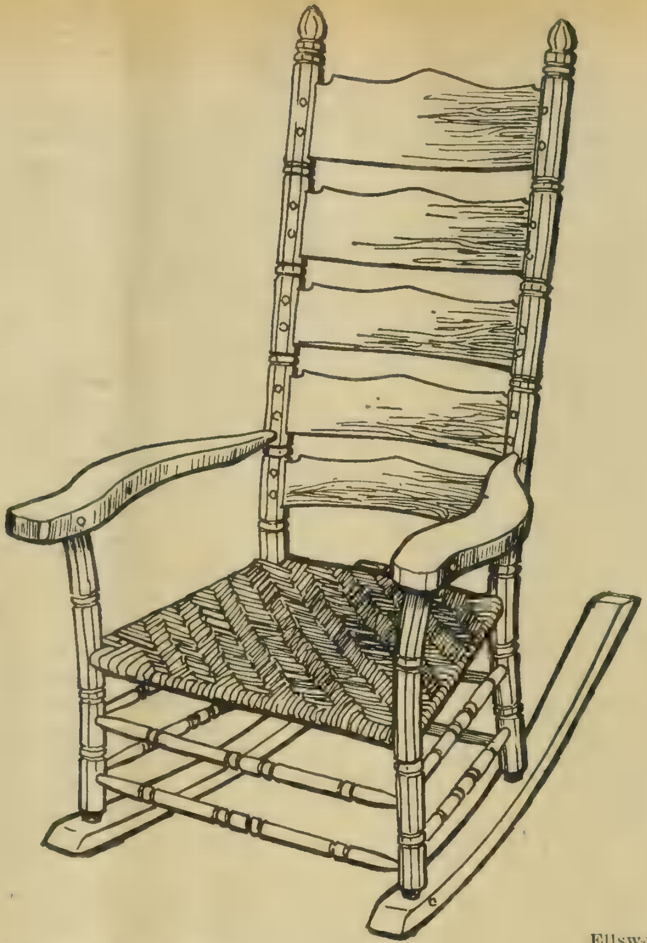
For fear that this will seem to anyone to be a sentimental defense of an anachronism, I hurry to say that this man's work, particularly in his chairs, is among the finest I have ever seen. The chairs are certainly the strongest and best made of their kind that I know of. They are beautifully proportioned and balanced. Such ornamentation as is used is modest, and tasteful in a way that transcends fashionableness. They are made to last a lifetime and more, and their strength is achieved without expense of grace. It is hard to think of a room, rich or poor, that would not be dignified by the presence of one of them, and impossible to imagine a householder who would need to condescend to own one.

This, then, is an exceptional man. But if his troubles are not typical of the region, they are nevertheless indigenous to it, and are peculiarly revealing of the region's troubles. His fate cannot be separated from the fate of his land. Like every poor man in East Kentucky, he is suffering from the deficiency of schools and opportunities in a land sold out by the greed of its elected officials, and systematically plundered by the coal companies. If the truth were not already available to anyone who cares to know it in Harry Caudill's Night Comes to the Cumberlands, it would be almost mathematically demonstrable that a land of such wealth could have been reduced to such poverty only by fraud. (The region itself is not poor; the big money did not come there to get lost.) That the land and its people could have been so far brought down is explainable only by the failure of governors to govern and legislators to legislate and judges to judge, in the interest of those they are sworn to serve — only by the subservience of our governmental ideals to the stupidity and greed of officials who have been willing to justify, by a spurious rhetoric of free enterprise, the right of the rich to get richer, by any means, at anybody's expense.

It is not possible to escape the irony of the fact that the furniture maker — a man of skill and industry, whose craft is itself one of the valuable resources of his region and nation, and who is engaged constantly in making products of great beauty and usefulness — is destitute in America, now. This, it must be remembered, is the very man whose promise the American Government was established to redeem. By all our public claims he ought to be one of the prime beneficiaries of our system. As it is, he is its victim. And if he, with his skill and his devoted effort, has wound up un-r the heels of the exploiters, what pe can there be for those who are ss able?

The reaction of good sense to this ian's predicament can only be to k: Instead of food stamps, why ot tools? The food-stamp program, t up as it is to neutralize whatever income is earned by personal fort, is clearly stifling to ambition, aking it certainly much easier, if ot more remunerative as well, to nothing. On the other hand, the w power tools which would be ecessary to increase the man's productivity (perhaps enough to make im independent of government iveaways) would probably cost a ood deal less than a year's supply f food stamps. The gift of tools, hich would honor the capacity of e man to survive the troubles of is region and to support himself, ould look toward a just end of the ederal intervention in the region. he gift of food alone, whether or ot limited to an established minimum, can lead only to an endless ependence on governmental chary — in which case charity becomes o more than a subtle form of oppression. If a man continues long direct and absolute dependence n the government for the necessities of life, he ceases to be a citizen nd becomes a slave.

The federal government has nade no attempt to deal with the urniture maker in terms of his particular abilities and needs. And the Division of Arts and Crafts of the state government, which would be hought the most logical source of help, seems completely puzzled by him: his output is too small, the quality and price too high. The state seems prepared to encourage only such arts and crafts as can be mass produced at dime-store prices. One gathers that the emphasis is entirely on sales, and that no consideration at all is given to the quality of the work or the integrity of the workman. The division's sole impulse in dealing with the furniture maker is to "change" him — which is to say to diminish and cheapen him. His only hope, the division feels, is to reduce the quality of his work in order to raise the volume and lower the price, or make something more marketable — souvenir whistles, for instance. Nobody seems to have considered the possibility that it would be most natural, and even most expedient, to help him to make a living by doing what he already does supremely well. Nobody seems to know how he might get hold of some tools.



Ellsworth Taylor

The truth is that the furniture maker is the dependent of his region in a more meaningful and crucial way than he ever will be the dependent of any government. And the measures that will lead to his recovery are those that will lead to the recovery of the region.

But at this moment East Kentucky is caught in the relentless grind of governmental cross-purposes. The federal government is there, carrying out various programs to assure that everybody will eat. Under the circumstances that is commendable. But it is commendable only as a temporary expedient. To be worthy of admiration in any final sense, government help will have to accomplish the result of making itself unnecessary. It must be acknowledged both by the government and the people that the charity programs can do no more than the minimum — can only prevent starvation. An agency or bureau or institution cannot exercise taste and judgment, cannot be motivated by love or compassion, cannot value a man for his industry or his art or his pride; they are abstractions themselves and must deal with people as abstractions.

To give a man bread when he needs a tool is as inept and unfeeling as to give him a stone when he needs bread, and this painful clumsiness is inherent in the generalizations of the social planners and the organized charities. Their most "humane" endeavors almost necessarily involve an attitude toward humanity that debases it. The tendency to deal with individual citizens exclusively in terms of the abstractions of their class or condition is to strike at the very foundation of American liberty, which was established to safeguard the possibility and the right of escape from such abstractions—the right to become exceptional. For the government to treat the furniture maker simply as one of the Appalachian poor is not only to insult and threaten him as an individual but to work at the destruction of the possibility that such craftsmen will ever live in the country again. To wage a "war on poverty" in such a way as to encourage the exceptional to become ordinary would seem to imply an expectancy of defeat.

The furniture maker possesses the skill and the industry and the pride that make envisionable for him the personal triumph on which most of our ideas of human worth and dignity depend: the triumph of making a living in the work of one's choice, by one's own effort, by the use of one's own gifts. And this triumph. is completely beyond the reach of any government or bureau. It cannot be achieved except by a man's own doing. What government can do — and this has always been one of the acknowledged functions of government — is to create and protect a condition in which personal effort is meaningful.

But having established, and given extravagant publicity to the necessarily superficial expedient of feeding the hungry, the government seems to be doing little to bring about the economic health of the region. In can be said, in fact, that the government is tacitly abetting the further gutting of the region by the coal companies. The history of the greed and irresponsibility of these companies in East Kentucky does not need repeating. It only needs to be added that as this is being written strip mining is going on there at an unprecedented rate' — in a silence of federal power which seriously threatens all corrective efforts of the state. And it needs to be said that this sort of mining involves not only the further departure of the region's wealth, with little or no benefit to the region, but the irreparable destruction of the region itself.

In the face of this crisis, which demands prompt and decisive action, the federal government has embarked on a two-year "study." For two years, then, nothing is likely to be done. And the bulldozers will grind on in a destructiveness surpassing that of any war or natural calamity; the mine owners will grow richer; the people will grow poorer; the possibilities of the region will be steadily and rapidly diminished. To anyone who has watched a strip mine being worked or has seen the results — th huge dead gashes in the mour tain sides, timbered slopes inunda ed by avalanches of sterile ove burden, streams poisoned by acid and choked with rocks and mu wells made unfit for use, the lan and the homes of citizens destroye
— this two-year study is bafflin and astonishing. It is not possib to imagine why it should take tw years to "study" a situation tha could be shown to be critical — t anyone with a live intelligence – in two days. Here again one smell the stench of the political fraud an bureaucratic paralysis that have be gun to seem as natural to the regio as coal.

Since the federal governmen is the largest customer (throug TVA) of strip-mined coal, and cor sequently the chief depressor of co prices and the chief discourager c the less destructive deep minin one must wonder if there is an real intention to do more for th region than to ask the best and th worst to come together to eat ou of the government's hand.

Can We Live With Our Cars?

Elinor C. Guggenheime

Within the memory of a number of people still alive, the first horseless carriages appeared on our dirt roads and cobbled streets. They were as amusing to watch as a baby, moving from the creeping to the toddling stage. They were the toys of tinkerers and of a handful of the rich. Certainly, no one at the turn of the century could have foreseen the "automobile explosion," but a few visionaries did predict some of the changes which were about to occur. Henry James remarked that the automobile would be "a great transformer of life and of the future"; Thomas Alva Edison announced that the horse was doomed. But the average man, possessed of average common sense, enjoyed the satisfaction of advising the cranks — and the crankers—to "get a horse."

When General Motors was formed in 1908, the notion that its welfare could ever be thought synonymous with that of the United States would have seemed absurd. During the almost sixty years since then, the automobile has wrought staggering changes in our economy and our society. One thing remains true, however: what is good for General Motors, or Ford, or for the manufacturers of foreign cars now flooding in through our ports, is not necessarily good for all the people of the United States. Furthermore, what is currently good for the industry may be creating excesses that will curtail the usefulness of its product.

Automotive "progress" has been responsible for the irresistible thrusts of asphalt into our parks and meadow lands, across our countryside and along our river edges. It has ripped up our trees and has leveled the land contours in the rural areas; it has choked up the streets and polluted the air of our cities; and its omnivorous need for facilities to serve its purpose has devoured our land. We are t day the blessed beneficiaries progress. We are also its victim

Recently, the President's Confe
ence on Natural Beauty paid a gre deal of attention to the matter highways. Principally, the confere were concerned with billboards th detracted from vistas which wou otherwise delight passing motorist Relatively little attention was pai however, to the fact that highway in and of themselves, frequent destroy important natural areas.

It is not unusual today to s parks, which once represented t last reservation of natural land f city dwellers, lacerated by highwa that leave the park areas fra mented. It is always simpler build highways through open area and parks are natural prey. B even residential areas are not i mune. Some of our finest hom and some of our most precio landmarks have disappeared befo the onward march of roads.

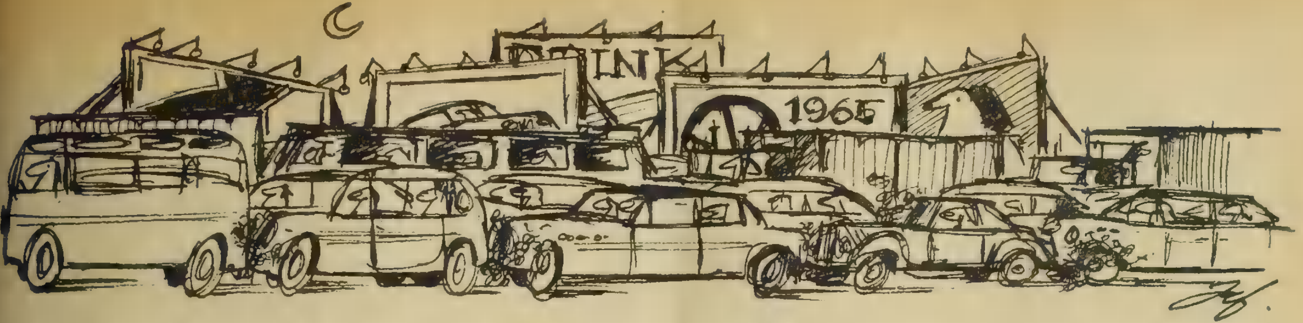
Elinor C. Guggenheimer is Commissioner of New York's City Planning Commission.



Highway engineers are inevitably reoccupied with insuring economy nd efficiency. The automobile in- ustry is preoccupied with increas- ıg the demand for cars. And au- ımobile owners are interested in nproving travel in general and increasing the range of their cars. The answer for all three, until recently, has been the building of more and better highways, with more and better interconnecting links and spaghetti-like interchanges. Relatively few people, until recently, have spoken out for the trees and the wild-life areas, and the pleasant sloping country-sides that are disappearing.

Every day, in the Bay Area alone, our automobiles pump 6,400 tons of pollutants into the air we breathe.

In Los Angeles, 7.5 million gallons of gasoline are burned every day, and in downtown Los Angeles, man has given more than two-thirds of the land surface to the automobile — in streets, access roads, freeways, interchanges, parking space and service stations.

Last year in California, almost 5,000 people were killed in car accidents. That amounted, in numbers, to wiping out the population of, say, Sausalito. More than 215,000 people were injured—and that's about the number of people who live in California's capital city.

The new automobiles which roar into life each year in California outnumber the number of babies born here.

This year the state government will spend (including subventions to local governments) more than $1.25 billion on highways and other direct costs of the automobile. That's $70 for every man, woman, child and infant in the state. And it doesn't include the tragic and inestimable costs of loss of life, human injury and property damage. . . .

The point is not to condemn the automobile, or to suggest that its disadvantages outweigh its advantages. I mean to say that as citizens of California we must begin now to examine all the implications of the automobile—and its proper role as merely one means of meeting the transportation needs of modern man. And I mean to say that transportation is only one of many compelling problems of common concern.

Excerpt from an address delivered by Alan Cranston, State Controller, to the Commonwealth Club of California, Aug. 6, 1965

On through the decades, as highways have improved and as mass production has made the automobile more available, accessory demands have arisen. First of all, because of the automobile's limited life, "burial grounds" or junkyards, are necessary. Secondly, the turnover in cars, induced by constant improvements, has accounted for a tremendous secondhand car-lot development. The growing number of automobiles require a growing number of service stations; and the growing number of motorists require recreation and refreshments. The entrances to our cities have been made hideous by "automobile rows"; by the string of shopping centers surrounded by seas of parked cars; by drive-in movies and neon-lit hamburger joints. But even so, roads and facilities barely keep pace with the rising demands of the automobile. Road planners frequently predict bumper-to-bumper traffic on highways and expressways that have not yet been completed.

The automobile has encouraged the development of metropolitan areas, and it is within metropolitan areas that the impact of traffic is greatest. Highways leading into cities are frequently built by authorities that are not controlled by the city government itself. Traffic generated by new and better highway systems streams into the core areas of cities and strangles them.

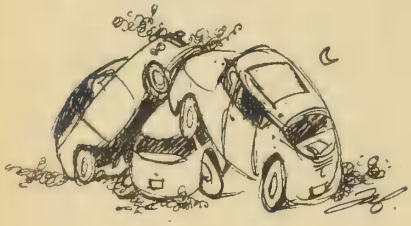
Furthermore, the automobile makes the most inefficient possible use of existing pavement. Recently, a member of the New York City Transit Authority, in a letter urging that more attention be paid to the problems of mass transportation, pointed out that in "1911 a horse-drawn truck could speed through the city streets at 11 miles an hour. Today, automobiles are forced to crawl at an average speed of 6 miles an hour when crossing Manhattan." In peak hours a 9-foot-wide lane in town centers can accommodate per hour 16,000 persons on foot; between 5,600 and 18,000 by bus (depending on the capacity of the bus) and 40,000 persons per track by rapid transit. In contrast to this, a 9-foot-wide lane in a town center can accommodate only 1,200 persons traveling by car. In actuality, the figures become even more startling because cars are rarely filled to capacity. The average number of persons per car, traveling in cities, is 1.5 to 1.7, rising at peak hours to 1.84. To put it a different way, three lanes of autos in one direction carry 4,100 persons per hour, and one local plus one express track carry 100,000 to 120,000 persons per hour. Sooner or later we must face the fact that if people are to move around a city freely they must forsake the automobile.

Merchants in the central business district of most cities urge more parking lots, because without adequate parking arrangements they cannot compete with suburban shopping centers. But parking lots generate traffic. They attract cars by their presence and they clog adjoining streets during hours when people are entering or leaving the lots or garages. Parking lots are useful for attracting customers only if they are convenient; if approaches to them become too clogged and the waiting period is too long they do not serve the purpose for which they are intended.

London, Paris, Rome and Tokyo

have joined the long list of cities undertaking studies and expressing deep concern for the steadily worsening traffic situations. In some instances cities have barred cars in sections of downtown areas. This is a drastic solution which orderly control might be able to avoid. The Buchanan report ("Traffic in Towns," London, 1963) states in a sentence what will happen in the absence of control: "The rising tide of cars will not put a stop to itself until it has almost put a stop to the traffic, essential and non-essential alike."

Traffic congestion has also contributed to the problem of air pollution. Even if the fumes from automobiles are not the major cause of air pollution, they are extremely unpleasant. At best they can be called a nuisance and, at worst, a health hazard. In California, motor-vehicle exhaust is recognized as perhaps the major source of atmospheric pollution. Congress has taken recent notice of this, and exhaust-suppressive devices to be installed in new cars should help. However, the devices now proposed will be only partially effective, and additional research is required.



Congress has grown restive over more than pollution. It is worried also about safety—about tires, padded dashboards, collapsible steering wheels, anti-skid devices, laminated safety glass, and a variety of other safety devices, to cut the always appalling accident rate. Sen. Abraham Ribicoff has been leading the efforts to improve the mechanical safety of cars.

Service stations and parking lots are meeting more and more opposition. New zoning resolutions attempt to exclude them from as many districts as possible. Industry has never been concerned about the appearance of service stations, secondhand car lots or other accessory uses. Many of them are decorated with wrecks. The advertising signs, the posters and the varicolored flags hanging like dirty underwear are an affront. In general, they have a downgrading effect on the area surrounding them.

The shopping centers, with their container-type architecture, are changing the roadside all over the country. Our finest architects take pride in the construction of major office and residential buildings, and of airport facilities. But their contributions to our cities are overshadowed by the vulgar design of the service station and the tasteless landscaping, or total lack of site planning, associated with parking facilities. Suggestions for improving such facilities, if they were publicized by the federal government, might raise the standards of some of our shortsighted entrepreneurs.

A good many communities are waging war against new highways. Recently, a California proposal to route freeways through certain established communities brought an all-out battle. In Bronxville, N.Y., citizens took up arms against bulldozers that were uprooting trees in an expressway widening. This battle was lost, but the spirit of revolution is growing and it is evident that uncontrolled highway construction will not much longer be feasible. Sooner or later, determined citizens will rout the bulldozers and an entire highway plan may go down to defeat. If such a highway is part of an organized plan it will mean the disruption of that plan. It is essential, therefore, that the controls be established by government before orderly planning is destroyed by revolution.

No easy contraceptive pill exists to counteract the "automobile explosion," and discipline will have to be applied if the automobile is to be kept a servant of human welfare. The problem is national, and the time has come for the federal government to assume leadership. The President should establish a commission, consisting of the Secretaries of Commerce, Interior, Labor, Defense and the new Department of Urban Affairs. In addition to these government officials, the commission should include top management and labor representatives from the automotive industries, and from all accessory industries; city planners; representatives of the American Institute of Architects; and representatives from the Society of Landscape Architects. The commission should be instructed to submit to the President and to the nation concret suggestions for the planned futur development of our highways an carefully designed recommendations for the construction and disposition of roadside facilities.

It should give special attentio to the problems of central cities since three-quarters of our citizen reside in cities. It should recommend plans for routing traffi around the cities and for increase subsidies to rapid transit and commuter systems. It should propos zoning patterns that will enabl communities to control the desig as well as the location of automotive facilities. The Buchanan report refers to "the magnitude o the emergency that is coming upo us and the inspiration of the challenge it presents." It states furthe that "we are nourishing at immens cost a monster of great potentia destructiveness." I do not subscrib to the theory that the automobil is a monster—it is merely a chil that is being allowed to run wild. I has served us well in emergencie and disasters. It has brought pleasure to millions and it has move forward, not merely the passenger it carries, but the entire worl Nevertheless, it has desecrated th landscape, strangled cities, and lef behind it a choking atmosphere o polluted air and a string of Kustar Kastles. Today, the automobile i ravening. We can continue to fee its inexhaustible appetite or we ca put it on a diet that will enabl us to live with it. Planned automobile-hood is overdue!

So far this year, 13,857 junked cars have been picked up by Department of Sanitation tow-truck crews. During 1964, 23,386 were removed. In 1960, the department dealt with only 2,500 such encumbrances. The present annual cost of towing abandoned cars from the city's streets to a department depot, plus the storage of the vehicle for twenty days under current legal procedure, is estimated at more than half a million dollars. In 1964, approximately half of the abandoned cars were sold at public auction, netting the city $102,479. The remaining unsalable cars constituted a massive storage and handling problem until they were finally disposed of in Department of Sanitation land fills.

From statements made by the N. Y. Department of Sanitation

The Goals of the Group

IE LOST UNIVERSE. By Gene Weltfish. Basic Books. 506 pp. $12.50.

IE LONG DEATH: The Last Days of the Plains Indians. By Ralph K. Andrist. The Macmillian Co. 371 pp. $8.95.

D'Arcy McNickle

xcept that they deal with Indian bject matter, The Long Death and e Lost Universe are in no respects mparable. Their methods are dif-rent, their purposes are different, t each in its own way is a com-lling narrative.

Mr. Andrist has had part of his perience writing radio documen-ries, and the text of The Long eath reflects that experience. It is sual and auditory, full of the move-ent and the clatter of charging dies of men. When he interrupts e headlong dash of his narrative analyze Indian character, or gov-nment policy, or citizen action in half of peaceful frontier solutions, becomes tendentious, even tedi-is. No one, Indian or white, emerges full hero; no one is intelligently or manely motivated. It is a surface count of the long agony of Indian feat—bitter, caustic, denigrating.

The author does not limit his nar-tive to the Plains Indians of his tle but leaps over the mountains to e Pacific Northwest to trace the atchless retreat of Chief Joseph and s Nez Percés followers and to relate ptain Jack's tragic effort to hold is Modoc country. These were mov-g events in the total Indian story d one does not regret their inclu-on.

One has more serious difficulties ith the book's thesis. The Wounded nee massacre was, indeed, a sor-wful day for the Plains Indians, ut it was not the end. A way of life as ruthlessly closed out, but the dians endured. There are more Sioux today than there were in 1890, while the traits of character, the attitudes and the values which are identifiably Indian, still operate and confound all predictions about the "Vanishing American."

The how and why of this survival will be found in Dr. Weltfish's scholarly but highly readable study of the Pawnee Indians. The Lost Universe is an account of a single year, a full calendar round, in which the secular and religious activities of the people are detailed. The year is 1867, a time when Pawnee observances still made up an integrated way of life, though the population had been severely reduced by disease and warfare.

Estimated at some 12,000 in the 1830s, the tribe, consisting of four separate bands, numbered less than 4,000 in 1859 when it settled on the Loup River near what is now Genoa, Neb., following a treaty with the United States. This study of the Pawnee, by making explicit the values embedded in the society of one of the great Plains tribes, supplies what is missing from the Andrist volume. It also heightens the sense of tragedy for what was destroyed.

The apparent reluctance of the Indians to fight during the winter months, for example, might leave one wondering about their stamina. They seemed not to learn that "the Army did not stop making war" merely because the grass withered and traveling became difficult, Mr. Andrist observes. Mr. Andrist, in telling us this, also tells us of their repeated failure to post guards around camp and the frequency with which they were slaughtered in surprise attacks. One wonders if these could be the same people who appear in story and picture, always spying out the enemy or disappearing into the landscape when matched against a superior force.

Possible answers to both questions, and to many others, are at least suggested by what Dr. Weltfish tells us of the Pawnees. For these Indians, and perhaps for most of the Plains Indians, the winter months were the months when the people returned from their journeys to become one people again, to relate their exploits and to renew the ceremonies which made them one people set apart from all others. The warm-weather months were too crowded with activity for these necessary observances.

The shrewder of the army commanders made the most of this trait by defeating camp after camp in the later years of the war on the Plains. It was not lack of stamina—most of the tribes went out on midwinter hunts while the buffalo were still fat and easily hunted in the deep snow—but faithfulness to a way of life. Winter was not for fighting, and a pursuing army could not alter so fundamental an aspect of the moral order.

As to the question of posting sentinels to guard against surprise attacks, Dr. Weltfish suggestively writes that "they were a well-disciplined people under many trying circumstances. And yet they had none of the power mechanisms that we consider essential to a well-ordered life. No orders were ever issued. No assignments for work were ever made. . . . The only instigator of action was the consenting person." Even in so critical an area of public safety as the posting of camp guards, the will of the individual governed. According to Dr. Weltfish, a young man would say, "I think I'll go up to the sentry post early tomorrow morning." A friend would respond, "I think I'll do that too." In due course as many men as were needed would have volunteered.

It is conceivable, under such a system of individual consent, that there would be temporary lapses, moments when the guard was down. Any democratic society based on the consent of the governed is vulnerable to sneak attack from a militant neighbor.

The Pawnee system of individual consent brings us to one of the central themes of the book, for Dr. Weltfish is manifestly interested in the meaning of democracy, as practiced by this tribe, which lived in the Missouri River basin for more than 600 years—a longer time perspective than archaeologists of the area formerly reckoned with. She asked repeatedly how the people managed to live together without centralized authority and could find no instance in which a political leader, a priest, or even a senior member of a household presumed to give orders at large or to another individual. Even formal discussion for the purpose of arriving at a consensus was not a general procedure. When asked how plans were worked out, who discussed them, the informant would answer, "They didn't discuss it at all. They don't talk about it. It goes along just as it happens to work out."

---

'Arcy McNickle, a member of the onfederated Salish and Kootenai ibes of Montana, is director of merican Indian Development and is e author of The Indian Tribes of e United States: Ethnic and Cul-ral Survival (Oxford University ress).

Social forms, she decided, "were carried within the consciousness of the people, not by others who were in a position to make demands." For such a system to operate, as this one did for a longer period than most modern democracies have existed, participation had to be universal, the autonomy of the individual had to be inviolable, and the individual had to be internally disciplined and responsible, not for himself alone, but for the entire group within which he functioned.

What brought down the Pawnees was not a failure in the society but diseases against which they had no immunity; competition with the Sioux, intensified by a shrinking economic base; and finally by the total destruction of that base, the buffalo herds. And behind all of this was the incoming white man, who practiced a democracy in which every man wants to be king.

The development of the individual within his society is yet another part of the question raised by Pawnee democracy, which Dr. Weltfish explores. "One thing is clear," she writes, "no one is caught within the social order . . . each person stands as his own person." The child was born into a community, but was never swallowed up by it. From the beginning he was made to feel that his identity was with the infinite cosmos, as the roundhouse within which he lived served as a central observation post from which the movements of the planets and the stars were calculated for ceremonial purposes.

Affection came from many sources, in varying degrees of kinship intimacy, but affection never became a smothering overprotection. "The special concern of his mother did not mean that he was so closely embedded with her emotionally that he was not able to move about." Move about he did, to the homes of his uncles, his half-brothers, his grandparents, always certain of food and warmth, "and there was no reason why he should hesitate to set out alone and explore the wide world, even though years should pass before he returned." The world, indeed, was his home. Dr. Weltfish contends that "it is not easy for us to perceive the wide gap in kind between Pawnee society and our own, and yet in the face of all the terrible events of the past and the pressure to destroy his personality, surely it must mean something that the American Indian has maintained his identity among us."

If the meaning of Pawnee identity eludes us at this moment in time, the occasion may yet arise when we find ourselves retracing the social development of these once despised denizens of the Plains for the threads of continuity which successfully carried them beyond disaster.

One such thread certainly was the individual—not the social form or the institution, which may stifle individual growth and in any case is a temporal creation of fallible men. The Pawnees were fortunate in that they were born into a fluid society. "The individual personality was not trimmed down to fit the kin structure, but the structure was used to realize the individual personality. The Pawnee social structure was written into no statute books, nor did it have the status of doctrine, and there was no chain of command enforce it."

With freedom to move and to gro the individual carried out his co mitment to the group, not because coercive sanctions or internalized gui but because in his own searching f goals he was realizing the goals the group. "His aspiration [was] n to surpass some one else, but to beyond his own past achievement And therefore, his aspirations, ev his personal name, were secrets whi he shared discreetly, if ever. To spe publicly of such matters was to invi competition and conflict.

In such a society, the individu was the keystone. This, the Pawne as well as other Indians, understoo Which perhaps is the ultimate e planation of why the Indian peop have kept their identity through adversity. After all forms had cru bled, the man stood revealed.

On that final point, having minded us that the problems of o bomb-ridden, automated age "call f drastic revisions in our age-old mo vations," Dr. Weltfish concludes th "it is within the individual that t universe will be regained."

This, also, the Pawnees knew.

Reflections on Gaols

ON THE PENITENTIARY SYSTEM IN THE UNITED STATES AND ITS APPLICATION IN FRANCE. By Gustave de Beaumont and Alexis de Tocqueville. Southern Illinois University Press. 222 pp. $6.

Norval Morris

In May of 1831, Alexis de Tocqueville, aged 26, and Gustave de Beaumont, aged 29, arrived in the United States to spend ten months, at their own expense but under official French auspices, studying American penitentiaries and houses of refuge. They published On the Penitentiary System in the United States and Its Application in France in Paris and in Philadelphia in 1833, the English translation being the work of Francis Lieber. Compared with Tocqueville's remarkably prescient Democracy in America, also in part the product of his observations and discussions on this trip, his survey with Beaumont of American penitentiaries is lit known; it is nevertheless a gracef and thoughtful study of importan to the history of correctional theo and practice, and its republication Southern Illinois University Pre with an excellent concise introdu tion by Prof. Thorsten Sellin, is co mendable.

In 1833, unlike today, much phi sophical literature, many shapely says, and an abundance of learn pamphlets were devoted to proble of penal sanctions; suddenly, simil interests are being forced upon of us, though they have not yet tracted, as they did in the early 19 century, the better minds of the d Of course, all was not then ratio argument and sober planning; t uplifting moral precept of a high gree of practical irrelevance w much in vogue. As Beaumont a Tocqueville comment: ". . . there in America as well as in Euro estimable men whose minds fe upon philosophical reveries, a whose extreme sensibility feels want of some illusion."

Norval Morris is Julius Kreeger Professor of Law and Criminology at the University of Chicago.

The pressure toward consideration f these topics today is less academic ıan practical, less theoretical than f threatening social significance, ith crime in the streets an issue of ational political interest, as well as f pressing importance to the inabitants of the urban agglomeraons that increasingly proliferate cross the country. Yet what we still eed is more—not less—theory; better alidated guides to action, not more ction for action's sake; more critical valuation of what we are doing; and lso, in the manner of Beaumont nd Tocqueville, more intelligent atiocination directed toward what night be, to the limits of the praccal and feasible. And we want ıose who will not merely speculate nd spin words but will measure and ount, and like Beaumont and Tocqueille "have at least the advantage of iving to our arguments none but olid foundations."

It is often forgotten that the enitentiary, the state and federal rison as we now know it, is an merican invention, and that if one vanted to study prisons in the first alf of the 19th century it was to his country that one came. There vere, of course, European and even sian antecedents to the prison, but roadly, until the development of the Valnut Street Gaol in Philadelphia, he prison was not used for the punshment of serious crime anywhere n the world. The prison until then erved a series of different purposes; f one went to an English prison, ay in 1780, one would find there hree groups of inmates: First, those waiting trial or appeal against their onvictions or sentences; secondly, lebtors, civil and criminal, awaiting he time when they or their friends ould find the funds to purchase heir release; and thirdly, those waiting punishment which might be apital, corporal or the less than leasant journey in a convict ship o the sunnier climes of Australia. One would not find inmates imrisoned as a punishment. That idea irst gained acceptance in Philadelhia and from there spread throughut the world with swift luxuriance. Beaumont and Tocqueville concisely ell this Philadelphia story as folows:

> Though the penitentiary system in the United States is a new institution, its origin must be traced back to times already long gone by. The first idea of a reform in the American prisons belongs to a religious sect in Pennsylvania. The Quakers, who abhor all shedding of blood, had always protested against the barbarous laws which the colonies inherited from their mother country. In 1786, their voice succeeded in finding due attention, and from this period, punishment of death, mutilation and the whip were successively abolished in almost all cases by the Legislature of Pennsylvania. A less cruel fate awaited the convicts from this period. The punishment of imprisonment was substituted for corporal punishment, and the law authorized the courts to inflict solitary confinement in a cell during day and night, upon those guilty of capital crimes. It was then that the Walnut Street prison was established in Philadelphia.

The prison is again in process of rapid change. Correctional administrators and scholars devote themselves to developing and planning a variety of penal sanctions alternative to the walled banishment which is prison, and are aspiring to treat offenders with meaningful and effective control in the community in which they will live, whether or not they are temporarily banished. And even within the walls there is a gradual development away from the pachydermatous monsters which characterized penal institutions in this country and toward smaller prisons of diverse character, with and without walls, but with a milieu matched to the prisoners' various rehabilitative needs.

There is also a developing realization of the importance of more effective after care, in the community's interest, and of a variety of processes for the controlled and strongly supervised release of those we do have to banish to prison. But, when Beaumont and Tocqueville wrote, different issues exercised men's minds, and the central questions to which they addressed themselves were: Is the American system to be preferred to that of the Old World? Of this, they had no doubt; clearly it was. And within the American system is that of Pennsylvania or that of New York the better? Is the Eastern Penitentiary in Philadelphia to be the model for French emulation, or should Auburn or Sing Sing in New York? They studied these questions in no cursory manner. For example, Tocqueville personally interviewed every prisoner in the Eastern Penitentiary and recorded what seemed to him the main points of these interviews.

Supporters of the two systems agreed that communication among prisoners must be prohibited to avoid moral contamination and to provide ample opportunity for unimpeded reflection, repentence and moral change; in Philadelphia this was achieved by the complete isolation of the offender in a solitary cell where he would live, sleep, eat and work, and from which he would be taken daily for still isolated periods of exercise; in New York this was to be achieved by solitary confinement in the cell at night but with labor in factory and workshop in silence throughout the day.

Beaumont and Tocqueville most carefully consider the respective advantages and disadvantages of these two systems. They recognized the extreme psychological pressure that the Philadelphia system imposed on the human mind and spirit, foreshadowing the fierce anger of Charles Dickens when he later looked at the same system, and the recent psychological research on the damaging effects of isolation. The New York system required less expensive prisons since the cells did not need to be so large, and it was not necessary to build a small exercise yard attached to each cell. They summarize the advantages, as they see them, of the penitentiary system of the United States over that of other countries, and express cautious preference for the New York system:

> The advantages of the penitentiary system of the United States may then be classed in the following manner: (1) impossibility of the mutual corruption of the prisoners, (2) great probability of their contracting habits of obedience and industry, which render them useful citizens, (3) possibility of a radical reformation.
>
> Though each of the establishments which we have examined aims at these three results, there are nevertheless, in this respect, some shades of difference, which distinguish the Auburn system from that of Philadelphia.
>
> Philadelphia has, as we have already observed, the advantage over Auburn in respect to the first point. Indeed, the prisoners, separated by thick walls, can communicate with each other still less than those who are separated by silence only. The Auburn discipline guarantees the certainty that silence shall not be violated, but it is a mere moral certainty, subject to contradiction; while at Philadelphia, communication among the convicts is physically impossible.
>
> The Philadelphia system being also that which produces the deep-

The Birthday Dream

At the worst place in the hills above the city
Late at night I was driving   cutting through The overbalancing slums.   There was no soul or body
In the streets.   I turned right   then left somewhere Near the top   dead-ending into a wall.   A car Pulled out and blocked me.   Four men detached from it.
I got out too.   It was Saturday night   the thrill
Of trouble shimmered on the concrete.   One shadow Had a bottle of wine.   I stood and said, Say, Buddy, Give me a drink of that wine   not at all fearing Shaking   as in anything but dream bones   dream Feet I would have.   He said, We're looking for somebody
To beat up.   It won't be me, I said   and took him
By the arm with one hand and tossed him into the air.
Snow fell from the clearness in time for there
To be a snowbank for him to fall into elbow-first.
He got up, holding the wine.   This guy is too big,
He said, he is too big for us; get the Professor.
Four of us stood together as the wind blew and the snow
Disappeared   and watched the lights of the city Shine   some others appearing   among them   some Going out   and watched the lava-flow of headlights off
In the valley.   Like a gunshot in the building next to us
A light went out   and down came a middle-aged man
With a hairy chest; his gold-trimmed track shorts had YMCA Instructor on them   and I knew it was time
For the arm-game.   We stretched out on our stomachs
On top of the dead-end wall.   On one side was the drop
We had all been looking into   and the other side sank Away with my car   with the men: two darks lifted Us toward the moon.   We put our elbows on the wall
And clasped palms.   Something had placed gold-rimmed Glasses of wine beside us   apartment lights hung in them
Loosely   and we lay nose to nose at the beginning
Of that ceremony; I saw the distant traffic cross him From eye to eye.   Slowly I started to push   and he
To push.   My body grew as it lay   forced against his
But nothing moved.   I could feel the blood-vessels
In my brow distend   extend   grow over the wall like vines
And in my neck   swell like a trumpet-player's: I gritted Into his impassive face   where the far lights moved   this is What I want   this is what I came for   The city pulsed
And trembled in my arm   shook with my effort   for miles
In every direction   and from far below in the dark
I heard the voices of men raised up in a cry of wild Encouragement   of terror   joy   as I strained to push His locked hand down.   I could not move him   did not want To move him   would not yield.   The world strove with my body
To overcome   the highways shuddered   writhed   came apart
At the centerline   far below us a silent train went by A warning-light   and slowly from the embodying air was loaded
With thousands of ghostly new cars   in tiered racks
The light like pale wine in their tinted windshields.
The culture swarmed around me like my blood   transfigured
By force.   I put my head down and pushed with all my life
And writing sprang under my forehead   onto the concrete:
Graffitti scratched with a nail   a boot-heel   an ice-pick
A tire-iron   a scrap of metal from a stolen car   saying
You are here   and I woke Entangled with my wife, who labored   pled   screamed
To bring me forth.   The room was full of mildness.   I was forty.

James Dickey

> st impressions on the soul of the onvict, must effect more reforma- on than that of Auburn. The lat- er, however, is perhaps more con- ormable to the habits of men in ociety, and on this account effects greater number of reformations, hich might be called "legal," in- smuch as they produce the extern- l fulfillment of social obligations. If it be so, the Philadelphia sys- m produces more honest men, and hat of New York more obedient itizens. . . .
>
> It is . . . this system which we hould wish to see applied to our risons, if the question were only choose between the two.

Little of all this is believed today: most prisoners we are happy ough if we do them no harm and n them loose no worse than on day they arrived. The socially otective function of prisons lies in deterrent effect on others, but nditions within institutions seem gely irrelevant to that general de- rence, the ameliorated conditions some modern smaller institutions rving equally well or badly for that rpose as the regime of the tougher k-ups. We struggle for a few of- nders—the younger, the first timers, d occasionally those with pro- unced psychological or gross so- logical disadvantages—to make of prisonment a rehabilitative ex- rience, but we are yet only on the reshold of this work.

In 1833, Beaumont and Tocque- lle offered the view, which is now adually gaining acceptance that he number, more or less consider- le, of crimes, and even their de- ease or increase, may be owing to uses entirely foreign to the peni- ntiary system." It is fair to try to dge a correctional system in terms recidivism, of the later conduct its discharged inmates, but even is is a complicated enterprise in hich easy comparisons between sys- ms are peculiarly difficult; but it is least fair to try to test in this ay. It is quite unfair to try to judge correctional system in terms of the tes of crime and delinquency in e community. The aims of the ison officer, of probation officers, parole officers must be more mod- t and realistic than to encompass ch gross social phenomena as the tes of criminality in the macrocosm the community where a multi- licity of other social pressures are preponderous weight.

A defect in this publication is that r too many people stand between Beaumont and Tocqueville and their public. But Prof. Thorsten Sellin's introduction interprets the climate of thinking and practice in France on correctional matters and is a necessary frame of reference in which to understand this survey of the American system. Both helpful and a masterful study in itself, it also strengthens Professor Sellin's position as the leading historian of penal methods. The same is not true of Francis Lieber who grossly exceeds his role of translator and assumes the function of wearisomely pretentious commentator on the authors' observations and conclusions. The editors have exorcised most of his wordy reflections from this edition and what remains could well have been similarly treated (it is remarkable that a man who can produce such strong and clear sentences as a translator writes with such circumlocution when expressing his own opinions). Likewise, the foreword by Prof. Herman R. Lantz adds little to the book, but is perhaps justified as an introduction to a series, "Perspectives in Sociology," of which this is the first volume, and which aims, so it is claimed, and I quote since I would hesitate to use such large words in public, "to bring together the richness from bordering disciplines in order to shed light on the social confrontations of man, in both time and space." The young French authors admirably fulfill this purpose, whatever it precisely is, and so does Thorsten Sellin. Together, they present an important vignette in the history of correctional methods and ideas.

What they wrote of the Walnut Street prison in Philadelphia has unhappy truth for most prisons: "It had two principal faults: it corrupted by contamination those who worked together. It corrupted by indolence, the individuals who were plunged into solitude." And they tell their wise story always with grace and with occasional wit: "Some persons believe that it would be extremely difficult to apply to women a system, the basis of which is silence."

Mad Old Man and the Sea

THE SAILOR WHO FELL FROM GRACE WITH THE SEA. By Yukio Mishima. Translated from the Japanese by John Nathan. Alfred A. Knopf. 181 pp. $3.95.

DIARY OF A MAD OLD MAN. By Junichiro Tanizaki. Translated from the Japanese by Howard Hibbett. Alfred A. Knopf. 177 pp. $3.95.

Harold Clurman

In his discursive guidebook, The Kimono Mind, Bernard Rudofsky entices the prospective tourist by saying: "Be prepared for the fact that in Japan there is no sin, original or otherwise." This come-hither suggestion is more austerely corroborated by the scholar G. B. Sansom in his cultural history of Japan when he notes: "The conception of sin, as distinct from uncleanliness, is wanting or rudimentary, and throughout their history the Japanese seemed to have retained in some measure this incapacity, or this reluctance to grapple with the problem of Evil. Such a statement, once committed to writing, forthwith challenges contradiction, but it represents, if imperfectly, a truth; and much that is baffling in the study of their history becomes clearer when one remembers that they have never been tortured by the sense of sin."

The Japanese then are essentially a pagan people. With us the word is usually confused with the notion of pleasure seeking. But pain is as much present to the pagan mind as pleasure. Both are realities which are viewed objectively—to be appreciated without judgment in terms of good and evil since both are equally inherent in the fact of existence.

In this light it is interesting to examine the two most recently published Japanese novels: Mishima's The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea and Tanizaki's Diary of a Mad Old Man. Mishima, at 40, is Japan's leading young novelist; Tanizaki, now 79, is the grand old man of Japanese letters.* Their two novels, though dissimilar in aesthetic approach, still reveal basic characteristics. While profoundly of their own land and culture, they attain a fascinating universality.

Superficially The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea (this is not the untranslatable original title) is a horror story of juvenile delinquency. A group of adolescents, a little "clan" of well-born 13- and 14-year-old boys, conspire to kill a man, the husband newly wed to the mother of one of their number. In their eyes he is a sailor who has fallen from grace with the sea: he has renounced the sea to settle down as the manager of a luxury shop in Yokohama which his wife owns. To the gang the sea stands for freedom, detachment from society, the ultimate truth. It removes men from the crassness of workaday preoccupations.

---

*The news of Tanizaki's death was received after this review was written.

We are reminded, to begin with, of the children in Dostoevsky and Gide whose crimes express the innate evil of mankind, gratuitous and mindless. But in Mishima's novel the children are nihilists because they are absolute idealists. They train themselves in detachment by such exercises as the killing of a cat, followed by its dismemberment and disemboweling. Their "chief" asserts that they must rise above error and vulgarity by which their parents, or society in general, are besmirched. They strive to achieve "absolute dispassion." Sex itself for them is not only an unworthy but an insignificant activity. The sailor of the story—he is an officer on a merchant ship—is a hero to them so long as he remains one, free from the taint of mundane commerce. When he consents to join the commonplace citizenry, he must be done away with as a traitor.

Curiously, the sailor himself shares his assailants' sentiments. He too feels that his marriage entails a corruption, a descent into the sloth which his killers call "impermissible things," the ordinary traffic of life.

More is involved than the depiction of abnormal psychology. There is something in Mishima which yearns fiercely for the unattainable, a pinnacle of purity akin to nonexistence or "godliness." Mishima dramatizes a possible explanation for this in one boy's relation to his mother. But psychoanalytic interpretation is hardly relevant here.

In his earlier novel, The Temple of the Golden Pavilion, the central character feels himself compelled to burn the ancient temple to the ground—that is, to destroy his ideal in order to accommodate himself to reality. In The Sailor Who Fell — the man who fails to live up to the ideal must himself be destroyed. A social comment is implied that is so subtle one is uncertain whether it is entirely conscious. The youth who burns the temple in the earlier novel wants to destroy a burdensome ideal of beauty —of which the temple has become the symbol—so that he can take his place in the "new Japan." The savagery of the kids in the later novel represents a hatred of the ever increasing mechanization (or "Americanization") of their country, which has become sordidly mediocre in comparison with Japan's antique dream of pristine grandeur, traditional and sacrosanct long before the intrusion of the materialistic West.

Dense in substance, far-reaching in allusion, this novel is brilliant in the conciseness of its narrative line. The imagery is marked by a sort of impersonal sensuousness, a graphic and colorful precision. The verbal means employed are spare; one is aware of a dominant control. The informed reader is tempted to find analogies with such minute Japanese verse forms as the haikai or with certain 17th-century scroll paintings in which much is conveyed in little.

Mishima's inspiration is fundamentally poetic; Tanizaki is a realist. The younger man tends toward abstraction though he never loses contact with the specific; the older one appears to confine himself to the familiar, the immediately observable, even the domestic. Yet both writers meet in contiguous spheres.

Tanizaki's Diary of a Mad Old Man (an irreverent American might call him a dirty old man) is the portrait of an ailing, almost moribund character of 77. He is and has been for a long time completely impotent. Yet sexual desire and the various e travagances attendant upon it pers and will persist as long as he liv

In the telling, the story is fun obscene, grotesque and, finally, exh arating. There is also something chi ing in the complete absence of sen ment in Tanizaki's presentation.
spares us no clinical detail of the man's condition or of the medi treatment he undergoes. But the m desires endlessly with masochistic j and cunning malice, despite t awareness of his decrepitude, surdity and the total inefficacy his impulse, which is as intense if it were to know consummation.

The object of his desire is daughter-in-law. She teases, gra fies and exploits him in a man "eternally feminine." But no one—his son nor his own wife, his daught his doctors and nurses — finds t man's sexual impulse in the least natural or shocking. They understan the sex drive is a constant for superseding its physiological sour manifestations or consequences. It evidence of and commensurate w the energy of life itself. The unin ligible because nonrational p nomenon of existence—neither g nor evil—is stoically accepted.

Tanizaki smiles ambiguously at t wonder which cannot be exploited fathomed. Mishima's posture is of apparently imperturbable conte plation, something between anguish awe and puzzled serenity. Neither m moralizes. Both are master artists a both in these admirably transla novels have much to tell us.

Preview of a German Controversy

George K. Romoser

Twenty-one years after the bomb which Count Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, a colonel in the German General Staff, carried to Hitler's headquarters failed to kill the Fuehrer—and thus once and for all doomed a military-civilian plot to overthrow the Nazi regime—the stage is being set, perhaps literally, for a public airing of the motives and actions of the conspirators.

Following in the footsteps of Rolf Hochhuth, whose controversial drama about Pope Pius XII and the Jews aroused great interest inside and outside Germany, the German stage has suddenly become documentary. One of its most unusual playwrights will undoubtedly be Wolfgang Graetz. Graetz has written a sharply criti work about the German Resista Movement. The Conspirators,
Graetz names the play, at pres exists only in manuscript form. It been scrutinized by any number German historians and theatrical ducers, and may be performed Munich this autumn. Graetz is un contract to publishing houses in nich which will print the work
October.

George K. Romoser is associate fessor of government at Connecti College. He has also taught at F burg and Mainz Universities in many, and is preparing a book on politics of resistance in Nazi Germa

Graetz's drama is well written and ceeds in capturing the atmosphere discussion and action among the ıspirators. The action is limited to events of July 20, 1944, itself, t the play is intended as a com ntary on the whole course of dis ssions among those military and ilian leaders who meditated action ainst the Hitler government between Czech crisis of September, 1938, d the attempted coup d'état six ars later. This Graetz makes clear a long foreword which, unlike chhuth's "Historical Appendix" to e Deputy is—at least at the mo nt — completely undocumented. ere Graetz argues the thesis that ıe cannot rebel against something th which one is identical."

Though the dramatic presentation elf conveys a more subtle and dif entiated argument—as do, indeed, ne of Graetz's statements in the eword—the general approach of his rk is something new on the German ne. It is small wonder that the ınuscript has already agitated Ger ın historians. Another historical ama about sensitive problems of Nazi era threatens to have greater pact than the fruits of years of re arch by professional scholars, not speak of the efforts by survivors of plot against Hitler, and by friends the conspirators.

In West Germany, there have en but two general attitudes toward conspiratorial activity of 1938 to 44 among historians, journalists and ıer disseminators of the printed and oken word (the general public has best been indifferent, at worst un ubtedly suspicious of the conspira s).

The first school of thought has been l by Hans Rothfels, professor emeri s of history at the University of ıebingen. In 1948, when Professor thfels was still an émigré and ıching at the University of Chicago, published a highly influential work The German Opposition to Hitler. it, he praised the political and ral insight of the conspirators, gued that they had acted seriously d resolutely, and were thwarted ly by the totalitarian control exer sed by the Nazis, the indifference "nonpolitical" generals inside Ger ıny, and the indifferent or hostile itude of the Western Allies toward ir plans.

Though Rothfels' book was written English, was first published in this untry, and was primarily directed against the views of American and British "anti-Germans," it initiated the tendency to glorify the motives and actions of the conspirators. This aim is supported by the argument that there should be an "educating myth" for German youth, an integration of the passion for freedom—which is said to have been characteristic of the conspirators—into opinions about the recent German past.

The purveyors of the second view about the anti-Nazi conspiracy do not enjoy the professional reputations of the spokesmen of the first school. But their position probably more accurately reflects the suspicion with which the conspiracy is seen by Germans of the older generations. In its baldest form, the second viewpoint is expressed in neo-Nazi writings which label the conspirators as traitors. In more moderate forms, the viewpoint is influential enough to have deterred the West German Government from making July 20 a legal holiday, as has been done for June 17, the anniversary of the 1953 uprising in the Soviet Zone.

At first glance, Graetz's drama appears closest to views which have been widespread in the United States and Great Britain, and which have recently been represented and propagated in William L. Shirer's The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich. According to such interpretations, the conspirators were representatives of disgruntled military and reactionary cliques, opportunists who undertook an ineffective attempt to change Germany's government only when faced by military disaster.

In some respects, indeed, Graetz's views appear closest to interpretations which have been fashionable among Communists. In these circles the plotters have been regarded simply as disgruntled Hitlerites.

Yet Graetz's work opens the possibility for a discussion of the Resistance which moves beyond all these previous interpretations. Such a discussion becomes even more desirable as interpretations of July 20, 1944 outside West Germany begin to shift and a historical episode which had seemed of minor importance comes to be used as a weapon of political historiography. For example, the influence of Rothfels and his followers has been so great in the Anglo-Saxon world that in the second edition of The German Opposition to Hitler (1958), Rothfels writes of the complete "reversal of opinion" on the Resistance outside Germany since the immediate postwar period. Moreover, Soviet and East German historians and journalists have, within the last few years, undertaken to distinguish between "reactionary" and "progressive" members of the conspiracy. According to this interpretation, which is now the official line in East Germany, Stauffenberg and a few of his friends were progressive nationalists who wished to orient the future Germany toward close cooperation with the USSR; Carl Goerdeler, former mayor of Leipzig, and the chief civilian involved in the plot, was, along with his followers, bourgeois, pro-Western, and a crypto-Nazi.

Graetz's play is marked by a frontal attack upon that which he terms the "resistance myth" in West Germany. In his foreword, he remarks that the function of this myth is to hinder social reform in the Federal Republic, for it holds forth as heroic models persons who were essentially anti-democratic. At the same time, writes Graetz, the resistance mythology is consciously or unconsciously used to "justify" German history since World War I.

It is tempting to try to relate Graetz's own personal misfortunes to his passion for social reform. In the first article on The Conspirators to appear in a West German publication, the caustic and critical news magazine Der Spiegel alluded to such relationships when it described in detail Graetz's chaotic life as an adolescent during the war (he was born in 1926), and his subsequent alienation from postwar German society. (He has a long prison record of burglary, robbery, check forging, etc., and wrote his play while incarcerated in a Hessian prison, after the judge refused his plea for psychiatric treatment.)

The dramatic action of The Conspirators involves the contrast between resolution to action against the Nazi regime—what the Germans call Tatkraft — and the pervasive hesitation in the conduct of the conspirators. In seeking to reconstruct the atmosphere of the conspiracy and the cast of mind among the plotters, Graetz shows that the central problem of the Resistance was a lack of clear and consistent resolution. Even more important is the fact that the play depicts the connection between hesitation and the political sentiments of many of the key actors. For while Graetz shows the inefficiency of the plotting, his real theme concerns the sources of that inefficiency.

Not inaccurately, for example, Graetz has some of his characters engage, during the fateful hours on the afternoon of July 20, in an absurd and lengthy conversation on exactly what percentage of chance for success is necessary before one may undertake a coup d'état. He depicts Gen. Ludwig Beck, destined to be chief of state in a new regime, alternating between moods of hope and despair. He shows Stauffenberg issuing frantic military commands to which no one listens because the plotters have failed to gain command of the radio or make provision for finding reliable troops in Berlin itself. Yet the confusion of their actions merely raises the question: Why?

Graetz explores this question in line with his belief that "it is not so-called 'treason to Hitler's Germany' which should be made the subject of criticism, but the exact opposite—namely, that the conspirators could not bring themselves to a clearer and more radical rejection of Hitler." In effect, the play shows the emphasis which the conspirators always placed upon the "right conditions" for the initiation and then successful conclusion of a coup d'état. According to Graetz's dramatization, these "right conditions" were but reflections of the nationalist bias and confused political dreams of the conspirators. The conspirators were weak in resolution because they qualified their willingness to act through too many "conditions" which had nothing to do with the attitude of the Allies, or the military and police power of the regime, but with their state of mind, particularly their sympathy with the "good parts" of Nazism.

The only genuinely tatkräftig characters in Graetz's play are non-ideological figures such as Count von Helldorff, Police President of Berlin, and Hans Bernd Gisevius, a former Gestapo official who was close to both Admiral Canaris, head of German counterintelligence, and the American Office of Strategic Services during the war. Helldorff, who had been a rough Nazi Storm Troop leader in the early years, presents the figure of a cynical man of pure action; Gisevius represents the realist who opposes Stauffenberg's confused political romanticism and urges that action take place before ideological debates and without waiting fruitlessly for a favorable sign from the Allies.

The assassin Stauffenberg, though the initiator of the action which finally came to pass after years of discussion, is pictured in The Conspirators as a man of personal ambition, nationalist sentiment, and militaristic-aristocratic ideas. Indeed, Graetz first developed the notion of writing a dramatic work on the conspiracy after reading Eberhard Zeller's Geist der Freiheit (The Spirit of Freedom), at whose "folkish-nationalist jargon" he took offense. Zeller's book, a detailed accounting of the plot of July 20, and a characterization of the leading actors, is in fact constructed around a glorification of the hero Stauffenberg, whose actions Zeller interprets in a romantic manner as constituting a "revolt against the mass age." In spirit it is close both to the quasi-political aristocratic romanticism of the Stefan George circle, which had indeed influenced the young Stauffenberg, and to the sentiments of the "conservative revolution" against the principles and practices of liberal democracy in the Weimar Republic.

To Stauffenberg, Graetz attributes the opinion that National Socialism had sought positive gains: "the struggle against corruption and the spirit of big cities, for instance; the emphasis on the peasantry—and a healthy sense of rank, along with the leadership principle." While Stauffenberg admits that the regime has failed to develop its early promise, his alternative is notably vague: it can only be "some new concept which it will be worth living and dying for . . . in any case, we don't want a return to the rotten conditions of the Weimar Republic!"

For Graetz, Stauffenberg's "ideology" comes down to support for "holy Germany's national war," an unclear notion of future rule by military aristocrats, and a rejection of all rebellion that leads to a breakdown of either the internal or external mobilization of Germany. In Graetz's portrait, moreover, Stauffenberg is an avid opponent of the so-called "Western solution"—a plan which would have involved giving up the war against the Western Allies.

To gain support for their action, the conspirators on July 20 operated with the fiction that the S.S. had attempted a coup d'état. The justification for the role of the army was to be that it had stepped in to "preserve order and unity." That the use of this fiction is a highly significant indication of the mentality of the conspirators is not lost upon Graetz. His characters turn again and again to the question whether "the people will accept the conspiracy," and fear "telling the naked truth to the people."

The plain fact is that the conspirators believed the populace as well most officers to be thoroughly "Na fied." Thus, they felt themselves be politically isolated at the same ti that they both needed mass supp to carry the coup to a successful c clusion, and yet, because of th elitist political views, mistrusted m participation in politics. Under th conditions, the coup d'état could o be precarious, a fact which was flected in the hesitations of the c spirators on July 20 when matters not proceed exactly according to pl As Graetz correctly indicates, mu of the "planning" prior to that ti simply involved useless discussi about the importance of having "c cepts" for "the social question" (i the question of winning mass s port). The conspirators were pal revolutionaries who obscurely rec nized that they could not be sim palace revolutionaries in a country which the regime had mobilized m support.

Thus, though Graetz's prese tion requires much qualification refinement, he has touched upon central dilemma of what has come be known as the "German Resista Movement" — a term, incidenta which unfairly obscures the activi of Communist and other left-wing positional cells in the early years the Nazi regime. Graetz's play p ably underestimates the degree which many of the conspirators v motivated to action by moral re sion. Graetz's assertion about "identity" of the rebels and against which they were "rebelli cannot be supported. His work negl the extent to which the conspira were hampered by other circ stances, and does not clearly eno articulate the objective difficulty their position. Moreover, Graetz is sufficiently attentive to the fact many of the conspirators had ea been not "Nazis" but "revolutio conservatives" who feared—and without some reason — the poli role of "mass men" in a disjointed shattered social order such as which prevailed in Germany after First World War.

However, none of these the have been discussed by German torians either in a plausible man The Conspirators may help to ren the theme from what Graetz terms "dustbin of crumbling old fol German holy relics" to which F fels, Zeller and similar authors consigned July 20, 1944.

ILMS

Robert Hatch

THIRD FESTIVAL

e proprietors of the New York Film stival maneuver to launch their nual stand at Lincoln Center in atmosphere of controversy. Last ar the opener was the melodramatic d somewhat sentimental Russian amlet; this year it was Jean-Luc dard's Alphaville. If I were a direcr, I doubt that I would covet this sition. The festival takes some ins to make an occasion of its first ghts, with speeches from the stage forehand and a buffet reception out midnight. There is an air of ficial endorsement about the screen-g that is subtly bullying, and a m so presented must, at least ini-lly, work against it.

But there was a certain logic to ading with Alphaville. It is the only xperimental," the only "difficult," cture in this year's collection, and ving got it out of the way, the stival could turn to its main job, hich is to act as a preview screen
r the international film imports. It serving that function very well; ilharmonic Hall is proving to be e only movie theatre in town, ex-pt for the houses that specialize the underground, where audiences spond with applause, cheers, catlls and boos. A distributor with an r sensitive to decibels should be le to predict box-office response.

And it is important to give the mmercial importers as much guidnce and encouragement as possible, r it is noticeable that as the world nema gains ebullience and inven-ve energy, the American import affic dwindles. The goal of the art use proprietors, understandably, is book sensational hits, with the re-lt that fewer and fewer films have nger and longer runs. The virtue the festival is that it notifies the ovie audience of what it may be issing as the Beatles or Tom Jones ind on for interminable months.

I have not tried to cover the tire festival, for to do so turns film ing into an endurance test. What llows is a sampling of this third ason, the hope being that much what has been shown once at Lin-ln Center will play normal runs and reviewed before Easter.

Alphaville has been accurately de-ned as a "Pop" film—that is, it ses discreditable materials for artistic and, in this case, moral ends. (The true Pop artists repeatedly disclaim any moral intent, though viewers conscientiously read it into their canvases.) The genre Godard exploits is the secret-agent thriller and Eddie Constantine, who plays Lemmy Caution, is an American actor living in Paris who has become identified with sex-and-sadism B-films. He looks and behaves like an inadequate description of Humphrey Bogart.

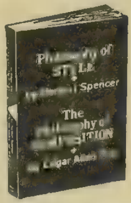
This time, Constantine has been sent on a science fiction mission: to a megalopolis enslaved by a computer, where lapse of logic is a capital offense and any display of emotion grounds for arrest. Lemmy, instructed to eliminate the computer and its director (named, coincidentally, Dr. Von Braun) is thus an agent of the humane virtues, of love. It is therefore notable that he has not been in Alphaville an hour when he guns down an anonymous intruder into his hotel room with an automatic that subsequently proves to be fitted with one of those inexhaustible cartridge clips favored by blood-intoxicated super-agents.

That is one side of Godard's acrid joke—humanity is to be saved from technological tyranny by a professional killer out of the sub-literature; the heroine, mother of our future, is to be dragged, Persephone-like, from the embrace of the computer by a trigger-happy bully. The other side of the director's grimace is that he has created a metropolis of futuristic horror out of people, structures and machines that can be found today in the core of any big city. There are no fantastic buildings, no outlandish gadgets, no unprecendented customs in this love-banned world. The effect of permanent nightmare is produced by selection from what is now ours—and much of it turns out to be what we most dearly value.

Two weaknesses work against the picture as entertainment. One is that the ostensible story is not very ingenious; a director who sets out to lampoon the thriller should be certain that his own thriller is mechanically deft, and this one creaks and sags. The other fault is that Godard cannot resist preaching. He engages Lemmy in tedious dialogues with the computer that repeat forensically what is already implicit in the action. And, more generally, I felt cheated because Godard had involved us in this elaborate spoof in order to enlighten us on points we could scarcely have avoided noting some time between Brave New World and 1984. It is true that the great moral issues evolve slowly, but some attempt should still be made to change the platitudes.

A special service that the festival can perform is juxtaposition. and this year it does so usefully with two films from India: Charulata by Satyajit Ray and Shakespeare Wallah by Ray's Western protégé, James Ivory. Ray takes his narrative from a story by Rabindranath Tagore; I do not know how much he transformed it, but on the screen it bears the characteristic marks of his gentleness and sad humor. The picture is also unmistakably his by reason of its sensuous immediacy — it is al-

Forthcoming in October
an MR Special
THE LYMAN LETTERS
New Light on Emily Dickinson and Her Family
by RICHARD B. SEWALL
A new chapter in the lives of Emily and Lavinia Dickinson as revealed in the correspondence of Joseph Bardwell Lyman (1829-1872).
THE MASSACHUSETTS REVIEW
AMHERST, MASS.
$1.50 a copy — $5.00 a year



FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to
PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 9-27-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)
NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

ways the feel of Ray's pictures that one remembers.

As before, no Englishman enters the scene, and yet the picture is dominated by the transposed spirit of 19th-century England. The protagonist is animated by the promise of Gladstonian reform, his wife and younger brother by the lyric emancipation of Byron and the Lake Poets. It is funny, and it is certainly a little sad, to see these admirable, capable and beautiful Indians surrounding themselves with the oppressive wealth of Victorian decoration and seeking a structure for their lives in the doctrines and visions of their conquerors.

Nevertheless, the relationship of these people to one another is at the real heart of the picture and there one finds a modesty and a generosity that would be rare in England. I doubt that they are commonplace in India, but they are characteristic of Ray's view of life.

Ivory also tells a tale in which nostalgia and the interplay of cultures play a large part. A Shakespearean family troupe, once supported by maharajahs and the English colony alike, is sinking into poverty and failure with the departure of the Empire and the preoccupation of the Indians with their own (often tawdry) talents. The daughter of the troupe (Ophelia, Juliet, Desdemona) falls in love with a young Indian sportsman, a man of great charm, little vice, but no capacity for love beyond the making of it. She goes home to England (where she has never been) and her father and mother will end their days giving "recitations" from Shakespeare to aspiring club groups.

Ray's influence is felt partly in Ivory's tenderness with his people and respect for them, partly in his appreciation of the physical texture of India. It is a sign of his tact that he neither patronizes nor pities his traveling company; they are not great actors, but they understand the plays and their performances are respectable and sometimes eloquent. And, again like Ray, he does not bear down on his characters. They suffer but they are not tormented; the girl will clearly rebound from the rejection of her love and her parents are saved from quaint decay by the discipline of their craft. It crosses my mind, though, that the effect of the picture may be more anti-Indian than Ivory intended. All the creative and regenerative virtues lie within the English; the Indians are feckless, vulgar, disoriented.

The difference I feel between Ray and Ivory is in the flow of their films. Ray's compositions are invariably as silkily imperturbable in overall structure as they are luxurious in tactile detail. Ivory is more spasmodic; his transitions have a greater wrench. It is not a fault: Ivory is a pupil of Ray, not an imitator, and he comes from the more abrupt and muscular West.

Two films that I would not give high priority for commercial showing are Raven's End (Sweden) and The Shop on High Street (Czechoslovakia). The first of these—a dirge-like chronicle of a young man's talent crushed by his father's alcoholic delusions of persecuted superiority—is implacable, but lacks insights beneath the surface of determined pessimism. I was struck principally by the tidy look of what the Swedes evidently consider a poverty verging on squalor.

The Shop on High Street is a recent film dealing with events in a Czech small town during the Nazi occupation. I found it sentimental (sentimentality is perhaps the dominant failing of Communist art) and morally ambiguous. The picture makes clear that some Czechs eagerly embraced the German conquerors and that others fattened on the persecution of the Jews, but it is all more in the Mussolini than in the Hitler manner, and the central character—a skeptical carpenter who is made Aryan manager of a button shop and soon becomes the adored clerk of the ancient and oblivious Jewish widow who owns it—so vacillates among greed, cowardice and chivalry that the picture appears to say that the Czechs were children led astray by wicked tutors. There may be a propaganda purpose to it, but its human relationships are too tentative for successful export.

The major disappointment of the festival for me was Film by Sar uel Beckett, directed by Alan Schne der and played by Buster Keaton.
seems to be a work by someone wh had borrowed Beckett's vocabula but found nothing to say with Keaton is a long-coated figure sc rying beside the bulkhead of t Brooklyn Bridge, his face cover with a handkerchief. He scoots in a tenement and up the stairs to lo himself into a room empty except f a rocking chair, a basket containi a kitten and a small dog, a parrot a cage, a fish in a bowl and a m ror on the wall.

There is much business (eloque Keaton pantomime) of coveri window and mirror, ejecting cat a dog, masking bird and fish. Th from a portfolio comes a group photographs showing pivotal momen in the victim's life from infancy present desuetude (one eye cover by a patch). One by one the pictu are torn to fragments and the came finally swings around to face a sink into the live lizard eye of t old actor rocking in his chair. Th are here bits of Endgame, Krap
Last Tape, Malloy Dies and the r of the Beckett canon. But the h on life, the poetry, the accumulati of mad lucidity, seem to have drain out of the scene, and left lonelin and desperation as though they w entities rather than conditions. I the feeling that Beckett was fina obliterating his world, and I was pressed but unmoved.

On the same bill were two ot Keaton films, a recent one by the N tional Film Board of Canada, cal
The Railrodders and Seven Chan from 1925. The contemporary f turned out to be a plug for the Ca dian National Railway and the to ist interests of Canada. Keaton ri a motorized handcar from the lantic to the Pacific and in the proc runs through his repertory of si gags from the silent days, but "v beautiful Canada" is the motive.
old picture was made before Kea had perfected his screen personal he appears as an agile young sw
The movie is notable for a ch that involves several hundred ji women and, more gloriously, a side of cascading papier-mâ boulders that pursue the hero i surrealist passage of weightless m ace: they look like rocks and beh like beach balls. This was prop applauded, but the two modern tures seemed inadequate reasons
Keaton to break his long retirem

PERSONALS

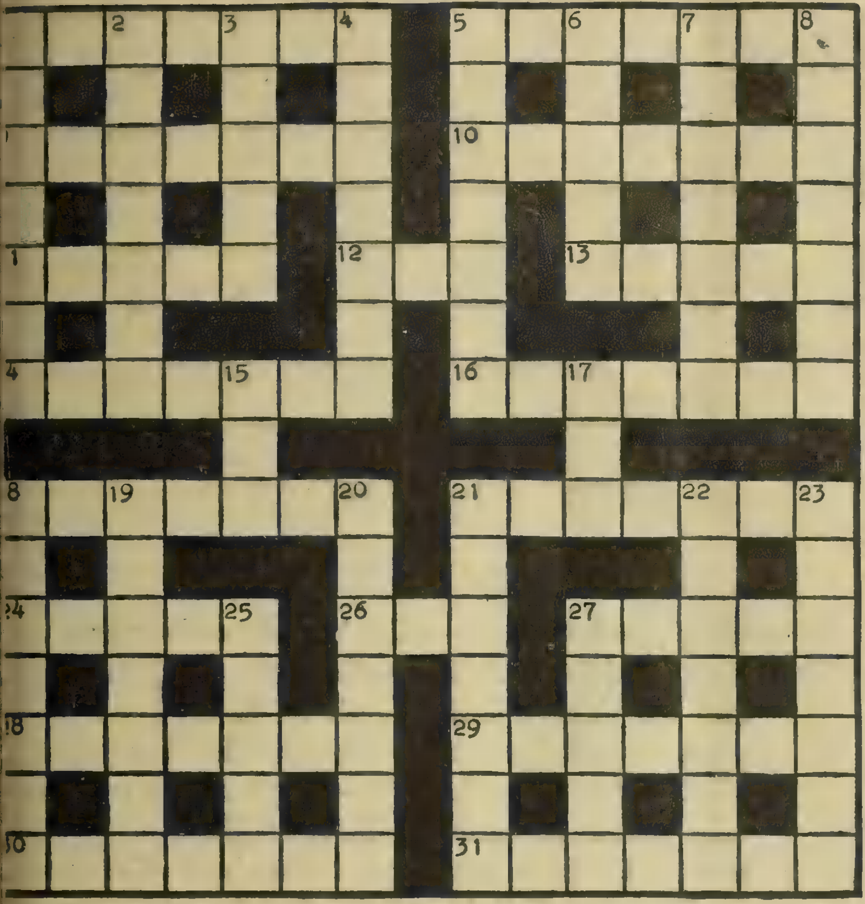
THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to: P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

THE FAMOUS ALEXANDER TECHNIQUE (teaching natural and efficient use of the body) improves posture and appearance, reduces muscular tension, and promotes an assured sense of well-being. Endorsed by John Dewey, Aldous Huxley, GBS, etc. New students: four lessons at half-price. 799-2956, NYC.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1120

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

Helps fish in the sound? (7)

The measure of a joke sometimes applied to Congressmen? (3, 4)

What one might safely call a southerner. (7)

Man's got in trouble in the middle of things. (7)

Travels around a foreign city? (5)

, 15, 17 and 26 Is able (and was able) to have something that might engage time, showing folks as they are! (6, 6)

3 Possibly the teacher saw I'm in need of straightening out! (5)

4 Reached Darien carrying food, possibly from overseas. (7)

Do they detail things at the wharves? (7)

3 Is one who ponders heavily likely to care for the motherless? (7)

1 Medicinal herbs? I'm on to them for a fair visitor! (7)

4 Say! This is a funny way to make money! (5)

7 Nocturnal forest incendiary? (5)

8 College building worker, but not actively engaged. (7)

9 Paradoxically, one might have to in order to finish paratrooper training. (4, 3)

0 Not a castle corner, though it might describe one of the colonies.

1 Father stays around for his meals, perhaps. (7)

DOWN:

1 Characteristic of a seizure thus, if about over. (7)

2 Play clothes? (7)

3 Alternatively, a sign of respect running up the flag, perhaps. (5)

4 Useful in making a film merger.

5 With corn, as some woods might be. (7)

6 A shining example of annotation?

7 Raise the standard where some still have to shift for themselves?

8 Involves a silent change. (7)

15 and 17 See 12 across

18 Rock the more fearless sounding.

19 A movement of air onto the place?

20 A possible problem for the astronaut, and a solution to the 29? (7)

21 Good speakers probably don't. (7)

22 Leg-irons are by the sound of it omitted for such as the Foreign Service type. (7)

23 Supernatural beings participating in the beginning and end of spring rites. (7)

25 Writer who seems to have lost some of his public. (5)

27 Would-be good-deed-doers, collectively? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1119

ACROSS: 1 Bachelor-at-arms; 8 Protoplasmic; 10 Restaurant; 13 Ironic; 14 Shrinker; 16 Annunzio; 17 Adjoin; 19 Sure; 20 Recidivist; 22 Water buffalo; 23 Violoncellists. DOWN: 1 Bipartisanship; 2 and 11 Cross-country race; 3 Evocations; 4 Oilers; 5 Absinthe; 6 Acid; 7 Peregrinations; 9 Bank holidays; 12 Disdainful; 15 Nineteen; 18 Liable; 21 Mail.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

Come Alive in Berkeley!

This is where the action is: Teach-ins, Sit-ins, Sail-ins, March-ins, Stop The Troop Trains, "The Word," FSU, VDC, KPFA, Telegraph Ave.

. . . If you can't move, subscribe to the weekly BERKELEY BARB— $1 for 2 months. Live vicariously; you do, anyhow. George Kauffman, sympathizer.

MAX SCHERR, Editor
2421 Oregon Street Berkeley, Calif.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE DRAFTED is must reading for every young man. Send $1.00 to Knox, Box 1018, Mission, Kansas.

IS THERE TRUE FREEDOM OF RELIGION?

The Sioux Falls Argus-Leader says: " . . . His freethinking will shock those who never challenged the tenets of their particular religion, his logic will be welcomed by those who share his views."

A layman speaks out on some aspects of belief that tend to undermine our civil liberties and offers a common-sense solution by facing reality in our beliefs.

Readers say: . . . "enjoyed it" . . . "down-to-earth" . . . "outrageous" . . . "divertingly told" . . . "makes one think."

Send $1.00 ppd. for LET'S GROW UP (90 pp) to: ANDREW ROES, Route 1, Menahga, Minn. 56464. Refund if not satisfied and book returned within 10 days.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC). 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

Advertising Rates
Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014, CHelsea 2-8400

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion—which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you as your initial copy upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION's portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my first issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________ STATE__________ ZIP No._____

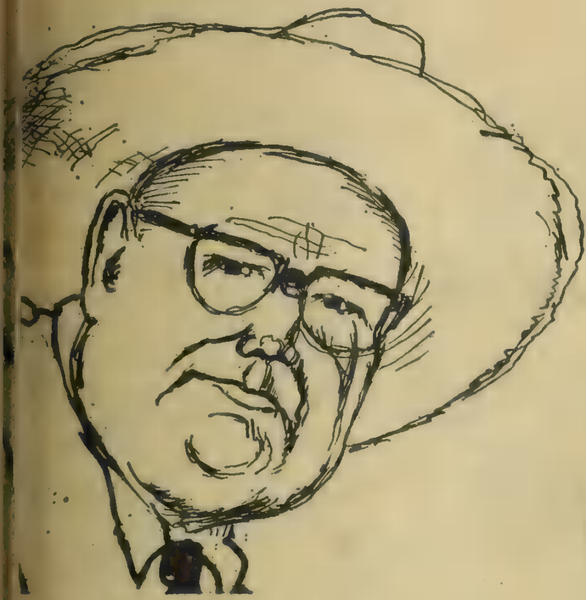
9-27-65

OCT 4 196

THE
NATION

October 4, 1965 . . 35c

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Cal.



JAMES EASTLAND
Child of Scorn
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

IMAGE AND REALITY

CHINA FROM WITHIN
Charles Taylor

THREE BOOKS ON AFRICA
Gwendolen M. Carter

LETTERS

Ultimate power

Scottsdale, Ariz.

Dear Sirs: I think the general substance of James MacGregor Burns's approach ["The Shadow Presidency," The Nation, Sept. 6] is a very good idea and I think it would be of great benefit to our form of government if we did, in effect, have a more organized and intelligent position. One of the problems is that there is no so-called titular head of the party when the party is not in the White House. The out party spends most of its time trying to figure out how to bury the unsuccessful candidate instead of trying to form a coalition around him with Congressional leaders, governors, et al., dedicated to the task of intelligent alternatives and intelligent positions.

This, however, is not going to come about, in my opinion, in this country as long as the power of the President is increasing. For example, the power he has with the press. The other day I counted twenty-four press releases in twenty-four hours, and it is practically impossible for the opposition voice to be heard. I think I could sum this whole problem up by recalling something that Jefferson said, and Mr. Burns leans heavily on him. Jefferson said: "I know of no safe repository for the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves, and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their controls with wholesome direction, the remedy is not to take it from them but to increase their discretion by education."

This is precisely what I am trying to accomplish with the Free Society Association, and I think it is what others are trying to do, to acquaint the American mind with the truth of what is taking place in our government today.

Barry Goldwater

Soccer heresy

Plainview, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: How dismaying to find David Cort's article on soccer ["Soccer: The Rabble Game," The Nation, Aug. 30]! Shame on you, Nation and Mr. Cort!

I am offended personally, for I have played soccer in the New York area for twenty years with high school, college, amateur and professional teams. . . . I am more seriously disturbed by Mr. Cort's display of both tunnel vision and chauvinism of the sort The Nation has so consistently opposed over the years. . . .

Please remind Mr. Cort that we soccer fans (and players) outnumber his baseball and football counterparts combined, many times over, and that we would rather kick than switch.

Jerry Mahrer

Los Angeles, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Is poor David equally ignorant about all the other things of which he writes?

Robert Davidson

Anniversary

Wellington, N. Z.

Dear Sirs: I have read The Nation for half a century. . . . Its integrity and honesty and consistent championship of the "lower orders" has never faltered—and such is my chosen climate. When my father became very old he took to reading his hoarded back numbers, so rich was their quality as compared with other available reading matter. May this paper continue another 100 years.

Morva Williams

Correction

New York City

Dear Sirs: In my contribution to The Nation's centennial issue I referred to Alma Wertheim as the granddaughter of Ambassador Morgenthau. This was a careless slip of the pencil; I knew quite well that she was the Ambassador's daughter, and I regret having caught my own error too late to keep it out of print.

Freda Kirchwey

Still hovering

Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sirs: Daniel Cohen's "The Return of Flying Saucers" [The Nation, Sept. 13] was, while quite interesting, in error on a number of points. . . .

The impression given was that the 1952 UFO reports in and around Washington, D.C., were confined to radar. This is simply not true. Also, Captain Mantell was flying an F-51, not a P-51, during his famous UFO chase.

I counted approximately sixteen errors in this article. With all this we are inclined to wonder whether the "bizarre state of mind" Mr. Cohen mentions belongs to UFO enthusiasts . . . or Daniel Cohen. . . .

Allen H. Greenfield
Editorial Director
American UFO Committee

New York City

Dear Sirs: Nobody saw any spaceships over Washington, D.C., on July 26, 1952. Only the radar echoes were out of the ordinary and they were caused by unusual weather conditions. A few pilots saw unexplained lights, but that is not at all strange over a well-lighted city like Washington. In addition, the lights coincide with the radar echo for Captain Mantell's plan designation P (for Pursuit) longer in use; it has been r by F (for fighter). Thus the P- F-51 are the same plane.

I trust my other fourteen were equally serious. Daniel

THE NATIO

Monday, October 4, 1965
Volume 201, No. 10

In this issue

EDITORIALS

177

ARTICLES

180 Image and Reality: China from Within Charles Taylor
184 James Eastland: Child of Scorn
Robert G. Sherrill
195 What Is a Socialist?
James O'Connor

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

197 As It Was — As It Is
William R. Brock
197 October (poem)
David Leviten
198 Two Tough Minds . . .
Gwendolen M. Carter
200 . . . And a Cold Eye
Stanley Meisler
200 'Reverting Still Again' (
Hayden Carruth
202 Formentor Surprise
Richard Kostelanetz
202 To a Good Friend at Home (poem)
Phyllis Brooks
203 Letter from Tokyo
Mary Evans
Crossword Puzzle (opp.
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Edit
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry

Mary Simon, Advertising Manag

The Nation, Oct. 4, 1965. Vol. 20

The Nation is published weekly (excep and August, when biweekly) by Th Company and copyright 1965 in the the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixt New York, N. Y., 10014. Second clas paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2- Subscription Price: One year, $10; t $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: per year.

na the Peacemaker

ind India and Pakistan's acceptance of the -fire" are a number of critically important de-nents. Most apparent has been the thorough-and energetic joint action of the United States he USSR. Not merely have they been in agree-on the necessity for a cease-fire, but in this ice both powers put real muscle into their tage negotiations. Nor should the efforts of e and Great Britain be minimized. Also the work of Ambassador Goldberg, not in front of sion cameras but behind the scenes, has been ssive. But the paradox of the cease-fire, in a
, is the fact that China is perhaps the power rily responsible for it. Whatever China's inten-may have been — and we shall probably never — it was the specter of direct Chinese intern that got everyone moving. The Chinese demond once again that they know how to put on, ake off, the pressure; the timing was excellent he action got results. And it is a bit difficult to ne that a cease-fire was not part of China's inn from the outset; Chinese diplomacy does not produce "accidental" results. In this instance, Pakistan may have been moved to accept the fire in part because of its uncertainty over what hinese might do.

w, with the stalemate over assessments (Article ut of the way, the United Nations has a chance ve forward. But two major "ifs" are implicit in iew. One is that China, the world's largest power, be admitted to the UN; the case for admission ever clearer or more compelling. Next, the UN now proceed, as U Thant has warned, to settle of the problems it has permitted to fester these years. For a time, postponement served as a itute for settlement; it did keep the world from ng up. But the UN has now entered the phase development in which basic settlements of real tes can no longer be deferred. UN inaction is a cause of the present flareup of fighting be-India and Pakistan.

ice 1962, the wise and patient Dr. Frank Graham, N's mediator, has been standing by, prepared e a summary report on his tireless efforts to e a settlement of the Kashmir dispute. Maybe N will now turn to its gifted mediator and re-him to submit that report. In his analysis of , Dr. Graham called attention to the fact that tan had agreed that a UN peace force might be ned on Pakistan soil — a major concession — if N would proceed with a plebiscite. Had this ng been followed up at the time, the Kashmir might have been settled.

e Secretary-General is right: the issues that have ttered relations among nations, and that periodically flare up in a way that endangers world peace, must finally be settled. Palestine, Cyprus, South Africa, Kashmir are some of these issues; Vietnam is another. But the UN will be powerless to propose a settlement of the war in Vietnam as long as China is excluded from membership.

Senator Fulbright Dissents

Any American who says a critical word about U. S. military or para-military operations anywhere on the globe is assured of a generally bad press in his own land; and Senator Fulbright is no exception. It avails him nothing that he is the Senate's leading scholar on foreign affairs, that the Fulbright scholarships are a landmark in creative statesmanship, that he is Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. When, as in his speech on U. S. intervention in the Dominican Republic, he presumes to criticize our policy in the Caribbean, and in Latin America generally, he is rebuked by most of the commentators. In the Senate, Morse and Clark spoke up in defense of their colleague but Senators Dodd, Smathers, Lausche, Long and others laid down the predictable barrage. As Newsweek observed, Senator Fulbright had "knowingly staked out a lonely position."

But perhaps his position is not as lonely as it appears to be. Any number of Senators who are known to agree with Senator Fulbright maintained a discreet silence for fear of incurring the displeasure of the White House. At about the same time that Senator Fulbright was speaking, Dr. Wolfgang Friedmann, an international law expert from Columbia University, voiced much the same criticism of the President's handling of the Dominican crisis before the World Peace Through Law Conference in Washington. Dr. Friedmann took the position that the unilateral use of force signals a major weakening of the United Nations. "We are faced," he said, "with the threat of a collapse of the painstaking efforts of nearly half a century, and especially the last twenty years, to build up a system of organized international control of the use of force." United States intervention in the Dominican Republic—without a showing of outside direction of the rebellion—"cannot be justified by any canons of international law."

After the Bay of Pigs fiasco, which Senator Fulbright also opposed, President Kennedy lamented: "How can I have been so stupid?" But his successor will not abide criticism nor acknowledge mistakes. Asked how he felt about the decision to intervene in the Dominican Republic, he replied: "I would do it all over again, only we'd have done it earlier and tougher." At the last moment, the President put in an unexpected appearance at the World Peace Through Law Conference to voice a few platitudes about the UN, while carefully avoiding any reference to the Dominican Republic. The distinguished array of 3,000 Supreme Court Justices and international law experts heard him out, but his remarks drew only "a tepid response."

In the wake of the Fulbright speech the House proceeded to adopt a resolution endorsing the unilateral use of force by the United States or by any other Western Hemisphere country to prevent a Communist take-over anywhere in the hemisphere. The resolution was approved by a vote of 312 to 52. The Administration had not asked for the resolution but it did not oppose it. Many members, though made uneasy, said that they couldn't oppose a resolution that seemed to be intended to serve as an ex post facto endorsement of the President's Dominican policy. Some of these same members also criticized the State Department for "lack of backbone" in not taking a stand against the resolution. While the resolution is without legal effect, it will be read as a blanket endorsement of the unilateral use of force and will add to the criticism of American policy in South America. Rep. John Brademas said that he had gone all the way up to Secretary Dean Rusk and had been unable to get anyone to say whether the department was for or against the resolution. In brief, there is no indication in Washington of a willingness to learn from experience or to listen to critics.

The No-Enterprise System

By all journalistic standards, the Globe and Mail of Toronto is one of the best newspapers in the Western Hemisphere. It is also the one Canadian paper which maintains a full-time correspondent in China. This must be an expensive operation and, aside from the cost, it must have taken some doing to get a man there in the first place, and to keep him there.

The first incumbent, Frederick Nossal, opened a bureau office in 1959 and was subsequently expelled when he sent some dispatches that annoyed the Red regime. On returning home, he did a piece for The Nation ("China's Second Experiment," June 15, 1963) and wrote Dateline Peking (Harcourt, Brace & World).

The Globe and Mail let matters rest for a while, then put out feelers to see whether Nossal might be reinstated. When that failed, they waited some more, then sent Charles Taylor to Peking. Taylor, a first-class reporter, has now been in China for eighteen months, traveling and sending to his paper informative material that did not reach the West from any other source. The Nation, through the Globe and Mail, commissioned him to write the article whch starts on page 180. It is not one of his regular dispatches.

The Globe and Mail is not in the syndication business. In this instance, however, since the material was unique and had international importance, they offered Taylor's dispatches to American newspapers. The articles have appeared frequently in The New York Times, and occasionally in The Washington Post, the San Francisco Chronicle and a few other papers, but the bulk of the American press has ignored them.

Another outcome of the Globe and Mail vent that the Red Chinese news service was given p sion by the Canadian Government to base two Cl newsmen and their wives in Canada. Their disp are read by Taylor in the Chinese press and he r that they consist mostly of straight Canadian stories, with some "propaganda," or at any rate our side would regard as such. They send no r on the United States. Thus the Chinese peopl totally dependent for news of the United Stat what their government chooses to tell them—and we may be sure, is heavily larded with propaga while the American people are almost as badly i formed about China.

The situation is deplorable, and even worse the American standpoint than from the Chinese. we who are forever prating about on-the-scene r ing and truth in the news, but when it is made able in this crucial sector, the vast majority o American press will have none of it. Apparentl truth about China is not news, nor do we want Ch journalists in this country to give their versi events to their countrymen.

It was not always so. One does not have to grandfather, nor hark back to Richard Harding I to remember when the American press was reno for its enterprise. There is still no assignment too gerous, no expense too great, when its foreign c spondents are reporting the number of Vietna guerrillas American soldiers have killed (mostly aircraft) and similar feats of valor that make reading next to the sports page. But a vast co like China our press is glad to leave to the Canad

The Pay-Later Economy

Most Americans nowadays are in debt, som them up to their necks. Banks, loan companies loan sharks, dealers in consumer goods, colle agencies, sheriffs and lawyers prowl on the fr of the Affluent Society. Their prey is not the de ately poor, because they have no credit, nor the to-do who, when they borrow, are able to repay. least reputable elements of the loan industry b on the lower middle class, and particularly that ment which has recently risen from the working and wants to live it up on an inadequate incom this group bankruptcies are on the rise.

The loan industry — or, as it is more accur termed in some of its activities, the loan racket one of the heaviest of the heavy advertisers. American cannot step into a railroad or subway t or a bus, or walk past a bank, or open a newsp or turn on a radio set, without being importune borrow. He borrows for vacations, for higher ec tion, for home appliances, for clothes, and of co for his automobile. His home is mortgaged, an soon as he accumulates an equity he is remi that he can refinance and be in hock once more. one who fails to borrow to the limit of his cred regarded as a square.

n one of its brilliant roundups, Consumer Reports ptember, 1965) delves once more into the intri- ies of the keep-them-in-debt business, which has ome a major industry since World War II. Mort- ge debt for nonfarm homes then stood at $20 bil- ; it is now close to $200 billion. Short-term debt p to five years) has risen in twenty years from 5 billion to $80 billion—a ratio of nearly 15 to 1, against something on the order of 3 to 1 for gross tional product and for disposable income. Most of s consumer debt is little more than an unsecured mise to pay, since, except for automobiles, the ods purchased have little resale value or, as when proceeds of the loan were used for a funeral or cation trip, none at all.

The borrower counts on future earnings to keep up th the rat race. According to the Federal Reserve ard, 14 per cent of disposable income is now tied in short-term debt repayments. This does not nd too serious, but about half the nation's families estimated to owe it all, hence it averages about per cent of their disposable income, which is quite different matter. Moreover, when the economic ietists point to the growing volume of savings and sure us that it more than covers the growing vol- ne of debt, they do not take into account that the ople who have big savings are not the ones who ve burdensome consumer debts. So far the struc- re has not begun to totter, but with increased bor- wing concentrated in the most vulnerable sector the population, sooner or later something will give.

Whatever built-in safeguards against massive over- mmitment once existed are now being jettisoned in e rush to sell and buy, lend and borrow. If the would- borrower has a job and is not officially bankrupt, is automatically classified as a worthy credit risk. e trouble with this criterion is that the people who y on the easiest (and most expensive) terms are e ones with the least job security — even without tomation threatening them. And of course, in a pitalist economy, they have no capital.

The lenders and sellers take care of themselves. hen merchants sell on time, they job the contracts banks or sales finance companies, which hold the lk of consumer paper. This system protects the ller and lender against the imprudence, miscalcula- on or hard luck of the buyer-borrower. The dealer ay write a contract for, say, 18 or 24 per cent true nual interest on an automobile loan, on which the nk expects a return of 12 per cent true annual in- rest. The difference is the dealer's reserve, a nice rm for kickback. The dealer has every incentive to ck all he can into this fund, out of which losses e to default are paid.

Time was when a merchant was interested solely selling goods. Later, though he resorted to con- mer credit to stimulate sales, his primary objective as still to sell. Now the goods are often only a bait sell indebtedness, which is where the profit lies.

All of which gives added point and relevance to the Truth-in-Lending legislation jointly sponsored by Senators Paul Douglas and Philip Hart. This legislation would simply require the lender to inform the borrower of the interest rate and the total amount of the carrying charges. Presumably this information would place improvident borrowers on notice as to what the actual cost of the loan would be and, more important, enable borrowers to shop around for better terms. One would think that such legislation would pass by acclamation in a Congress dedicated to The Great Society. But Chairman Willis Robertson has kept the legislation bottled up in the Banking and Currency Committee for three and a half years. It will probably emerge from committee the day the boom breaks.

French Conscience

A number of French artists and intellectuals—including many who protested the French colonial war against Algeria by signing the famous "Manifesto of the 121"—have just issued an appeal on behalf of the deposed president of Algeria, Ahmed Ben Bella. Among the petitioners are Arthur Adamov, Simone de Beauvoir, Claude Bourdet, Aimé Cesaire, Yves Montand, Alain Resnais, Claude Roy, Françoise Sagan, Nathalie Sarraute and Jean-Paul Sartre.

The appeal expresses no judgment on the Ben Bella regime or on that of Colonel Boumedienne, which so abruptly replaced it. It demands that the deposed president, whose whereabouts and condition have remained unknown since his arrest three months ago, be accorded the elementary human rights that have thus far been denied him: the right to be represented by a lawyer of his own choice, to be treated by his own doctor (he is rumored to be seriously ill), to receive friends and other visitors.

This "urgent appeal to the world conscience," as the signers call it, is a further example of the high sense of moral responsibility that the French nonconformist intelligentsia bring to public issues.

No Place to Hide

Hypocrisy, according to the aphorism, is the homage that vice renders to virtue; it is also a useful screen for morally indefensible actions. For more than ten years, hypocrisy has been an indispensable element in the conduct of American policy in Vietnam: It was not our war, it was the war of the Vietnamese people, whom we were selflessly aiding against the invader from the north. Our soldiers and airmen were not fighting, only advising, and when they were killed it was while pondering and counseling. Ngo Dinh Diem was practically a saint (until we decided to get rid of him), and our every action was on the side of justice and virtue.

These pretenses enabled Americans, except for an immunized minority, to defend the war as a just war, or simply to disregard it. That is all over now. Since the massive escalation of the war—more specifically since President Johnson said that we were in effect at war, and the more as we have pushed the Vietnamese aside—it has become our war in a sense that was not true in the past. This is what the Manchester Guardian means in a recent editorial comment titled "Americanization of the Vietnam War." Among other things, it has become more than ever a white man's battle. This has important military and political implications in Asia, but it also makes things less comfortable for the folks at home. As men are drafted for service in Vietnam, the war will be brought home to them in a way that the most unlettered cannot fail to understand. But it is the spiritual advisers, the clergy, the commentators and interpreters, who have a heavy burden now thrust upon them. They must either justify what is increasingly difficult to justify, both in its scope and its character, or they must stand up and protest. The questions of aims, intentions, proximate and ulterior motives, take on a new importance and cannot be glossed over.

"The agony of rural Vietnam, where 75 per cent of its people live, must be seen to be comprehended," one observer reports from Vietnam. "It is found in the faces of the widow and the orphan, the hurt and the homeless, the harassed and the fearful—and their name is legion." The speaker is Stephen G. Carey of the American Friends Service Committee, so what he says may be discounted—the Friends are always on the side of magnanimity. But a distinguished Roman Catholic theologian, the Rev. George Tavard of Mount Mercy College in Pittsburgh, argues that "the people of any given nation have a native right to make a revolution without the interference of foreign pow and on this basis questions the morality of U.S. po The National Council of Churches has formed a c mittee of fourteen prominent churchmen "to st the deepening crisis." And letter writers in the n papers show increasing solicitude over our role.

The conclusion increasingly reached is that war cannot be "just," essentially because it is imm to fight a war in the midst of a civilian popula that has never clearly expressed itself one way or other on the so-called issues. It is basically a gr power struggle, and since it cannot be fought ex with the most horrible consequences to people are in effect bystanders, it is inherently and irrem ably immoral.

How soon such conclusions can affect the po elite in Washington is a moot question. But the science of the rest of America is on trial. If we different from, say, the Germans in World War now is the time to make the difference manifest we fail to do so, we will be judged by history as t have been judged.

Mr. Sherrill Goes to Washington

Recently Robert G. Sherrill, well known t Nation readers (see p. 184, this issue), decide to take up residence in Washington. Taking ad vantage of this move, The Nation has name him its Washington correspondent.

Image and Reality

CHINA FROM WITHIN

. . . . Charles Tayl

Peking

From the vantage point of Peking, United States policy statements on China make strange and disturbing reading. Speeches by President Johnson, Secretary Rusk and other leaders impress one clear picture on their audience. China is the "enemy": an angry, irresponsible giant with vast armies and a nuclear potential, supporting aggression in South Vietnam and revolutions everywhere, determined to conquer or control the whole of Southeast Asia, and probably bent on eventual world domination.

Washington decrees, therefore, that Peking must be tamed and even taught a lesson. It must be contained by military might, denied diplomatic recognition and a United Nations seat, cut off even from trading and cultural contacts with the American people. The bombing of Chinese military and industrial centers is openly discussed as a final resort.

Small wonder, then, that the Chinese leaders seem to believe their own propaganda: that the United States is an angry, irresponsible giant with vast armies and nuclear arsenals, ringing the Chinese mainland with military bases, and occupying the Chinese island of Taiwan, supporting Fascist dictatorships and suppressing popular revolutions, and cooperating with the Soviet Union to dominate the world at the expense of all the emerg peoples.

While each view contains sc segments of truth, both propaga pictures are wide of the mark to extent that would be ludicrous, w it not so dangerous. It seems wc while, therefore, and even urge to convey to Americans some i of how China looks today, from inside. As seen in Peking—and trips throughout the Chinese ma land—the "enemy" is a vastly ferent creature from the bogyn of U.S. propaganda.

First, it must be said with all sible emphasis that the present ture of China is defensive, not gressive. In the foreseeable fut that is not likely to change, and one outstanding reason. Des

---

Charles Taylor is completing an eighteen-month assignment as correspondent in China for the Globe and Mail of Toronto.

ir violent polemics against both United States and the Soviet ion, and despite their support for olutionaries in Asia, Africa and in America, the Chinese leaders primarily concerned with domes-problems, both economic and po-cal. In their twilight years, the gh old rulers in Peking have a t of headaches on the home
nt. Nothing in their record sugts that they would aggravate se problems, and imperil their sent progress, by indulging in cy foreign adventures. Indeed, ir attitude is just the opposite:
ing sixteen years of Communist e, Chinese foreign policies have n marked by caution rather than perate bravado—and that apes even to their military advenes in Korea, the Himalayas and Taiwan Straits.

When they won their final tories in 1949, the Chinese Comnists faced two main tasks: to ild China into a modern indusal power, and to insure the future their revolution by establishing m Communist party control at ery level of society. After sixteen even years of major progress and ious setbacks, these two concerns ll predominate.

Across the country, there are def-te signs of industrial expansion.
om Harbin in the northeast to nming in the southwest, recent itors have noted new plants unr construction and old plants, andoned during the chaos of the eat Leap Forward, being reacti-ted. To some extent, this activity ars out the Chinese claim that a ew upsurge in production" is unr way; it is interpreted as a prel-le to the much delayed Third Five ar Plan, due to start in 1966. But r all the bold slogans, Chinese onomic planning now seems cau-ous and pragmatic. The evidence dicates that there will be no re-rn to the disastrous, mass-line licies of 1958-59—back-yard fur-ces and the like—when Peking asted that China, through the eer sweat and enthusiasm of its illions, would overtake Britain as industrial power within fifteen ars.

Instead, there is a sober reaffiration that agriculture, and indus-ies serving agriculture, must have iority over heavy industry. There a new trend toward specialized ctories, and away from the huge,
all-purpose plants (often built with Soviet help) that are now admitted to have been inefficient. There is an emphasis on quality, rather than quantity, and workers are praised and rewarded for practicing economy and making technical innovations. In high-level directives, factory managers are told not to be too zealous and not to drive their workers to the point of exhaustion, as often happened during the misnamed Great Leap. Overtime is discouraged, and it is officially stated that workers must have eight hours' sleep and sufficient free spare time. Even political meetings are to be fewer and shorter.

This caution emphasizes the fact that progress is still tentative and the economic base still precarious. After the disastrous years of 1959-62, harvests have been generally good, but with a population that must already exceed 700 million, and is growing by at least 15 million each year, food is still the main problem. This year, China will again import about 6 million tons of wheat and other food grains, with Canada and Australia supplying most of it. This year, too, the Chinese are spending an estimated $120 million to buy up all available world supplies of chemical fertilizer, aside from their heavy purchases of fertilizer factories.

Much of this effort and expense simply enables Chinese food supplies to keep pace with population. There is still too little surplus from the fields to permit rapid industrial expansion. After the grain and fertilizer purchases, there is too little foreign exchange in Chinese coffers to permit heavy spending of capital imports (although repayment this year of the last remaining debts to the Soviet Union has removed a heavy financial burden). While Peking hotels are filled with Japanese and West European traders, and a few major deals have been completed, imports of plant and equipment have been somewhat disappointing this year, compared with the modest boom of 1964.

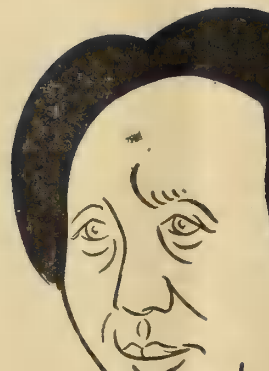
This cautious approach to economic problems could be abandoned overnight, if the planners in the hierarchy again lose out to the dogmatists, as had happened in 1958. With their revolutionary outlook, Mao Tse-tung and the other leaders must have difficulty resisting psychological and political temptations to launch new mass drives. Especially, they are tempted to crack down on the peasants, and to deny them their private plots, private livestock and the other "small freedoms" that were restored to them after the chaotic early days of the communes. But at present, in both town and countryside, most signs indicate restraint and realism.

The same moderation prevails when Chinese leaders relate their economic problems to foreign policies. When it suits them, the Chinese can make economic sacrifices for political ends—for instance, by giving aid to Asian and African nations. But in talks with foreign visitors, Mao and the other leaders stress one main point: China needs many years of peace to develop its economy, and does not seek a major confrontation with the United States. There seems little reason to doubt their sincerity on this score, particularly in view of Chinese policy statements on Vietnam, which are remarkably defensive in tone. In their own propaganda, the Chinese have acknowledged Washington's warning that this time — unlike Korea — there would be no privileged sanctuary. While the Chinese leaders remain rightly confident that no invading armies could ever conquer their vast country, they can have few illusions about the devastation that American bombers could inflict on their industrial centers, their communications and their nascent nuclear installations. On the eve of new industrial expansion, they show no inclination lightly to risk such destruction.

In the political sector, the Chinese leaders also have major problems and preoccupations. Since these concern the sanctity of their revolution and the future of communism in China, they remain more basic to Peking than even the most cherished foreign goals. After sixteen years of power, Mao and his colleagues fear that their militant and puritanical brand of communism has taken only tentative roots in the vastness of China. The rising generations cause them most concern, since they are too young to have experienced the hardships and iniquities of Kuomintang rule. Too young, also, to have lived through the revolution, they have less sympathy for the revolutionary goals and demands of the aging leadership. Young people wonder (often openly, in letters to newspapers) why they should not be free to concentrate on developing professional skills and improving their living standards, instead of always "placing politics in command." The party demands that they be "Red and expert," with the stress on redness, or loyalty to the party line. In reply, they put forward their own slogan —"to be passable politically, to be very good professionally, and to be comfortable in daily life."

To Mao and the other leaders, this is darkest heresy, and it has been strongly condemned. In recent months, the regime has made a few concessions with respect to daily life in the cities, to keep pace with the general improvement in the supply of food and basic consumer goods. As long as they work hard, and live within their means, people are no longer condemned for wearing slightly stylish clothes, for having permanent waves, or for spending their money on cameras and other status symbols. But while there may also be fewer political meetings, the demand for political orthodoxy has, if anything, been strengthened. In Mao's view, many generations must work hard under stringent discipline to build a China that is both powerful and Communist. Backsliding cannot be tolerated, since it would erode the very foundations of party power. It is this concern—as much as national rivalries—that underlines the vehement dispute with the Soviet Union. The specter of "revisionism" creeping across China haunts Mao in his remaining years. In his few recent talks with Western visitors, the old revolutionary has emphasized this point again and again; with him, it is an obsession.

Hence the all-embracing "Socialist education" movement, which reaches every level of society but is especially directed toward young people and intellectuals. Everyone must read the works of Mao as the golden guide to solving every problem, whether it be the breeding of a new strain of rice, the designing of a 12,000-ton hydraulic press, or even the playing of ping-pong. To toughen their minds and bodies, and to banish bourgeois desires, youths, intellectuals, office workers and even party cadres must spend several weeks each year in hard physical labor on the communes or in the factories. Each year, hundreds of thousands of young people must leave the cities permanently, to settle in the countryside; they must do so partly for economic reasons (there are not enough jobs in the cities, and not enough places in the universities and senior middle schools), but partly to serve the same political ends.



Mao Tse-tung

When heresies appear, they must be ruthlessly suppressed. There is sweeping criticism of philosophers and historians who show revisionist tendencies, however abstruse. Ideological errors are deliberately built into movies, which are then released as "negative examples." Last winter, the party leaders were disturbed by reports of widespread corruption on the communes; officials and party cadres were alleged to be indulging in embezzlement and profiteering. The result was a major campaign called si ching, or four cleanouts, which sent tl sands of city dwellers to live selected communes for eight to months, in order to spy out the fenders and do political work am the peasants.

It has been so far little ticed in the West, but Peking currently devoting great effort establishing new networks of litical control. New political partments have been formed in industries. On the communes, a ciations of poor and lower-mi peasants are being set up, to w closely with the party in crack down on richer peasants and a one who shows corrupt or capita tendencies. Youth organizations being reorganized and expanded a parallel move, the insignia of r were abolished this past sum in the armed forces (they were troduced only as late as 1954) is slightly ludicrous to see a "c rade commander" (no longer ca general) wearing the same flo khaki uniform as an ordinary dier, with the same simple red on the cap, and red flashes on collar. But however comic, it i move of great political importa clearly designed to strengthen ty control in the army, and to vent the formation of a rival m tary elite.

As seen from Peking, these nomic and political drives domin the daily life of the nation and occupy the leaders. In this pers tive, China's foreign policies revolutionary intrigues — which greatly excite the attention of outside world—seem less menac and even less crucial.

It is true that Chinese officialc spends great effort on entertain and wooing potential friends fr Asia, Africa and Latin Amer whether they be bourgeois nation ists or pro-Peking Communists.
Vietnam, especially, they issue unceasing effusion of virulent violent propaganda—for interna well as external consumption.
nese newspapers print four to pages. Each day, at least one p is devoted to news from Vietn hailing Communist victories, rea imagined, but making no atte to hide the extent of the U.S. n tary build-up. It is the same w radio, television, theatre and movies. In factories, blackboa and wall posters urge the work to greater efforts under such

s as “support the heroic struggle the Vietnamese people against . aggression.” In their public ches and at receptions for visit-statesmen, Chinese leaders lose opportunity to stress their supt for North Vietnam and the tcong.

ut all this is clearly within a ensive context. The Chinese have red to send troops to South Viet-n, if so requested by the National eration Front. But the very word-of this threat makes it seem ree, and most diplomats in Peking convinced that the Chinese ld move south only if they felt ir own borders endangered — ier by an American advance oss the 17th Parallel, or by the ninent collapse of the Commuregime in North Vietnam. In same vein, the Chinese state t they have made all necessary parations, and that the People's eration Army is waiting “in full tle array.” Taken out of context, may sound menacing. In cont, it is part of the same defen-posture.

t is obvious that the Chinese e made some military preparans, especially in the southern vinces of Yunnan, Kwangsi and angtung. Outside the army, ng people are encouraged to take “military `sports” — swimming, oting, signaling and mountain nbing. In recent months, millions young adults have again been pt up in a mass militia move-nt, and the hard-core units drill several hours each week—some-es, with modern weapons, more n with ancient rifles and even nboo spears. Political motives y a big part in these activities ce they help to toughen the lies of the young, and to temper ir minds in an atmosphere of itant struggle. Insofar as they e any military significance, it defensive, and directives to the itia make clear that they must train their charges to back up the regular army in case of invasion, bombings or parachute landings.

It is likely that the Chinese leaders look forward to U.S. air raids on China, with either nuclear or conventional weapons, as a distinct possibility in the near future. (Again, we return to those American policy statements. Read from a Chinese point of view, they seem both aggressive and irrational.) But for all their propaganda on Vietnam, they have made almost no attempt to prepare the civilian population for imminent conflict, and have done nothing that would give Washington an excuse to order pre-emptory strikes. At least in Peking, a few air-raid shelters have been quietly built in recent weeks, but there have been no air-raid drills and no obvious or widespread evacuation of key personnel. Instead, the atmosphere is very much one of business as usual, and the steady influx of visiting delegations, traders and even tourists (from virtually every nation but the United States) adds to the impression of normalcy.

There is, in short, no evidence that China would welcome an immediate confrontation with the United States, and much evidence that China will do everything possible to avoid such a conflict. Yet skeptics may maintain that for the Chinese, such caution is a short-range necessity. The Chinese, in this view, are merely waiting until American vigilance is lulled, until their economy is stronger, and until they have more nuclear weapons and an effective means of delivery. Then the yellow horde will pounce, and the whole of Asia will be imperiled.

There can, of course, be no certainty, but it is possible to make some informed guesses on the basis of Chinese history, Chinese actions in the last sixteen years, the declared intentions of Chinese leaders, and China's economic and military potential.

It seems likely that for several decades Peking will be primarily concerned with internal development, especially with stabilizing agriculture and building an industrial base. As the old leaders die off, the new leaders, lacking their elders' personal hold on the people, will spend much energy consolidating their positions and preserving the Communist party as the source of all political power. To this end, it may be necessary for them to make some concessions in the area of daily life. What Mao fears—Soviet-style revisionism—may slowly overcome the old dogmatic approach.

In foreign policy, China will follow goals that are both nationalist and Communist. The Chinese have made clear that, in their own good time, they will settle scores and recover territory wrested from them by the so-called imperialists — including Taiwan, Hong Kong, Macao, vast tracts of Soviet Asia and possibly Outer Mongolia. This would be the goal of any strong Chinese ruler — even Chiang Kai-shek, were he still in power. Similarly, any Chinese regime would want to re-establish the old Chinese hegemony around its borders, and especially in Southeast Asia. It will be a major Chinese goal to exclude U.S. power and influence from the Asian mainland and the adjoining islands. In the short run, China will work to establish (or maintain in power) friendly (but not necessarily Communist) regimes in Indo-China, Burma, Thailand, Singapore, Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines. In the longer run, the Chinese will try to extend their influence to India and Japan, at the direct expense of the Western powers and the Soviet Union.

Deeply chauvinistic, the Chinese leaders yearn for the old days when the Middle Kingdom dominated Asia, both by its wealth and power and by the excellence of its civilization. But this does not mean that the Chinese will move with reckless haste — launching invasions or brandishing nuclear weapons. Patience has usually been a mark of their diplomacy, and they can be expected to favor persuasion, subversion and indirect threats. Contrary to both American and Soviet propaganda, the Chinese have never said that they would welcome a nuclear war. They have no illusions about matching American nuclear might and will probably use their own small arsenal to increase their political influence over their neighbors, rather than as a direct military threat.

Driven on by their messianic faith, the Chinese will continue to seek leadership of the developing world of Asia, Africa and Latin America—again, at the direct expense of both the Western powers and the Soviet Union. At least in the near future, Chinese support for revolutionary movements will continue to be a menace to Western interests. It is possible, however, that a new generation of leaders will be less driven by ideology, and prepared to trim down these global ambitions in order to concentrate on developing Chinese power at home and in the immediate area.

But while their communism may be modified from that of the founders, there is little likelihood that any new leaders would be less sternly nationalistic. China's humiliation at the hands of the Western powers, from the Opium Wars to World War I, is still deeply felt. Foreign residents and foreign visitors to China are almost always greatly disturbed by the sharp chauvinism of the young. While they might welcome revisionism, Chinese youth will be strong nationalists for generations to come.

In all this, there is little consolation for Americans. For reasons both historical and contemporary, hostility toward the United States runs almost as deep as the militant chauvinism — indeed, the two are closely linked. From an American point of view, China will be a difficult nation to live with for many years to come. As long as the United States plays a military role in Asia—to support "free" governments, to stop the spread communism or, more hones simply to defend its great po interests — Washington risks series of Koreas and Vietnams v the Chinese and their allies.

This may be inevitable: on b sides, the poison runs deep. little is served by American p aganda that pictures China as archenemy, bent on ruthless c quest. Such distortions will c prolong and complicate the p lems of Taiwan and the Chir seat in the United Nations — two essential first steps to o coming Chinese hostilities and ducing the threat to peace.

Chinese goals and Chinese p lems are much more complex, e contradictory, than Americans led to believe. In this, there r be some hope for the West. hope will never be fulfilled as l as Washington misunderstands misinterprets the fact of mod China.

JAMES EASTLAND: CHILD OF SCORN

Robert G. Sherr

James O. Eastland has, during his twenty-four years in the United States Senate, been called many things. In the delta country that arches along the Mississippi River from Memphis to Vicksburg, he is referred to with real affection by the white folks as "Our Jim." Elsewhere in Mississippi affection diminishes to merely the typical appreciation of the South for standard fare; political hominy grits, tasteless but substantial. Robert Hearin, the affable president of the First National Bank of Jackson, one of the two largest banks in Mississippi, is downright proud to be a friend of Jim Eastland, whom he calls "solid, you know what I mean, really solid."

Washington has reacted to him across a wide spectrum. FDR saw him as just another Dixie pitchman, open to trade. ("That's all right, son," Roosevelt told him after Eastland's first race for the Senate. "I got quite a kick out of those anti-New Deal cracks. But now you're elected and we've got to play together. You can come see me whenever you want to.") Eisenhower feared him and allowed him to handle Republican patronage in Mississippi. Lyndon Johnson's love of power includes that vested in Eastland, with the result that they seem chummier than they really are. ("They're like brothers," says Wilburn Buckley, Eastland's home secretary, with considerable exaggeration.)

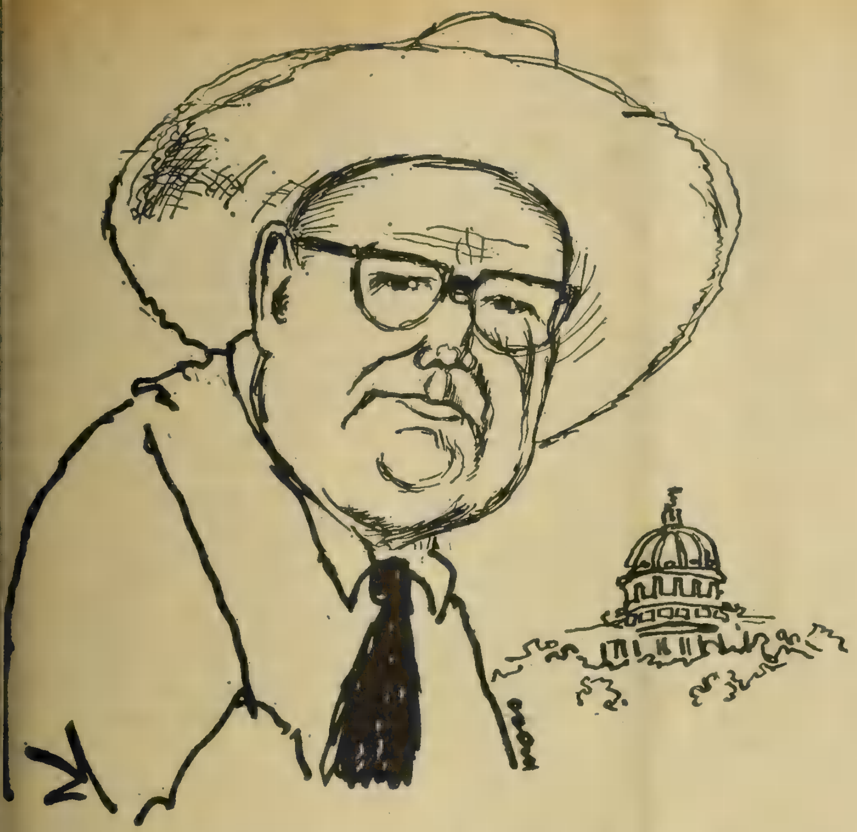
But, generally, the descriptions applied to Eastland outside the South reflect a deep bitterness and fear. Even Westbrook Pegler, who stands second to no man as a wacky conservative, attempts to hoot him down as an "illiterate in good standing."

Getting his Senate colleagues to appraise his character publicly is not easy, but the late Herbert H. Lehman, once Senator from New York, damned Eastland as "a symbol of racism"—an estimate with which most Southerners would agree, but with a different intonation. Time after one of its mysterious polls, marked him as the " tion's most dangerous demagog I. F. Stone offers a briefer sket "Mississippi McCarthy."

Intimates of the Senator are qu to press upon inquirers the port of him as a devoted homebody avoids the party circuit in W ington to be able to spend more t with his family and with his r life detective stories, which he re at the rate of two a day; as a g planter, a kind planter, who "n whips his niggers and would any white worker who did"; a pillar of the Democratic Party has helped keep Mississippi f going officially Republican (as in the light of the last election, mattered much). The private im of Eastland as a kindly pate planter somehow keeps getting bled up by his carnivorous pu image, however, and despite the efforts of his friends and famil remains true that none of Ameri anti-Southern cults has more otees than the one that directs hatred at Senator James Eastl He, more than any other ex politician, seems to symbolize v

---

Robert G. Sherrill is writing a book about Southern political personalities, to be published by Houghton Mifflin.



many Negroes, liberals, laborers, ellectuals, seekers, mystics and vericks are trying to remove m the world.

Exactly why this should be true more complex than is the man o inspires such feelings: a rather nple man, really, as simple as nflower County, his home and thplace, where 70 per cent of the pulation lives and dies in uncom- cated peonage, where violence g., Emmett Till) flows out as turally as the passage of seasons, d where one can easily stand in middle of the delta's steaming neness and honestly believe that world goes straight out forever, t all the way and overripe, and de by a God who in His infinite sdom gave Adam a cotton allot- nt.

It's hardly enough to say at Eastland is hated because he is old-school segregationist. Strom urmond is shriller and Leander rez more savage, and yet they are dged to be merely disagreeable riosities. Is it because he is so ef- tive in his hyper-conservatism? t he isn't very effective: he has ver had a fraction of the success following in Washington that en an ailing Harry Byrd can com- nd today. Although he has few als as an accomplished vilifier of the Supreme Court, this separates him from most other deep South politicians only in the matter of decibles.

Eastland does not draw dislike from any specialty; he is adept at irritating in many ways. If he is dangerous, it is only as the embodiment of the Southern middle class at bay. He is, though very wealthy, middle class in every way. Like Miniver Cheevy, James Eastland, child of scorn, loves the days of old but does not know what to do about it. "We are living in an age," he wails, "where everything old is evil. Old values are being swept away and pseudo-sophistries substituted." His emphasis on chivalry is rather odd at times. He seemed less concerned that three persons were slain and more than 300 wounded at the Ole Miss riots than that some of the coeds were reportedly forced to flee their dormitory in their nightgowns. And when dozens of Negroes entered the registration office of Mrs. Martha Turner Lamb in Greenwood, Miss., demanding that their full citizenship be recognized, Eastland was not so much perturbed that a revolution was at hand (although that did annoy him) as he was that a group would "push themselves into the office of any public official, much less the office of a lady public official."

However, there is a leak in the quaintness that deflates it to mere dullness. In frequent public statements Eastland has shown his concept of the law and of the Constitution to be that of a recipe book, wherein every problem is indexed and where one need only turn to the right page to find the proper formula. The Constitution speaks but is not to be interpreted—except by some psychic communication with the founding fathers. "I say," says Eastland, "that the fundamental of all fundamentals in our system of government is the premise that the Constitution of our country shall be interpreted strictly in accordance with the understanding of the members of the Constitutional Convention who submitted it and the states which adopted it."

Persons who expect imagination or eloquence from Eastland are always disappointed. Pat Watters, Southern Regional Council writer, heard Eastland at a fund-raising dinner for the Georgia States Rights Council, and described him as "a disappointment, a sing-song speaker who often lost the tune, a stringer-outer of sentence structure, a constructer of swimming syllogisms, a citer of confused Communist-front charges, and in this performance anyhow, a bore." Watters expected too much: Eastland, with his raspy repetitions, is usually a bore. He confuses excess for eloquence—as when he charged that the NAACP is backed by organizations "of all shades of red . . . the blood red of the Communist Party . . . the almost equally red of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S. of A."—and has neither the guttersnipe charm of Theodore Bilbo nor the raging excitement of Richard Russell at his best. Eastland is simply excessively trite.

Carefully lettered on the wall of the Freedom Democratic Party's shanty headquarters in the Negro slum of Indianola, county seat of Sunflower County, is this dogma:

There are rich people
And poor people.
Middle class people
Are the same as Rich People.
They have more things
Than they need.

That is another clue to Eastland as an object of hate. He stands preeminently for the preservation of a world in which the middle class so outdistances the poor class that even to mention a "middle" begs the question. In any real sense there are only two classes: those who have what they need and those who do not.

Although he is not the largest landholder in Sunflower County, Eastland's 5,800-acre plantation, acquired by his grandfather at $1 an acre and now worth between $500 and $700 an acre, makes him a multimillionaire. In addition he has leased a 1,300-acre plantation near Vicksburg for raising specialty cattle, and holds stock in the First National Bank and the Deposit Guarantee of Jackson, the state's two largest and politically most influential banks.

Telephone operators in Sunflower County earn $200 a month, stenographers $200 a month, sales clerks $20 a week and salesmen $50 a week, mechanics $1 an hour, electricians $1.25 an hour, medical technologists $200 a month, bookkeepers $175 a month. (Figures taken from a salary list issued by the Indianola Chamber of Commerce to entice new industry and business.) However, contrary to what a Northerner or Westerner might suppose, these workers—all white, of course; jobs of that type are not open to Negroes—are not the lower middle class. They are, like Eastland, members of the wealthy middle class of Sunflower County. They have something; they have, by comparison with the Negroes who work on Eastland's plantation, more than they need. So when the National White Citizens Council movement was born in Indianola in 1954, a movement that originally was said to be made up of "respectable middle-class" white people, it's no wonder that Eastland was one of the organizers and the chief speaker. In the unreal world of Mississippi, the clerk, the burgher and the planter stand shoulder to shoulder not democratically but in the aristocracy of the full gut.

Of the 46,000 residents of Sunflower County, 68 per cent are Negroes.* Most of these Negroes are in families earning less than $1,000 a year, with children 9 and 10 years old working a full day in the fields to bring the family total to even that much. Full-time Negro maids in town are paid $8 a week. Two-thirds of the residents must expect to subsist on federal food handouts at some time during the year.

The rapid increase in the use of cotton-picking machines and weed-killing chemicals has brought unemployment and hunger to Sunflower County. Between 1950 and 1960, Negro farm jobs fell off 48 per cent. The unneeded Negroes are looked upon as a nuisance. "Negroes," said one planter, "went out with the mule." If they are not yet gone, they are going. In the last decade, hunger and despair have driven 22 per cent of them out of the county.

Many of those who remain and who are uppity enough to protest tell of slave conditions. That phrase was used by Andrew Hawkins recently when he testified before two Congressional committees. Hawkins, a Negro cotton picker who is an official with the hardly existing Freedom Labor Union, said that Negro cotton choppers who live on Eastland's plantation earn less than 30c an hour when they work, which often is less than two days a week. "Just bunk, all bunk," said Eastland.

Clyde Rutledge, general manager of Eastland's plantation, would not let me on the premises to interview workers, but I took a sneak tour one night, going in by a back road. There are teen-age children in there who have never been to school because they have never had the clothes to wear; there are children 9 years old who wo from sunup to sundown. Some Eastland's workers have ne tasted beef. One woman said s had eaten turkey only twice her life: once when she got a turk from comedian Dick Gregory, a the other time, back in the m 1950s, when she bought a turk on the installment plan. At a tract driver's shanty the family meal th night had been biscuits, molass and salt meat. Tractor drivers a among the elite force; for a twel hour day they earn $6 and wo nearly the year around. At a cott chopper's home, the menu had be bread and butter beans. Cott choppers earn only $3 a day a have only a four-month work yea

Meanwhile, at Sunflower Count six Rotary clubs, four Lions clul four VFW posts and seven gard clubs the life of service and f goes on about as usual, conscien clear. For in Washington, speaki their true beliefs and desires, ass ing them that what they do is rig —that they are not to blame for t
Negro's condition but the fact th
"our natural resources have be exploited by Eastern capital as outlet for investments to make hu profits from cheap Southern lab —is the potent voice of Our J (who will gross an estimated qu ter of a million dollars this year)

Our Jim says: "We have no v ing qualifications based on ra none at all, and anybody wh qualified can vote." (NAACP hea quarters in Jackson says there a 13,524 Negroes of voting age
Sunflower County and 164 are r istered; that's 1.2 per cent.)

---

*These and other figures that follow are either from Indianola Chamber of Commerce records or from U.S. Census Bureau records, supplied by the Indianola C. of C.

r Jim says: "I am against any ization which indulges, which otes, racial and religious preju- hatred and bigotry." (He has rted the John Birch Society, itizens Council and every ma- white-supremacy organization has popped up in the South in ast twenty years.)

r Jim says: "I have never en- l in a filibuster. Southern Sen- have never filibustered but we conducted campaigns of edu- n." (He has done service in anti-civil rights filibuster that aken place in the Senate in the wenty-four years.)

r Jim says — or until a few ago he was still saying it — e's not a Ku Klux Klan chapter e state of Mississippi."

ese are not lies; they are the expressions of how one region itself, and itself in relation to est of the world. Such views, esult partly of individual my- and partly of regional mad- forestall any outside persua- and the nation, seeking di- e, is thus frustrated to the of rage and turns easily on and because he tells his South- yths with such bland sincerity.

On the wall of Eastland's is a photograph of Mary Ann y, Miss America of 1959, in- d, "To a great statesman and loyal Mississippian." He is a loyal Mississippian, and this loyalty, combined with his hold on the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has given Eastland both the motive and the position to shape, retard and pervert the civil rights movement more than any other man in America. The Judiciary Committee is one of the two or three most important committees in the Senate; some believe it to be the most important. It handles not only all civil rights bills but all judicial appointments, including appointments to the Supreme Court, and oversees all appointive jobs in the Department of Justice.

For many people, the theory of committee structure by seniority reached its most indefensible point in 1956, when Eastland became chairman of the Judiciary Committee on the death of Sen. Harley Kilgore, a liberal from West Virginia. The promotion was made on the recommendation of then Democratic Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson. Only two Senators spoke out against the appointment: Wayne Morse of Oregon and Herbert Lehman of New York, who received their reward from the Southern press by being called "two racist demagogues" (Richmond Times-Dispatch) and "leftwing pinkos" (Jackson, Miss., Daily News). Other Senators who might have been expected to gag at the promotion took the position that they were made helpless by the seniority system.

But the next year, when Majority Leader Johnson laid his committee slates before the Senate, with Eastland again tabbed for the Judiciary chairmanship, Paul Douglas of Illinois was finally moved to point out that the Senate and Johnson were not helpless, as they pretended, because they did not follow the seniority system when it pleased the inner Establishment to ignore it. Although Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee (usually on the outs with the Establishment) had four years' seniority over Sen. John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts, Kennedy had been named in his stead to a coveted seat on the Foreign Relations Committee.

Some observers were well pleased by the Eastland appointment. Fulton Lewis, Jr., remarked that "Kilgore was a constant critic of big business and sought unremittingly to prod the government into more antitrust bills. Eastland is not likely to react the same way." (Eastland has indeed not reacted the same way. Not once has he initiated an antitrust investigation; and when four steel companies refused to surrender cost data subpoenaed by Senator Kefauver, Eastland told them, "I don't blame you at all.")

For his part, Eastland appeared not to understand what all the quarreling was about. "Of course I'll be an impartial chairman of the Judiciary Committee," he said publicly, "and carry out my duties to the best of my abilities"; privately, he gave his word of honor to two delegates from the NAACP that he would do nothing to block the progress of civil rights bills to the floor.

The New York Times credits the Eastland influence in the Judiciary Committee and its Civil Rights Subcommittee, of which he was chairman before advancing to chairmanship of the full committee, with bottling up 122 civil rights bills.

Later Eastland held up appointments within the Justice Department, attempting to evoke the promise that federal troops would not be used to enforce civil rights laws in the South. During this period he would brag in speeches around Mississippi of how "in time there was so much pressure built up from various members of the committee who wanted to get their nominees approved, I was able to get the Judiciary Committee to approve or reject bills and to name judges I wanted." As a matter of course since he became chairman, Negro nominees to the bench have been kept waiting nine months to a year for confirmation, and Jewish nominees have frequently had to wait just as long.

Eastland was correct when he boasted of his bargaining power. Thurgood Marshall, counsel for the NAACP and a Negro, was nominated Sept. 26, 1961, to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. One year later, less two weeks, he received confirmation by Eastland's committee. There had been a purpose to the delay, as Attorney General Robert Kennedy is said to have discovered one day when, meeting Eastland in the corridor, he was accosted with this quasi-threat: "Tell your brother that if he will give me Harold Cox I will give him the nigger" (meaning Marshall, now Solicitor General).

Marshall thereupon ascended the Second Circuit bench and Cox, Eastland's old college roommate and protégé, became a federal judge in the circuit that handles most of the deep South's civil rights cases. Cox's tenure there has been distinguished by such acts as calling some Negro civil rights defendants "chimpanzees," protesting by letter to the Justice Department about its "lousy" civil rights cases, threatening on one occasion to jail U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach for contempt, and throwing out indictments against seventeen men charged with the murder of three young rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss. — a triple murder which Eastland, by the way, persisted in calling a "hoax" until the bodies were actually dug out of the mud.

The cumulative effect of this kind of delay and barter within the Judiciary Committee is such that for some time Eastland has been considered no joking matter. One can scarcely raise a smile now by recalling the days when Eastland's Internal Security Subcommittee voiced grave concern because the Young Pioneers were circulating leaflets advocating "Smash the Boy Scouts!" Gone, too, is the time when no Washington cocktail party was considered complete unless somebody came up with the quip that the two southernmost parts of the United States are Key West and James O. Eastland.

Grimness has set in. It is understandable—since so many bombings, burnings and assaults have occurred contrapuntally to Eastland's propaganda litanies in the Senate—but it is also unfortunate, for some of the finest off-Broadway farces have been played in Eastland's committees.

If all the column inches Eastland has put into the Congressional Record in connection with that shapeless social nebula which he calls communism were placed end to end, "they might stretch," as one Washington wit calculated, "from here to sanity." In pursuit of what he conceives to be his duty, Eastland has filled the Record with a riot of accidental humor. Describing one civil rights meeting in Atlanta recently, Eastland concluded, with an air of intrigue uncovered, "It is perhaps significant that almost one-third of those present at this conference wore beards."

Deeply shaken by what he called the "invasion" of Mississippi by the National Lawyers Guild to help participate in the 1964 summer project of voter registration, Eastland set out to show the world just what sort of spies and subversives his state was having to deal with. He gave Henry W. McGee, Jr., of Chicago as an example. "When he was 14 years old," Eastland told a no doubt puzzled Senate, "Henry W. McGee, Jr., was reportedly a member of the International Workers Order, Lodge No. 751 at Chicago." That membership was eighteen years ago, and apparently Eastland realized that it did not strike his colleagues as something to get terribly upset about, so he threw in a few things that Henry McGee, Sr., had done that displeased him.

John Tillotson, another invader, was guilty in Eastland's eyes because at the University of Minnesota he had led a student protest against atmospheric nuclear testing. On several occasions he had stated his opinion that "nuclear war won't solve anything" and had even written rather sharply about the campus ROTC. These revelations failing to arouse the Senate to much alarm, Eastland again ended lamely with, "there is more which could be said about young Tillotson if security reasons did not prevent it. He outstanding example of a se generation Communist-in-pro
In fact, he might even be third generation. His father Communist; his mother was a munist; his grandmother w Communist. . . ."

Eastland followed up with examples of his politico-Men discovery.

Persons who have been calle willingly to appear before East Internal Security Subcommitte quickly point out, however, such entertaining boobishness cidental and incidental to th jury of reputations which place there. Although witn regularly complain of his bu tactics, the Senator insists th conducts his committee busin a fair and untroubled mann friend of Eastland who has on numerous executive sessio
the Internal Security Subcom said, "I never saw Jim really except once, and that was wh nigger referred to him as 'ol' land.' I've heard others call him Eastland, and he didn't see mind that, but this was the time he'd ever been called 'ol' land,' and he got so mad he g in the face and his gray eye cold, and I thought he was goi knock that nigger out of his Jim was so mad he was grindi teeth. Nobody but a Comm nigger would have called Ji Eastland.'"

Eastland believes tha witness should be allowed to an attorney, but he also feels attorneys willing to defend munists, former Communis suspected Communists — ev his suspicions are the only aroused — must be prepar share the obloquy of thei ents. The records of his comm hearings are full of instances he has called an attorney a munist for no reason than th represented an unpopular ca a "suspect."

Nor is it possible to clear o with Eastland if he is conv that his suspicions are correc best example of this is the c James Dombrowski, who has ably been subjected to more unfairness over a longer peri time than any other integrat on the Senator's list. Dombr has been a marked man amon onal investigators from as far as the early 1940s when he xecutive director of the South- Conference for Human Wel- The SCHW was suspect: it for integrating the races. It awards to dubious people like nor Ellis Arnall of Georgia, ı wealthy corporation attorney; ; advisory board were people the late folklorist, J. Frank , who was noted for being as subversive as a cactus. Dombrowski became execu- lirector of the Southern Con- ce Education Fund (SCEF), an ization whose openly an- ced and overriding aim was to n end to segregation in the ı.

mbrowski has sworn under before the Internal Security ommittee that he is not now as never been a Communist. id so in 1953 and Eastland no attempt to prosecute him erjury, so by normal rules this d have meant that thereafter and would treat him as though elieved him. But it wasn't gh.

r two decades Congressional stigators had been itching to heir hands on the SCEF's files. years ago, Eastland figured out y to do it, with the cooperation e New Orleans police and of oked-up Louisiana Joint Legis- e Un-American Activities Com- e.*

rly in October, 1963, the New ns cops, with several legis- s trudging at their heels, hed into the SCEF's headquar- and started tearing the place t, literally. They also invaded omes of former Orleans Parish Assistant District Attorney Benjamin E. Smith, the SCEF treasurer, and Bruce Waltzer, Smith's law partner. The legislative committee's counsel explained that they did not give the FBI advance notice of the raids because they were afraid the FBI might have had to tell Attorney General Kennedy who, in turn, would have tipped off the Rev. Martin Luther King, who would have warned Dombrowski.

When the raids were over, the two attorneys and Dombrowski had been charged with criminal conspiracy (a charge later thrown out by a state judge) and while they were running around trying to get out of that accusation, the twenty-year collection of extremely important data was being carted off from the SCEF. The state legislative committee released the records to Eastland within twenty-four hours of their removal.

Months later, Eastland returned the records, but only after every piece had been photographed. Since then he has been reading into the Congressional Record portions of private letters to and from Dombrowski. Dombrowski has asked the courts to stop Eastland from publicizing the material, but a hearing on this has not yet been held. Meanwhile, Dombrowski attempts to sort out the material that was returned to him: it was mishandled, messed up, some appears to be missing.

Protected as he is by the ponderous fortifications of the Washington Establishment, Eastland is not an easy man to beat; but from time to time the inner vein of excess that has mucked up his whole career breaks out again and he defeats himself. That happened in his now-famous effort of 1956 to bully The New York Times which had, he felt, been unkind to him.

Under the guise of seeking out Communist influences everywhere in the American press, Eastland set out specifically to get the Times. He has always denied that the paper was a special target, but figures make the denial silly: twenty-nine of the thirty-five witnesses called to executive sessions of the committee, and fourteen of the eighteen witnesses called to public sessions were past or present members of the Times staff; in the latter group, a fifteenth witness was the brother of a present employee of the Times.

Among those summoned by Jules Sourwine, counsel for the Internal Security Subcommittee, was one Robert Shelton. Correction: He was not summoned. Another Shelton's name was on the subpoena, but Robert Shelton was the newsman the committee's subpoena server insisted on hauling in. It was a clumsy, needless mistake, as Eastland was to learn, but at the moment he didn't seem to care: one Shelton was as good as another for his purpose, which was to blacken the name of the Times, and since Robert Shelton was an employee of the Times, he would do.

But Robert Shelton refused to cooperate. When the grilling began, he read into the record this statement:

> I am involved in these hearings as a victim of accident. The subpoena first served to me was originally made out in the name of a person who does not work on my paper. A committee aide, when told that there was no such person on the Times, insisted on knowing if there was anyone with a similar name employed there. There were a few, but the only one that interested your man was the sole similar name in the news department, mine. At the executive hearings the committee counsel tried without success to link me with a certain New York newspaper. He was unable to establish any connection because I never worked for the paper under discussion. Yet I have been called back here today. It appears to be just another step in a campaign to discredit the paper for which I work.

Too bad, said Eastland, but he would nevertheless have to answer the questions.

"I won't answer because I am a

---

his fascinating organization re- y investigated, and cleared, the Klux Klan, finding it to be only litical action group" with "a cer- Halloween spirit."

victim of accident," Shelton insisted.

Thereupon he was charged with contempt of Congress. Although by the time the thing got to court Eastland and Sourwine knew they were in the wrong, they attempted to bluff it out. Sourwine claimed that Robert Shelton was exactly the man they wanted and that they had subpoenaed him on the basis of information supplied in an informer's letter. Shelton's attorney, Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., took the position that Sourwine was not telling the truth and by the time the case came up on appeal the informer's letter could not be found. Eastland fared even worse. Seventy-seven times he answered Rauh with either, "I don't know," or "I don't recall" or "I don't remember."

The New York Times investigation was unquestionably among the most notorious held by Eastland, but he testified in the Shelton appeal that he could not remember any details of the hearings.

Rauh questioned: "You can't remember one detail, can you, Senator?"

Eastland: "No, sir, I certainly can't."

Were the hearings even legal? Eastland insisted that he had had the authorization of the subcommittee for holding them, but he could not remember when the subcommittee was called together to give the authority, or where it met, or who was there or what was said. He could not remember Shelton, or who issued the subpoenas for him and the other witnesses, or whether a record was kept of the meeting or how many witnesses were called. He could not remember any of the testimony, he could not remember any legislation that was pending at the end of the hearings. He did not know Sourwine was supposed to have a letter regarding Shelton, nor did he know what disposition Sourwine had made of it.

But none of his lapses of memory strains credibility more severely than Eastland's forgetfulness of the John T. Watkins case. Four years before the Shelton appeal, Eastland had taken the floor of the Senate to introduce five bills, recommended by the American Bar Association, to "correct certain decisions of the Supreme Court which have weakened our internal security." Ticking off the five, he said that of all the subversive decisions, none was so bad as that of the Watkins case, in which the court held that the House Un-American Activities Committee had to show relevance of questions about a person's associations. The decision infuriated Eastland: "In the Watkins case the Supreme Court abrogated the right to judge a man by the company he keeps. The Supreme Court has in effect created a new 'First Amendment right,' which it has designated the 'right of freedom of association,' and has held in effect that a man's associations with Communists are his own personal business, and that he cannot even be asked about such associations without invading his right of privacy."

He had reason to be furious, for just the previous year the Watkins precedent had been used by the Supreme Court to slap him down. Back in 1955, when the Eastland committee was pumping Matusow for all those commie pipe dreams he later recanted, Harry Sacher, a New York attorney, was called to testify. The committee (only two members were present) started off slyly asking Sacher about Matusow, but then switched — the Supreme Court later referred to it sarcastically as a "brief excursion"—to asking him questions about what he thought of proposed legislation barring Communist attorneys from practicing, and then sneaked in three questions about the possibility of his being a member of the Communist Party, past or present.

But Eastland was trying to weasel around with the wrong man. In his way, Sacher was tough. As an attorney for the eleven Communists tried before Judge Harold R. Medina in 1949, Sacher had so bedeviled the judge that he spent six months in jail for contempt. That had removed none of his scrappiness, and when Eastland started prying into his political affiliations, Sacher told him to go to hell.

Eastland cited him for contempt. Sacher went to the Supreme Court, and the case bounced back to the court of appeals with the advice that this conviction be reviewed in the light of the recent decision in the Watkins case. The appeals court ignored the advice, reaffirming the conviction. But by a 6-to-2 decision, the Supreme Court overturned the lower court in 1958 and freed Sacher, Eastland screaming in the ground about "an unconsci restriction on the legislative p

Such was the unhappy that the Watkins case had h Eastland's career prior to hi
ing the stand to be question
Rauh:

> Q. Do you recall ever h > listed the Watkins case, a > others, as being pro-Communi > Eastland: I think so. I th > listed a number of cases as > pro-Communist, but when it > and what was in what I said a > time, the Congressional R > speaks for itself. I don't recal
> Q. But now to ask it more > erally, Senator, you do agree > me that you have called the > kins case decision pro-Commu
> Eastland: I say I could have
> I think so.
> Q. All right. Now the Wa > case was decided in June,
> My question is very simple.
> you following the principles of > case back on January 6, 1956?
> Eastland: I don't rememb
> this time what the Watkins > held.

But Rauh became nettled pushed on harshly:

> Q. Senator, in your entire- > just referred to the fact that > tried to be fair to all the witn > that come before your commi
> Eastland: Yes, sir, we have > very hard to be fair with al > witnesses.
> Q. Can you name a single > ness who has ever said he > remember as often as you > said it this afternoon?
> Eastland: Well, I don't know > there are very few men in > country, except a judge, that > as many witnesses as I hear.
> Q. I asked you a simple que
> Eastland: Well, I know. I c
> the implication in your questi
> Q. I was asking you if you > name one witness before your > mittee that ever said, I don > member, I don't recall, I > know, as often as you said it.
> Eastland: I can't answer > question. I don't know. . . .
> tell you I don't remember any > about it. This was eight years
> Q. Senator, do you have any > how many years back your sul > mittee goes in asking witn > about things?
> Eastland: Well, we try t
> what they remember, of c > what the facts are.
> Q. How far back do you g
> Eastland: Well, that depen
> the case. . . .
> Q. Have you ever, at your > ings, ever counted up the n > of times a witness has said, I remember, and used it as a question of his credibility, Senator?

Eastland: No, sir.

Just as his old friend and mentor Joe McCarthy was never so cocky again after his encounter with Welch, the public character of Eastland has noticeably limped ever since its encounter with Rauh. Too many people in Washington could answer the questions Eastland suddenly could not answer; too many could remember the brutal overhauling witnesses had received in his committee when they could not dredge up transient events from the depths of twenty or thirty years. Spread across the nation in a million reprints is Eastland's messy little innuendo regarding Chief Justice Earl Warren's failure to remember random reports issued six years earlier by a California legislative committee, when Warren was California's Governor. "Certainly," Eastland told other Senators with a knowing look, "certainly Judge Warren cannot claim unfamiliarity with his own state official reports on such an important subject."

After the Rauh cross-examination, Washington was no longer quite so willing to accept Eastland's basic premise that forgetfulness is a symptom of treachery.

Considering their impact upon our times, it is ironic that Mississippi's two most notorious living sons are political successes by accident. Of the two, Ross Barnett is more of an accident than Eastland, but Eastland is an accident, too. If the insurrection at Ole Miss had not occurred during his first term of office, Barnett would be just another gray face in the fog of Mississippi's political past. As it is, he is the most popular politician in the state today and the governor's office is his again whenever he wants it. Barnett was a gauche executive (except for his ability to attract new industry) whose political prestige had been badly mauled when Meredith's ambitions, plus his own unfortunate dealings with Attorney General Kennedy, made him what Hodding Carter called "the dominant political figure in Mississippi as long as he lives."

Nothing so dramatic established Eastland. He started out as a second-choice interim appointee. Governor Paul B. Johnson, Sr., father of the present Governor of Mississippi, had hoped to name Eastland's father to fill the vacancy brought about by the death of Sen. Pat Harrison. But Woods Eastland, a power in Mississippi politics, didn't want it, so the largess was passed on to his son. Up to that moment, Jim Eastland's earlier political star seemed to have burned out. Ten years before, he had won state-wide attention as a member of the Mississippi legislature. He and two other legislators, Courtney Pace (now Eastland's administrative assistant) and the late Kelly J. Hammond, became known as the fighting Little Three; they tried to push through the rather progressive program of Governor Theodore Bilbo, but were frustrated by the reactionary Big Four, including Walter Sillers, who has been in the Mississippi legislature since 1916 and who for the past twenty years has been Speaker of the Mississippi House.

Eastland strictly followed Bilbo's lead; Bilbo made him. Still, he gets full marks for backing what he did: money for highways (there was scarcely a paved road in Mississippi at the time), free textbooks, money for TB hospitals, etc. But all that was a decade past and Eastland, retiring from the legislature when Bilbo left the mansion, had settled into dabbling in law, luxuriating in the family wealth, living the typical life of a spoiled planter's son, and doing little about politics. Taciturn, unimaginative, ineloquent and humorless, Eastland—United States Senator by appointment — arrived in Washington amid few predictions that he would stay long, or make an impression while he was there.

But Washington did something that Eastland could attack, and from the attack he drew strength. This was 1941, edge of wartime, and the Office of Price Administration put a price ceiling on cottonseed oil just as Eastland arrived in the capital. There were few topics that Eastland was competent to speak on, as even his friends admit retrospectively, but one of them was agriculture, especially cotton. The OPA regulation would have cut the cotton farmers' profit in half; it would have reduced his own family's income by many thousands of dollars. It was enough to make Eastland — who customarily cannot rise above a low C in rhetoric — sound drivingly persuasive. The regulation was killed. And immediately Eastland was a hero with many of the home folks. He had slain a regulatory giant, or at least cut off a finger.

Eastland had been appointed for eighty-eight days, until a special election could be held, on the promise that he would not be a candidate. He kept his promise on that occasion, but the 3,500 letters that had come to his office praising his work in the cottonseed-oil fight pointed to a following that he did not want to waste, and the next year he came out as a candidate against Sen. Wall Doxey. It was a tough fight, with Bilbo taking the stump to denounce his one-time protégé, but Cottonseed Jim, whose principal tactic consisted of attacking President Roosevelt, won by 16,000 votes.

If Eastland had grown up in the county of his birth, it is doubtful that he could have made the political grade. But his father moved from Sunflower County to Scott County and there Jim was raised, not returning to the delta to live until his mid-20s. The significance of this is that the delta is traditionally the home of the Mississippi aristocrats, the wealthy planters. But the voting power lies to the south and the east, where the rednecks live. The only resident of the delta who has ever been elected governor of Mississippi, for example, was Fielding Wright, and he made it only because he was first automatically boosted to the position from lieutenant governor on the death of Governor Thomas Bailey. The impoverished rednecks do not normally trust delta moneyed men. Eastland has the best of both worlds: born among the rich and reared among rednecks, he carries both blocs.

For the first ten years after he defeated Senator Doxey, Eastland was nobody in Washington. He was only one more Southern vote, which went predictably for low tariff, against labor, for the administration's foreign policy, and against social reform. Inarticulate, inconspicuous, with few noticeable interests outside agriculture, Eastland represented his mostly impoverished constitutents in such a style that one of his Senate colleagues of that day now recalls: "To make Jim believable, I had to keep reminding myself that his grandfather actually rode with General Bedford Forrest. Jim didn't seem to be much. In fact, if you looked at him very long, he would begin to disappear, like the Cheshire cat."

The Eastland that the world was later to know and that civil rights workers were to hate began to emerge in the early 1950s, clutching with quiet desperation at the coattails of Sen. Joseph McCarthy. As chairman of the Internal Security Subcommittee, Eastland's goal was the same as McCarthy's and it was from McCarthy that he learned the headline profit to be had from attacking the Supreme Court. Subcommittee records of those days reveal cooperative exchanges such as this between the two men:

> Eastland: The court seems to be issuing one pro-Communist decision after another.
>
> McCarthy: You're so right.
>
> Eastland: What explanation is there except that some Communist influence is working within the court?
>
> McCarthy: Either incompetence or the influence you mention.

On the death of McCarthy in 1957, Eastland became the nation's number-one patriot, his only rival being William Jenner, who was to retire the next year. Having learned so much from his fallen comrade he could be expected to eulogize McCarthy as needing no "vindication and no justification before the bar of ultimate justice and the throne of his God. His heart was pure; his purpose was noble."

Equally pure of heart, Eastland was the Senate watchdog to protect individual licenses. His was the loudest voice raised in the Senate against the federal marshals' treatment of townspeople in Clinton, Tenn. When local thugs attempted to block integration despite a court injunction prohibiting force, marshals threw them in irons. Eastland saw this as unnecessarily harsh treatment for contempt, but when other Senators entreated him to read into the record an explanation from the marshals for using irons, he refused to do so, saying he would stand on the description of the incident supplied by the attorney for the arrested fifteen men —"a very able, very responsible, very respectable, and one of the ablest trial lawyers in the United States." The attorney so applauded was Ross Barnett, representing the Clinton defendants at his own expense.

That wasn't Eastland's only statement on Clinton. When the county attorney went to the Clinton high school and explained to the students that the court's injunction applied to them, too; that it meant the court would no longer tolerate "throwing of ink on books, books belonging to the state of Tennessee, the messing up of lockers, the threatening notes to teachers, the filthy language to fellow students, the pushing and shoving of other students [Negroes]," and that they could no longer gather in gangs and beat Negroes going to and from school, Eastland wailed: "These children have been told by responsible authority that they had no freedom of speech, they had no freedom of assembly . . . and that their minor peccadilloes and misconduct" would be punished. "Neither Hitler nor Stalin was ever guilty of more ruthless thought control."

In the field of civil rights, Eastland has preached resistance to law — sometimes in the form of individual defiance, sometimes in the form of legal contempt, sometimes as legislative interposition or nullification—but not hypocritically, for he has preached it as much in Washington as in Sunflower County.

His counsel was especially inflammatory in the periods leading up to two of the worst outbreal of racial violence—at Little Ro and later at the University of Mi sissippi. Much has been writte quite justifiably, about the infl ence of Georgia king maker R
Harris and Georgia Govern
Marvin Griffin on Arkansas Go ernor Orval Faubus in inciting hi to change his mind (he had bee preparing for peaceful integratio at Little Rock) and resist the fe eral government. Strangely, hov ever, little credit has been given Eastland for his effect on Faubu Inasmuch as Eastland's advi came from next door, not thre states away, it was probably eve more effective than that of Harr or Griffin.

To hear Eastland talk—as he di talk to organizations all over th South — about "weak-kneed polit cians in the border states," th segregation battle in the South d pended solely on Faubus' standin firm. "If the Southern states a picked off one by one under th damnable doctrine of gradualism he told the American Legion Tupelo, shaking his head like a di tress lantern, "I don't know if w can hold out or not." Oh, it su made him depressed to even thin of Faubus who, he predicted, "wi not take action and, as a resul racial integration has already star ed." Apprised of Eastland's com ments, Faubus of course said h was not a weak-kneed politicia and he would, too, take action.

When Eastland first "took up" iternational affairs, he followed a ath already beaten by other Sen- ors from the deep South—straight ı Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo. astland became one of the Senate's iost outspoken defenders of the ominican Republic. On a good- ill tour of that country, Eastland nd Jenner were invited to speak ı the legislature. They competed ı see who could praise more rich- '. Jenner said that because the eneralissimo had refused to "drift ith the tide," he had turned the ominican Republic into an "island aradise." But Eastland easily won ıe contest of praise. "Your gener- issimo," he told a legislature that r thirty years had been too terfied to act as anything but Tru- llo's rubber stamp, "is one of the reat men of the free world. With im leading your government, this ader of all Latin America—you ad for freedom; you lead for onor; you lead for religion; and hank God you lead for common ense."

Later on, when he began to feel at he really knew something bout foreign affairs, Eastland ould warn the Senate against ad- itting Hawaii to the Union be- ause "the economy of Hawaii is ommunist-controlled." Furthernore, he said, the commies had ken over the Hawaiian legis- ture. When other Senators pointd out that the FBI had made a etailed study of possible Com- nunist infiltration into Hawaii and ad found that there was a maxi- num of between forty and sixty ommunists out of a population of 35,000, Eastland retorted: "What there in numbers? We have seen, ll over the world, a small minority f Communists taking over one ountry after another." (Just as, ne might have added, a small ninority of the electorate sends im to the Senate each six years.)

By this time, such was the repu- ation throughout the country of Mississippi's Senator, that when leade Alcorn, Republican national hairman, and Paul M. Butler, Democratic chairman, agreed in 958 to wage a fair campaign and void using vilifications and scur- ilous attacks, they could not come o terms on whether mention of astland and Faubus as Democrats ell within that definition. Alcorn aid he thought it wasn't exactly ilification to remind the public that Eastland wore the Democratic label, but Butler protested that it was hitting below the belt.

By this time, too, Eastland was well established in the public's mind as the man who, in the words of a Christian Century editorial writer, "has done more to defy and bring into contempt the highest court in our land than any other man. . . ."

While "more than any other man" is quite a condemnation (or tribute, in Mississippi), Eastland probably deserves it. He has from time to time accused the Supreme Court of treason, of being directed by a Communistic philosophy, of advocating adultery and sodomy and miscegenation, and of being "the greatest single threat to our Constitution":

> The one area where there seems to be some predictability with respect to the Warren Court action is where cases involve the interests of the world Communist Party and its arm in this country . . . when delay is necessary to help the Communist cause, the Court delays. . . . [The Court] is moving step by step, paragraph by paragraph, decision by decision, toward establishment of the Communist conspiracy in the U. S. as a legal entity . . . when misstatement would help the cause, the Court has misstated.

It is likely that Eastland would have turned out to be much the same person he is today, McCarthy or no McCarthy. Acting independently, he proved his own mettle in the election of 1954, the only real challenge — and it was not great—he has had since he beat Doxey.

It came from Lt. Gov. Carroll Gartin, a kind of moderate. Tired of his largely nondescript life in the Senate, Eastland had said he wasn't going to run in 1953. By the time he changed his mind, a lot of people had got behind Gartin. The lieutenant governor would not have been there to get behind if he hadn't been snookered into running by James Coleman, later governor and now fifth circuit court judge, who wanted Gartin out of the way. Coleman got Governor Hugh White to run a survey on Gartin's strength, and it showed—thanks to some interpretation by Coleman—that Gartin would carry three-fourths of Mississippi's eighty-two counties.

"Nobody," said one of Eastland's aides the other day, laughing at the memory, "nobody but a goose would have believed the survey. I could have named thirty counties that would have voted for Eastland if his name was just on the ballot, no matter what kind of campaign he ran."

Eastland won all but twelve counties, and he lost three of those by fewer than 100 votes. It was a good test of Eastland's popularity. In Ruleville, which he sometimes calls home, he lost only two votes out of 500, and as one Eastland aficionado pointed out with justification, "it's pretty hard not to make at least a dozen enemies in a town like this."

Popularity is perhaps not exactly the right word for it. Eastland may sometimes arouse a tenuous identification with the masses, but he is no "popular" campaigner in the manner of Eugene Talmadge or James Folsom or, going back to his own state, Theodore Bilbo. He has no flair, but only the sureness of a native son in voicing the meanness the rednecks feel.

In the 1954 campaign Eastland took his place just below Vardaman and Barnett as a true-blue demagogue but, then, the times were made for him. His campaign opened only a few days after the Supreme Court handed down its school-desegregating decision in the Brown case — "Black Monday" in Mississippi.

At once he was inciting defiance. "I know that Southern people, by and large, will neither recognize, abide by nor comply with this decision," he said. "We are expected to remain docile while the pure blood of the South is mongrelized by the barter of our heritage by Northern politicians in order to secure political favors from Red mongrels in the slums of the East and Middle West."

Again and again he repeated the boast first made at his old home town of Forest, his face filling with blood as he leaned across the rostrum and rasped out an account of his negative powers:

> After 1950 they [that is, the civil rights measures] were blocked in the civil rights committee. Do you know why? Because of seniority I was maneuvered into chairmanship of the civil rights subcommittee. Yes . . . Eastland of Mississippi [tapping his chest] . . . became boss of the committee that had all of > the civil rights bills! And they said I broke the law and so I did! You know the law says the committee has got to meet once a week. Why, for the three years I was chairman, that committee didn't hold a meeting. I didn't permit them to meet. I had to protect the interest of the people of Mississippi. I had special pockets put in my pants and for three years I carried those bills around in my pockets everywhere I went and every one of them was defeated!

Today his aide Buckley, who was formerly Sen. Pat Harrison's aide, feels that history of that sort should be edited and revised.

"That talk of a pocket for the civil rights bills was just campaign talk," says Buckley. "He used to say, 'I'm going to get my wife to make a larger pocket. I'm going to have her sew 'em up in there.' That was just campaign talk. Confidentially, we did play on race in '54.

"Course, Eastland was nothing like Vardaman, who used to talk about God's making niggers from an ape's skull, and a frog for the nose, and a skunk for the armpit, and the ashes of hell for color. But anyway, what a man says in a campaign is one thing, what he does up there in Washington is another."

Buckley's argument would be more convincing if Eastland had not filled the Washington air during the closing years of the war—when he was not running for office and therefore not being called on for any special theatrics—with statements about the Negro's physical, moral and mental inferiority.

Speaking of the Negro soldier, he had said: "He has disgraced the flag of his country. He will not fight. He will not work. Yet we give him preference. We discriminate against the white soldier in order to get some Negro votes."

This was not just talk to please the home folks. Buckley says that Eastland advised General Dwight Eisenhower privately to put Negro soldiers in work battalions, not on the front lines, because they couldn't be trusted, "and Eisenhower did, though he denies it now."

His contempt for the Negro cannot be blamed on war-torn nerves. Two years after the war he was still saying, "The mental level of those people [that is, Negroes] renders them incapable of suffrage."

Nor was Eastland's advice to flout the Supreme Court's decision "just campaign talk," as Buckley insists. In 1955, a year after he had been re-elected, Eastland was still advising the Mississippi White Citizens Councils, and the South Carolina Association of Citizens Councils, and the Patriots of North Carolina, and many nameless groups across the South: "Southern people will not be violating the Constitution or the law when they defy this monstrous decision. They will be defying those who would destroy our system of government. You are not required to obey any court which passes out such a ruling.

"In fact you are obligated to defy it. The law is what the people make it and a ruling is no more than public sentiment makes it."

And in his most famous speech before the Senate—a speech that has been reprinted and, according to workers in Eastland's office, put into more than a million hands—Eastland said:

> The question is asked, will the South obey this decision of the Supreme Court [the Brown decision]? Who is obligated morally or legally to obey a decision whose authorities rest not upon the law but upon the writings and teachings of pro-Communist agitators and people who have a long record of affiliations with anti-American causes and with agitators who are part and parcel of the Communist conspiracy to destroy our country?

The favorite son of Sunflower County will be running again in 1966. There are politicians in Mississippi who could give him trouble. He has a wide following but does not command deep political loyalties; nor has he given such loyalty, either to party or to individual politicians, except for the present Governor of Mississippi, through whom Eastland discharges the debt he owed to Johnson's father for appointing him to the Senate. Eastland even spoke for Johnson in his last campaign: an unusually energetic show of commitment. The ties between Eastland and Mississippi's junior Senator, John Stennis, reportedly came close to fraying when, a few years ago, Ross Barnett talked of running against Stennis and Eastland did nothing to silence him.

In reality a partyless politician, he has not since 1948 cleanly broken with the National Democratic Party. That year, spoutir the Calhoun nonsense about ho to force the Democratic Party come begging simply by refusir to vote the ticket, Eastland wer Dixiecrat.

He never again made that mi take, though he did nothing 1964 to try to change the cours of a white electorate that gave per cent of its support—highest the nation—to Barry Goldwater. H simply kept quiet, at least publicl as did Stennis. But even silen from the South is sometimes a preciated in Washington; toda they are the only Mississippians the capital with any power, a though of course the power the share is quite enough for a stat of only slightly more than 2 mi lion people. Stennis is the chie pork barreler for the state, bein second only to Richard Russell o the Armed Services Committee an ranking high enough on the A propriations and the Aeronautic and Space Science Committees keep NASA money flowing int Mississippi. Eastland's share of th power depends almost entirely o his ability to exert a negative i fluence and in that regard he seem to be dropping off sharply.

In recent years he has apparent given up trying to fill a role h once fancied for himself, that the Great Arouser. Describing hi self as "with a fever, weak, an can hardly stand up now," Eastlan staggered to the Senate floor i 1948 and sounded the call:

> The South is a sleeping giant. We hold the balance of power in this country. We can save the country. There must be a grass-roots organization in every hamlet of the South. The people must be informed of the dangers involved and > the results if the South is shed. This all-Southern organi- ion must be pushed. There must mass meetings. The people are dy! The South can be saved!

espite his fevered heroism, the on wasn't saved that round, neither was the South, but six s later Eastland was ready to again, this time linking his its with those of other South- leaders such as Strom Thur- d, John Bell Williams, L. Men- Rivers, William M. Tuck, Field- Wright, Herman Talmadge, Jones and Coke Stevenson. met in Memphis to shape gs up. To nobody's surprise, the rman of the executive com- ee turned out to be none other that old faithful alarmist U. Barr, the New Orleans in- rialist who was a prime mover verything from the Southern es Industrial Council to the ecrat movement to the cam- n (conducted in league with ence Manion) to offer the na- T. Coleman Andrews for Pres- t.

hat organization didn't catch on ll, but meanwhile Eastland was on the establishment of the te Citizens Councils of America me goals, same leaders (for a e), same format—in Indianola, son and other points in the h. Of all his organizational ef- , this one alone remains in than moribund condition, and is because its original middle- leadership was shortly deposed he local level and the low-class es who really meant business over. Eastland has attempted ep "in" with this grubby crew. Citizens Council depends very ily on its radio-TV "forum" to sell its propaganda to whatever portion of the Southern public is still wavering. Eastland, along with another legislator from Mississippi, has arranged for many of the tapes and films to be made in government recording studios in Washington.

Despite such helping hands, Eastland has been upbraided recently by some members of the Citizens Council who feel that he is not doing all he could do to stave off integration. There is, behind the irony of such criticism, a very true feeling for Eastland's declining role in American life. The Citizens Council has grounds to complain, not because of what he has failed to do, but because Eastland has done all that he can do. As a representative of Mississippi's attitudes, he is now virtually useless in Washington, because Washington has forced him into a position of compromise, and compromise is completely foreign to Mississippi thinking. The nation will have to go on living with Judge Harold Cox for some time, but the nation will not be forced to take another like him. James P. Coleman was not Eastland's choice for the fifth circuit court of appeals. No man who as governor of Mississippi had said "we cannot defeat the whole nation" would be Eastland's choice, but after talking it over with Stennis, Eastland knew that Coleman was the best—or worst — judge Congress would accept from Mississippi, so he went along with the nomination. For Eastland, this is decay.

He will no longer sit for months on an important bill because Congress will not permit it. The future will see important bills going to his committee marked with a specific return date; the voting-rights legislation of 1965 was so marked. For Eastland, this is death.

He has had his period of negative strength, although even that has been exaggerated: mutilated and late, some civil rights bills nevertheless eventually, and regularly, reached the Senate floor despite Eastland's efforts to stop them in committee. Now there is scarcely anything left to stop. In the Internal Security Subcommittee he had his fling as a grand inquisitor, but of late the appellate courts have indicated they will hold him down to being merely a pest.

Old friends, old allies are falling away. An increasing number of Eastland's colleagues on the Judiciary Committee — including even that rational segregationist Sam Ervin of North Carolina—are racing to see who can most speedily dissociate himself from the Eastland-Sourwine position. When an Internal Security Subcommittee publication recently identified the American Friends Service Committee as "a well-known transmission belt for the Communist apparatus," the sharpest denunciations came from within the committee itself.

It will take time—time first of all to forget some of the heartache that his leadership has brought—but by and by the nation will again be able to see Eastland as the pathetic absurdity he really is but does not mean to be. What has Mississippi left in him? One vote, and the native talent to stand straight-faced and without embarrassment before the Senate and predict:

> Some day, Mr. President, the people of this nation will come to realize what they owe to the people of Mississippi. . . .

What Is a Socialist? . . . . James O'Connor highly successful First Annual alist Scholars Conference, held olumbia University on Septem- 11-12, drew an audience of up- l of 900 teachers, scholars and rs. Of the many genuinely im- ant questions there raised, two articular stood out, but only of these enjoyed formal panel ussion: what is the political of the Socialist academic? The r, and antecedent, question — what is the precise meaning of Socialist scholarship? — was not brought wholly out into the open.

The question that remains is whether an academic can be a Socialist scholar—in the sense of employing a method which departs from that of his orthodox colleagues—without being a Marxist. On the evidence provided at the conference, the answer is no. Although often interesting and informative, the papers given from a non-Marxist perspective were not in any apparent way Socialist, except insofar as the panelists held certain Socialist opinions. This was particularly true of the papers by Professors Richard Hamilton of

---

James O'Connor, assistant professor of Economics, Washington University, has just completed a book on the political economy of Cuba.

Princeton University and Eleanor Leacock of Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, given Saturday morning on the ideology of the American working class, which were not distinguishable (although distinguished on their own terms) as Socialist scholarship by either topic or method.

Professor Hamilton, for example, performed the feat of transforming working-class intolerance of unpopular political and other views into middle-class intolerance by way of middle-class control of the decisively influential mass media. This was accomplished by a statistical sleight of hand of the type which is the orthodox social scientist's bread and butter. But why the workers have allowed themselves to be mutilated in this way — a question that naturally arises during an argument to the effect that the working class is "really tolerant"—was not discussed. In short, the problem of reduction (which concerns the relationships between opinions and real interest) was sloughed off and the concern was to defend the working class from slander (Professor Leacock's word) at the hands of academic orthodoxy.

With the panel Saturday afternoon on Modern Imperialism the conference seemed to get its bearings. Prof. Conor Cruise O'Brien, late of the United Nations and now on the faculty of New York University, discussed the political forms of contemporary imperialism. During the discussion he was taken to task, somewhat unfairly in at least one instance, by Professors Said Shah of the State University of New York (Plattsburg) and Timothy Harding, who specializes in Latin American studies at California State College, Los Angeles. Their main bone of contention was Professor O'Brien's unwillingness, to a degree more apparent than real, to discover the roots of modern imperialism in the economic imperatives of the advanced capitalist countries. As it turned out, there was a more or less general consensus to the effect that it would be premature to discard an economic theory of imperialism, although the relationship between economic interests and big business, on the one hand, and specific and general foreign policies, on the other, was a very complicated one, deserving extended study in the future.

Better organized and on the whole more coherent than the panel on imperialism was Sunday morning's session, "The Meaning of Conservatism for America." The provocative and important themes which emerged from papers by Professors Allen Guttmann (Amherst) and Warren I. Susman (Rutgers) were that while conservative thought in America is, to put it mildly, somewhat muddy, the conservative's stress on critical, as opposed to merely technical, thinking is a good thing; and that conservative values, at least certain of them, should not be dismissed as altogether nonsense. In effect, the audience heard a solid critique of liberalism in the guise of an exploration of conservative thought. During the subsequent discussion, a good dialogue between Marxists and non-Marxists provided a glimpse of the meaningful clash of ideas and analyses which we can hope to hear at future conferences.

The final panel of the conference, "The Future of American Socialism," was not as intellectually satisfying as the morning session, although the panelists did get down to the real business of outlining the conditions under which a Socialist movement might emerge in America and, of more immediate importance, debated the role of the Socialist academic. Prof. Staughton Lynd, who teaches history at Yale, led off with a theory which predicts that increasingly numerous and severe foreign-policy crises as a kind of substitute for economic depression will be the bellwether of Socialist revolution. This thesis was not developed in any detail, although it did not go unopposed. In particular, Dr. Herbert Aptheker, of the American Institute of Marxist Studies, painted a rather more optimistic view of the ability of the peoples in the backwaters of the capitalist world to stand up to American imperialism. Previously, Mr. Sylvester Leaks, of the Harlem Writers Guild, had reminded the audience that white Socialists had historically underestimated the revolutionary potential of the black workers in the ghettos and put forth the idea, by no means new, that socialism could not be expected to solve their problems until racism had been abolished.

Also sticking close to h Mr. Norman Fruchter, an edit Studies on the Left, in perhap most interesting comments of afternoon, described the proce which oppositionists of all sh are absorbed into federal and programs as a consequence of inferior material resources and of a coherent and generally cepted theory of social cha Prof. Eugene Genovese (Rut seconded that particular mo throwing some cold water on fessor Lynd's views as to the sibilities of developing a Soc movement. The conclusions w he drew for the role of Soc academics flowed logically his premise that there is an mous amount of intellectual to be done and that acade ought to be content to "influ activists in the interests of ra ing scarce resources in the text of a relatively stable social political system.

The panel made clear unlike the European and, in pa ular, the underdeveloped coun first-rate intellectuals who ar tally committed to a Socialist m ment are rare indeed in this c try. The reason, or at least the mediate reason, is that what is erally described as the Move here is not a Socialist mover What someone might have sa Prof. Genovese came closest— that when Socialist academic leave their studies they will to create a new movement, and merely work in the existing M ment.

And before a specifically So ist movement can be create would seem essential to clea the meaning of "Socialist sch ship." Otherwise, a Socialist r ment would suffer from the lack of ideological clarity weakens the Movement today subjects it to the insidious pr of co-option. Next year's Se Annual Socialist Scholars Co ence, one has reason to hope, throw light on this questior this way, the second annual co ence, like the unprecedented hugely provocative and useful will not only establish itself a outstanding arena for Socialis bate and exchange but also b occasion when Socialists can a bit closer to the eternal ques "What is to be done?"

As It Was — As It Is

: SOUTH AS IT IS: 1865-1866. By ›hn Richard Dennett. Edited, ith an introduction by Henry M. hristman. Viking Press. 370 pp. 3.95.

William R. Brock

historians now accept that curi- blend of Old South mythology economic interpretation which l to pass for the history of Re- struction. Outside the South few believe that Reconstruction pol- can be explained by Northern lictiveness or by error which was ic when inspired by fanaticism, temptible when designed to se- the ascendancy of the Repub- n Party, and explicable only by desire to fasten Northern capital- upon the South. For the past years the tide of historiography flowed in another direction, and n in the South—where a genera- ago there was an autmomatic ex to the "horrors" of Reconstruc- — the most distinguished his- ans now see the period after the il War as the forum for ideas and blems which could not be grasped solved within the parochial con- t of Southern "home rule." For Northern liberal, Reconstruction its own special challenge: the ublicans of the period professed same ideas as the liberals of to- , and they sought by their policy translate the ideas into law and titutions. If the ideas are right ay, were they wrong then; and the ideas are universal, was the icy bad? In this new mood it is tructive to study the early issues The Nation, launched on July 6, 5 by a group of men who rep- ented the quintessence of 19th- tury enlightenment.

n the first two volumes of The tion attention is held by a series articles which appeared each week ler the heading "The South As s." These articles provided a lucid, l-written account of travels, con- ions and opinions in the South, l they provided the reading public of the North with much needed information about the strange and conquered land which so few of them knew; to a modern reader these echoes from a century ago have a ring of uncomfortable topicality. Their author was a very young man called John Richard Dennett; the articles were unsigned, he published nothing more, and he was to die before he was 36; his very name was therefore probably unknown even to specialists on the period. Henry M. Christman and the Viking Press have done a valuable service in rescuing Dennett from oblivion and publishing his articles for the first time in book form. From now on Dennett must figure on all short lists of books about the South during and since Reconstruction. It is a pity that the value of the book for students of the period was not increased by editorial notes and an index.

The first attractive thing about Dennett was his clear and exact English style; without rhetoric and without sentiment he reported what he saw and heard, and the manner of writing breeds confidence in his accuracy. It is tempting to use the overworked word "objective"; but Dennett was not really objective. He had taken part in the Port Royal experiment on the occupied Sea Islands of South Carolina, when free Negro labor had been tried for the first time on a large scale. He therefore went South in 1865 armed with well-formed ideas about the rights and capabilities of free Negroes, and a corresponding rejection of the Southern assertion that free labor would never succeed in the South. Moreover, he went South to answer certain questions which were vital for the formation of Northern policy: and he probably had a good notion of what the answers would be. His articles give the impression of a man who knew what he wanted to find, and though he did not distort evidence—indeed his reporting of actual conversations, even to the simulation of country dialects, has the ring of truth—he sought out the men who would provide the information he wanted, and when he found himself in random company he guided conversation into the required direction. Not that Southerners in 1865 needed much prodding to talk about the results of the war, about their attitude to the Union or, above all, about "niggers."

These were the questions which had to be answered: were the Southerners, or any large number of them, genuinely convinced of past error and was their formal resumption of allegiance likely to bear fruit in real loyalty; could Southern Unionists provide the nucleus for a new Southern leadership or a bridge of reconciliation between the sections; were Southerners prepared to give to the Negro equality under the law, and would they go beyond this—in due course if not immediately—to give him the vote; was there hope for Negro advancement if the responsibility was left to white Southerners; and would Southern employers operate a free labor system as the rest of the world understood it? To all these questions except the last Dennett provided, through his evidence of what Southerners themselves said, a negative reply. On the labor question he expressed a slight and qualified optimism because he found that Southerners' assertions about the worthlessness of Negro labor were sometimes contradicted by their own success in restoring production; by the spring of 1865 he thought that the freedmen, considering them "merely in their character of men hired to labor," were receiving tolerably good treatment and tolerably good wages. But he added, "that there is any general desire or even general willingness on the part

October

Cellulose crackles: leaves under my foot: scent crumbles pressing spices of summer flowers to a wood's smokehouse: now fruit for desire's tooth, apple-tart, tingling this time to a plunge into the haze, an ocean bobbing stripes of lifeboat leaves down in a drift clutching down gray horizon, shore crumbling grain after grain seeding the rising ground

David Leviten

---

lliam R. Brock teaches American tory at Cambridge. He is the au- r of An American Crisis: Congress d Reconstruction 1865-1867 (St rtin's Press).

PL

PROGRESSIVE LABOR

VOL 5 NO. 1 OCTOBER

Watts—USA 'Strategic Hamlet'

Notes on Black Liberation — Bill McAdoo

ILWU Convention Report

Students and Liberalism — Steve Martinot

Teamsters on the March — Fred Fry

A Reply to American Dialog— R. Taus

Voting in the South—Ed Clark

The Road Since Bandung — Sukarno

Documented U. S. Atrocities in Vietnam

Articles on the "New Left," art, literature, contemporary problems, current affairs— $2.50 yearly

Also read Challenge-Desafio, the revolutionary newspaper from New York — $4

Special Subscription Offer

Those who buy a special combination offer for $6—PL and Challenge-Desafio may choose one of the following free gift offers (valued at from $4-$6):

GUERRILLA WARFARE by Ernesto Che Guevara

U. S., CUBA AND CASTRO by William A. Williams

SECOND REVOLUTION IN CUBA by J. P. Morray

SELECTED MILITARY WRITINGS by Mao Tse-Tung

PROGRESSIVE LABOR
GPO Box 808, Brooklyn 1, N. Y.

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

PL .... PL & Challenge-Desafio ....

Gift Book ....

of the Southern people to aid the Negro in becoming as valuable a member of society as he might become, in educating and otherwise elevating himself, I do not believe." He praised the maligned Freedmen's Bureau which, besides providing essential relief, "had at least familiarized the minds of Negroes and their former masters with the fact, not learned at once, that the slaves had really been emancipated"; but for this reason the bureau itself was odious to all Southern white men.

Bitterness toward the North made "itself manifest more or less distinctly in nearly every Southern community," and the impression was that of a feeling which time would not easily erase. This may prompt the incidental reflection that while reconciliation is not easy after any great war, the French, the Germans and the English have made a better job of it than two sections of a people sharing the same language and the same political tradition.

As for any hope which might be placed in Southern Unionists, Dennett found them a bewildered and despised minority; they had rejoiced in secret at Union victory, but four months after the end of hostilities they wondered if they had been right to rejoice at all. As for the past he found that many Southerners regretted secession but "not as a wrong thing which had been done; only as an inexpedient thing." Beneath Southern intransigence was a refusal to accept "the natural result of the
. . . that the social and political dition of the South is eventually the same with that of the North.
Negro rights, there was an al universal belief that Negro testi should not be accepted in the c which would make it impossibl any Negro to establish rights u the law. In Louisiana he met Northern businessmen who were posed to stay on after the troops withdrawn, but "when I asked if is any town in the state where thought a man might, with safe his life, publicly advocate, or be erally known to advocate, the priety of allowing intelligent, ed ed Negroes to vote, the reply was formly in the negative."

The South which Dennett saw the South which had not yet com der the Fourteenth Amendmen the Reconstruction Acts, or N suffrage. It was the South guide President Andrew Johnson's poli leaving the initiative in Recons tion to Southerners. The mood o South, as he described it, was determining factor which pressed erate men toward radical Recons tion; it was the mood which ca the policy, not the policy which ca the mood. The condition of the ern South is thus not the resu Reconstruction but of Southern tudes which preceded Reconstruc
But charity bids one remember no people have yet solved the lems of a biracial society.

Two Tough Minds . . .

AN AFRICAN BOURGEOISIE: Race, Class, and Politics in South Africa. By Leo Kuper. Yale University Press. 452 pp. $12.50. Paper $2.95.

POLITICS IN THE CONGO: Decolonization and Independence. By Crawford Young. Princeton University Press. 659 pp. $12.50.

AFRICA: A POLITICAL TRAVELOGUE. By Thomas Molnar. Fleet Publishing Corp. 304 pp. $6.95.

Gwendolen M. Carter

Before the Belgian Congo was given its independence in 1960, there were many common features between its situation and that in South Africa. In both, an advanced economy built on the rich returns of mining had drawn Africans from all over the country into its activities. In the Congo, where unlike South Africa there was no substantial white working class, were fewer bars to Africans per ing skilled tasks. But in neither try did Africans possess pol rights and opportunities of any c quence or share in the ownersh the means of production. To thi tent, both countries could be sa reflect a typically Marxist situ with the means of production an litical power both firmly in the h of a ruling minority and, to aggr the situation, that minority diff tiated from the majority not onl wealth and postion but also by

Yet to read side by side two o most penetrating and significan tailed works yet to appear on

---

Gwendolen M. Carter is direct the Program of African Studi Northwestern University.

countries — Leo Kuper's An Afri- Bourgeoisie: Race, Class, and Pol- in South Africa and Crawford ng's Politics in the Congo: De- nization and Independence—is to truck immediately by vast differ- s in the degree of development of cans in South Africa and in the go. Dr. Kuper, in his tightly packed ociological account of the largely n African bourgeoisie in South a, brings out clearly the depth of oots, the extent of its history and ad, its commitment to African ethnic nationalism, and the seed- this group (which is hardly a ;) provides for future leadership hat country in the unlikely event n overturn of the present political m. In contrast, conscious nation- ic thought developed very late in Congo where, until World War II, e was no African elite comparable hat already evident in South Africa re the turn of the century. This is ly because secondary education he Congo hardly existed before) and university education was blished only shortly before inde- lence, whereas by 1961 some 0 Africans in South Africa held ersity degrees. Moreover, freedom he press and association were only lly granted in the Congo in 1959, reas John Tengo Jabavu had es- shed an African newspaper, Imvo ntsundu (Native Opinion), as y as 1884.

It is striking contrasts like these make nonsense of white South can fears that if Africans were ted political rights in that coun- the result would be the kind of oil and continued instability that plagued the independent Congo ublic. Professor Young has given remarkably clear and readable unt of the tangled politics sur- ding and following the most rapid d least well prepared—transfer power that has taken place in ca, a transfer whose character further distorted by the conti- 's most sudden and complete Afri- zation of both bureaucracy and y. The lesson of the Congo is not withhold political rights and ad- istrative responsibility from Afri- , but progressively to provide such rtunities. Particularly in a coun- like South Africa, where Africans already long demonstrated pro- ional and technical skills, such rtunities to share in molding the try's political course are espe- y important. Otherwise there is not only a waste of valuable potential but a gnawing impotence and bitterness among Africans that polarizes sentiment even among the most moderate, and prepares the way for the ultimate—though probably long-delayed—violence which Professor Kuper, like the rest of us who care deeply for the future of that beautiful and richly productive land, still hopes can be averted.

Such careful, detailed works as Professors Kuper and Young have given us sometimes gain added perspective by a more general work like Thomas Molnar's Africa: A Political Travelogue. A professor like the others but of French rather than of the social sciences, Dr. Molnar has written freshly and often vividly of what he saw during his African travels in the fall and winter of 1963-64. He does so, he says, to contradict many of the clichés of the international press but, alas, he accepts too easily the surface manifestations in central and southern Africa without going deeply enough into their background causes and their consequences. Thus he perpetuates without adequate research the current views of whites in southern Africa regarding the spread and potency of international communism.

NEW DOUBLEDAY
ANCHOR BOOKS
THE FIRST NAME IN QUALITY PAPERBACK PUBLISHING

THE CORPORATION TAKE-OVER
Edited by Andrew Hacker
Ten noted authorities examine the American business corporation's rise to power and social influence, probing the effects of corporate decisions on education, employment, and politics. $1.25

GIVE AND TAKE
The Biology of Tissue Transplantation
by Francis D. Moore, M.D.
"A superb account of the important and exciting new medical field of organ transplantation . . . Dr. Moore gives not only the dramatic details of what has occurred to date, but also an expert how and why."—LEONARD ENGEL, Harper's Magazine. Illustrated. $1.25

ABUNDANCE FOR WHAT?
And Other Essays
by David Riesman
The new book by the author of The Lonely Crowd ranges in subject from the Cold War to the Cocktail party. "[It] penetrates more deeply into more crucial problems of both the present and the future than any single recent volume. It is as close to 'essential' as a book can be."—Washington Star. $2.45

THE BERKELEY STUDENT REVOLT
Facts and Interpretations
Edited by Seymour Martin Lipset and Sheldon S. Wolin
Two political scientists from Berkeley, themselves in disagreement over the meaning of the revolt, here present a wide range of opinions from participants, faculty members and outside observers, plus a detailed chronology and a sampling of the pamphlets and manifestos handed out by both sides. An Anchor Original. $1.95

HALF-WAY TO THE MOON
New Writing from Russia
Edited by Patricia Blake and Max Hayward
"Beyond doubt the best single volume of post-Stalin Russian writing available in English."—Saturday Review. "A vivid report on the contemporary Soviet literary scene."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $1.25

DOUBLEDAY & COMPANY, INC.
Garden City, New York including LAIDLAW BROTHERS, River Forest, Illinois, publishers of textbooks for elementary and secondary schools.

When he writes that even the Liberal party in South Africa has been permeated by communism, he discloses the extent of his bias. Perhaps the time has passed for these general accounts of the complex and ever-moving African scene. To analyze and understand the background and basic forces at work in the widely varied countries of that continent requires long study, and a perspective resting on intimate knowledge and scholarly analysis. What makes the first two books discussed in this review so important is that they represent the fruit of long study, extensive first-hand exposure and sound use of the techniques of their disciplines.

. . . And a Cold Eye

AFRICA: From Independence to Tomorrow. By David Hapgood. Atheneum Publishers. 221 pp. $5.

Stanley Meisler

I have spent a good deal of the past five years reading reams about Africa, some of it informing, some of it nonsense. David Hapgood's book has more sense than all the rest. This is not unexpected. Those of us who have met Hapgood, or have read his newsletters and magazine articles, have long known that he leaves all the academicians and other journalists far behind. Few Americans understand Africa the way he does.

The university professors who trek through Africa tend to see it through the prism of their own pet theories. The embassy men tend to see it as a giant continent cracked by the cold war into one part that adulates John F. Kennedy and another that cheers Chou En-lai. The newsmen tend to see it through the whispers of the elegant elite, sipping brandy and ginger in the hotel lobbies of the capitals.

Hapgood, a former New York Times writer who spent two years in Africa as a fellow of the Institute of Current World Affairs, looks at Africa with a cold eye and tough mind. He enjoys Africa, he feels it, even loves it, but he is not taken in. He sees its crushing problems, and he sees its leaders rushing away from them. His affection for Africa does not stop him from putting down in a relentless way all that is wrong with Africa and, by indirection, all that is wrong with a Western policy that encourages these ills.

Hapgood approaches the continent in three steps. First, he believes that Africa's economic development depends on its ability to change the attitudes of the peasants and transform agriculture. Second, he believes that the ruling elite is so alienated from the masses that it obstructs the agricultural transformation. Third, he believes that this alienated elite has been created in part by an imported educational system that has no relation at all to African society.

"To achieve a better material life," Hapgood says, "African farmers must adopt a whole set of new techniques, and for this to happen, millions of people living in isolation from the urban centers must decide they want to make revolutionary changes in their lives. Agricultural progress does not begin and end with a new tool or a different crop. . . . Change in how a man farms his land means change in how he views the world and himself in relation to other men."

The author shows how most Western agricultural experiments in Africa, with their foreign experts and heavy machinery, have failed. At the
they have created, at high cost, pockets of privileged farmers.
demonstration value has been Most Africans look at the results duly impressed, but regard the eign techniques as a special pro of a foreign culture.

Hapgood, following the lead o
French agronomist Rene Dumont, gests that the transformation of can agriculture must come thr small changes: donkeys to turn wheels and carry food to market, hand tools that can be produce village smiths, bins and insecti to save the corn crop, producti peanut flour for protein, small mills costing $4,000, cheap wind trained dogs to herd cattle.

Such changes will be dif
and Hapgood says their succes pends on agents of change who village life and care about it.
likely that the lack of imagin and real concern on the part of European and educated African behind most fiascos on the f Hapgood writes. " . . . The A technician, like his European cessor, typically calls the village gether and tells them what he, superior, wants them to do. . .
the elite African, concerned showing how different he is rural Africans, to listen to 'prin peasants without patronizing

Stanley Meisler, a frequent Nation contributor, spent a year in Africa on a foundation grant.

'Reverting Still Again'

Reverting still again to the hatch from a safe distance maybe it was like this an engine idling with internal fire the bones of the mastodon burning in the red light of its lost imagined heart rigidity and chaos statehood and anarchy four meals a day served with a bell a french sauce to cover the roast paranoia tick tock the clock two feet in a sock and virginia creeper flaming in october trying to consume consume the square walls where red squirrels are fighting like savages screaming tooth and claw and none are hurt a system of dikes walls dividing subduing the sea that nevertheless still rages like panthers back and forth in the cubicles or a harmonica held up to the wind a line of uniform holes and each one wailing the time's favorite fellow the chimpanzee at the typewriter that was where he lived easy to be a poet reconstructing life hard to live hard to live hard to live easy to be a mad poet in the town's wonder hard to be a madman far gone under.

Hayden Carruth

be damaging to his own self-m." pgood's conviction is that Af-ruling elite, despite all their list slogans, do not believe in ge, for it might destroy their eges. "When the Europeans sur-red the keys of the palace," he s, "they put the elite in their shoes. . . . Nothing could be more al than for the African elite to nue a system in which they were ighly privileged; social change
l inevitably reduce their power, income, their sense of superior-African capitals brim with what ood calls the unproductive but ly visible "monuments to the quest for prestige": palaces, s stadiums, armies, air lines, c lights, television stations. The would rather spend their energy the country's money on these on the peasant in the bush.
he tragedy of the elite today," ood continues, "is that it has ed European ways of consumpwithout European productivity.
What Europe displayed [to the ial Africans] was not the harding society of Europe but the olent feudalism of Europe-in-
a. . . . Combined with its Euro-salaries, low productivity makes elite expensive indeed to the an nations."
e colonial attitudes are perpetl in the elite by the colonial l systems still used in inde-ent Africa. These schools teach ans as if they were little French-or little Englishmen. "The ation of the educated African Europe's legacy," Hapgood writes, the school is still teaching the message . . . the superiority of at is European-urban over what frican-rural. Contempt for vil-culture and its values, and all contempt for farming and ual labor, is the lesson instilled e students."

Hapgood notes that "the method aching is still rigid memorizathe purpose of schooling is to an examination that gets you the elite." This kind of school-reates in the elite "the concern status rather than production, igid application of rules without rn for their purpose and, worst l, fear and dislike of anything and risky."
hough it is hard to generalize an entire continent, Hapgood's is relevant to almost all of the

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current will be sent to you as your initial copy upon receipt of your order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my first issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________STATE__________ZIP No.__________

10-4-65

ten Black African countries I have visited. I have a little trouble, though, in applying it to Nigeria, the largest and best known of the new nations in Africa.

This is not because Nigeria has escaped the three problems of agricultural stagnation, an unproductive elite and an irrelevant school system. Nigeria suffers from these just as do the other countries. But Nigeria has another side. Foreign aid and trade are pouring into the country, the pet of Britain and America. All this money has created a heady, get-rich atmosphere, and Nigerians are rushing about trying to get their fingers on the cash. Despite stagnant agriculture, elitism and Western education, can Nigeria develop on the force of greed alone? My guess is that the answer is no, that this country will falter just like the others. But I wish Hapgood had spent some time analyzing the special case of Nigeria.

I also have some trouble with Hapgood's final assessment. The import of his critique of Africa would seem to indicate a coming social and political revolution. How long can society withstand the pressures of a system that makes the elite richer and does nothing for the masses? But the author talks vaguely about the distant future when a new culture may come to Africa, combining both European and traditional African values. It sounds a little lame.

But these are quibbles or suggestions of new topics for another book. I don't want to suggest any serious deficiencies in this tight little work. It's the best one around on Africa.

Formentor Surprise

THE GIANT DWARFS. By Gisela Elsner. Translated by Joel Carmichael. Grove Press. 309 pp. $5.95.

Richard Kostelanetz

Last spring in London, The Sunday Times covered the heralded Formentor International Literary Conference in the gossipy, feature column by "Atticus" rather than in the book section. Justifying the switch, the columnist noted that the most memorable, if not newsworthy, aspects of the four previous conferences were not the prize novelists nor their work but the antics of the eminent invited literati; and, as if to write off the possibility of any literary significance at all, Atticus reported that Barney Rossett, head of the American participant Grove Press, said, "We haven't yet made any writer famous. And no writer has made us famous. . . . So I guess so far we score a double zero." The other first-rate Sunday paper, The Observer, reported: "Publishers' molls saunter past the swimming pool with the latest novels tucked under suntanned arms . . . desperate critics take refuge in the bar and leaf through half-read manuscripts at the last minute."

The Formentor Conference emerges as precisely the sort of gathering that fails to inspire confidence in its selections and makes one wonder why publishers who seem to have unlimited funds for such junkets turn around and complain that they have so little money to support truly good books. Pity the poor author who should win the prize. As victim of this messy system, he is cast into the literary arena as a product of what Daniel Boorstein calls a "pseudo-event," whose significance is manufactured by publicity rather than achieved by intrinsic worth; in short retrospect, one can judge that the Prix Formentor seems to have crippled more budding careers than it helped.

It was thus, with some surprise, that I discovered that last year's choice, Gisela Elsner's The Giant Dwarfs (originally written in German and now translated into English) is a novel with many extraordinary dimensions, one which establishes its author as a definite talent. Rather simple in conception, the book is the first-person narration of a 5-year-old male child's responses to the world around him. In form, it exemplifies that most challenging (to write) and difficult (to read) of modern prose structures: the totally flat, plotless, repetitious—in Joseph Frank's term, "spatial"—novel, sometimes glibly and fallaciously called the "anti-novel." The Giant Dwarfs announces both its technique and its theme from its opening pages, and instead of progressing on to other characters, interests or themes—developing a story in the traditional way—Miss Elsner resorts to the more painterly strategy of drawing an outline of the entire
at the start, and then filling i picture with each successive and chapter.

Although the child lives, it in the most normal of German m class surroundings, he looks a world with the most jaundice eyes. Since the reason for his vision is never explained, the im theme of the book is that, despi most favorable of environments, still possible for a child to gro neurotic and bleak. The book, some of Flannery O'Connor's po als of children, emerges as a F ian-Christian critique of liberal raising and progressive educati

The problems stem from Mis ner's apparent inability to ti novel together into a seamless
The central improbability is th of the narrator. The thoroughn his negative vision becomes som suspect and, further, his style considerably, echoing most freq Samuel Beckett, but also Ge
Stein, Jean Genet, Klaus R (whose excellent stories, The of Night, 1959, are still regre little known) and Franz Kafk nally, some of the events the na describes are simply not credibl here as in Günter Grass' Th

Richard Kostelanetz is the editor of The New American Arts (Horizon).

To a Good Friend at Rest Home

I know how you feel:
like someone shoved a heavy barrel against your body;

like all the flowers in the wor bloomed altogether black;

like — put in charge of running your body's machine — you jammed
it;

like if Death came you wouldn't even be there . . .

Even now I know you sit — gravely —
like a house full of mourners, trying to remember where you buried yourself.

And I hear you cry out without sound where where where

I know how you feel:
like your heart was a bird but it flew away . . .

Phyllis Bro

um, much of the specifically Ger-an satire will be lost on Englisheaking readers.
Still, the major sign of Miss Elsner's omise as a novelist is how intellintly she manages the problems of spatial novel. Of the two distinctly ntemporary prose forms—the other ng the totally fragmented, disconuous "narrative" of, say, Michel tor's Mobile or William S. Burghs' recent experiments—the spa-l novel is the easier, for at least the velist does not choose to eschew herent sequences. However, basic oblems remain, primary of which is w to sustain the reader's interest.
the most successful examples, style d character replace plot and any dence of the author's attitudes or nsibility as the dominant features the novel; a novelist's success with se two aspects goes nearly the ole way in realizing his work. Per-ps the most effective recent novels this mode are Samuel Beckett's, which the style, particularly in The namable, never ceases to be as ginal and compelling as the nar-or's predicament. In The Giant arfs, the character is unusually eresting and his style, particularly the grotesque descriptions of fairly normal behavior, is brilliant enough to earn the work a place in the genre.

> My father starts to eat. His belly touches the edge of the table. There is a gap between his thighs wide enough for a head to fit in. His legs are wrapped around his chair legs. He carries big forkfuls to his mouth and chews them with great care, his eyes fixed on the center part in my mother's hair, who is now serving herself a heap that would go into my heap several times over [which, he remarks earlier, is in turn "a heap that could go many times over into my father's heap"]. Her head lowered, she sits opposite my father. And while my father is still chewing, he holds the next forkful at the level of his mouth, the prongs so close to his lips I'm afraid he may hurt himself.

To note that Miss Elsner is capable of pages of high brilliance demands the secondary remark that her materials would have been more artistically successful if she had pruned them down into a short story or a novella. Still, compared to Miss Elsner, now 27, how few young Americans can imaginatively use such contemporary novelistic forms as well.

ETTER from TOKYO

Mary Evans

ere was a time when even the uffiest foreigner could feel him-f a somebody in Japan. Though in ir hearts the Japanese might as-me that most long-time foreign resi-nts—those who stayed for more an six months—were nincompoops feeble to survive in their own nd, they granted these cast-outs re-suring deference—the homage due ose who convey magic by their ry persons. Just as it can seem nost enough to bear a certain me, so it was almost enough to be foreigner.
This has become less and less the se. People are still polite, but then Japanese do have better public nners than almost anyone else.
mehow, one has been demoted from eigner to alien resident. Construcn workmen think it quite their ht to hoot at passing foreign men. Taxi drivers no longer compulsively ask me, "What do you think of Japan?" The outer signs of status have diminished. It is no longer foreigners who ride in most of the big chauffered limousines but Japanese executives, or their little daughters being driven to the Sacred Heart Convent School. Nor are the limousines necessarily of foreign make: the Emperor has announced that from now on he will ride, not in a Rolls-Royce, but in a vehicle custom-built by a Japanese manufacturer. Most significant of this fall from glory, the social columns in the English-language papers, which everyone reads for a feeling of social solidarity, give more and more of their gushings to the activities of the international set among the Japanese.

There isn't quite a local jet set, but something near to it, what with all the Japanese who have been abroad, who are rich enough to give big international parties, to buy their wives Dior or Balmain dresses (made locally under Parisian supervision), and whose rebellious daughters no longer commit suicide when unhappy in love but instead run away with papa's wallet to Hong Kong. All else being equal—and the Japanese have never doubted their superiority in aesthetics and social conduct—money tends to put people in their places. Japan leads the world in shipbuilding, is second or third in electronics, chemical textiles, steel.

People no longer "talk poor," nor do they live as if they were. Most of the space in the new "Mansions" and "Co-op Villas" is rented by Japanese. My neighborhood meat shop now sells black olives, Vermont maple syrup and Indian chutney. It is the Japanese who buy the $15 tickets to see the Slav opera of Zagreb do Boris Gudonov. This past summer the boys and girls who hang out around the Ginza and in the "Champs Elysee" coffeehouse went in for madras. With all the new buildings going up — marble lobbies and fountains — Tokyo is muddy underfoot, but it certainly doesn't look shabby today. The big international hotels, like the Imperial and the Okura, where delegates to the Esperanto Conference share roof restaurants with doctors attending the neuro-physiological seminar, make their big money on Japanese wedding banquets and business parties.

Not everyone is prosperous. Cottage industry workers can barely eat, and the pioneer farmers in Hokkaido—who are forever losing the bean crop to typhoons—can't even do that. The authorities are constantly trying to track down 14-year-old girls who have been sold off to hot spring hotels, prostitution being against the law though destitution is not. As with the American poor, there are odd anomalies: the Tokyo rag pickers, considered at the very bottom of the heap, live in smelly alleys of tin-sided huts, where one sometimes finds a telephone (very expensive to install in Japan) or an electric washing machine among the messy piles of rags and junk which spill out of the tiny rotting rooms.

Still, most of the country is doing well, and there have been interesting developments in national self-assurance. It used to be that exhibitions of Japanese painters never carried identification signs in roman letters. One might as well have been viewing the anonymous works of anonymous painters. Now in the big department store galleries and the government museums, everything is

---

ry Evans, who has lived in Tokyo eight years, is film and theatre tic for the English-language Japan nes.

labeled in English. The confidence thus shown is not so much in the artistic discrimination of the foreigners, but in the intrinsic worth of what has been hung.

Japanese men are also beginning to consider themselves as important works of art; they have a new sense of their own sexual value. They have always considered themselves superior to women (a worldly doctor friend says categorically that all women are at least 20 per cent inferior to men in all respects), but they weren't so sure that they held their own with foreign men. After all, they did lose the war, and the American GIs, who were so big, took away lots of their women. Whatever the reason for it —the blandishments of lonely women tourists tired of viewing gardens with other lonely women, the marriage of a young N.H.K. (Japan's B.B.C.) official to "a proud graduate of Radcliffe," Toshiro Mifune's fame—the Japanese male now believes he dominates the erotic dreams of foreign women. A story going around has it that in Yokohama there dwells a lady who came all the way from Oklahoma in order to ride the crowded commuter trains and "molest" the white-collar workers — who say that she is most dignified in her advances and that they look forward to these encounters.

Some of this new general confidence is due to the success of the Olympics. Everything — the subways and the monorail, the bullet train to Osaka and the marvelously beautiful swimming center by Kenzo Tange —got finished in time. That the Emperor read his short opening speech instead of reciting it was typical of the cautious care everyone took to make sure there wasn't a hitch. It was probably the most perfectly organized Olympics ever held. The Japanese didn't win as many medals as they had hoped for, but they collected more than did most European countries. Anyway, the games came off. A handsome boy, born the day Hiroshima was bombed, ran nimbly up the stadium steps to light the Olympic torch. The unhappy past was over.

EDUCATIONAL

SEMINARS in Personal-Social Understanding and Action. A unitary approach to the intertwining of personal life and social problems. Weekly meetings emphasizing group process and development of awareness. YUkon 9-8294 (N.Y.C.).

APARTMENT TO SHARE

54th ST. WEST. Beautiful apartment to share (female). Own large, most desirable room. CI 6-4444.

PERSONALS

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

PUBLICATION

FUN TO READ!

THE IDLER is a lively, individualistic liberal monthly that entertains as it informs. Warm humor and cold facts mixed into a pleasant, personal and personable journalistic pot.

Send $3.00 today for a year's subscription. Money back if not satisfied.

Discover THE IDLER and you will have made a new friend.

THE IDLER
125 Fifth St., N.E.
Washington 2, D. C.

Please send me a one year's subscription to THE IDLER. Enclosed is $3.00.

Name ....

Address ....

........................Zip........

The unhappy past is also being re-evaluated. The older generation of nationalists at last feels free to give its version of what happened. A book that came out recently says that the deaths of about 15,000 Allied prisoners of war and natives during the building of the Thai-Burma railroad weren't due to Japanese cruelty. The workers were better treated than the Japanese soldiers (which makes one pity the lot of the Japanese conscript). The Education Ministry, according to the Weekly Asahi, has officially approved the release of new history textbooks which give the impression that the Japanese invasion of French Indo-China was justifiable (because of economic pressures and because France had fallen to Germany) and that the term Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere "charmed even those who were not enthusiastic about the war."

Most Japanese remain completely uncharmed by that or any other war. When the United States began to bomb North Vietnam, people wrote hundreds of letters to the Japanese Asahi, saying that they were made to remember the terror of the w time B-29 bombings of Japan.
instructor at the War College tc what he thought was a private r on a U.S. bombing sortie but sor one on the U.S. side released a pl tograph, and there was national dignation. One friend said to r patiently, that the explanations fered by the State Department of mission in Southeast Asia reminc him of statements made by Japan militarists, who had also claimed be safeguarding the rights of natives. And what is the differen people ask, between the attack
North Vietnam and the attack
Pearl Harbor?

This year's Nika exhibit of mod painting showed a large oil of young Vietnamese being comforted, the moment of execution, by a cy cal-looking priest, while troops American helmets shoved their b onets at weeping civilians. The ar was doubtless a leftist, yet com back from a moon-viewing festival streetcar, I sat next to a young who was reading the Japanese sion of Seventeen: right after pages on how to open a sliding d in the proper manner were p tographs of peasant children in V nam clinging to their dead motl Across the aisle a woman holdin bouquet of the autumn flowers is offered at moon-viewing, said her companion, "We should tell t American woman what we think Vietnam."

At least the Japanese are still w ing to tell us what they think of Significantly, they have adop American ways of doing this.
stead of mass demonstrations, th was a televised teach-in, and a gr of intellectuals has been trying raise the money for a big peace in The New York Times. We are ing treated rather as a foo younger brother who doesn't rea how badly he is behaving.

The new sense of familial equa has its advantages for foreigners.
a performance of the Noh, touri bored by the unfamiliarity of it blew their noses during the most l cal passages and left in the mic with a clatter of cameras and parc Yet I was asked by the ladies sit next to me (all of them amate who had come to watch their I master perform) not whether thought I could possibly ever un stand the Noh but whether, them, I was studying it. No lor magic, one has become individ

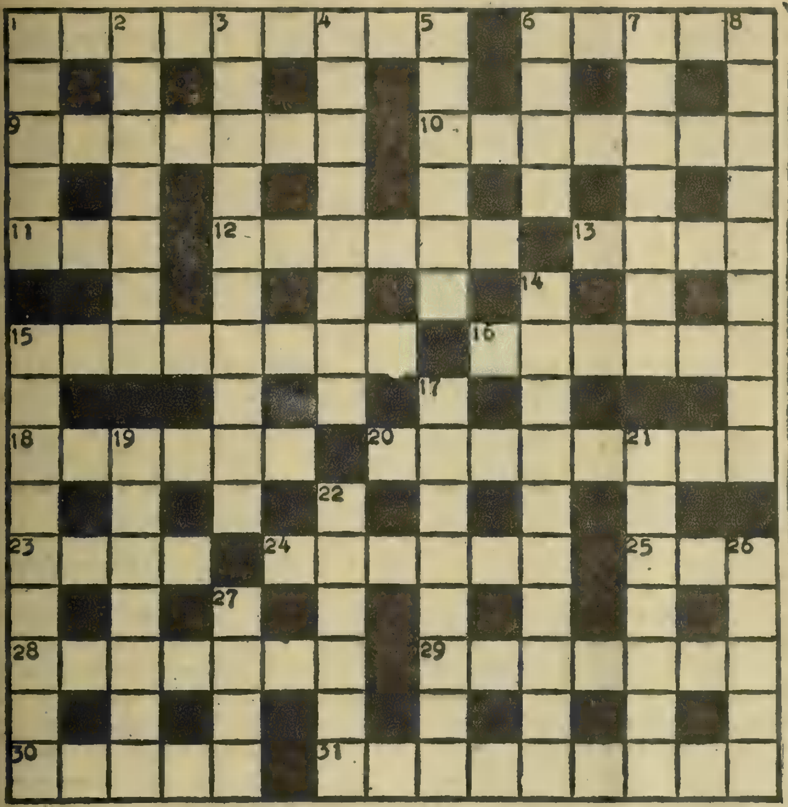
Crossword Puzzle No. 1121

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

and 26 down 20 is both, with the spirit obviously weakened. (6, 3, 5)

A worker with the military forces —possibly a driver? (4, 3)

German city types? (3)

The wild mare is sometimes engaged in the field. (6)

Heed the psyche, as the tender might. (4)

Such a fireman might get more attention than such a nurse. (8)

How that "Welcome" is used might show the shape of things to come.

A passing one is not necessarily "move over, ya hog!" (6) and 10 Men's school rents, claimed to have been observed on the rise? (4, 4, 7)

One of these certainly doesn't sound out customers stopping there. (4)

Is it popular not to have the so-called best class on your property, perhaps? (6)

How to intimidate the female of the species. (3)

Tries an unusual form of what one sometimes does with lawyers. (7)

What one might do to slide a big job, possibly. (7)

Play casually? No, this is a pet scheme. (5)

He is presumably a speeder, but that's his business. (9)

DOWN:

Part of the stock that farmers used to turn over? (5)

Probably responsible for a certain amount of pull in the plant. (7)

3 and 6 across Drawn with ideographs on the hanger? (9, 6)

4 An Athenian in any environment would imply an element of brittleness. (8)

5 However, on the piano one wouldn't want it relatively moist.

6 Sort of indulgent. (4)

7 Is it Tom that threatened to break up someone else's party? (7)

8 Historian who proves to be one of the good guys on the spot, with you and me. (9)

14 Not exemplified by Ma Barker, back in the 30's! (10)

15 A composer starts to make a deposit. Gray, however, finished it in France. (9)

17 Candy, relax! I and Daddy will make it all right! (8)

19 Ironclad lizard—possibly a school pet! (7)

21 Possibly teaches how to give back property to the state. (7)

22 In the course of a dinner party, it looks somewhat like a small animal, but sounds like a much larger one. (6)

27 You might see a starlet in one, but it proves a rather thin protection.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1120

ACROSS: 1 Succors; 5 Gag rule; 9 Austral; 10 Amongst; 11 Tours; 12, 15, 17 and 26 Candid camera; 13 Swami; 14 Cheddar; 16 Dockers; 18 Brooder; 21 Simples; 24 Utter; 27 Tiger; 28 Dormant; 29 Drop out; 30 Rookery; 31 Repasts. DOWN: 1 Spastic; 2 Costume; 3 Orris; 4 Splicer; 5 Grained; 6 Gloss; 7 Upgrade; 8 Entails; 18 Boulder; 19 Ontario; 20 Reentry; 21 Slander; 22 Legions; 23 Sprites; 25 Reade; 27 Troop.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY AFIELD
Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair.
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
$2 check or money order
B. F. JOHNSON
P. O. Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique, Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N. Y. C. Bin Dir Woor calls for thousands in every country to run for public offices, wearing on their foreheads these prophetic words, "World Democracy" and to run not to win, but to spread World Democracy principles, to take offerings for charity, and to pray for the sick and the dying.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE DRAFTED is must reading for every young man. Send $1.00 to Knox, Box 1018, Mission, Kansas.

"LET THERE BE A WORLD." Felix Greene's pictorial account of humanity's dilemma. One dollar a copy. Concerned Citizens, Box 191, Palo Alto, Calif.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans. Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed [illegible] the U. S. A. by [illegible] Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

Trans-action

THE MAGAZINE OF SOCIAL SCIENCE & MODERN SOCIETY brings new insights and informative articles based on reliable research

FROM PEOPLE WHO KNOW

(psychology, sociology, economics, political science and anthropology)

TO PEOPLE WHO DO-

(management, communications, government, the professions, civic leaders, supervisors, intellectuals)...YOU

NEWSWEEK: *"The physical sciences have their Scientific American, but until recentl the social sciences had no publication in which the professional could speak intelligently–an intelligibly–to the layman...Trans-*action offers an authoritative, jargonless view of the usuall recondite world of the social sciences." February 15, 1965

DID YOU MISS...these articles in recent issues?

- Who Needs the Negro?
- Beyond Berkeley: High Noon on Campus
- The Ethics of Psychoanalysis
- New Strategies for the War on Poverty
- Flattery Will Get You Somewhere
- The Innovating Organization — special supplement

DO NOT MISS...these in upcoming issues!

- Does military deterrence work?
- How top-level executives resolve disputes
- Is there an American Protestantism?
- The "power elite" of American small towns
- The social and psychological stakes in the space race
- What happens when mothers don't love their babies?

make your next transaction

Trans-action

BOX 43,
WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI 63130

Send me the October issue of Trans-action and enter my trial subscription for one year (six issues) at only $3.50.

☐ $3.50 enclosed (An EXTRA ISSUE free if no billing is necessary.) ☐ Bill me. If I am not completely satisfied with the issue, I may cancel the subscription, keep the issue, and owe nothing or get a refund.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP

10 TA-N

TO SOCIALISM BY TRAIN: Stefan Heym

THE NATION

October 11, 1965 . . 35c

OCT 11 1965

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

Ferment in the Churches

The New Christian Soldiers

Harvey Cox

THE POLITICS OF POLLUTION . . . . Gladwin Hill

THE EXPULSION OF SINGAPORE . . C. P. FitzGerald

Mississippi: SUMMER OF DISCONTENT . . . Elizabeth Sutherland

LETTERS

Backdrop of malaise

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: The atmosphere of the Berkeley nonstudent Left as described by Hunter S. Thompson ("The Nonstudent Left"; The Nation, Sept. 27) reminds this effete Easterner of nothing so much as the resort ads in the very establishment New York Times. . . . Certainly there are serious basic problems in our society which demand (and are receiving from a section of the New Left) serious consideration and action. But for the persons whom Mr. Thompson describes, the malaise of society is not so much a condition to be changed as a fitting backdrop for the only fulfillment which they seem to know—self-indulgence. That this style of politics can have any lasting significance seems a remote possibility.

Steven Levine

Poet on politics

Santa Fe, N.M.

Dear Sirs: Robert Duncan's "Up Rising" (The Nation, Sept. 13) seemed to me the finest political poem I had read in years. Clearly, even in the time of overpopulated empires, if a poet is good enough, he can write well on public themes. The fact is reassuring.

J. C. Fiscalini

Still in print

New York City

Dear Sirs: Alexander Laing, in his most welcome article in your anniversary issue, mentions that a book of Eli Siegel's poems, Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana: Poems, was published in 1957. The book is published by Definition Press, 39 Grove Street, New York City, and can at this time be gotten from the publishers.

Martha Baird, Editor

Poverty, Inc.

New York City

Dear Sirs: With the aid of SNCC, the Poor People's Corporation has been formed in Mississippi. The purpose of the corporation, to be run wholly by its members, is to provide a framework for the establishment of a variety of small businesses to be carried on by the poor people of the rural South. Many of these people have lost their jobs through participation in the civil rights movement—all too often merely registering to vote. . . . [See "Mississippi: Summer of Discontent," p. 212.]

Several workshops are already under way, and in a matter of a few months goods will be arriving in the North for marketing. But to realize its potential of providing the poor of the South with a considerable measure of economic independence—to become itself an economic force in the South—the PPC needs money to initiate projects, skilled people who are willing to train others and, of equal importance, ideas for future workshops. Please address correspondence and checks to: Poor People's Corporation, 5 Beekman St., New York 10038, N.Y., or P.O. Box 977, Jackson, Miss.

James Goldman
Poor People's Corporation

Welcome

New York City

Dear Sirs: Good to see Constantine Poulos back in The Nation—and with the best thing that has been written on Greece and its present problems ["Greece: What the Palace Fears," The Nation, Sept. 27].

T. Tanakos

Art's arrow

New York City

Dear Sirs: The great art of our day without exception favors the Left. André Malraux's fine novel Man's Fate is a hymn to the Chinese revolution. Silone's Fontamara, Picasso's Guernica and Brecht's plays are Left-oriented. The destroyers of the Left (Mussolini, et al.) begot no art.

Still U.S. policy would destroy all Left revolutions, even those independent of China and Russia. Failure is certain. For art is ever the arrow of history and no force can withstand its pronouncements. The pen is indeed mightier than the sword.

David Mandel

Competence

Hollywood, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Sen. Thomas J. Dodd, denouncing Martin Luther King for his peace proposals relative to the United States, Vietnam and China, said King "has absolutely no competence to speak about complex matters of foreign policy." It might be pointed out that King (not Dodd) won the Nobel Peace Prize.

Harry Cimring

Mechanics of diplomacy

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: From the discussion on the floor of the Senate prompted by the Fulbright memorandum on the Dominican intervention, the hand of the Central Intelligence Agency in setting the matrix for intervention was shown. Credit for this should be given to Sen. Joseph Clark who, while somewhat ambivalent in his views on the intervention at the time, has given wholehearted support to the Fulbright position. Because of the

(Continued on page 223)

THE
NATION

Monday, October 11, 1965
Volume 201, No. 11

In this issue

EDITORIALS
205

ARTICLES

208 The Expulsion of Singapo
C. P. FitzGerald
212 Mississippi:
Summer of Discontent
Elizabeth Sutherland
216 Ferment in the Churches:
The New Christian Soldier
Harvey Cox
220 The Politics of Pollution
Gladwin Hill

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

224 The Clashing Old and Ne
Robert Green
225 Declining, Bewildered, Frustrated
Frederick Gutheim
226 A Neglected Genre
Richard Kostelanetz
228 I Arrive at Socialism by T
Stefan Heym
230 Records
Benjamin Boretz
232 Sunday to a Close at Grit Hospital (poem)
Edward Auert
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 2
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry

Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Oct. 11, 1965. Vol. 201,

The Nation is published weekly (except and August, when biweekly) by The Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth A New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-840 Subscription Price: One year, $10; two $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice quired for change of address, which can made without the old address as well as th

Information to Libraries: The Nation is i in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature Review Digest and the Public Affairs In tion Service.

EDITORIALS

hither Goldberg?

The General Assembly is in the throes of its annual nial of United Nations membership to Red China d, as usual, the United States is in the forefront of battle against Peking. The spokesman this time s Ambassador Goldberg, but it might as well have n Adlai Stevenson or Henry Cabot Lodge. The script s the same, and Goldberg's reading was inferior, m a theatrical standpoint, to that of either of his decessors.

There may be valid reasons for denying member-p to Red China—or withholding the offer of it, for s by no means likely that the Chinese would accept. e reasons given in the Goldberg (or State Depart-nt) statement are so hypocritical, however, that ne but the child minds of international politics can e them credence. China is accused of designs to ange world order by force and violence" and to re-t "fundamental restraints on the use of force in e UN] charter. . . ." This is quite true, but it is ally true that the United States and its anti-Com-nist allies believe in the use of force and violence resist changes in the world order, and not only be-e in it but practice it without restraint. It is the ited States that is flooding South Vietnam with men l arms, attacking civilians and combatants in both tnams indiscriminately from the air, and making lain to the Chinese that if they dare to come to the of the North Vietnamese they will receive the same atment. The Chinese, as witness Marshal Lin Piao's l for world revolution, are vocally the more bel-rent, but no nation can surpass the United States its willingness to use force—and that holds for the man, Eisenhower and Kennedy administrations as l as the present one. The debate might more logical-turn on a proposal to expel the United States from United Nations, or apply sanctions against it, her than on whether the Chinese should be admitted. f, in the present world order, any nation, with the eption of the Scandinavian countries, forgoes the of force when its rulers find force to be in the ional interest, that nation has somehow hidden its tue from historians. Israel joined England and nce in an attack on Egypt, which had provoked attack by aggressions of its own. The Soviet Union down counterrevolution in Hungary by force. The ited States abetted an invasion of Cuba. As Gold-g was mouthing his lines, India and Pakistan, both ned by the United States, were violating a cease-fire their war over Kashmir. There may be distinctions l degrees of aggression in these conflicts, but ag-ssion is certainly not peculiar to the Chinese.

The script is so hackneyed that it hardly merits this ch discussion, but its delivery by Ambassador Gold-g is a bad augury. The President pulled him out of Supreme Court, and one could assume that the selection of a negotiator of Goldberg's caliber foreshadowed a less sterile policy. One could also assume that Goldberg thought he could serve the cause of peace in accepting the appointment. He is in a position to influence policy to a degree that Adlai Stevenson was not. If he merely reads the kind of drivel Washington furnishes him, he will contribute neither to the cause of peace nor to his own reputation. He is, as Eric Sevareid says, a man of character and proper pride. Let him show it, for only so can he serve his country and himself.

The Crackdown

Dissent is not for milquetoasts. In our time, dissent is especially prohibited when it touches on any of the fighting wars which spring from the cold war. It does not matter how respectable the dissenter has previously been: the instant he finds anything wrong with U.S. policy in Vietnam or, more broadly, anywhere abroad, the crackdown begins.

Over the past several years, Martin Luther King has added luster to the dissenting tradition, as his great namesake did before him. Actually, his dissent was not so much antagonistic to accepted views as a reaffirmation of the principles of the Declaration of Independence in respect of race. Actually, also, Dr. King is a most moderate leader of the Negro people, and a restraining influence in the face of almost intolerable affronts and injuries. Except among homicidal racists, he has been regarded with tolerance even by segregationists, and with admiration by most others.

But this tolerance did not, for the most part, extend beyond Dr. King's civil rights activities. When he applied his doctrine of nonviolence to Vietnam, and spoke out against the Johnson Administration's policies (as well as against violence on the part of the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front), he was deluged by threatening editorials and cartoons, and by slanted news stories. Included among the admonitions was one from his good friend in the White House, who never resents dissent except when it is directed his way.

The case of Senator Fulbright, for all the differences between him and Dr. King, is in the same style. Mr. Fulbright is that rarity among politicians — a thinker and prophet. He is, if anything, too modest; he says himself that he is not a "powerful personality," a disclaimer which, coming from a politician, is almost unprecedented. Among his personal virtues is an acute sense of the value of dissent. In his recent speech on the American big-stick policy in the Caribbean, he succeeded momentarily in undoing, to some degree, the harm that had been caused by our initial intervention in the Dominican Republic. But his critics, by way of public rebuke, proceeded to push Resolution 560 through the House by a vote of 312 to 52. The resolution affirms the right of unilateral military intervention by any Western Hemisphere nation into the internal affairs of any other nation in the Western Hemisphere if, in the sole opinion of the intervener, Communists are involved. Adoption of the resolution promptly raised an even greater protest than this magazine had anticipated (see comments in last week's issue). Initially, neither the State Department nor the White House had opposed the resolution; later, after an informal poll of Latin American embassies, a last-minute effort was made by the Administration to stop the resolution which it had tacitly encouraged. Now the Administration is attempting—with an assist from Senator Javits and others—to repair some of the added damage caused by the ill-tempered and ill-advised rebuke to Senator Fulbright.

When it comes to dissent, neither prominence nor obscurity affords much protection. Although he is well known in California, few Easterners have heard of Si Casady, a former newspaper editor who presently heads the California Democratic Council, composed of some 75,000 of the farthest-left Democrats of the state. Casady has been going about California attacking the Vietnamese war, in the words of Time, as "legally, morally and politically indefensible." That might have got by, at least for a while, but Casady went on to tell audiences: "It takes more guts to burn a draft card than to go to war. Some people have the guts to stand and say, 'We will not fight for what we don't believe.' "

The storm broke. Even Governor Pat Brown, who is often praised in these pages, thought Casady had gone too far. Acknowledging Casady's right to speak for himself, he demanded his resignation as president of the council. Casady, after a "family blood-bath" meeting of the council's board of directors, refused. According to Carl Greenberg of the Los Angeles Times, President Johnson had already taken umbrage at Casady's speeches and might have communicated with Governor Brown before the latter acted. It does not matter too much. The dissenter must expect trouble, and the time when he should worry about his views is not when he is criticized, but when he is praised by the majority and its leaders. The majority is not always wrong, but it is always wrong when it attempts to stifle dissent.

Sugar Stick-up

In speeches delivered in the House on September 22 and 27, Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.) called attention to one of the more flagrant outrages perpetrated on the American consumer. The domestic price of sugar is in effect fixed by act of Congress or, more accurately, by one very special Congressman, Rep. Harold D. Cooley (D., N.C.), Chairman of the House Agriculture Committee. Findley estimates that the latest sugar legislation sponsored by Cooley would cost American households $3.5 billion in excessive charges over the next five years. What Cooley prescribes is also of great importance in U.S. for relations, particularly in Latin America. It is equ important to the sugar lobbyists, who are paid u $50,000 a year by their clients and who work Cooley to rig the market, all with perfect legality for the most pious reasons: to "stabilize" the p of sugar, to punish the cold-war enemies of the Un States and reward its friends, and to keep dome sugar producers prosperous and happy.

The mechanics of sugar manipulation have described in past issues of The Nation by Desm Smith, Boris Swerling and Fred J. Cook, but the byists and their friends in Congress have contin on their own sweet way. The U.S. sugar marke controlled by the Secretary of Agriculture, but enabling legislation is renewed every year by gress. The legislation is extremely complex (per more complex than it needs to be) and it norm comes before the House late in the session. members have neither the background nor the incl tion to inform themselves on the technicalities of sugar industry. It is much easier to defer to Cooley's knowledge and experience, both of which considerable. Mr. Findley's revolt is exceptional. ally the legislation goes through smoothly, and one is the worse for it except the consumers.

The stakes are enormous. The world price of s is more than 3c a pound less than the U.S. p At retail, also, a consumer across the line in ada pays 8c a pound, on this side of the line This may seem a trifle, but the United States sumes 10 million tons of sugar annually, of w 4 million tons come from abroad. Thus when ev minor suppliant like Thailand obtains a 20,00 quota, it is $1,200,000 better off than if it had to that quantity on the world market. Whether it the quota depends on its lobbyist, on Represent Cooley, and on technicians in the Departmen Agriculture, whose advice Cooley may accept o ject as he sees fit.

Of course the other members of Cooley's H Agriculture Committee may also have somethin say but, as Chairman, Cooley has somewhat the s status that Rep. Carl Vinson had in the House A Services Committee. Thus when Findley tried t rect questions at sugar-lobbyist fees, Cooley summ overruled him. It was no one's business, Cooley on what terms the lobbyist worked for his client

The rationale of the sugar program has always that it creates "price stability." So it does. Fi points out that if prices are fixed at a high en level, stability is automatically achieved—as in racket or conspiracy in restraint of trade. Findl not opposed to reasonable regulation in sugar, more than in other agricultural commodities, bu wants to end one-man domination of the Agricu Committee and the exploitation of the public b quiescent Congressmen and the sugar lobby. H serves the support of Congressmen whose intere their constituents is not limited to securing their v

One World

In 1916, David Sarnoff, then 25, submitted a memorandum on a proposed "radio music box" to his superiors in the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America. The company officials, though already aware of Sarnoff's ability, considered this scheme so harebrained that they did not bother to reply. They had second thoughts in 1921, when broadcasting burst upon the Radio Corporation of America, which by that time had absorbed the Marconi Company. Within a few years RCA's sales of broadcast receivers had eclipsed its marine and transoceanic wireless telegraph business, and in another few years Sarnoff was president of the company.

Last September 17, Sarnoff, now 74, delivered an address at the Conference on World Peace Through Law on "Law, World-Wide Communications and World Peace," which people familiar with his career consider fully as prognostic as his radio music box idea. We are already in the era of satellite communications, but heretofore the experts have surmised that intercontinental television would continue to require elaborate facilities like those of the Communications Satellite Corporation, which would channel picture and sound to the TV networks for distribution to home receivers. Thus governments and giant corporations would decide what the viewers in each country could see and hear—and what they were not to see and hear.

Sarnoff, who naturally has access to the latest technical advice, now tells us that this is not the way it is going to be. Within five or ten years, he believes, nuclear-powered satellites will transmit TV and radio programs directly to home receivers. Only the home antennas will require modification, and that presents neither technical nor economic problems. It may be added that with the waves coming in at a steep angle there should be less difficulty with "ghosts" than with the present system, where tall buildings, bridges, etc., often cause multiple images.

But it is the political implications that are most disconcerting, or exciting, depending on the viewpoint. Sarnoff asks: "When, for example, a Russian satellite can broadcast directly to a Kansas farm, or an American satellite can broadcast directly to a Hungarian collective, what will be the reaction in both countries? . . . What rules of conduct are to apply, and who is to establish them? This question evades the jurisdiction of any established body, yet it will affect the welfare of all nations and all people." He adds that "it would be a travesty on the hopes of humanity if this immense force for enlightenment, understanding and social advancement were to be subverted to narrow national ends, or become discredited by the failure of nations to agree upon its beneficial uses."

Not so long ago, Sarnoff's views on the cold war were indistinguishable from those of John Foster Dulles. At the request of President Eisenhower, he prepared a report on psychological warfare measures, using existing means of communication which, had they been applied, could only have worsened U.S.-Soviet relations. Now, both the forum he selected and the tone and content of the address indicate a more sober frame of mind. Sarnoff envisions summit conferences, scrambled or open, in which the principals would confer face to face without leaving their respective capitals, television by the United Nations, international educational programing and, in general, areas of communication designed to "strike a chord of response in civilized man regardless of his nationality or ideological allegiance." For the moment, at least, world peace has supplanted the cold war in Sarnoff's thinking. The outlook for the survival of mankind would be more hopeful if peace should become for him a lasting preoccupation, and if other powerful industrialists and politicians were to follow his lead.

A Presidential Front

On September 9, a handsome advertisement appeared in The New York Times and other newspapers announcing the formation of a new ad hoc committee—the Committee for an Effective and Durable Peace in Asia, with Arthur H. Dean as chairman. The list of sponsors—Dean Acheson, Eugene R. Black, James B. Conant, John Cowles, Thomas S. Gates, Roswell L. Gilpatric, John J. McCloy, David Rockefeller, and other equally well-known names—reads like an executive committee for the Establishment. And that, it turns out, is what it is. Thanks to Louis Fleming of the Los Angeles Times, it is now known that the committee was set up at the behest of the President "as an answer to numerous peace-front groups that have been attacking American involvement in Vietnam."

One would think that the Administration, in possession of almost unlimited access, at all times, to all media, had been given the fullest possible opportunity to state its case to the public. But apparently the President is not satisfied with these facilities. Just how the new committee is to be classified in the spectrum of "fronts" is not clear. It could perhaps be called a "war-front group" or "an anti-peace group" or, more accurately, a "Presidential front." Formation of the new committee is proof, if any were needed, that the decision makers in Washington are sensitive to the teach-ins and other forms of public protest and discussion of the war in Vietnam.

The Marines Have Had It

It used to be that every patriotic American was proud of the U.S. Marines, their ability to bring law and order to small, irresponsible Caribbean countries and to collect the just debts due American corporations. Boys could hardly wait to grow up so that they could join the Corps, see the world, and kill a few insolent foreigners. Although not all of this magic has been lost, the Marines are being overshadowed by the Central Intelligence Agency, whose members, though not clad in splendid uniforms, live lives of hair-raising adventure. The fact that these activities are secret (until they become public) only makes them the more intriguing. We get but fleeting glimpses behind the CIA curtain, but these are enough to assure us that (1) the CIA is everywhere; (2) the CIA can do anything; (3) the CIA is the chief bulwark of the United States against the jackals of communism.

Iran, Guatemala, Vietnam, Cambodia, Cuba, Ceylon, Singapore and other CIA battlegrounds are now joined by Pakistan, and who will be next? The Pakistan story is told, front page, in the Daily Telegraph of London, which is noted for the excellence and reliability of its foreign news coverage. The writer is Victor Anant, and the story lacks a dateline, because Anant obtained his material in New Delhi and had to make a getaway before he could cable it uncensored. Anant's account, in his own words, describes "not so much America's commitment to India, but the State Department's urgent desire to cut President Ayub Khan down to size."

To this end, in September, 1963, the CIA stepped up its operations in Pakistan, giving aid to the campaign of Miss Fatima Jinnah, who ran against Ayub Khan in the election of 1964. After Miss Jinnah's defeat, the CIA people in Pakistan seemingly made overtures to the one-time Governor of East Pakistan, General Azam, but without success. However, it was regarded as imperative to punish Field Marshal Ayub for his rapprochement with Red China, and the opportunity came when the India-Pakistan dispute over Kashmir reached the flash point. According to Anant, the CIA group informed New Delhi that a coup d'état was imminent in Pakistan, that Ayub Khan would soon be deposed, that Pakistan was preparing an attack in Kashmir, etc.

This meddling may well have hardened Indian determination to fight over Kashmir, and later, to open a second front. Anant says it is clear that the Indians had reason to believe that the United States "woul not disapprove of a measured spread of the fighting. He also cites Prime Minister Shastri's remark tha India was now in the same position in Kashmir as th United States in Vietnam, and his answer to a question on what he would do if the Chinese invaded India "We have considered that possibility. If that happen we will not be alone." This could mean only tha Shastri relied upon American aid in a form much mor decisive than was forthcoming when the Chinese invaded India in 1962.

Our State Department promptly denied that it ha possessed knowledge of an impending coup in Pakistan or that it had given such information to the India Government. Such denials are routine. They have bee proved false so often that the CIA, rather than bein held innocent until proved guilty, can be assumed t be guilty of any charges made against it by any perso of repute, such as Prince Norodom Sihanouk of Cambodia, Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore or in this case, Victor Anant. As Peace News of Londo (September 17) puts it: "The CIA is probably the mos dangerous organization in the world, its only savin element being an infinite capacity for blunder." Fro time to time Sen. Stephen M. Young of Ohio make the same accusation on the floor of the Senate, terming the CIA an invisible government, answerable onl to itself, and calling for supervision of its activitie and, specifically, for a return to its original mission o centralizing the collection and evaluation of intelligence material. But though probably a majority i both houses of Congress secretly agree, few member will stand up and say so. The prospect is, therefore that the derring-do boys in their Ivy League suits wil continue their careers of high adventure.

The Expulsion of Singapore . . . . C. P. FitzGerald

Canberra, Australia

The abrupt announcement in mid-August that Singapore had been excluded from the Malaysian Federation and become, overnight, an independent state, left the world and its press in some confusion. It was far from clear at first whether this was secession, expulsion or mutually agreed withdrawal. It is now all too evident that it was, in fact, expulsion. Tunku Abdur Rahman, Prime Minister of Malaysia, came back from the Commonwealth Conference in London and simply told Mr. Lee Kuan Yew, Premier of Singapore, that his state must go. In subsequent explanations of this unilateral decision it was made plain that the real cause was the Tunku's fear that if Singapore, predominantly Chinese, remained in the federation, the extreme Malay nationalists could no longer be controlled and would press upon the Prime Minister policies leading swiftly to racial conflict between Chinese and Malays. The amputation of Singapore, it was hoped, would alleviate this pressure and deprive the extremists of their principal weapon—the constant denunciation of the Prime Minister of Singapore, and their dangerous clamor for acts of physical coercion against him and his supporters. Up to a point this aim was achieved. Dato Syed Albar, leader of the extreme party, resigned in anger his post as secretary of the United Malay National Organization (UMNO), the Malay party in the government coalition, and bitterly denounced his leader, th Tunku, for getting rid of his favorite whipping boy. A Malay of aristocratic descent, the Tunku perhaps comforts himself with the reflection that Albar is not even Malay, but a man of Arab ancestr born in the Celebes, who did no migrate to Malaya till he was 30 Lee Kuan Yew did not fail to brin these facts to public notice in television interview, pointing ou

---

C. P. FitzGerald teaches Far Easter history at Australian National University. He is the author, most recentl of The Third China (F. W. Cheshir Ltd.). His other works on the countr where he lived for twenty-five year include China: A Short Cultural History and Floodtide in China.

at he, on the contrary, came from family that had been settled in ngapore for more than a century.
After the first recriminations, it as become clear that neither Ma-ysia nor Singapore wishes to pure the quarrel to the bitter end.
ingapore was promptly recognized a sovereign state by Britain, the nited States and other powers, ut as yet by no means all the Afrosian states have followed suit. The ttitude of Indonesia, above all, mains ambivalent. The reaction Singapore, which was one of joicing, with firecracker celebraons in the streets when the news as made known, was at least in art inspired by the belief that in-ependent Singapore could escape om the quarrel with Indonesia which could henceforward be left "Malaysia") and resume its prof-able trade with Java, Sumatra nd the outer islands. Mr. Lee oon showed that this was too sim-le an assessment of the new situaion. He cannot, under present cir-umstances, follow a foreign policy hich Malaysia would regard as ositively hostile. He must at least eel sure that Indonesia has ceased o make raids and clandestine atacks upon Singapore itself, hithero a conspicuous feature of "con-rontation." But it may be assumed hat Singapore will seek to appease he quarrel and use what influence t has to restore normal relations.

Another question arising rom the exclusion of Singapore is whether this event does not repreent a victory for President Sukar-o's policy of "confrontation" and ts aim, to "crush Malaysia." Cerainly the Indonesians have made his claim, arguing that the expul-ion of Singapore proves their con-ention that Malaysia was an artiicial creation of incongruous ele-nents which should never have een associated, which were forcily united only by the "neo-colonial mperialists" (British, in this in-tance) as an instrument of their efarious policies. They predict, nd expect, that the next break will ome in Borneo, where the states
f Sarawak and Sabah, also non-Malay, though not dominantly Chiese in population, will soon break way. That the Malays in Kuala Lumpur share this prediction is lear from the vehemence with which the Tunku has proclaimed ts utter impossibility and from his

Harry Moss

somewhat premature claim that any such talk was "treason." It can truly be thought that the association of Sarawak and Sabah in Malaysia, originally designed to compensate for the inclusion of dominantly Chinese Singapore, has lost its purpose. There was some economic link between Singapore and the Borneo lands; there is almost none between peninsula Malaya and these countries. The chief remaining function of the federation for the Borneo states is to provide a political framework within which British and Australian military assistance can be provided to resist Indonesian infiltration. Britain is pledged to defend Malaysia against these attacks; if Sarawak and Sabah were no longer part of Malaysia, this pledge might be rendered invalid, or at least would need to be reconsidered. Britain is pressed by financial problems and many influential people there would not be sorry to find a reason for getting out of this onerous commitment.

On the other hand it is not at all clear that Indonesia does gain anything from the exclusion of Singapore, even if this were really a result of confrontation. Mr. Lee knows that Sukarno and his supporters regard the British naval base at Singapore as the chief bastion of the hated neo-colonialism in Southeast Asia; he also knows that the base is of the highest importance to the economy of Singapore; it employs large numbers of citizens of the new state at good wages, brings in welcome money and stimulates commerce. Moreover, whatever the past sins of British imperialism, it is a fact that as long as the British are in the Singapore base the Indonesians cannot hope to crush either Singapore or even peninsula Malaysia. Mr. Lee, in his television interview, reminded the public that the armed forces of the state of Singapore were but two battalions—one of which is in any case still in Borneo fighting Indonesian infiltration. He did, at the same time, gently remind the Western peoples that the population of his country was as numerous as that of New Zealand. Singapore has no intention of becoming the pawn of President Sukarno, and it is also very doubtful that its able leaders have any inclination to seek new alliances in other quarters.

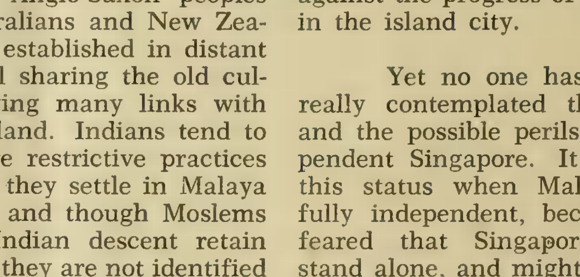
But the real cause of the rupture between Singapore and peninsula Malaya was not confrontation, but the underlying tension between Malays and Chinese which had built up for many years, but which was of no political significance as long as both peoples were equally under British colonial rule. Nineteenth-century laissez faire may have been good for business, but it was bad for future race relations. Malaya needed willing and industrious workers: the Malays were peasant farmers, or their aristocratic masters. The Chinese were glad to come and work at running the village shop, tin mining, rubber planting, distribution, transport, banking, wharf labor and every other urban occupation. Thus was built up a race pattern wherein the Malays retained the land and lived mainly on it, the Chinese built up and inhabited the cities, dominating the economy, while the British reserved to themselves all real political power and the biggest of big business. With the withdrawal of British rule, and once the Communist insurrection had been suppressed, Malays and Chinese were left face to face. Singapore was at first not part of the new Federation of Malaya, lest its overwhelming Chinese population and economic importance should dominate the new state. When it became clear that this separation was inconvenient and possibly dangerous, Malaysia was created with the addition of the Borneo states to balance the Chinese in Singapore. But the tensions were not eliminated by this political carpentry.

The Chinese are not only in Singapore but, up to a 40 per cent minority, in peninsula Malaya also. They are there in great numbers in the cities, such as Kuala Lumpur, the capital; Penang, the main port; Ipoh and Taiping, the tin mining centers. They are politically represented by the Malayan Chinese Association, one of the two partners in the coalition government. But this party mainly represents the rich businessmen, the tin-mining millionaires and the tycoons of commerce. The poorer Chinese, the laborers and the urban petty bourgeois, had little influence in the M.C.A. and were often without the vote, being immigrants, although of long standing. After the formation of Malaysia, the Peoples Action Party of Singapore, Mr. Lee Kuan Yew's party, started to operate in the peninsula states, and although at first it made slight headway, its avowed aim was to create a popular party which would challenge the coalition of Malay aristocracy and Chinese wealth which comprised the federal government. The Chinese, by virtue of their occupations and their derivation from poor immigrants over the past century, are urban, progressive, a relatively classless society; the Malays are conservative, either aristocratic landowners or poor and often illiterate peasants. They have no tradition of, and little aptitude for, business, commerce or industry. Thus social as well as racial tension has undermined the new federation, and bids fair to continue as the chief problem of the peninsula after Singapore has been excluded. This situation was only marginally connected with Indonesian confrontation, and not at all with the problem of communism.

The exclusion of Singapore promises very little for the peninsula part of the Malaysian Federation except, perhaps, a temporary relaxation of political pressures. For Singapore it could mean much more. The aim of the Peoples Action Party, the government, is to create a truly multiracial society in the island. The party includes several prominent non-Chinese: Indians, Ceylonese and others of the numerous small minorities which settled under colonial rule in the prosperous port city. The Chinese are at least 80 per cent of the population, so cannot be challenged by any other group. Strength gives tolerance: it is not true that such communities retain all the characteristics of the nations from which their ancestors came. The Chinese are from many parts of south China, and speak several different dialects. They came from underprivileged families in a neglected, politically unimportant region of the old Chinese empire. They have become prosperous and in many cases very wealthy in their new country. They look upon it as their home, while retaining a pride of race and traditional attachment to the old country. Their attitudes in this respect closely resemble those of Anglo-Saxon peoples such as Australians and New Zealanders, long established in distant lands but still sharing the old culture and having many links with the old homeland. Indians tend to shed the more restrictive practices of caste once they settle in Malaya or Singapore, and though Moslems of Arab or Indian descent retain their religion, they are not identified with the Moslem Malays. Many Chinese, large numbers of south Indians, Eurasians and others are Christian. Malaya, and in particular Singapore, has been a melting pot in which, although the various races have not fused to form a new people, they have rubbed off the sharp edges of their national cultures. It is for these reasons that Singapore has a better chance to evolve a truly equal-status, mul racial community than seems to be possible on the mainland.

Such is the ideal which is f lowed, sometimes with insufficie tact, by Prime Minister Lee Ku Yew. His trouble with the Mala of Kuala Lumpur arose principa from the single-mindedness wi which he proclaimed the doctri that in Malaysia there should only Malaysians—not Malays a others. A man of brilliant gif with an outstanding academic r ord in his own country and later Cambridge, he has the handicap being unable to suffer fools glad —or in silence. Several years ag when still the leader of an unreco nized movement under the colon regime, his mordant criticism a pungent comment on the ruli authorities won him their disli and almost fear. They then used comfort themselves with the beli that Lee Kuan Yew and his su porters were "men of straw": t years later the British in Singapo were very glad to see such so bricks made from this straw, a w which they recognized was the be perhaps the only, sound defen against the progress of communis in the island city.

Yet no one has up to no really contemplated the proble and the possible perils of an in pendent Singapore. It was deni this status when Malaya beca fully independent, because it w feared that Singapore could stand alone, and might succumb Communist influence. Malay seemed to be the answer, and t Peoples Action Party fully accept this solution. It has now been jected by the Malays, so abru ly, and with so little consultati among the other members of British Commonwealth, that it necessary to conclude that this w an act of impulse, a yielding pressure.



The question remains whether, ice the deed is now done, the ngers of an independent Singa- re are as fearful as they seemed be a few years ago. Whether ngapore is viable economically is t uncertain, but it probably is, if unnatural restraint is put upon trade and developing industry. ie political stability of the new ite may seem more in doubt, but e P.A.P. holds a commanding ma- rity of the electorate, has to its edit great achievements in the ld of housing and social welfare r the poor and working class, and s won the respect, if not always e affection, of the business com- unity. But Singapore is more an a great commercial city and rt of call; it is also the strategic y to the eastern seas, a position anifested by the naval base, held ider agreement by the British and so used by Australian forces in e region. In the view of military perts no other base could replace ngapore: if the British cannot use is stronghold, they cannot oper- e effectively in Southeast Asia. either Malaysia nor the Borneo ites could be defended without ngapore. It is also more and more nerally realized that a base in a untry which feels hostility to the reign power which uses the base probably nearly useless. Cyprus owed this fact, and Aden now iderlines it. Is independent Sin- pore going to be tolerant of the itish in the base, or gradually ow hostile to its continuance?

There is no doubt that in Brit- n a large number of people feel at the burden of Eastern commit- ents is too heavy. There was a stinct tendency at the news of ngapore's expulsion from Malay- a to suggest that the time had me to reconsider the whole prob- m and to contemplate withdrawal. any politicians of all parties feel at it will be increasingly difficult justify to their electors the great pense of maintaining British rces in these distant countries hen the people concerned seem at st indifferent to British interests, id frequently opposed to them. It in this context that the remarks ade by Lee Kuan Yew, so sharp in ne toward the United States, must interpreted. Singapore, he said, ould never permit the Americans use the base. If the British went, ien no other power, least of all America, should have it. He added a number of criticisms of American policy and attitudes in east Asia; these may represent his feelings, but they also served to put him on the path of grace in the eyes of many of his Asian neighbors. It may be suggested, though, that this was the sauce: the meat was the threat directed against Britain's disposition to cast off its burden; if you go, we will not let you pass the responsibility, and the base, to America, so you had better understand that you must stay. It is also true that Britain in the base is a very good guarantee of Singapore's safety from Indonesian threats and Malay pressures. So the British were told that their past sins were forgiven, if not forgotten.

The future of the Borneo states, Sarawak and Sabah, remains far from clear. These relatively undeveloped and poor countries were brought into Malaysia both to balance the numbers of the Singapore Chinese, and because it was thought that they were too weak to form a new state of their own. This opinion was not shared by the 30 per cent Chinese minority in Sarawak, who had expected and hoped to become the dominant community in a Sarawak once more independent. They opposed entry into Malaysia from the first, and their left wing has actively cooperated with the Indonesian infiltrators along the frontier. Now that Singapore has been excluded, they ask (and not only the Chinese ask this) why, if Singapore can be expelled from the federation to suit the politics of Kuala Lumpur, they should be told, almost in the same breath, that Sarawak and Sabah can in no circumstances contemplate withdrawing, and that it is "treason," as the Tunku put it, to suggest such a change. To many it seems more logical and quite proper to question the arrangements which governed their accession to the federation, now that its constitution is so radically altered, and at least to state a claim for reconsideration and revision of these provisions. There are also strong doubts that the far-off Borneo states, no longer politically important as a counterweight to Singapore, will receive in the future much care or consideration from the Malay nationalists in Kuala Lumpur, especially if the successor to the present Prime Minister should prove to be a man of narrower outlook.

One possibility which has been mooted is that Brunei, the smallest of the Borneo States but rich in oil, which refused to come into Malaysia, could now become the focus for a new North Borneo Federation. Its oil revenues would underpin the new state and historical tradition supports the idea, for long ago Brunei (from which the word Borneo is derived) was the overlord of all the north coast of the great island. So far, it seems that this suggestion meets with no response from Brunei and is dismissed as subversion by Kuala Lumpur.

Though it is certain that Indonesian confrontation was not the first or even a major cause of the divorce between Singapore and Malaysia, it is far from certain that the result of that change will not be victory for confrontation: it may lead to that fragmentation of the Malaysian Federation which Sukarno so ardently desires. If Borneo becomes so restive that it can be held in the federation only by force, it is not at all plain who is expected to provide this power. The British and the Australians are unlikely to exercise on behalf of the Malays a role which they would not undertake for their own account. If opposition to Kuala Lumpur took the form of Communist insurrection, they might do so, though with widely expanded misgivings; if the opposition were nationalist it would command sympathy and there would be very strong opposition to the use of British and Australian forces to suppress it. Yet unless these forces were so employed there is nothing which the government in Kuala Lumpur could effectively do to intervene. These are the circumstances in which Indonesia could very well score the triumph in Borneo which it can hardly hope for in Malaya or in Singapore.

The Chinese are the one people in Southeast Asia upon whom the creation of an independent state of Singapore may have lasting and profound effects. In the whole region, from Burma to the Philippines, they number about 14 million: a people with a cohesive racial identity, a common culture, a shared way of life, but without a country or a common nationality. Like the Jews in past times, a Chinese in Southeast Asia could always be recognized to be a Chinese, but he was nonetheless a national of the state in which he lived, and very often a second-class citizen in that country. Singapore could change this situation. Here, for the first time, is a Chinese-ruled and inhabited country in Southeast Asia. Small, no doubt, but wealthy, advanced and economically powerful. Its government has no links either with the Communist mainland of China or the Nationalist regime in Taiwan. It could be the nucleus of the "Third China"—and by its very independent existence give a status and security to all Chinese in Southeast Asia which they have hitherto lacked, just as the creation of the state of Israel has raised and secured the position of Jews all over the world. There are dangers as well as advantages in this prospect; in many countries of Southeast Asia the Chinese community is both unpopular and suffers from discriminatory legislation. In some countries these chauvinist policies coul be strengthened by the fear that th local Chinese community was tur ing to Singapore for guidance ar protection. On the other hand, th economic power of Singapore wi make it a state worth respecting ar conciliating. The Tunku's hasty d cision to excise Singapore from M laysia will prove to have injected new and unpredictable element in the already complex mixture Southeast Asian affairs.

Mississippi
SUMMER OF DISCONTENT

Elizabeth Sutherlan

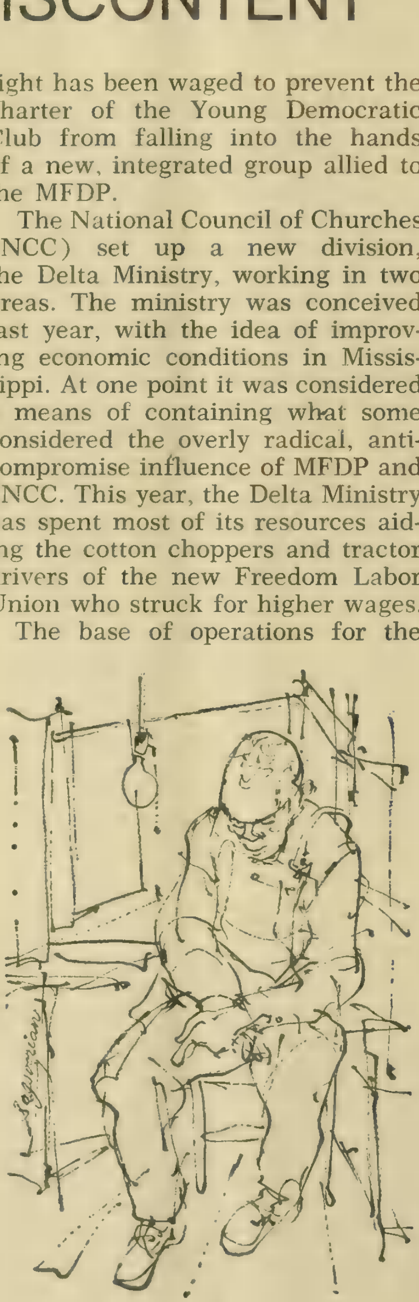
"Mississippi has changed from a reality to an abstraction," said Curtis Hayes, who was McComb Project director last summer. Not that there still isn't plenty of nonabstract hunger and bombs and suffering. But to someone comparing the feel of summer 1964 with the present, this made sense.

Mississippi today seems less a battleground between good and evil, and more a labyrinth where none of the possible paths is a sure way out. It has become fashionable and squabbled-over, almost like Africa in the 19th century. Politicking has nearly outmoded heroism, and the symbol of the Philadelphia martyrs has given way to a huge, curling question mark.

A host of new forces is now operating in the state, with LBJ humming We Shall Overcome in the background. The federal government came into the picture this past summer with a million dollars for Operation Headstart, an anti-poverty program to prepare underprivileged children (mostly Negro) for primary school. At about the same time, the National Democratic Party sought to forestall the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party by helping to set up the Mississippi Democratic Conference with Negro leaders unsympathetic to the MFDP, plus liberal white Mississippians. On the junior level, a successful fight has been waged to prevent the charter of the Young Democratic Club from falling into the hands of a new, integrated group allied to the MFDP.

The National Council of Churches (NCC) set up a new division, the Delta Ministry, working in two areas. The ministry was conceived last year, with the idea of improving economic conditions in Mississippi. At one point it was considered a means of containing what some considered the overly radical, anti-compromise influence of MFDP and SNCC. This year, the Delta Ministry has spent most of its resources aiding the cotton choppers and tractor drivers of the new Freedom Labor Union who struck for higher wages.

The base of operations for the Delta Ministry was the Mt. Beul Conference Center, located in th small town of Edwards about miles from Jackson. The Mt. Beul campus has been the focus of a tivity for a surprising variety organizations. It has served as hea quarters for Operation Headsta and has also been host to meetin of the MFDP, whose Congression challenge the NCC has supporte At one point, Washington order Headstart moved to an area le contaminated by the civil righ movement; Headstart's staff threa ened to resign en masse, and t program stayed at Mt. Beulah.



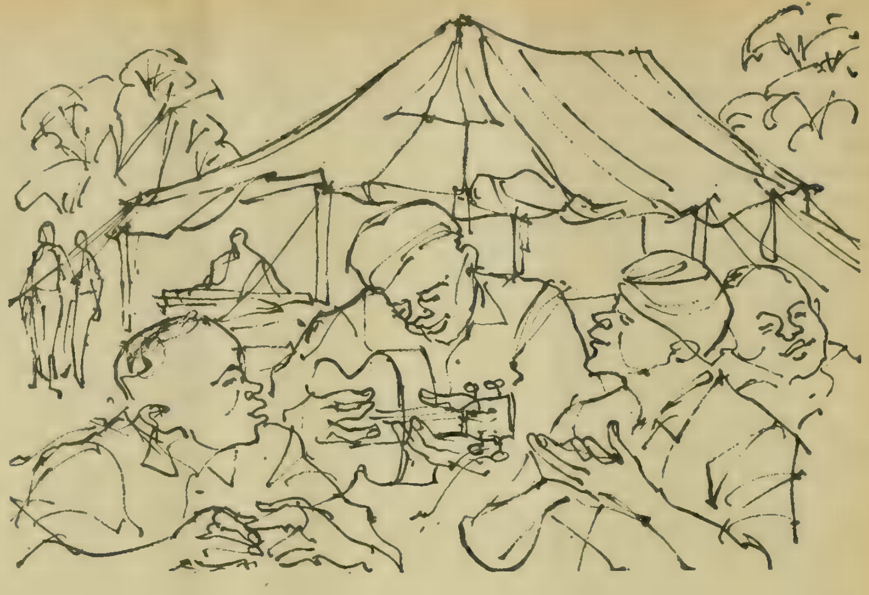
Meanwhile, white Mississip changed some but not all of its b habits. Outside the front entran to the Panola County Clinic, in t northern part of the state, a sta of discarded signs lies on the por floor. They say "White Entranc and "Colored Entrance," and it w good to see them gathering dust the sunlight. In Jackson, an int racial couple told of shopping in white supermarket without hara ment or hostile stares; whites ev chatted with them in a casu friendly way. But that same we a white Jackson minister was sh for the mildest of civil rights tivity. In Gulfport, on the tour coast, a Negro assigned to test r taurants complained of so mu compliance that he had had to seventeen full dinners in one d but another Negro was refus service and almost beaten up wh he ordered a hamburger. Amo "responsible" whites, the preval attitude seemed to be that expres in a sign at a drive-in; it had re

---

Elizabeth Sutherland, editor of Letters from Mississippi (McGraw-Hill) traveled recently in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama and Tennessee. She directs the office of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in New York.

RIVATELY OWNED BUSINESS — WE ESERVE THE RIGHT TO REFUSE ERVICE TO ANYONE but was bitter- ' scrawled over to say ONCE WAS A RIVATELY OWNED BUSINESS—WE AVE NO RIGHT TO REFUSE SERVICE ANYONE.

Up in Cleveland, Miss., the Holi- ay Inn motel gave a room without estion to two women, one of them egro, when they arrived at night. t breakfast, however, the manager me to their table before they had rdered and demanded immediate ayment for a long-distance call mpleted only five minutes earlier. uestioned, he explained that the rocedure was normal "for particu- r people"—but said he did not ean Negroes, he meant "single omen." When the women refused pay at once, he moved to call the lice. His anguished Southern soul ad compelled him to indulge in arassment—but with a sharp eye what was now legal.



Thus Mississippi finds itself ripped by the confusion and ten- on of new forces at work. Daily fe is not improved; the "new outh" is still almost invisible. In e counties where there are federal gistrars (nine out of eighty-two) ter registration has generally gone ell, but how much will that ange? As with school integration, e burden is on the Negro to go gister—and risk his child's neck his own. Civil rights workers feel ustrated. The extreme danger hich often bound them together 1964 is lacking now; security stems have dissolved. At the same me, a number of local Negroes ave died under sinister circum- ances, but the Justice Department ys it can do nothing "unless it's civil rights case." In this atmos- here of fragmented reality, the ovement searches for a grip on e future.

Beginning last March, cotton oppers went on strike in a suc- ssion of delta areas, seeking $1.25 hour instead of the standard $3 r a 10-to-12-hour day. Tractor ivers demanded raises from $5 $12 per day. The decision to strike as sometimes taken at a meeting ut rarely, if ever, by formal vote); metimes a group would simply t show up for work and others ould then join them. Strikes have iled because adequate measures ere not taken to supply the partici- nts' needs. But the idea spread quickly from the delta to McComb, where Holiday Inn maids making 39c an hour walked out (to be replaced by others at the same wage), and to other states. The birth of the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union caught the imagination of Americans everywhere who had always felt that the vote was no cure-all.

There are two versions of how it all started. A representative of the Delta Ministry in Greenville has stated that the strikes originated in the small settlement of Tribbett when he went there with gifts to distribute last Christmas and found the people had not been reached by civil rights workers. They began to talk and out of this came the decision of several tractor drivers to strike. But according to George Shelton, state president of the MFLU, the strike began on the Seligmann plantation near the small, depressed town of Shaw. A Freedom School class had finished reading Howard Fast's Freedom Road and began to talk about what could be done to improve their living conditions. A number of cotton choppers then struck.

At one point, 1,000 to 3,000 persons were not working. Today in Tribbett, five large tents with wooden floors stand in a field behind a little store; these are to house the eight families thrown off their land who form the hard core of strikers there. A sign nearby proclaims STRIKE CITY—LOCAL NO. 4, MFLU. No one seems to know why this is No. 4, or where are 1, 2 and 3, but the encampment has clearly been readied for a long siege. A total of 300 workers intend to stay on strike through the winter and an all-out effort is planned for the spring.

The grim truth is that by 1966 many choppers will probably have been made obsolete by chemical spraying, and many pickers by machines. "The whole delta would strike tomorrow," said a SNCC worker in Shaw, "if they knew there would be something to eat. But they don't."

Although small increases have been granted in some areas, the MFLU demand for $1.25 an hour instead of $3 a day is hopeless if human hands are no longer needed. For this reason, some people in the movement believe that the issue is not wages but land ownership. Curtis Hayes, a former SNCC staffer, is investigating the possibility of buying a large chunk of plantation land with the aid of a government grant and setting up a communal operation based on an Israeli model. Sharecroppers thrown off their land for striking would be given a tract for agricultural or small business use. Hayes talks about raising half a million dollars privately, to be matched by a government grant.

This kind of thinking may surprise people who have known SNCC, the pioneer organization in Mississippi, as distrustful of the federal government and suspicious of money which may have strings attached. But they overlook SNCC's diversity of viewpoint and the experimental spirit of many SNCC workers.

The fact is that white Mississippi has been driving the Negro out of the state. This has been going on for years, but now the pace seems to have accelerated. The radio carries a stream of announcements about domestic jobs in the North. On the plantations, machines are pushing Negroes off the land.

Last month, a more subtle way of forcing emigration emerged when school integration began. In Tallahatchie County, and a number of others, a Negro child who did not have at least one parent living in the state could not transfer to the formerly all-white public school this fall without paying "tuition" which ran as high as $263. This cuts out the hundreds, if not thousands, of children whose parents have moved to the North for better jobs, leaving their young with relatives. The relatives pay taxes, but no matter. A child can be adopted, but when the relative goes to take out papers he finds that the fee runs around $100. The only choice left is to send the child to his parents or have him continue at the Negro public school. But here comes the final twist: if the child is not living with a parent or legal guardian, he must now pay tuition to attend the Negro school! Such fees run from $100 to $275 in Amite County, a rural area where good jobs are hard to find and adults often leave for work elsewhere. They may send money to support their children, but they cannot afford such tuition fees. Thus the white authorities penalize the Negro child and drive Negroes from the state. The more who leave, the less trouble for the whites—and a lot can leave before the supply of maids and janitors runs out.

The Negro's economic situation is desperate; new jobs must be created, sustenance provided. And so the black Mississippians talk more about getting jobs with Operation Headstart than about voting. All across the state, people grasp for ways to create work that pays and ways to get more for their work. A new okra cooperative in Batesville (the only legal co-ops in Mississippi are agricultural) aims to cut out the white middleman; a new sewing firm has sprung up in Canton, another in Indianola. This is not an entirely new development; Ruleville has had a quilting group for several years. But the proliferation is new as is the Poor People's Corporation which aims to help establish such enterprises.

Jesse Morris, a SNCC staffer, set up the corporation last spring. It conducted a training program during the summer at Mt. Beulah where, because of limited funds (raised privately), training was restricted to three skills. On August 29, the corporation held its first meeting. Members came together to consider requests for grants from representatives of the okra cooperative, the Canton sewing firm, the three new firms which will make leather and suede handbags, belts, pouches, as a result of summer training. Softly and sometimes inarticulately, spokesmen talked of their enterprises and asked for grants of $400, $1,000—nothing very large. They passed around sample goods while members of the audience asked detailed questions about production and marketing. It was easy to invoke nightmare visions of bad management and laughable bookkeeping, but people were going to learn by doing, and that was something the white boss had never encouraged.

Another new project, also with its base at Mt. Beulah, is the Freedom Now Brick Company, conceived by SNCC worker Frank Smith. The purpose of the company is to provide housing for Negroes kicked off the land. The company's function is to be three-pronged: a foundation will be set up to extend the necessary funds, a factory is to provide the materials, and a contracting service will supply the technology. Funds are to be raised privately, with hopes for a supplemental loan from the Small Business Administration. The company's board of directors is thus far drawn from the co-ops and new businesses of the Poor People's Corporation. It plans to sell 15,000 shares of preferred stock at $10 a share and 5,000 shares of voting stock at $1 a share.

When he went to open a bank account for the brick company's development fund, Frank Smith was asked by the teller: "Are you the president of the company?" Smith had been an outspoken foe of "leadership" and excessive structure within SNCC, but this time he simply said "yes." The game had changed; you can't fight bankdom if you're going to start a company.

Perhaps none of these enterprises will get off the ground. And even if they do, the dent in Mississippi's poverty will be slight. They may however, compel other, richer an more powerful agencies to tak steps. The Delta Ministry has already announced the formation o the Delta Opportunity Corporation which would seek federal assistanc on economic development, jobs an housing for ten counties. The Delt contains Mississippi's richest lan and its poorest people; one suspects that the problem can trul be solved only by massive federa action.

Meanwhile, some of the civi rights people have recognized th need to attack economic problem and to utilize federal money wher possible. SNCC workers, for example, can help get government grant to those who need them most b providing the necessary information and contacts. It may not quit be possible "to radicalize the OE (Office of Economic Opportunity)," as an MFDP worker in Jackso put it, but it isn't necessary to assume that the movement will b bought off if federal money is used In any case, the movement can' compete with $1 million. A Freedom School can't compete with Headstart School. In the past, to many civil rights workers — pa ticularly middle-class Northerner both Negro and white — hav sought to impose their justifie alienation from American materialism upon Southern Negroe who just don't know what they ar talking about. To a sharecropper' wife with eleven hungry kids, a pai of shoes is freedom—unless she i a Fannie Lou Hamer, with a love o freedom so deep that it will abid with her through both trials an satisfactions of the flesh.

Most of the economic developments mentioned here, pa ticularly the Mississippi Freedo Labor Union, would not have com about without the 1964 Summe Project and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party. Both catalyzed the strength and desire o black men to speak out, to d something about their deprivatio

The MFDP does not yet have unified state program of action o local issues. It has concentrated i attention this year on the Congre sional challenge to unseat the fi Mississippians. To many Negroe it is therefore a structure of leade and little more: the complexities o political struggle in Washington a ote, baffling. When there has n political action on a local is-it has sometimes been taken the name of the MFDP, some-es not. People set up voting gues or "improvement associas" without including the Free-n Party in their names. Some nties have frequent MFDP meets, others do not. This looseness structure and decentralized proming were probably inevitable;

s hard to imagine the party exist-otherwise. Some day this may e to change — for example, en the MFDP runs candidates state office in 1966, as it now ns to do. The Challenge has been missed by a vote of 228 to 152, not without shaking up Con-ss and white Mississippi. MFDP ls that was only the beginning.
he MFDP has been unable to the vacuum created by the dee of the Council of Federated anizations last winter. In the nmer of 1964, there were thirty-COFO projects around the te, serviced by SNCC or CORE sonnel and funds, plus 650 vol-teers who had usually gone ough a week of well-planned entation. In the summer of 1965, CC agreed to recruit volunteers the basis of needs to be speciby the MFDP county commits. Most of the volunteers were posed to bring with them spe-ic skills, not just their white ies, and the MFDP was to orient
m. It didn't work. This past sum-r's crop — about 200 — was reited at the last minute amid at confusion. Few of them had the skills specified and no one seemed to know where they should be assigned to work. Orientation was cut short by the emergency in Jackson: the new workers went there to join the mass demonstrations and were thus oriented in jail. The volunteers seemed to me often of a poorer quality than last year's; less inspired, more frustrated. In fairness to the MFDP, it should be said that SCOPE's summer workers in Alabama — recruited by the Southern Leadership Conference — seemed no better off. Their orientation had been orderly but abstract; they learned some Negro history, little about what to do when beaten or jailed. In any case, the time for massive numbers of white volunteers has passed.

Also gone from Mississippi this year is Robert Parris Moses, director of the 1964 project. Having dropped his last name in an effort to break the hero worship and leadership role he had acquired, Parris worked this year on a new approach to Mississippi's problems [see "The Question of SNCC," The Nation, July 19]. He acknowledges the importance to the Negro of material well-being, and the effect this can have on his political behavior. He believes that if the grass-roots movement is to retain its vitality and keep on pushing for change to benefit not merely the teacher but also the sharecropper, that movement must gain strength by hooking up with other protest groups around the country. These include elements of the peace movement, the student movement, the civil rights movement and community organizations such as the Students for a Democratic Society project in Newark. An attempt at bringing them together was the Assembly of Unrepresented People in Washington, August 6-9, which held workshops and declared peace in Vietnam. George Shelton, president of the MFLU, was there from Shaw, as were the two young men from McComb who created a furor with their flier urging Negroes not to serve in Vietnam. "We talked to a lot of people in McComb about the idea before we put out the flier," said one of them, "and they liked it. So we did it."

Across Mississippi and outside it, people grope for answers. Ask a SNCC worker where the movement should go and he will usually say, "I don't know." Ask an LCDC lawyer about the dynamics of change and he will see no solution within our system as we know it. Ask a sharecropper like Mrs. Miller, in her delta shack. Mrs. Miller decided to send all seven of her school-age children to the white school in town this fall. Her home was shot into shortly after she registered them. Their going to school means the loss of seven cotton pickers, and that much less food. The planter has already indicated his displeasure, and she and her family will probably be thrown off the land. Mrs. Miller knows every corner of her trap. She should be brought to Washington, to testify about economic oppression, in the same way that Negroes have come before to tell of political oppression. If the government listened and acted, it would break the plantation system. But it won't. So Mrs. Miller doesn't know the answer either.

Meanwhile, Negroes from Mississippi continue to go north in search of some small improvement. They go to Watts, and Watts will be repeated. Northern liberals may be appalled to learn that Los Angeles gave a certain satisfaction to the nonviolent Negro of Mississippi. He regretted the toll of black lives; he sympathized with the spirit of insurrection. He too has been on the verge of armed "riot"—in Greenwood last year, in Natchez this year when an NAACP worker's car was booby-trapped. For today he feels, simultaneously, the hope of change and the depth of racism in this country.

Ferment in the Churches

The New Christian Soldiers . . . . . . Harvey Co

There is a good deal of talk in church circles today about a new division in Christendom. This may sound strange to those who believe the churches are still riding the magnificent wave of ecumenical euphoria activated in part by the Vatican Council. But open discussion about a fast-approaching period of disruption and dissension is growing among both Catholics and Protestants. Archbishop Andre Pallier of Rouen recently conceded publicly that he foresees a schism in Roman Catholicism, led by the ultraconservatives, if the Vatican Council accepts the controversial sections on "Religious Liberty" and "The Modern World" now before it. There are other strains in the Catholic Church and in Protestantism that no one is yet talking about publicly. A prominent Protestant church leader told me recently that at the rate the altercation between the young turks and the old guard is now developing, we can look for a major split in Protestantism within five to ten years.

Let me make clear at the outset that the split people are discussing now is not one between Catholics and Protestants, where it once cut most deeply. Nor does anyone expect the main Protestant sects to diverge further from one another. Many so-called "church unity" proposals will probably develop and come to fruition in the next ten years. The schism now being talked about runs straight through churches and denominations. When it comes, so the predictions run, it will find Catholics and Protestants, clergy and laity, high and low churchmen, on both sides.

Nor will the issue in this split be explicitly theological. It is mainly one of praxis or church strategy, with very important theological overtones. It is the question of how the churches should respond to the revolutions of color, opportunity and power now sweeping the world, both at home and abroad.

This, and not the Virgin Birth, the infallibility of the Pope or the Bible is what Christians argue about most heatedly today. On the one hand, there are those in all churches who want the church to play its customary social role as the guardian of the values and institutions of the past. They usually couch their attitude in terms which suggest that the church should "stay out of politics." On the other hand, there is that growing group of laity and clergy, mostly young, which insists that the church should play a direct role in social change. The nub of the question is the secular significance of the church. Jesuit Thomas Clarke was probably right when he wrote in America, his order's weekly periodical, that the future image of Vatican II probably will not be either collegiality or even ecumenism but "Christian secularity." It is the coming theological mode of the era: Christians plunging into the social order to struggle for justice and peace. But it is not a mood which everyone accepts with enthusiasm. Protestant theologian Martin Marty writes in a Methodist publication:

> There is a hushed-up revolution abroad in our land. One side of the revolution says that the Christian church should be involved in the struggle of today's poor in city and on farm; at the side of the delinquent, the racially oppressed, the politically exploited. The other si > says the church should love the > people but should not become i > volved in the politics of their pro
> lems.

Tensions set in motion this hushed-up revolution are reaching. They simmer just be the surface at the national m ings of denominations, chu agencies and church organizatic
They erupt in city councils churches. They distress the vest and deacon boards of local cong gations. It is not that these dif ences have not always been the they have. But recently, the you turks within the churches have an increasing strength. The c rights movement helped. In ma instances it brought together p ple who had felt the same on number of issues, but because th served churches in different cit never had a chance to get to kn one another. Just as the Gre slaves in Rome were forbidden wear a distinctive garb—lest th recognize their number and rev
— this group has been kept aware of its potential power by sociology of church division. Th came the March on Washingt and the ecumenical convergence Selma. "When I got to Brow Chapel," confessed one young Me odist minister, "I was shocked see how many of us there were the church." In short, the "Ch tian underground" has surfaced.
rather amorphous, generally you mostly Northern and urban gro of clergy and laity has come o
the scene and is now learning strength. And the church will ne be the same again.

It is important to realize that present controversy is not just old "social Gospel" fight wearing new hat. There are differences tween the current crop of socia militant churchmen and the ea 19th-century followers of Wal Rauschenbusch. The socially act churchmen of today, for examp lack the confidence of their fo bears that one more big push bring in the Kingdom. They te less to identify particular idealis schemes, such as socialism or pa fism, with the Gospel. They see

Harvey Cox, associate professor of church and society at Harvard, is the author of The Secular City (Macmillan).

urch and its members more as pporters and strengtheners of a ovement already under way than a vanguard. The passion and dication are similar, and there can no doubt that in the new genera-n of Christian activists the spirit
the social Gospel is with us again.
t unlike the social Gospel move-ent, the secular Christians of toy work from a broader interdeminational base, have a higher gree of theological sophistication, d are determined not to disap-ar until their militancy has rked some major alterations in e life of the American churches.
Under the leadership of the new litants, the churches have begun play an unprecedented role in me aspects of American society, role once played by labor unions.
ul Alinsky, the controversial head
the Industrial Areas Foundation, id in two recent interviews: "The ions are now the haves—they're rt of the status quo. The Chris-n churches are now taking the dership in social change." The w mood in the churches has de-loped rather quickly. A telling in-x of the shift can be seen in the dical metamorphosis the public age of the American clergyman
s undergone in the past few years.
decade ago, the clergyman was en depicted in cartoons and ries as a pompous bore, a disreeable zealot or a genial incom-tent. These images still persist in me places. But the average man now just as likely to think of ns, priests and ministers leading otest marches or standing on ket lines. The new image may wilder or even infuriate him, but is undeniable that the popular w of the clergy has undergone eeping revision. The changing blic stereotype has also affected e minister's own self-image. It s marked off the new breed from e old. Among the clergy, the ar demarcation is between those o have participated in direct ac-n and those who haven't. It signates the frontier along which y new division is apt to erupt.

The debate within the church out how deeply it should be inlved in the secular order has rred up things in every area of urch life. The most crucial issue, wever, and the one which will ve most significance for the fure of the churches themselves,
s to do with the nature of churchly authority. It may or may not have been important for the racial scene in Los Angeles that some Roman Catholics wanted to get involved in civil rights. It is highly important, however, that Father William DuBay—frustrated by the caution and inaction of his superiors—finally resorted to writing the Pope and urging him to remove Cardinal McIntyre from his office as archbishop because of "malfeasance." Cardinal McIntyre was not removed, but neither was Father DuBay. He was not even publicly reprimanded; his punishment was to be exiled to a posh parish far from the Negroes and impoverished whites with whom he had been identified. It is hard to imagine any priest getting off so lightly ten years ago. One cannot help wondering if even Cardinal McIntyre has not had second thoughts on how far the Church should go to resolve the racial mess in his diocese.

The same sort of thing happens again and again. When the Roman Catholic bishop of Birmingham and Mobile, Thomas J. Toolen, told the nuns and priests who were marching in Selma to go home and tend to "God's business," they not only refused to go but 300 of them signed a press statement spelling out their disagreement with the archbishop and stating that they would return to Selma, or to other racial crisis spots, whenever Martin Luther King asked them to.

Here is a situation almost without precedent in the history of the Church. Some 300 Roman Catholic clergy refuse to obey a bishop's request and, at the same time, pledge obedience to a Baptist minister who ironically bears the name of the main leader of the Protestant Reformation. (King became a de facto Catholic bishop in Selma.) Yet not one of these 300 was defrocked.

The role of the Catholic Church in the racial revolution in America has precipitated something like a crisis of authority in the Church itself. The Pope has publicly criticized the declining respect for authority, and Paul Emile Cardinal Leger of Montreal, who is known at the Vatican Council as a "progressive," recently deplored a "growing climate of opinion hostile to the whole idea of authority, much less its exercise." But the diagnosis is not quite accurate; the Catholic clergy at Selma had not rejected the idea of authority. They had chosen, in this instance, to submit to another authority, realizing it could mean danger or even death. They had chosen to obey Dr. King rather than Archbishop Toolen.

The authority problem in the Roman Catholic Church is in no sense confined to the clergy. Readers of the Catholic press have become aware in recent months of an increasingly strident and insistent criticism by laymen of Church policies and personages. The vexed issue of contraception is now open game for disputation, and such Catholic writers as Michael Novak take open and sweeping exception to the Church's teaching on the subject. Lay student groups have picketed chancellory offices on racial issues. A year ago, Dennis Clark published a withering attack on Archbishop Kroll of Philadelphia and the failure of that city's Catholic leaders to face up to its racial crisis. But the present bête noire of this critical crackling in the Church is a young California convert to Catholicism, Edward Keating. He is editor of the magazine, Ramparts, easily the most controversial publication within American Catholicism today. Keating, whose technicolor covers and vivid reportage attract numerous non-Catholic readers, even from the newsstand trade, has ruthlessly attacked such Catholic cultural heroes as Dr. Thomas Dooley ("Hang Down Your Head, Tom Dooley") and Pius XII (in a spirited defense of Hochhuth's The Deputy). He cheerfully acknowledges that ". . . if McGucken (Joseph T., archbishop of San Francisco) could figure out a way to do it, he'd shut us down tomorrow." Keating's recent book, The Scandal of Silence, has outraged Catholics from coast to coast. More considerate critics, such as the editors of Commonweal, view Keating and Ramparts in much the same way as Roy Wilkins must often view the shenanigans of SNCC. Yet Keating certainly dramatizes the new vigor and openness not previously thought possible in American Catholicism. And his main battle is pointed at precisely the decisive point, the freedom of laymen to participate vigorously and with minds of their own in the secular realm. "The continued supremacy of the hierarchy and priesthood over the laity in temporal affairs," says Keating, "is the most serious obstacle to the fulfillment of the Church's mission in the United States." Once again, the sore point of tension clearly emerges; it is the collision between Christian secularity and traditional notions of churchly obedience.

The United States is not the only country in which the Roman Catholic Church is wracked by problems of authority growing out of clerical participation in political action. The talk of Colombia today is a young Roman Catholic priest, Father Camilio Torres, who recently defied his bishop, the Most Rev. Angel Maria Ocampo Burrio, Archbishop of Tunja, by openly supporting a revolutionary solution to Colombia's bewildering social problems. When Father Torres' ideas were attacked by his superiors, he asked to be relieved of his priestly duties if he could not be a priest and a revolutionary too. He was joined in his request by a fellow priest, Father Martin Amaya Martinez, who said in a newspaper interview, "I believe the Colombian Church should rout the misery of hunger and superstitious ignorance of our people. . . . In fact," he added, "since the Emperor Constantine, the Church has become more of a business corporation than a messenger of Our Lord Jesus Christ." When questioned directly about his attitude toward ecclesiastical authority, Father Torres replied that he would always obey his cardinal "except when it runs contrary to the ideas of Christianity and my conscience." It requires only a modicum of historical imagination to detect in Father Torres' reply a distinct similarity to the words of a rebellious priest in a Council at Worms some 400 years ago, who told his superiors, "Here I stand, God helping me, I can do no other."

But conditions differ significantly from the 1500s. It is noteworthy that the schism Archbishop Pallier of Rouen expects, if the Vatican Council moves too far on religious liberty or on the relation of the Church to the modern world, is appearing on the Right, not on the Left. The Vatican itself, under John XXIII, and to a lesser extent under Paul VI, is often viewed by the young turks in the Church as their ally. This re-creates a climate reminiscent of certain moments in the 17th and 18th centuries when the Jesuit order, with its loyalty centered in Rome, was able to take radical positions in some countries, frequently opposing the local diocesan clergy. It is why a Father DuBay in Los Angeles appeals to the Pope to remove his archbishop and an Edward Keating can suggest, apparently in all seriousness, that the whole Los Angeles archdiocese may be out of communion with Rome and therefore not be a truly Roman Catholic Church at all.

Archbishop Pallier's opinion is also confirmed by the fact that a considerable conservative Catholic backlash is already gathering steam. The backlashers have found their hero so far in the rather unlikely figure of a mild-mannered professor of Canon Law at tiny Mt. St. Mary's Seminary in Emmitsburg, Md. His name is Gommar Albert DePauw, and he leads something called the Catholic Traditionalist Movement. Presumably this group was organized mainly to oppose liturgical reforms in the Catholic Church and to fight what its members call the "Protestantizing" of their Church. But the movement doubtless represents a growing apprehensiveness among conservative Catholics about the number of trends at work in the Church, which to them must appear quite ominous. Recently, its representatives picketed at the National Catholic Liturgical Conference in Baltimore, carrying signs which extolled Father DePauw and denounced the "novelties" now being introduced into the worship life of the Church (vernacular masses, congregational participation in the liturgy, etc.).

Another rallying point for the Catholic conservatives is William Buckley's weekly journal, the National Review. Buckley, a Catholic layman, has been nervous about the way things have been going in his Church ever since Pope John assumed the throne of Peter, but his unease has been multiplying in recent months. A few weeks ago, he announced the publication of a thick booklet entitled "What in the Name of God Is Going on in the Catholic Church?" with contributions by Evelyn Waugh, Frederick D. Wilhelmsen and others. The title of the brochure gives eloquent voice to the anxiety felt these days not only by conservative Catholics but also by non-Catholics who have relied on Rome and its minions always to provide a dependable ally for the status quo.

Despite all the talk, however, the possibility of a significant schism within Catholicism is a minor one. Though potent here and there, t real reactionaries in the Catho Church add up to a tiny band the world scene. The progressiv on the other hand, are now doi well. If they cannot get conser tive cardinals sacked, at least th keep themselves from getting communicated. Here and there Catholic interracial councils, e menical action groups and a vari of lay apostolates, they keep pu ing, and the general climate of t Catholic Church is, if not wil responsive, at least not inquisiti al. Besides, the uncanny flexibil of the Roman Church, its alm unerring capacity to make room diversity and inner tension, w probably pull it through the comi crisis relatively united.

But does talk of new divisi carry a greater threat for Prot tants? Whatever happens to Pr estantism will happen to a religio community that is already ba fragmented. Though "Protestan are usually mentioned along w Catholics, Jews and agnostics as o of the four socio-religious groups America, the classification is m leading. Despite much talk a some action about church union recent years, and considerable terchurch cooperation, Protestan are still wastefully and catastro ically divided into more than 2 denominations and sects. Futh more, there has been a histori tendency among them to separ if the situation seems to warrant rather than to preserve unity at price of burning conviction.

Where then do the strains pear in Protestantism? Protesta in America have not often be troubled by excessive clerical c trol over their activities in the se lar realm. The battle therefore is no sense a battle for the freed of laymen and activist clergy agai a dominating hierarchy. But Protestantism, it has freque happened that activist minist must contend with the socially c servative laymen who sit on boards and committees that r the churches. This is a particula interesting phenomenon in view the vocal demands among Cath laymen today for a wider respo bility in the governance of th Church. Protestantism in Ameri at least in its main-line denomi tions, is far from being complet lay controlled, but it is often wh lay control is most powerful t the opposition to social action has been most vociferous. Studies have shown that ministers who do not serve a local parish, and hence are somewhat more insulated from direct lay control, are much more likely to demonstrate and become involved in direct action than pastors of local churches. Of the hundreds of clergymen who flew to Selma, a disproportionate number were denominational and interdenominational staff people, college and university chaplains, and ministers of mission churches not directly dependent on a congregation for their financial support. It is worth noting that not one of the three Protestant ministers who have lost their lives in the civil rights struggle in the past two years was a parish minister. Bruce Klunder, who was killed by the bulldozer in Cleveland, was on the staff of the Student Christian Union. James Reeb was working for the American Friends Service Committee in Boston when he went to Selma. Jonathan Daniels was a theology student.

Still, in the South and also in metropolitan areas, it is the parish minister who may soon find himself on the firing line whether he chooses to be or not. The denominational executive can fly to Selma or Hattiesburg for a couple of weeks and then return to his office. The minister in a city parish lives every day with the tensions of race and social change swirling around him and forcing him to make costly decisions. Although the suburban minister has not had to face this kind of pressure as steadily, he soon will. As Negroes move to the suburbs, as fair-housing committees accelerate their activities, as groups try to modify zoning laws to bring lower-income housing to the suburbs, the minister will find himself just as inescapably involved as are his inner-city colleagues. The next decade may see scores of ministers from Northern suburban churches join the hundreds of Southern ministers who have been forced from their pulpits by congregations angered by their attitudes toward race and the social involvement of Christians.

The crisis in city and suburb, North and South, usually emerges over an issue which may at first seem minor. It usually has more to do with what the minister does than with what he says in his sermons. Even deep South congregations have been known to accept large doses of "brotherhood" talk in sermons. The flame point comes, however, when a group asks for permission to use the church building, or the minister participates in a community organization of which his congregation does not approve. The issue of use of the building varies between North and South. In Dixie, some ministers were ousted by angry congregations when they opposed using church buildings as private schools to evade the Supreme Court decision. In the North, ministers reap the wrath of conservative laymen when they permit the church building to be used by groups the deacons consider radical or disruptive. In the South, a parish minister may court forced retirement by agreeing to serve on a community relations council or a biracial committee. In the North, the same thing happens when he joins a group protesting de facto segregation, or supports the picketing of a discriminatory business.

In almost all instances, ministers who can avoid retaliation by boards controlled by laymen are the ones willing to take larger risks. Ministers of mission churches are the clearest example. Such churches are frequently located in slum areas and usually receive only a small part of their income from the local congregation. The rest comes from city, state or national mission boards. The minister of a small missions congregation can therefore move with much less hesitation into controversial community and national issues.

Not only do supra-local agencies support staff involvement in controversy but they often initiate things a local church would not usually undertake. A prime example is the Mississippi Delta Ministry sponsored by the National Council of Churches. Begun in the "Freedom Summer" of 1964, as an effort to help train and orient volunteers, the program was continued at the end of the summer and is now one of the most decisive forces at work in Mississippi. In cooperation with Mary Holmes Junior College, the Delta Ministry received a $1,460,748 Office of Economic Opportunity grant to run a Mississippi Headstart program last summer. Besides the summer people, the Delta Ministry now has a permanent staff of more than a dozen seasoned veterans of clerical activity in civil rights. It works in projects all over the state, using an abandoned college campus at Mt. Beulah in Edwards as its headquarters. When the cotton choppers in Leland went on strike late last spring, The New York Times rightly singled out Rev. Laurence Walker of the Delta Ministry staff as a key figure in the astounding walk-out by one of the most exploited groups of workers in America.

The Delta Ministry is a dangerous and ground-breaking mission of direct participation in social change. It proceeds, however, only in the teeth of the bitter and determined opposition of many of the white church leaders and probably the majority of their churchgoing laymen in Mississippi. Efforts have been made by Mississippi ecclesiastics to persuade the National Council to call off the Delta Ministry, to force the Delta staff to confine their efforts to relief work and literacy, or to turn the whole program over to Mississippi churches. To date all these attempts have been resisted. The Delta Ministry stands as a particularly dramatic symbol of supra-parochial and ecumenical "presence," persisting despite determined local opposition. The fact is that mission agencies not only tolerate controversial activities by their staff but even encourage them, while the average local lay board opposes such involvement. But this still leaves two important unanswered questions. The first is why national boards and agencies, and in some places city mission societies, often lean toward the side of secular involvement, while local congregations are more hesitant. The second is what effect this growing militancy and activism at national levels will have on a possible split within Protestantism over the direct involvement issue.

The reason why the agencies are often sympathetic is apparent. A growing number of people on their staffs have come from a formative experience in an inner-city slum church. For ten years following World War II some of the most capable and militant young ministers avoided suburban congregations and went into the Harlems and West Chicagos of America. There they quickly saw the futility of a strictly "spiritual" ministry and also learned how to deal with institutional politics and structural problems. Many had their baptism of fire in racial issues and tough city politics.

During the past ten years these men have moved into the hierarchies of the Protestant churches and agencies with an unusually strong determination to lead the church into the political struggle and to engage it on a larger scale with the issues they once faced locally. By now the period of apprenticeship for these secular actionists, who are no longer really "young" turks, is over. They are assuming the reins of power all over the church. Robert Spike, who leads the National Council of Churches Race and Religion Department, got his start in the slums of lower Manhattan. George Todd, director of the Presbyterian Church's urban work; Don Benedict, who leads the Chicago City Mission Society; and Archie Hargreaves, who recently left the United Church's urban mission division, all began their careers in East Harlem. Suffragan Bishop Paul Moore of the Washington Episcopal Diocese and Kilmer Myers, Suffragan Bishop of Michigan, both began in the tenements of Manhattan's Lower West Side. Jitsuo Morikawa, the Baptists' main agency pioneer, served a church in the racially tense Hyde Park-Kenwood section of South Chicago.

There are dozens more of the New Breed of Protestant church leaders. They are still a minority but no longer a battered one. Their influence will probably continue to expand, and since they are all inside the structures of the church, this diminishes the possibility of the rupture some predict. Why pull out of the church when there is some chance of taking it over? Thus, increasingly, goes the logic of the New Breed.

But this still does not preclude the possibility of a schism. Since there was a rather wide, if somewhat grudging, consensus in the churches on the moral aspects of the civil rights movement, the insurgents found themselves fighting on an ideal battlefield. But wha will happen when the focus shifts as has already happened to some extent, from race as a narrow issue to injustice and the need for decisive social change in the North and all over the world? It is becoming clear that while the churches action in Selma drew kudos from many laymen, similar involvement in Syracuse elicits sharp criticism Church leaders who try to swing into action in Saigon and Santo Domingo find the going much rougher than it was in the March on Washington. As more G.I.s are killed in the rice paddies of South Vietnam it will become harder for church leaders to support even verbal criticism of our policy, to say nothing of direct action protests.

Will the question of Christian secularity force a new division in the churches? For Catholics the answer, I think, is a clear no. For Protestants the answer depends on a number of imponderables. Wil the militant young turks grow flabby and complacent? Positions in church hierarchies have been known to cool the fire of zealots Will the New Breed cause the churches themselves to assume a new and creative role in our society? Will everyone settle for a kind of ecclesiastical two-party system with spiritual Christians and secular Christians ruling in uneasy coalition? Nothing is resolved, bu whatever happens, American church history will be well worth watching in the next few years.

The Politics of Pollution . . . .

Gladwin Hil

Los Angeles

"The books," the old-timer from Capitol Hill remarked, "say that water is two parts hydrogen and one part oxygen. Actually, it's one part economics and one part politics. . . ."

This should come as no surprise to anyone who has watched the long-time bureaucratic scramble in Washington to get aboard the water wagon. In the fastest growing parts of the country, water has been inextricably linked with votes. For decades, Interior, Agriculture and the Corps of Engineers have trampled on one another's toes—and projects—in a stampede to bestow liquid bounty on the common man, and orient his legislative representatives toward bigger appropriations for their respective agencies. Logrolling and water have a historic affinity, too.

This merry jousting had geographic limitations, however; water was primarily a concern of the West. Stetson-hatted, string-tied members of Congress from the cactus country had to preface appeals for Eastern support of their pe projects with explanations of wha water was. And as far as the lowe echelons of politics—the governo of North Carolina, the attorney general of Ohio, the mayor of Duluth—were concerned, the folks ou West could have been drinking pulque, and voting accordingly.

But now suddenly the arena ha

Gladwin Hill, head of The New Yor Times Los Angeles news bureau, ha been covering water problems fo twenty years.

become vastly enlarged. The big new subject of pollution has turned water into a game any number can play—indeed, that most people are being drawn into willy-nilly. Pollution is nation-wide; protests about t are arising from the Androscoggin in Maine to Lake Tahoe in California; resistance to remedying it is equally ubiquitous; and everyone with even a tax-paying interest in politics finds himself somewhere in he rumble. The tip-off, if one were needed, came last February when he President, while refraining from accustomed personal reference to he Pedernales, teed off on water pollution.

Alleviation of water pollution promises to be one of history's classic tests of Democracy At Work. t is a predicament we got ourselves nto through a tacit national policy of using waterways for the disposal of waste, municipal and industrial. The waste load has now become intolerable. Yet the clamor for a clean-up finds vested interests in pollution in every hamlet of the country. f a community doesn't have inadequate sewage treatment—which is likely—or a factory discharging noxious fluids, it at least has stockholders in the steel, chemical, oil, paper or textile industries, which are among the biggest polluters. This conflict of interest at the citizen level is what brought pollution to its present aggravated state.

Political pussyfooting with pollution has a long history. The International Joint Commission, a six-member United States-Canada board that deals with boundary problems, first went after pollution on the Great Lakes in 1912, and still is nominally pursuing it. But the commission's function is purely advisory to the two governments, and its purview is limited to subjects which, after interminable travel through diplomatic channels, are formally referred to it by agreement of the two governments. On the Great Lakes, inquiry has been carefully confined to the waters connecting the lakes, rather than the lakes themselves. When it has found pollution, the commission has had authority only to hold hearings and remonstrate politely with the offenders. Withal, the commission claims to have effected, down the decades, some reduction in pollution at the points under its surveillance. Meanwhile, Great Lakes pollution has been getting steadily worse—to the point where Sen. Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin said of degenerating Lake Erie: "It's no longer a body of water—it's a chemical tank."

All states have laws against water pollution, but with a few exceptions enforcement has been weak, not to say cowardly. Hidden away in the files of the average state will be hundreds of permits to municipalities and industries to violate pollution laws, pending vaguely projected improvements in facilities that haven't materialized. The New York State Health Department in 1936 ordered the city of Utica to stop polluting the Mohawk River, giving it four years to clean up its discharges. Nearly thirty years later, Utica is still pumping 15 million gallons of untreated sewage into the river every day.

Sewage is an unglamorous subject, lacking political appeal. It is far easier for a local officeholder to get the community to pony up $10,000 for a useless statue than for improvements in the sewage plant. It is also a lot easier for him to see "the company's side of the problem" when somebody complains that the XYZ Corporation has, without anybody's vote, pre-empted the old swimming hole and boating place as a waste-disposal channel. If patriotism is the last refuge of scoundrels, local economic chauvinism is the cloak of pollution abetters. The Velsicol company in Memphis, reproached for dumping into the Mississippi masses of high-powered agricultural chemicals that killed millions of fish, staged a civic dinner whose keynote was a sarcastic: "We understand you don't want our industry in your city. . . ."

There is no instance on record of an industrial concern's carrying out a threat to move if required to meet acceptable water-quality standards. The National Association of Manufacturers reports that American industry last year spent $100 million on waste-treatment facilities. That is exactly one-sixth of the amount that one company—U.S. Steel, repeatedly cited, along with most other steel companies, as a polluter—plans to spend on new production facilities in the next year. It is less than 5 per cent of what the steel industry alone plans to spend on capital expansion in 1966.

Rather than cracking down on pollution, there is evidence that some states have been misguidedly using it as a come-on for industry. Anti-pollution efforts in the United States started in 1886 in a laboratory on the Merrimack River at Lawrence, Mass.—the area of some of the nation's earliest industry. Nearly a century later, the Merrimack is still one of the worst polluted rivers in the country. New England, which has suffered more than any other part of the country from an exodus of industry, also has been the most intransigent area in defying federal pollution-abatement efforts — even resorting to the ridiculous contention that federal concern with pollution on interstate waterways is unconstitutional.

Alone in the country, New England and New York (which shares many of New England's streams and industrial problems) have maintained that pollution is best dealt with by "classifying" streams. This is a three-card-monte exercise in which up to fifteen years have been frittered away in "studies" and hearings that resulted in various degrees of pollution being approved for various segments of rivers. Ostensibly this is to provide goals for improvement. In reality it freezes existing pollution, and begs the question of a real cleanup by presupposing that pollution is inevitable and that certain interests have a right to commit it.

Schwering

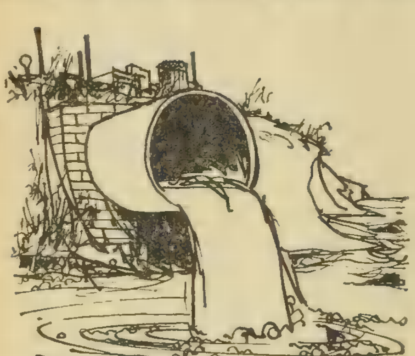
New England industry hasn't conspicuously flourished from this approach. Industry needs clean water, and with rivers from the Androscoggin to the Connecticut woefully polluted, there are lots of better places for manufacturers to settle.

The South, equally avid for industry, got the message some time ago. In many places, industries once had almost a free hand to pollute. Portions of the Savannah River in Georgia and the Coosa, running into Alabama, are among the shocking results. But now usable water is getting scarce, and Georgia, in particular, has started a big cleanup campaign in which, leaders frankly acknowledge, considerations of health and aesthetics are coupled with the realization that availability of clean water is more alluring to industry than easy disposability of dirty water.



This sort of enlightenment reaches its apogee in California, where agriculture overshadows industry economically, water is scarce, and state authorities feel they can be tough about effluent standards in respect to both industry and municipalities. Thus, when the Kimberly-Clark paper company, casting about for a Western mill location with a good water supply, chose Anderson, on the Sacramento River, California in effect said: "We'd be delighted to have you, but only on this basis: the Sacramento is one of our priceless natural treasures, and if you're going to sluice waste into it, that waste is going to be so clean that baby salmon (more sensitive to water quality than people) will thrive on it." The company judged it well worth while to spend upward of 10 per cent of its $20 million investment on waste-treatment equipment. This spectacularly contradicted the notions that lax enforcement is the key to fat local payrolls and that, industrially, cleanliness is next to bankruptcy.

Other states are starting to show gumption. Federal intervention in water pollution is limited by statute to interstate situations, except where a governor asks for help on an intrastate problem. Michigan invoked such federal aid in 1961. Its water officials had prided themselves on pollution enforcement throughout most of the state, but Detroit was another story. There the combined political and economic power of the automobile industry was evident both in outrageous discharges from plants and in a horse-and-buggy sewage system to serve 3 million people. Detroit has only "primary" sewage treatment, which in the inelegant phrase of sanitary engineers means just "settling out the lumps" before the remainder is flung into the public domain. Standard treatment nowadays includes "secondary" processing of waste with chemicals, filters and sometimes electrolytic gear that remove up to 90 per cent of pollutants and leave a fairly innocuous residual fluid. At federal hearings last spring, Detroit's sewage director, Gerald Remus, lamented that secondary treatment facilities would cost the city the inconceivable sum of $129 million—which, amortized over a nominal twenty-year period, would amount to less than $3 per capita per year.

The achievement of an explicit agreement between state and federal officials on a pollution cleanup program—enforceable by federal court action—usually requires a certain amount of horse trading on terms, with the state people going as far as they feel they can in commitments without the risk of being lynched by their constituents. In the case of Detroit, the U.S. Public Health Service negotiators, having gotten on the record official acknowledgments of the automobile companies' atrocious discharges (Chrysler being a notable exception), settled for a semantic compromise on the city's sewage. Instead of categorical "secondary treatment," it was agreed that Detroit would install "a degree of treatment sufficient to protect all legitimate uses [of waterways]."

The previously mentioned conflict in the public mind is suggested in the paradox that, at the time when Michigan state officials were accepting federal backing to clean up pollution, the Michigan State Chamber of Commerce was trumpeting alarums about "the threat of a federal take-over" in water pollution.

Along with many other representatives of states and industry, the Michigan Chamber was bucking the Muskie-Blatnick bill, the major pending piece of nationa water cleanup legislation. The Chamber depicted fundamenta liberties as being jeopardized by the bill's proposal to make water pollution control a separate division of the Department of Health Education and Welfare, instead o being an offshoot of the subordinate Public Health Service. This was purely an intra-departmenta change paralleling what had already been done with air pollution it did not give the department a jot more statutory power than i had already. The reason for making the change—and the reason the pollution lobby opposed i —was that it promised to make the department's existing powers more effective. Water-pollution control evolved as a side line of the Public Health Service's original preoccupation with disease. This work had involved a lot of friendly collaboration between Public Health field personnel and state health officials. When water-pollution personnel moved into states to enforce cleanups, this long-standing relationship got in their way; the old line Public Health people didn't like the inevitable frictions with state officials. So it seemed a good idea to draw an administrative line between the two activities.

What agitated the pollution lobby even more was the Muskie-Blatnick proposal to establish nationa water-quality standards. This seem no more illogical than having uniform national standard for aspirin or minimum wages. It take the same concentration of bacteria in water to make a person sick in Delaware as it does in Oregon, and the same amount of phenols t dirty a boat hull in Lake Erie a in Lake Texoma. Furthermore, i is obviously inequitable for a low ndards upstream state to impose th on a more conscientious state wnstream. Yet in the Michigan amber's nightmare, the proposed tutory innovations would em-wer the secretary of Health, Edu-tion and Welfare to control even e expansion of subdivisions in r state" through manipulation of ter regulations.

Of such chimeras The New York
mes commented:

> The complaint about "invasion
> f states' rights" has been heard > oo long. It is the rallying cry of > he chemical, leather, paper, steel, > ower and other industrial firms > hat oppose Federal action because > hey find it much easier to put > ressure on state and local govern- > nents. There is no need to defer > urther in this field to the states.
> f they had not defaulted in their > esponsibilities for decades, pollu- > ion would not be a major prob- > em today. Too many states have > oo often winked at serious pollu- > ion by cities and by local indus- > ries.

The League of Women
ters, the Izaak Walton League, e United Auto Workers, and ores of similar organizations—ong with LBJ—are on the warth against water pollution. Pub-pressure is plainly becoming ore distressing to some officials an the old pressures. Protests om hundreds of thousands of ioans virtually pushed Governor mes Rhodes into requesting a deral proceeding to abate inter-ate pollution of Lake Erie.

This represented a tactical vic-ry for New York's Sen. Robert nnedy in protracted dueling with vernor Rockefeller over water atters. The Governor, promoting $1.7 billion six-year state-cleanup ogram, sought for a long time to stain the idea that New York pol-tion was entirely an intrastate fair that called for no federal terference — except federal sub-lies. At an emergency gathering governors at Cleveland on May
, about the Lake Erie mess, Mr. ckefeller talked expansively out problems of pollution, while most avoiding mention of Lake ie—or the tons of corruption at pour into it hourly from ound Buffalo. Hence there premably was some head snapping Albany a month later when Gov-nor Rhodes' Lake Erie applican to Health, Education and Wel-re inexorably involved New York as a co-polluter along with Michigan, Pennsylvania and Indiana.

Even then Governor Rockefeller resisted the prodding of Senator Kennedy that New York should avail itself of federal assistance in intrastate pollution problems. The latest round in the skirmishing culminated on September 1, when—New York's water shortage having called attention to the grievous pollution of the Hudson — Health, Education and Welfare started an abatement action there, tactfully stating that it was being initiated "at the request of" the governors of New York and New Jersey and Senator Kennedy. The Senator, incidentally, has been giving industrial circles some qualms with proposals to charge big-water users higher rates, to discourage waste, and to tax industrial plants for pollution. The system has worked well in Germany.

New York City's water shortage appeared to be a glaring illustration of ineptitude on the part of officeholders. Mayor Wagner has insisted that the city's water-storage capacity has increased greatly under his administration (even if unkind vagaries of weather prevented that capacity from being filled). If we look into the little-publicized credentials of the city's appointed water commissioner, Armand D'Angelo, who has been perspiringly dispatching rain-making students to California and trying to keep up with Rep. William Ryan's bodacious wading in water leaks, we find that he is bringing to bear all the experience of a career as a draftsman and union business agent. Under the circumstances, it may not be surprising that a lot of New York was parched while the Hudson River was sweeping past at a rate of 1 million gallons a second. The Hudson is polluted, but now that the grass has dried up and New Yorkers have sweltered through the summer with partial air conditioning, means are being found to use its water.

An adequate supply of clean water is still a matter of money—money to pipe it in, money to depollute it, or in the final extremity, money to buy it in tank cars and bottles. As long as there are liquid assets to be juggled, there will be people eager to juggle them. Money talks, they say. So does vox pop. Recently, vox pop has been talking louder.

LETTERS

(Continued from inside front cover)

importance which I feel should be attached to his remarks, I quote them in full: (Congressional Record, Sept. 17, p. 23366):

> . . . I understood that the Reid Cabral government had fallen for reasons which we do not need to go into. The government under Moreno Urillo, who was the legitimate successor of Bosch, thinking it was defeated, had taken refuge in other Latin American and foreign embassies. At the instance of the CIA—I believe it can be documented—a new junta headed by a certain Colonel Benoit had been formed, although it was pretty well confined to the San Isidro air base.

This junta, as Senator Clark shows, sent Ambassador Bennett word calling for American troops "because a Communist take-over threatens." Bennett wrote back saying that Washington, in effect, would not send troops for that reason because "the evidence is not clear," and suggested to the junta that they request intervention "in order to protect American lives." This was done with results that are now all too clear. Such are the mechanics of diplomacy in the Great Society. H. Lore

Tough echo

Virginia, Minn.

Dear Sirs: It is surprising that some liberal paper has not remarked upon unconditional negotiations—the most absurd phrase to come out of Washington for some time. Logically, it is a howler . . . and its only meaning comes probably from its being a sort of echo of unconditional surrender and sounding tough.

Truman Griffin

Now, not later

Santa Ana, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Although many voters feel that President Johnson has betrayed them, it seems probable that he will become the Democratic candidate in the next election. It occurs to us that we are wasting our time writing and sending telegrams to a man whose actions show so little regard for public and world opinion, and less for the sanctity of human life. We have therefore come to the conclusion that the selection and development of a candidate who could successfully oppose another "Johnson-Goldwater choice" would be the most vital and practical use of our time and efforts. Party labels should not be a factor in this selection, but ability to gain support of all segments of the electorate is essential. Now, not later, is the time to begin!

Mr. & Mrs. Lloyd Seibel
Dr. & Mrs. Roy K. Heintz

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Clashing Old and New

Robert Green

> The tradition-directed society is a relatively static one, because such a form of control must be dependent upon rules and customs which retain their validity over long periods of time. Tradition controls all aspects of behaviour minutely, and from birth to death each member of society knows exactly what is expected of him in all situations. Science (such as it is), religion, law, economic life, and custom are all in accord, so that there exists what Fromm has described as a universal frame of orientation and devotion. Of this type of society Karen Horney has pointed out that the possibilities of mental conflict are much fewer than in the case of a society in transition, which inevitably has a relatively fluid ethical system full of potential conflicts. Although individuality is undeveloped, each person in a tradition-directed society "belongs." . . .
>
> J. A. C. Brown: Freud and the Post-Freudians, Penguin, Harmondsworth, 1963, p. 174

The psychologist, who is quoted above, sees the problem of social displacement largely in terms of public malaise, but clearly a novelist or poet or playwright will narrow his focus when he comes to treat the same theme. He will be less interested in aggregates of men, whether the division be clan, tribe, nation, race or continent, than in the results of the tensions on individual lives. Certainly this would be true in a discussion of African literature where the question becomes one of how the African treats the dissolution of the old tradition-directed society and analyzes what this new, fluid society is doing to its individual men and women.

The most important working out of this theme in African literature occurs in a novel by a young Ibo writer: Chinua Achebe's No Longer at Ease (1960). His first novel, Things Fall Apart (1958), is by any standards a considerable achievement, and his third and last novel, Arrow of God (1963), has many solid virtues, but in No Longer at Ease he has undoubtedly written a book of major importance. It manages to capture most strikingly the clash between traditional and Western values and to present most honestly the virtues and vices of both sides of the argument. A book that manages to be a debate without ever losing its artistic form, it never fails to remain, at the same time, a very readable novel.

Briefly, it is the story of Obi, a young Nigerian who returns from a university education in Britain with great ideals for dealing with the problems of his homeland, but who falls a victim to the lure of bribery, is dismissed from his post as scholarship secretary in the Ministry of Education, and ends up with a stiff prison sentence. No Longer at Ease gives the impression of lassitude and of stylelessness, but this quietness of tone and matter-of-factness is the very center of Achebe's main theme—the tragic dilemmas of the "white African," the man stretched on a rack between the whirling, bright lights of Lagos and the attractive stability of the village and its communal living. As Achebe explains:

> [Obi's] real tragedy is never resolved. It goes on hopelessly forever. Conventional tragedy is too easy. . . . A real tragedy takes place in a corner. . . . The rest of the world is unaware of it.

Thus, Obi falls because of irreconcilable internal pressures, and it is Achebe's triumph in No Longer at Ease that he has taken the reader behind the scenes and shown him the tragedy that takes place in the dark corner, and can never be resolved. The judge at Obi's trial told him that he just could not comprehend how a young man of such high promise could stoop to the sordid crime of bribery: but by the end of the novel the reader, knowing more than the judge, can explain the inexplicable.

The first five pages of the novel show us Obi's predicament in miniature; he is a man whom both Europeans and Nigerians think they have the right to judge. We start by he ing what the judge said at the tr which serves to emphasize the evitability of Obi's fall. His count men, on the other hand, are equa sure that they too have the right criticize: "a very foolish and s willed young man," they call hi His trouble is that he cannot shr off either judgment: although has received a European educati and shares the white man's intell tual views, he is still emotionally t to his own Ibo community. Likew he fully accepts the "European" s ual morality that a man's relati ship with a woman is a private m ter and not to be dictated by tribal superstitions:

> It was scandalous [Obi though > that in the middle of the twentiet > century a man could be barred fro > marrying a girl simply becaus > her great-great-great-great-grandf > ther had been dedicated to serve > gód, thereby setting himself apa > and turning his descendants into > forbidden caste to the end of tim

And yet, despite his intellect emancipation, when faced with t time-honored and the irrational, discovers that he is not armed w the strength of his convictions a consequently, he finds that he c not disregard the traditions of parents and tribe and marry the o cast.

So while Obi thinks he has ma these Western values his own, th are, in fact, only a veneer. At t crisis of his life he finds he is l with no deep inner convictio neither Pagan nor Christian, Nigeri nor European:

> He was amazed at the irreleva > thoughts that passed through h > mind at this the greatest crisis > his life. He waited for his father > speak that he might put up anoth > fight to justify himself. His min > was troubled not only by what ha > happened but also by the discove > that there was nothing in him wit > which to challenge it honestly. A > day he had striven to rouse h > anger and his conviction but he w > honest enough with himself to r > alize that the response he got, n > matter how violent it appeared, w > not genuine. It came from the p > riphery and not the centre, like th > jerk in the leg of a dead frog whe
> a current is applied to it. But h > could not accept the present sta > of his mind as final so he searche

Robert Green teaches in the Department of Literature in the University College, Dar-es-Salaam. He has done work on English folk drama and 19th-century American fiction.

lesperately for something that would rigger off the inevitable reaction. e is an African equivalent, with fferent particulars, of our Western ollow man."

Both a psychological triumph and narrative of extraordinary strength, e pace of No Longer at Ease never ngs. With no irrelevancies, we are ver allowed to relax. Thus the de- ands upon Obi, to be an enlightened esterner and also to be a traditional o like his father, come so quickly nd are so interwoven that we feel e inevitable push of these forces as ey grasp and throttle Obi. And as e have seen, because of his own ck of deep conviction, he is un- le to cut these tentacles quickly and declare his identity, immediately and nequivocally. How can he make a noice when he no longer knows the lor of his own skin? Achebe's great at is to present both sides of these mands so fairly that he neither ealizes the traditional Ibo society r simply canonizes the modern, estern values. And he succeeds in nlisting our sympathy for Obi and l the other intellectuals and students his generation who, through no ult of their own except a desire for lucation, have a "black" heart and "white" mind—organs which often nd quite contradictory messages to neir brains. It is not without signifi- nce that No Longer at Ease is a rst-year text in more than one Afri- n university.

And now, very briefly, a look two other versions of the same neme: a Camerounian novel, Mongo eti's Mission to Kala (1957), and a igerian play, Wole Soyinka's The ion and the Jewel (1963). Beti's ero, Medza, an educated town boy, is nt to a primitive village to retrieve kinsman's erring wife, in the course which much Rabelaisian comedy is rung from the contrast between the nexperienced Medza and the village's xual virtuosos. But Mission to Kala more than a rambunctious sexual medy, for after Medza has seen the itality and freedom of the unedu- ated villagers, he begins to make ndamental criticisms of the Western od of education and progress to hom he has been unwittingly sacri- ced. No Longer at Ease is a tragedy ithout an end and, in the same way, nere are no simple answers to Medza's ew bewilderment. Mission to Kala nds not on a note of high comedy ut with these despairing words from ne young hero:

> The tragedy which our nation is suffering today is that of a man left to his own devices in a world which does not belong to him, which he has not made and does not understand. It is the tragedy of man bereft of any intellectual compass, a man walking blindly through the dark in some hostile city like New York.

In the last pages Medza has the courage to break this vicious circle, and he renounces his home, his education and his girl-wife. Thus he refuses to allow himself to be offered as a mute, unprotesting sacrifice to the ravenous, alien god of ambition and education. Medza's is a brave gesture but the problem is unaltered and the god still remains lusting for sacrifice, even though one of his scapegoats has decamped.

The Lion and the Jewel is an uncomplicated comedy without the tragic backlash of Mission to Kala, and in this play Soyinka shows only the comic possibilities of the confrontation between the traditional and the modern. Lakunle, the pompous village schoolmaster, wants to marry Sidi, a simple and uneducated beauty, and then has great plans for "Westernizing" her. However, the flighty Sidi goes to bed with the village chief, a thoroughly corrupt old reactionary, because she has been told that he is impotent, and she is keen to torment his incapacities. But the Baroka's alleged impotence is only a ruse to seduce Sidi and the latter finds his lovemaking so overwhelming that she rejects out of hand Lakunle's plan to make her a proper white memsahib. The slavering, lecherous old chief and the pompous young ass are comic statements of a serious theme; but The Lion and the Jewel is a delightful, bubbling play, and with its dance and mime makes an exciting theatrical performance.

In this brief introduction to African literature, it is necessary to omit mention of the tangled, Gothic imagination of the Nigerian novelist, Amos Tutuola, and the fascinating symbolism of Camera Laye's The Radiance of the King (1956). And, of course, there are many novelists, poets and playwrights who are not concerned with this theme of the clash between the old and the new in the Africa of today. Yet with all qualifications made, it is possible to see that current African writing is serious, vital and markedly relevant to the continent's predicaments. And it is only at their peril that educators, politicians and dispensers of aid ignore the problems that Achebe and company are raising with such wit and honesty.

Declining, Bewildered, Frustrated

THE URBAN NATION, 1920-1960. By George E. Mowry. Hill and Wang. 278 pp. $5.

Frederick Gutheim

With the inevitability of an unregulated mechanism, Mr. Mowry's history of our recent times starts brilliantly but gradually runs down. Its main idea —that the United States is characterized in this period by its increasingly urban nature and the influence of its mass-production, mass-consumption economy—commences with great clarity and strength. But in the end one is overcome with doubts, unimpressed with the author's facts and arguments, and looking elsewhere for explanations of this complex and elusive period that still remains so much with us.

There can be little argument with the fact of an increasingly urbanized nation. The difficulty is establishing what urbanization means. Perhaps one of Mr. Mowry's chief problems is that during this period the rural-urban dichotomy evaporated. Not merely did the agri-producer population decline to an absolute number of some 2 million. The nature of agricultural life itself became industrialized, and the farm population embraced urban living standards and ways. Urban migration swelled the population of cities and was strengthened not only by the technological developments that released surplus farm populations but even more by the loosened ties to the land itself. Not the rural-urban balance so much as interregional balances thus becomes the key issue. The movement of surplus population from the wheat regions to the West Coast in the twenties, the exodus from the dust bowl in the thirties, from the cotton states to the Northeast and

---

Frederick Gutheim, former president of The Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies, is now part of a Guggenheim project studying recent architecture in Finland.

West Coast in the war and postwar period, with their distinctive regional and racial characteristics has stamped our urban evolution as much as did earlier immigrations. As a Southern Californian, Mr. Mowry is keenly aware of these developments. The mushrooming cities of the West Coast perfectly illustrate the scientific-technological roots of postwar economic expansion, the significance of higher education and research, the defense-oriented, nationally supported economic stimulus, not to mention the global perspective of our foreign policy and, finally, the attraction of surplus population to these new opportunities.

The concentration of urban development in a relatively few very large metropolitan areas, located in but a few favored areas, further intensified the regional significance of these changes. Many older regions and particular cities were declining, bewildered, frustrated. Rather than the humorless version of rural America as the primary source of political reaction and bigotry, some consideration of what was happening in Cincinnati might better explain the attitudes of such a pivotal figure as Robert Taft, and Wisconsin's distrust of the new cosmopolitan centers offered the perfect seedbed for McCarthyism. Indeed, given the nature of the Senate, and the overwhelming significance of the resurgence of Congressional government in the postwar period, even such figures as Arthur H. Vandenberg, Harry S. Truman and Lyndon B. Johnson acquire new meaning as they respond to new constituencies, new economic and industrial orientations, new sources of political funds, new federal interests in urban problems, and the new ethnic politics of the big cities. Not the absolute gains or losses in population are significant in urban areas, so much as their meaning to cities which saw this performance in the light of former expectations, and found here their anxieties for the future.

The nature of the great city began to change about 1925, and the automobile was the decisive factor in creating its decentralized form and suburban character. In the free housing market choices of a totally mobile population a wholly new social and economic fragmentation of the metropolitan city appeared in which entire districts of homogeneous income, status and race were formed, and new relations with the older central city and with one another created new issues and apprehensions. That the suburbs have become today the prime beneficiaries of state legislative reapportionment, with the resulting significance both within states and in federal-urban relations, makes one regret still more Mr. Mowry's neglect of their growth and change during this period.

Somewhere in his excellent discussion of the dislocation of the war and postwar years, Mr. Mowry observes that in 1941, 45 per cent of all defense contracts had been given to just six corporations. What this meant to Detroit, Los Angeles, Seattle and a few other big cities—and to their politics—we are not shown, but it would appear a prime consideration to the urban interpretation of history. Indeed, it is history's greatest contribution to urbanism. If Houston was th fastest growing metropolis during th period, the source of its growth shou be found in national rather than sta and local factors. But the urban e florescence that distinguished M Mowry's period eludes his historic interpretation. That other historia must return to it we cannot doub When more is known about the in vidual actors in the historical dram and more known about individu cities, we may be able to answer son of the questions raised in this stim lating and intelligent historical i quiry. Meanwhile, for those who not expect all the answers, and wh seek a thoughtful account of the po tics, foreign policy, economic evol tion and intellectual history of th period, this is a rewarding book.

A Neglected Genre

Richard Kostelanetz

The Modern Image: Outstandin Stories from The Hudson Review Edited by Frederick Morgan. W W. Norton. 288 pp. $4.50.

The Fetish & Other Stories. By Alberto Moravia. Translated by Angus Davidson. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 285 pp. $4.95.

Soul of Wood & Other Stories. By Jakov Lind. Translated by Ralph Manheim. Grove Press. 190 pp $3.95.

The Invention of Morel and Othe Stories. By Adolfo Bioy Casares Translated by Ruth L. C. Simms University of Texas Press. 23 pp. $5.

Women and the Sun. By Pierr Gascar. Little, Brown & Co. 25 pp. $4.95.

The Night of the Giraffe and Othe Stories. By Alfred Andersch Translated by Christa Armstrong Pantheon Books. 179 pp. $3.95

Of all literary genres, none seems nowadays as neglected as the short story. Although agents may encourage writers to produce stories "to keep their names before the public," and many of the best American novelists have produced their most perfectly realized work in this shorter form (Bellow's "Looking for Mr. Green," for example, or Mailer's "The Man Who Studied Yoga"), stories take as long as poetry to be translated, unless their author is already a famous novelist. Indicatively, a major modern writer whose work has been dominantly in shorter forms, Jorge Luis Borges, is still hardly known outside his native Spanish America.

Moreover, one encounters little serious discussion of the modern short story, although we have all sorts of critical surveys, often comparative in orientation, of the modern novel, theatre and poetry. The few books we have are either unilluminating, such as William Peden's on recent American stories or, by standards for discussion of the novel, limited in scope and superficial as criticism, such as Frank O'Connor's The Lonely Voice. Even anthologies of criticism of modern literature hardly touch upon the short story—the Penguin The Modern Age has nothing specifically on it nor does, I'm ashamed to say, my own On Contemporary Literature. Nonetheless, writers continue to approa the story with serious and imaginati intentions and any reader of stor has sensed that the form has had own evolution, though critics ha shied away from defining it.

The five collections and one a thology of stories under discussion, modernist authors of various cultur suggest several common tendencies the contemporary story. The ma shift is away from the single ima story—occasionally characterized the "epiphany"—in which a uniq oment, scene or image clarifies all e other actions and locks the story's eme into place. In Hemingway's 'he Clean Well-Lighted Place," as at a model of the form as any, the rd's Prayer, with "Nada" substituted r all the important words, defines e oppressive feeling of nothingness nveyed everywhere else in the story. yce, Kafka, and Babel are among e masters of this form.

Richard Kostelanetz is the editor of The New American Arts (Horizon) and On Contemporary Literature (Avon).

As the single-image story reacted ainst the classic narrative story, ifting the point of emphasis from e end to a point near but not at the d, so the contemporary story moves e emphasis even further forward, reading it evenly throughout until e theme is literally present in every ragraph. That is, rather than deloping a plot or theme, the conmporary author intensifies the atosphere or situation presented in the ening lines. The story's conclusion more a reflection of the author's bitrary decision to terminate the le than of any intrinsic necessity climax.

Just as a trend as contemporary d "new" as "The Theatre of the bsurd" has its predecessors, so e contemporary story has its own cestry of experimental evolution. aditionally, most short fictional poraits of madness have approximated is form, such as Maupassant's "The orla," Gogol's "Diary of a Madman" Chekhov's "A Boring Story." Peraps the first great exponent of this tally flat form is the Argentine, rge Luis Borges, one of whose Ficones, entitled "Pierre Menard, Auor of Don Quixote," is among the rm's modern masterpieces.

Borges' story is essentially a paroed critical article about a writer hose "admirable ambition was to oduce [out of his own mind] pages hich would coincide—word for word d line for line" with Don Quixote. hat makes this story so profound that Borges—very much like Nakov in Pale Fire—at the same time at he parodies the absurdity of some erary values and styles also makes s narrator into an artist-hero. After l, like the writer himself, Menard as literally made something, a story, t of nothing; and Borges sustains th these themes—heroism and foolhness—through every sequence.

This overall structural shift lls the genre of the short story furer away from its roots in narrave and realistic portrayal (which, in r time, has been more successfully ppropriated by history and reportage) and pushes it closer to the nonlinear spatial form of modern poetry. Within this shift there are several secondary tendencies. First is the complete absence of an authoritative voice; neither the author nor a spokesman-character speaks a theme or perception directly to the reader. First-person narrators are invariably unreliable authorities; indeed, their unreliability often becomes the prime discovery and thematic key of the story. Second, many of the developments of the modern novel have parallels in short fiction, such as the structure of discontinuous scenes rather than continuous narrative; shifts in the point of view (brilliantly done in Jakov Lind's "Soul of Wood"); and a heightened prose style, achieved either through the use of a rich and unclichéd dialect or through foreign words, ellipses and sheer elegance. Take this example from the third page of "Soul of Wood," where the mastery of the elliptical style is sustained and impressive:

> Even at night Anton Barth lay with his eyes open, for like the rest of him his eyelids were paralyzed. He wore dark glasses. For sixteen years he had been waiting for his head to die too. That was the most he could do for his parents.

At once, Lind conveys quite a bit about his character as well as his own vision of life.

Third, the favorite subject of the modern short story is the madman in extremis, either from neurosis (Gascar), alcoholism (Blattner), narcotics, psychosis (Lind), sexual obsession (Moravia) or sheer arrogance. The most brilliant exploration of this psychological subject is H. W. Blattner's "Sound of a Drunken Drummer," included in The Modern Image, a collection from The Hudson Review. Mrs. Blattner, Argentine-born of Swiss parents and now writing in English, presents in Elise a woman who is completely demoralized and constantly on the verge of losing her self-control. Apparently incredibly beautiful, she passes through marriages and numerous affairs until she now subsists as a kept woman, capable of driving as ruthless a bargain as she is of giving middle-aged men their pleasures. Among the exploited, she cannot win favor or contentment, except from her dog, so personified that at first we think "Rob" is a man. As a portrait of drunkenness, Mrs. Blattner's story has the intensity of Malcolm Lowry's Under the Volcano but with none of his excesses.

A natural subject of the new flat short story is the madness of delusion. Borges is the master; and here his Argentine disciple, Adolfo Bioy Casares, blessed with the Master's preface, executes a marvelously comic variation of the form in "The Invention of Morel." The narrator, apparently stranded on an island, imagines that a voluptuous girl, occasionally accompanied by a male friend ("Morel"), is its other inhabitant. Although he never works up enough courage to make her acquaintance and only once records her words, he portrays himself as falling in love with her and, once she disappears, closes the story promising to devote himself to the eternal contemplation of his beloved. What is remarkable is Casares' narrator's ability to impose his mentality upon reality, so that he is capable of stating that he sees "not two copies of the same book, but the some copy twice." Like Menard, Casares' narrator is a hero-fool, the latter because he is "an inventor [doomed to be] duped by his own invention," the former because he admirably makes his existence more interesting than it really is.

Contemporary story writers have continued the development of

A lively, affectionate history of the Yankee Peddler—that shrewd, enterprising pioneer who was the true ancestor of the modern business man

A new printing just off the press

The Yankee Peddlers of Early America

By J. R. DOLAN

With over 100 illustrations
$7.50, now at your bookstore
CLARKSON N. POTTER, Inc.
Publisher

symbolism; but whereas the modern story writers tried to create a symbolic character or situation (Gregor Samsa felt like a bug that day), recent writers have made the story into a total symbol. Perhaps the best example of this is Thomas Pynchon's "Entropy," seemingly about an aimless wild party in Washington until one recognizes that Pynchon, through numerous references to the constancy of the outside temperature (37°), is portraying a human analogue (symbol) for the physical concept of Entropy. Alfred Andersch attempts something similar in the disjointed narrative of "The Night of the Giraffe," but giraffes are too imposed a symbol to achieve sufficient resonance. Likewise, in Pierre Gascar's "The Asylum," the symbol of the world as madhouse is at once too forced and too hackneyed to please contemporary readers. The most realized example of the total symbol here is Lind's "Soul of Wood"—a quality which describes not only every character in the novella but also the Creator of this universe that permits such cruelty to exist.

As much as these books have in common stylistically, they vary greatly in quality. The most wholly satisfying writer is the German Jakov Lind—invariably intense, politically serious and capable of consistently realized work. Among other things, his "Soul of Wood" is enormously terrifying without ever sinking into cheap effects. His countryman, Alfred Andersch, creates less universalized tales, often overloaded with specific references, especially political, that may escape the American reader.

Gascar, a Frenchman, skirts between pure sensitivity and outright preciousness. His prose, deftly executed, is sometimes flaccid and self-indulgent and his intellectual resources are correspondingly thin. Bioy Casares seems to write too much in the shadow of his countryman, Borges. Possessed of a similar imagination, he lacks the erudition and sheer nuttiness to equal his master's richly complicated comedy. Of the five, he is the most enjoyable; but the sense of sophisticated triviality ("camp," perhaps?), only faint in Borges, is irritating.

Moravia is a curious case of a potentially great writer who does a considerable amount of hack work; and one of the reasons why his artistic reputation is higher in America than in his native Italy is that up to now most of this schlock, largely Sunday supplement stories, has not previously been translated. The Fetish & Other Stories presents Moravia at his most facile, inclined toward clichéd characterization, trick endings (a device now almost cheap), spelling out his themes, and many of the other hallmarks of the popular magazine writer. Aside from an occasional perception into the nature of sexual feeling, one would hardly believe this same Moravia wrote such gems as Agostino or Conjugal Love.

Although it hardly favors the most experimental of contemporary story forms—what we are more likely to find in Genesis West, Evergreen Review, Art and Literature or Paris Review—The Hudson Review has a strong taste for complexity and seriousness; and although some of the inclusions in The Modern Image struck me as tediously heavy, it does contain, in "Sound of a Drunken Drummer" and William Carlos Williams' "The Farmer's Daughters," two of the grea est American stories of our time.

In all, the story form is hardl declining; interesting, imaginati things are happening on an intern tional scale. The flattened, spati form admittedly entwines disadva tages with its advantages. It discoun adventure and narrative for scen and moments; it minimizes the deta ed depiction of personality and soci milieu for more elliptical and myth portraits; it favors certain theme such as the narrator's madness, to tl exclusion of others; it sacrifices leisurely style to an intense one. Y nearly all the excellent contemp rary stories I know embody this fl tened form, because, I suspect, fir that the old form with its standa plots and gimmicks has simply wo itself out and, conversely, that tl new form is particularly appropria to the contemporary imagination.

I Arrive at Socialism by Train

Stefan Heym

I left the United States in the early fifties. Senator McCarthy was on the rampage, the Korean War was distorting the political and literary judgment of the people, writers were jailed under the pretext of being in contempt of Congress, the black list was the essential tool of the motion picture, radio and publishing industries. My position as a naturalized citizen made me particularly vulnerable to persecution; my exodus had been preceded by that of Charles Chaplin, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht.

I probably could have gotten along by compromising. No one was forcing me to continue to write the kind of books that had previously brushed against the neuralgic points of the Establishment. The Crusaders, while stressing the democratic effort of World War II, illustrated the big-business, Fascist angle built into the American power apparatus, besides putting the finger on the coming alliance with the very forces which had created the German concentration-camp regime; The Eyes of Reason stated the historical justification of the Communist take-over of power in postwar Czechoslovakia; Goldsborough demonstrated the conspira of business, government and corru union officials against the Penns vania miners during the 1949- coal strike.

But here lay the conflicts whi interested me. The clash of cl against class, whichever way it m ifested itself, made for the drama element which I felt the big no needed. The social texture of a ch acter's background determines a forms the character's psyche. So had to depict the social texture; a if I did this as I saw it, I had to d with class conflicts, themes wh were poison to publisher and criti at least in the United States of fifties.

I couldn't compromise my work didn't want to compromise my pol cal integrity. Jail and possible portation, the logical follow-up of tilt with Mr. Roy Cohn of the Carthy committee, were not conduc to writing books or getting them p lished. My income depended on sale of the books I wrote. If they longer sold, I would have had to cept an unskilled laborer's job, wh would have precluded all writing

So I left.

I was born in that part Germany which is now the Gern Democratic Republic. And though

---

Stefan Heym is the author of several novels, the most recent of which are The Eyes of Reason (Little, Brown), Goldsborough (Blue Heron Press) and The Lenz Papers (Cassell's, London).

er was an organized Communist I still do not belong to any party, political sympathies tended there her than toward the West German ime. As a United States Army of- er, editing some of the first news- pers published in the U.S. occupa- zone, I had been in on the begin- g of that regime and knew what s behind the trappings.

Settling in the German Democratic public, I was aware that I hadn't ne to a land of milk and honey. that time, the place was rife with ns; food was rationed; two sets prices gave the economy a crazy- ilt pattern; above all, the minds of people, as in Western Germany, re warped by twelve years of zism and by the crash of the am of the German Ubermensch.

But in Eastern Germany one thing d been done by the Soviet army d by the German Socialists and mmunists who had trickled into ninistrative positions — one thing ver seriously attempted by the nerican Army: power had been ested from those who were respon- le for Nazism and war. The landed ates had been expropriated and ided among small farmers and m hands; the banks, the mines, big plants no longer belonged to capitalists.

This was new. This had never be- e been done in Germany where workers, in 1918 and 1923, had ngled their chance to come to wer.

To the writer, this was a highly eresting, new situation, a field un- ped, pure gold if you only could it up.

The writer himself was placed in new position. He was becoming a ial force, his word a factor in pub- discussion, his work "a weapon in struggle."

I don't say that the writer is not ng taken seriously in the West. at a committee of Congress troubled put a dozen or so behind bars ves my point. But literature in West is generally understood and en as entertainment; it is not ex- cted that the writer will help to ld and change people's minds; the phasis on his function differs in West and East.

I have always sought contact with people. I have lectured in Amer- , I have lectured in East Germany. eel that the intelligence level of audiences is the same; but the itudes are different. Here, the estions put to me emphasized the fact that the people somehow wanted to apply the lessons of a book to their own lives; the questions went beyond the literary and came from audiences which only recently had begun to acquire books—questions by people who were seeking.

This kind of contact stimulates the writer. Or at least it did me. But it also puts a responsibility upon him which in the West he need not necessarily shoulder. Sartre, recently in Prague, said that the writer today has three duties. He must side with the revolution—the social or the national revolution, whichever is on the agenda. He must be disciplined. He must criticize. The two latter duties conflict with each other; the solution of this conflict, Sartre said, is the writer's daily task. This certainly applies to the writer in a Socialist country.

Settling in the German Democratic Republic, I had to decide whether I wanted to continue writing in English. I am bilingual, as are a number of writers from the former colonial countries who write in their native language as well as in English or French.

I decided to stick to English—but not as a secret protest against the government of the German Democratic Republic and its cultural policies, as was stated in The Atlantic Monthly not long ago. Were I moved to protest, I know more efficient ways to express my opinion than to boycott a language. I write in English because its strict rules of sentence structure require clear thought. German lends itself to muddleheadedness, as Mark Twain observed. When I use German in journalistic pieces that are written for the day, the English sentences shaping up in the back of my mind help me to avoid the roundabout formulations of the German.

My Soviet publishers have urged that I state whether I consider myself a German or an American writer. The question is of some importance to them because their paper allotment for my books depends on whether they can take it from their "German" or their "American" quota. For myself, I don't trouble over the problem. I believe that my literary roots lie in American and English literature more than in German. Hemingway, Twain, Dickens have been my teachers rather than Thomas Mann or Fontane.

A writer grounded in both the capitalist and the Socialist worlds has an obvious advantage over one who knows only the former or the latter. It is easier to find your way around in capitalism; it's been the same track for centuries. Socialism is new, untried; even forty-five years of it isn't much in the eyes of history.

You can enter socialism by revolution, at the side of the people who are making it and at the time it is being made; or you can arrive there by train, as I did. In either case, you set your foot on uncharted territory which, if that's what you like, can be quite exciting.

From theories and books, from reports and brief preceding visits East, I had tried to chart at least a provisional course. Its main feature was the idea that the revolution having done away with the power of the bourgeoisie, the classic conflict of class versus class, which had been underlying the themes of my books, no longer applied. Of course there were the remnants, pretty big remnants, of the old classes and the old conflicts; but they were remnants, I believed, and on the whole the new society was over the hump and on a pretty straight course toward con-

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The Best Way
To Get
THE
NATION

THE NATION 10-11-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

ditions in which the only conflicts to concern the writer were boy-meets-girl, or two-boys-meet-one-girl, or vice versa.

It didn't take long to find out that I was wrong. On my third day in East Berlin I ran into a man I had known for years as a staunch Communist, a founding member of that party in Germany, who told me he had been removed from membership. I tried to say something of an administrative error; he didn't even answer that one.

Then came June 17, 1953, in Berlin: workers striking against a workers' government, workers' tanks rumbling through workers' streets. I threw myself into newspaper work, ran a weekly column in Berlin's largest paper, stayed close to people, received thousands of letters, visited plants, lived anonymously in refugee barracks, was in touch with men from the chief of state to shipyard and building workers, students, farmers, clergymen.

And I began to see that there were conflicts — new conflicts — of which there was no mention in the Marxist classics: a few hints, perhaps, in Lenin, and strangely enough in the early Stalin; hints, but nothing more. These conflicts were no longer based on the old antagonism of bourgeoisie versus working class; although in a divided country like Germany, two-thirds capitalist, one-third Socialist, you could not rule out past patterns of collision. At any rate, in the Socialist sector an earthquake had taken place; what was down had come up, what was up had fallen, but the new mountains had by no means settled into place.

The revelations of the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet Communist Party threw a glaring light on some of the crevices; yet even the Khrushchev speech posed new questions rather than furnished answers.

Observing these new conflicts and taking part in them, defining the new questions and searching for answers to them by using the resources of fiction is a thrilling challenge. The writer may have a tough time of it; his findings may not agree with official requirements, he may even touch a neuralgic point—this does not change the writer's duty nor detract from the fascination of the job.

I know that up to now relatively little of this has been reflected in novels, plays, poems. I don't believe that censorship, Stalin and post-Stalin, is entirely to blame for the situation. While the unexplored conflicts have shaken up people for years, their outline, their component parts, their roots have only lately come into focus, and we still don't know too much about them.

What about discipline, party and otherwise? What about democracy under socialism? What about the power structure, what checks and balances must be found? What about freedom? What about art, its role, its function under socialism? Such questions quicken the pulse of the writer. These questions and conflicts are not the theoretical matters restricted to the ideological commissions of the party apparatus or its cultural committees. They are bread-and-butter questions. When people are no longer subject to big-business rule and their minds no longer shaped by big-business policies, art and philosophy enter daily living; the correct or incorrect interpretation of scientific theories means space flight or not; a ma thought and his word translate th selves directly into a moving force

I feel that as a writer in a cialist country I am now embar on a tremendous spiritual vent The Stalin mold—one fountainhe one wisdom, one solution—has b broken even where a few vest-poc Stalins try to keep some of the pie patched together.

We're on the track of someth new; we've got hold of it and won't let go. A day at the typewr can mean the first blocking out o new discovery, another step forw into the uncharted territory. Of cou — as in any social system — writer has to have the courage his conviction, the integrity to w the truth as he sees it, the patie to fight his way through petty sometimes not so petty obstacles.

I wouldn't want to change pla with any writer in the West. I'm ing an exciting time.

RECORDS

Benjamin Bore

SOME 20th-CENTURY CLASSICS

STRAVINSKY: Apollo (1928) Columbia Symphony; Orpheus (1946) Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6046/MS 6646.

These two works are mong the most specially treasured by "inside" Stravinskyans: unsensational in surface, but spectacular in the subtlety and richness of their details and formal designs, especially in the direction of the restraint and precision that are so powerful in Stravinsky's recent music. In Apollo, this is centrally evident in the incredible variety of sonority drawn from the string ensemble, and in the unique phraseology generated by a stunning revaluation of the formal meaning of a "lyrical" continuity. And in Orpheus, the selection of timbres around the initial harp sound (a process that actually "happens" as the harp is gradually surrounded and submerged by the mounting overlap of pitches sustained from its own steadily unfolding line) creates sonorities that resonate through later works from Agon to Movements and beyond. Here, too, a filmic intercutting (it becomes a "dissolve" in the slower tempos at either end, the most wonderfully "deliberate" passages all of Stravinsky's even-note conti ties) is the articulative basis fo total time-sense that, even for Stra sky, is singularly original—especi as he hears it on these extraordir recordings. Indeed, this soon-to nonagenarian remains his own n discerning interpreter; the Apollo conducts, for example, is a revela in the replacement of the "sweetn of every other performance by a sh "edge" and muscularity that is most belligerently un-Siegfried-I like. The playing by the Colun Symphony strings is precise eno though not as clean or unforce the Chicago Orchestra's perform of Orpheus, which is as close to i for the sonority of the piece as need imagine.

SCHOENBERG: The Music of Ar Schoenberg, Vol. III: Chamber phony No. 1 (1906); Five Pi for Orchestra (1909); He waechse (1911); Bach: Komm and Schmücke Dich (1922); B. "St. Anne" Prelude and F (1928); Kol Nidre (1938); C ber Symphony No. 2 (1939); mal Tausend Jahre (1949). R

Craft, cond. Columbia M2L/M2S 709.

The Columbia Stravinsky and Schoenberg series are the most important recording project ever undertaken, for they represent the only sources through which, at last, the principal musical literature of this century is becoming available for repeated, or even initial, listening. For that reason, to attempt a single "review" of even a part of the series, would be ludicrously inappropriate, beyond noting and exulting in its existence. Thus I shall just mention the most revelatory of the Schoenberg works that may be experienced in this and the earlier volumes on records (or elsewhere) for the first time: Die Glückliche Hand, in Vol. I, the Genesis Prelude in Vol. II, and the Four Orchestral Songs, the Bach orchestrations, and the choral Dreimal Tausend Jahre in Vol. III; those whose performances under Craft in this series are superior to others in print: Pierrot Lunaire with Bethany Beardslee and Robert Helps in Vol. I, along with the Survivor from Warsaw, both Chamber Symphonies, Kol Nidre, Pelleas and Melisande; the performances that are considerably superior to Craft's own earlier versions: Variations for Orchestra, Herzgewaechse, Five Pieces for Orchestra, and those renderings that are disappointing: mainly the Erwartung in Vol. I, because of Helga Pilarcyk's multiple inaccuracies of pitch.

The accompanying notes, written by some of the best musical minds in our midst, are for once genuinely informative on a level appropriate to the stature of the music itself. I suspect that it will be impossible to avoid constant references to this album in years to come, since, like Craft's own earlier pioneering Webern album, but on a far more significant and mature level of musical accomplishment, these recordings will themselves become part of the important musical history of our time.

BARTOK: The Six String Quartets. The Juilliard String Quartet. Columbia D3L 317/ D3S 717.

The string quartets remain the Bartók literature, the source of almost everything original and significant in his compositional thought. Even the First Quartet is in striking contrast to the rather superficially "moderne" music Bartók was producing in other media at about the same time. Indeed, the First is already quite clearly the work of a serious and probing deployer of

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________ STATE__________ ZIP No.__________

10-11-65

notes, especially in terms of linear interrelations — the special "counterpoint" of the traditional string-quartet texture — although the resultant harmony seems to discover rather too little ramification for all the complicated activity out of which it arises.

But one is also ever more aware, and particularly in these most important works, of all the inconsistencies and limitations that make Bartók the petit maître among the authentic early 20th-century giants. In particular, there remains an occasionally disturbing eclecticism, the sudden appearance of familiar sounds unsubsumed within an overall context—the Liszt added-sixth chords in the First Quartet for example, or the hurdy-gurdy music in No. 5.

Of the other quartets, the Second also predates Bartók's rather late-arriving compositional maturity. Nevertheless, it explores the dissociation and merging of (in the first movement) simultaneously and (in the second) successively occurring planes of texture, rhythm, tempo and register, with some arresting results, if again an ultimate sense of overall incompleteness and conceptual uncertainty.

The Third and Fourth Quartets, on the other hand, reveal a sustained compositional intensity that creates, out of an amalgam of "heard" string-quartet contexts from Beethoven to Webern, an articulative universe of its own and is the focal achievement that really justifies the continued currency of the entire set. The Third's remarkable idea of sonority and organization is apparent from the outset; perhaps for the first time in Bartók's work, the event-succession seems totally generated out of a comprehensive internal procedure, and the result is an immediately fascinating web of association in a palpable totality. In this context, all of Bartók's prodigious inventiveness in string-quartet sonority focuses on the articulation of important relationships, and this functionality gives the famous "effects" their real brilliance.

The Fourth is a "fourth quartet" in the Schoenberg sense amid Bartók's work, the locus classicus for any observations about his attempt to reconstruct a new syntactical coherence by nontonal means. It is, surely, the most concentrated and directed of all Bartók's works, certainly the one that most rewards repeated and attentive listening — particularly to progressive expansion of the interval-spans that form the melodic core of each successive movement, and the descending curve that ends with the return to the interval vocabulary of the opening.

The last two quartets appear to retrench from the resources and control evident in the Third and Fourth (whose qualities, in fact, seem to have undergone no real further development in Bartók's later music). Ir stead, there is often a facile effec tiveness, an apparent willingness t settle for the association that aros most immediately and improvisa torily. The Fifth is thus a somewha diluted statement of elements of th Fourth, while the Sixth takes th direction of a kind of wanderin lyricism that, for all the external ir genuity of its progressively fulle harmonization of a "basic line, fails to convey any powerfully moti vating structural concern.

The Juilliard Quartet first recorde these works some sixteen years agc and the superiority of the perform ances has never been challenged. Th group has by now discovered in th quartets a range of variety and nuanc that considerably modifies the unre lieved aggressiveness of the earlie approach. At the same time, the Juil liard has acquired a security in ever detail of the scores that results in level of mechanical ensemble hardl ever encountered even in the mos familiar traditional literature, an marred only by an occasional wan of timbral finesse. Given the excel lence of the recorded sound as well there would seem to be no furthe need to look for a definitive recordin of the Bartók quartets. For this rea son, one especially regrets the sub stitution in the new album of som pretentiously silly program notes fo the illuminating remarks that wer included with the old set.

Sunday to a Close at Gritman Hospital

i rest here for nerves: someone beserk inside (the rub is he looks like me) is blowing bubbles that rise and pop along the surface of my skin — i jerk like a puppet. Early evening, and for veins iced, listing on poles of ice, while neighbor walls tan themselves, they break the jam with nitro. A chain-saw close-by backs a black tree against sky, teeth murder and into blue — an hour glass spills its sand.

A voice reels along corridors, i open my hand:
"8 o'clock and visiting hours are now over."

How we let the world smoke down fuel-sick, pouring our oils into private lamps.
Yet one cannot say it's over: Here light and needle both pause to hover.

A hungry moth carrying gold-pin eyes thumps the window frontier, picks at ice with his hatpin. In, he excites the air with predictions pogosticks across the ceiling kissing reflections.

Edward Auert

ART

ORIGINAL ART COSTS LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! GRAPHIC CIRCLE offers you contemporary original signed lithographs, etchings, woodcuts for $3.00 monthly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Free Brochure — Graphic Circle, Dept. NA, 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

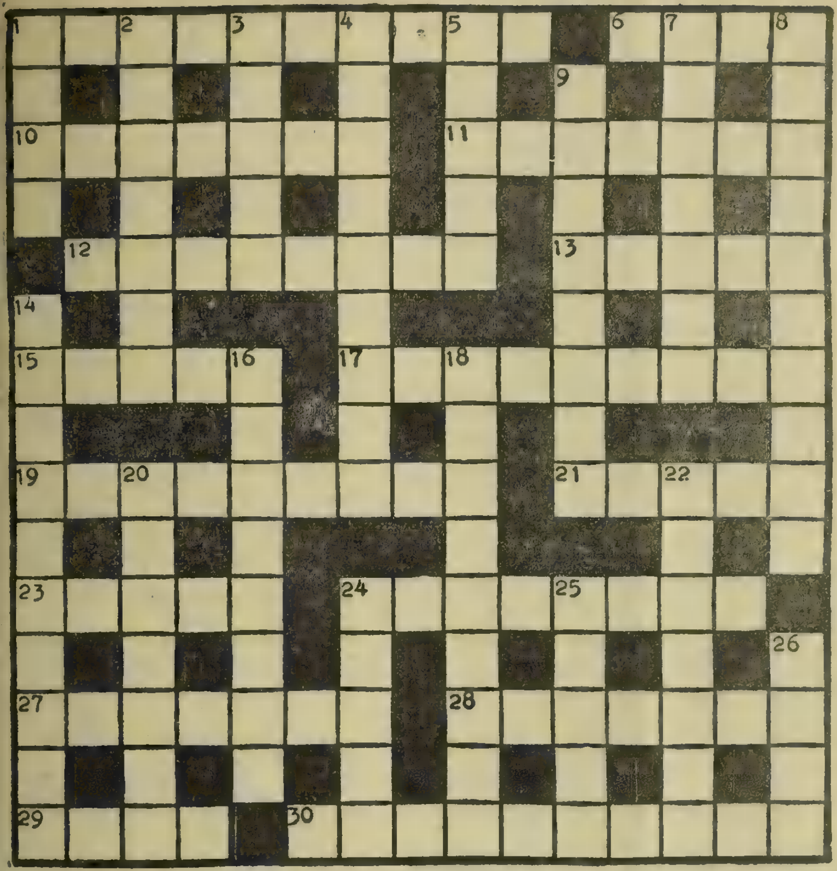
EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

ACADEMIC VACANCIES IN CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES
A list of teaching and administrative openings published in November, February and april.
Annual Subscription: $2.00
ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES OF CANADA
75 Albert Street Ottawa 4, Canada

Advertising Rates
Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014, CHelsea 2-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1122

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 They don't run true to type for little fishes. (10)

6 Proving at least part of the B-B shot goes out this way. (4)

10 What one does to 13, perhaps, as one does to make a killing. (4, 3)

11 No finer way to get a spot of heat! (7)

12 Ill-gotten gain does, as a doctor might try to prove. (8)

13 Remove a point beyond time. (5)

15, 25 and 20 down It might take a couple to set it up, but a different split might call for a large beam. (5, 12)

17 Affect with folly. (9)

19 Start to do what you might when the ramp is crowded. (4, 5)

21 See 3 down

23 Pathological condition of the demagogue? (5)

24 It should be recognized that James had admirable qualities — Barrie did! (8)

27 First impression of a signet, perhaps. (7)

28 Victoria didn't find it so, when someone tried to imitate her. (7)

29 Do they keep one from telling jokes? (4)

30 One didn't take the pledge if it is. (10)

DOWN:

1 Do the British dislike to change this old seaport? (4)

2 Trying to get one's goat inside the structure? (7)

3 and 21 across Dingo, perhaps, characteristic of the 30? (5-5)

4 Empower. (9)

5 Evidently Macheath was quite a blade. (5)

7 A couple of drinking spots with a girl? (7)

8 He gets none of the famous rocks there. (10)

9 Brought about. (8)

14 "Lay not that .... unction to your soul". (Hamlet) (10)

16 Sat up with great enthusiasm for the place. (8)

18 A strange seat can, if cast under a spell. (9)

20 See 15 across

22 What some used to believe in is sort of solid, when I'm around. (7)

24 Two points of the city? (5)

25 See 15 across

26 Should be getting along — how's your best whisky? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1121

ACROSS: 1 and 26 Scotch and water; 9 Army ant; 11 Ems; 12 Armies; 13 Mind; 15 Visiting; 16 Format; 18 Remark; 20 and 10 Loch Ness Monster; 23 Inns; 24 Poplar; 25 Cow; 26 Retails; 29 Project; 30 Strum; 31 Expediter. DOWN: 1 Share; 2 Osmosis; 3 and 6 across Character sketch; 4 Antimony; 5 Damper; 6 Kind; 7 Titoism; 8 Herodotus; 14 Motherhood; 15 Verdigris; 17 Lollipop; 19 Monitor; 21 Escheat; 22 Mousse; 27 Film.

PUBLICATIONS

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST [illegible] SECOND books will be sent!)

ATTENTION LITERATI: For only $1 you can get a copy of NEXUS, the most talked-about bimonthly literary magazine in America. Jerome Kulek, Editor, Box 2049, San Francisco 26, Calif. $6/year. (In NYC, it's available at Eighth St. Bookshop, 17 W. 8th and Gotham Book Mart, 41 W. 47th.)

"LET THERE BE A WORLD." Felix Greene's pictorial account of humanity's dilemma. One dollar [illegible] copy. Concerned Citizens, Box 191, Palo Alto, Calif.

15c LITTLE BLUE BOOKS — 1,900 titles available. 1,500 Big Blue Books 25c — $3.50. All subjects. Catalogues 10c (refundable). LARSON'S BOOKS, 5200 N. 22nd St., Arlington, Va. 22205.

BOOKS
AND PERIODICALS FROM THE CHINESE MAINLAND (in English)
Literary, scientific, political, children's and art books. Subscriptions taken for all Chinese magazines. Catalog available upon request. CHINA PUBLICATIONS, 95 Fifth Ave. (cor. 17 St.) N.Y. 10003 Tel.: (212) 924-1132. Open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m.

PERSONALS

PINOCHLE ANYONE? Elderly gentleman seeks partner(s) for games in Brooklyn Heights area, afternoons or evenings. MA 4-1684.

WALDEN TWO COMMUNITY being planned. Write: Gerald Baker, Box 351, Mondamin, Iowa 51557.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Divsion
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., [illegible] Y. C.

ANY 2

OF THESE VALUABLE REFERENCE WORKS FOR ONLY $4.95

(as many as 10 volumes... combined retail values to $45.45)

PSYCHOANALYSIS
PSYCHOANALYSIS
I
II
Judaism
Islam
Hinduism Protestantism Catholicism
Buddhism
AGES WESTERN I
II
LAW
LAW

283. GREAT RELIGIONS OF MODERN MAN: Buddhism, Catholicism, Protestantism, Hinduism, Islam, Judaism.

A massive home library presenting the meanings and contemporary significance of the world's major faiths — with extensive selections from their great writings. Retail $24.00

305. THE WORLD OF PSYCHOLOGY

Exploring the whole range of motives underlying man's behavior — his perceptions, myths, dreams, fears; his love, hate, and guilt; his ventures into self-discovery — this massive compendium of theories, case studies, and works from world literature contains essential writings by Plato, Freud, Dostoevsky, Jung, Nietzsche, Kafka, Huxley, Fromm, Sartre, and more than 70 other foremost writers. Retail $17.50

323. THE MASKS OF GOD: Primitive, Oriental, and Occidental Mythology
Joseph Campbell

The oldest truths of man's inner life seen in the light of a new science to which psychology, anthropology, and archaeology contribute. Retail $21.45

267. THE WORLD OF LAW
edited by Ephraim London

From the writings of judges and lawyers, novelists, playwrights, philosophers and prophets, an exciting library of literature about and in law. Among the 90 authors represented are Douglas, Camus, Hand, Faulkner, Brandeis, Miller, Cervantes, Frankfurter, Gandhi, James, Rabelais, Swift, Shaw, Zola and Holmes. Retail $17.50

309. THE AMERICAN IMAGE
edited by Ernest R. May Society, Foreign Policy, Political Process, Economy.

A basic 4-volume library of significant writings on American Civilization — from Jefferson and Lincoln, to Roosevelt and Kennedy, from Twain and James to Reisman and Baldwin. Retail $20.00

332. ALIENATION: The Cultural Climate of Our Time.
edited by Gerald Sykes

Alienated man — his relentless search for personal identity; rarely has the cultural predicament of modern man been depicted so vividly or comprehensively. Ninety-eight selections from literature, philosophy, psychology, religion, drama, sociology, poetry, and personal narrative expose the harrowing reality of alienation as the universal condition of our time. Retail $15.00

289. THE GREAT AGES OF WESTERN PHILOSOPHY

The major writings of the great philosophers through history to today — accompanied by interpretive commentaries to reveal the development of philosophy from St. Augustine to James, Sartre, and Russell. Retail $15.00

344. THE WORLD OF PSYCHOANALYSIS

More than 80 leading psychoanalysts and creative writers from Freud and Jung to Menninger and Bettelheim, from Dostoevsky and Proust to Updike and Roth explore the heights and depths of the human psyche: its growth and development, its regression and neurosis individually, within the family, and its profound impact on human society. Retail $15.00

322. THE WORLD OF LOVE

The full scope and depth of human love — from its experience, meanings, and pathologies to its social and moral aspects — explored in the great writings of over 100 philosophers, psychologists, theologians, anthropologists and novelists — including Menninger, Proust, Freud, Aristotle, Fromm, Adler, Malinowski, Dostoevski, and James. Retail $17.50

AN EXCITING OFFER FOR DISCRIMINATING READERS

Ranging from psychology, myth, law and philosophy to a massive set surveying the world's major religions, these distinguished reference volumes are indicative of the high quality of selections that are available to members of the Book Find Club. These are books of current interest and lasting value — books that will make precious additions to your home library.

To receive the two sets of your choice for just $4.95, you need only agree to take four more books in the coming year from among the many Selections and Alternates that will be offered to you month by month. In addition to the savings you enjoy on every book offered by the club, you will receive bonus credit for each book or record you purchase after completing the introductory agreement. Whenever you have three such credits, we will mail you a certificate that can be redeemed for a FREE book of your choice from our extensive list of bonus selections.

Each month members have the opportunity to obtain such outstanding books as the following — all selections of the Book Find Club:

The Words, Jean-Paul Sartre; and The Heart of Man, Erich Fromm. Combined retail price $8.95
Member's price (for both books) $5.95

The City in History, Lewis Mumford.
Retail $11.50..............Member's price $6.95

The Invisible Government, David Wise and Thomas B. Ross. Retail $5.95......Member's price $4.50

The Act of Creation, Arthur Koestler
Retail $8.95................Member's price $5.95

The Mother Tongue, Lancelot Hogben
Retail $7.50................Member's price $5.95

Take advantage of this unusual opportunity today. Simply fill out and return the coupon to us. You can receive as many as 10 volumes with an immediate savings of up to $40.50.

The Book Find Club, Inc. B65-ION
One Park Ave., New York, N.Y. 10016

Please enroll me as a member of the Book Find Club and send the two reference works indicated, by number, in the boxes below billing me for only $4.95 (plus a small charge for postage and handling). I agree to buy four books in the coming year from among the wide range of Selections and Alternates that will be made available to me at membership savings. I may cancel my membership at any time after buying these four books. If I continue as a member I will earn a bonus credit with each additiona purchase, and for every three credits, I will receive a certificate that can be redeemed for a FREE book of my choice from the bonus selection list.

INDICATE BY NUMBER THE REFERENCE WORKS CHOSEN ☐ ☐

MR.
MRS. ....
MISS
ADDRESS ....
CITY.......................................STATE.................
(Same offer and prices apply in Canada: 105 Bond St., Toronto 2, Ont.)

THE
NATION

October 18, 1965 . . 35c

NEW CURRICULUM FOR TEACH-INS

Christopher Lasch

NUCLEAR CLUB

Why the Outs Want In

Milton Viorst

TEACHERS' UNIONS

Rift Without Differences

Stanley Elam

CUBAN BESTSELLER:

The Exiles Return

Jose Yglesias

LETTERS

Mission to Hanoi

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: In response to the letter you published (Sept. 27) regarding the Swedish Vietnam Committee and their aim, "To undertake a humanitarian action for the people of Vietnam," I suggest the following:

Send five to ten responsible Americans to North Vietnam as a peace group. The practical purpose would be to aid in rebuilding bombed-out hospitals, schools and other public-service buildings, along with other appropriate work that lent itself to a humanitarian purpose. The symbolic purpose of such a group working for peace would be tremendous. . . .

To those readers who might be inclined morally to such a project, but disinclined to support it because of its illegality, I can only cite a recent incident with the Rev. Martin Luther King. When informed that his attempts to contact foreign governments concerning the war in Vietnam were illegal, he replied, "That's unfortunate."

I would appreciate correspondence from any interested Americans.

Lawrence H. Geller
1004 Huntingdon St.

Hopes and fears

Albany, Calif.

Dear Sirs: I must take exception to much of Antonio de Figueiredo's "Portugal: Imperialism on Credit" [The Nation, Sept. 13].

(1) "The facts that only 556 of the 582 members of the [electoral] college turned up, and that there were thirteen blank votes cast in protest" when the President was re-elected really do not seem to indicate that "long-dormant consciences . . . were pricked." Unfortunately, absenteeism of 4.7 per cent seems readily explained by, say, illness, and a protest vote of 2.3 per cent would be of minimal significance even in a roll-call vote, which this apparently was not.

(2) It is inexcusable for an economist to list a few foreign "investments and public and private loans," without relating them to total investment, GNP, etc. The lack of context is particularly unfortunate when the thesis is that Portugal is practicing "imperialism on credit."

(3) More than enough real horrors seem likely in Portugal's future without such wholly imaginary ones as that Salazar's death might be "the white settlers' golden opportunity to follow the example of Rhodesia in proclaiming their own unilateral declaration of independence." . . . Portugal's colonies already face guerrilla warfare, and they are much more dependent on the home country and much less likely to receive economic, diplomatic or military support. Yet even in Rhodesia, severe difficulties will result from a unilateral declaration. In Portugal's colonies, the likely results seem so much worse that serious consideration by even semi-rational whites is improbable.

Scott Keech

Cover stories

Hamilton, Ohio

Dear Sirs: The evening paper brings the news that the CIA is revealing a Soviet plot to slander and discredit the CIA and the FBI. . . . We seem to be coming face to face with one of the difficulties involved in superimposing a secret government on this nation. How many Americans will not wonder if, the CIA being what it is, this is not its way of putting itself above all criticism? How many will not ignore all documentation on the ground that the CIA can—and does—forge all the documents that it needs for any occasion?

Admittedly, the Russian equivalent of the CIA will be equally capable of doing anything that is charged, and falsifying any records necessary. When the smoke clears away, therefore, we shall probably ignore all "evidence" and act on the basis of whether we think that countries are best run by secret police, or otherwise.

W. P. Taylor

African defense

New York City

Dear Sirs: South Africa has developed a complicated maze of laws to bolster separation of the races and subjugation of the nonwhite races. Those who stand in opposition are almost certain to figure as defendants in the continuing—and numerous—trials. Figures released by the Minister of Justice on April 21, 1965 show that some 3,000 persons were hailed for political reasons from January, 1964, through December, 1965.

The high rate of release in a police state which is paranoic about advocates of racial equality is largely due to the efforts of a courageous band of South Africans operating the South African Defense and Aid Fund, to provide legal defense for those charged.

We urge all who sympathize to send funds to: Africa Defense and Aid Fund (for South Africa), Room 705, 211 East 43 Street, New York 10017.

A. Philip Randolph, Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, Dr. Donald Harrington, Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen.

THE
NATIO

Monday, October 18, 1965 .
Volume 201, No. 12

In this issue

EDITORIALS
233

ARTICLES
235 The Nuclear Club: Why the Outs Want In Milton Viorst
239 New Curriculum for Teach
Christopher Lasch
242 Atomic Insurance: The Ticklish Statistics
David E. Pesonen
245 Hospitals Without Nurses
Jean Martin
247 Teachers' Unions: Rift Without Differences
Stanley Elam
249 The Westchester Gorillas
David Cort

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
251 Cuba's Bestseller: A Gusano Returns
Jose Yglesias
252 Cityscape at Tahoe
Kenneth Lamott
253 Cycle (poem)
James Schevill
254 The Journey to Identity
Michael Vincent Miller
255 What Price Discount?
Victor Lebow
256 Art
Max Kozloff
258 Theatre
Harold Clurman
259 Films
Robert Hatch
259 "English" (poem)
Richard Lourie
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 26
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Oct. 18, 1965. Vol. 201,

The Nation is published weekly (except ir and August, when biweekly) by The Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth A New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class p paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-840 Subscription Price: One year, $10; two $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice quired for change of address, which can made without the old address as well as th

APR 16

EDITORIALS

The President's Chance

' President Johnson and his UN Ambassador sought e assurance against domestic political blackmail 'the peace issue," the Pope's visit was the answer heir prayers. Indeed, one can imagine that a man Ir. Johnson's political acumen might have solicited visit for the express purpose of making peace in nam politically possible (in fact, the credit must o Secretary-General U Thant and to the Pope him-). But who originated the idea and pressed it to a clusion is unimportant. The opportunity is now e open, and it may never present itself in this form in.

aul VI's message was unmistakable, and more spe- : than could have been anticipated. Obliquely, he hed on the desirability of China's admission to UN; on the flight west, asked by Barrett McGurn he New York Herald Tribune if he would be willing nclude Peking in his travels, he answered, "Cer- ly." Catholic support for a settlement in Vietnam implied. The speech gave unstinting praise to the , and Catholic nationalists will be hard pressed ceforth to make common cause with Protestant emists in attacking the world organization.

'o be sure, the message may not get through to the nds and hearts of those American Catholics who e been in the forefront of the advocates of a harsh cy in Vietnam. From the outset, the Catholic in- st in Vietnam has been a major aspect of the prob- . The Catholic minority in South Vietnam has been ominant concern of every U.S. President since the nch defeat and General Eisenhower's decision to rvene. The Nation pointed out editorially, during n F. Kennedy's brief tenure, which coincided with n strife between the Buddhists and the Catholics, the latter must be protected against reprisals in settlement of the civil war. But the idea that Viet- n should be the site of a Catholic crusade received support from Pope John XXIII, and Paul VI's ap- rance before the UN negates it further. Catholics, clergy and laymen—Sen. Thomas Dodd, for ex- ple—should have got the signal loud and clear.

'resident Johnson did not embroil America in tnam; the war was bequeathed to him. Harkening he war hawks, and apparently hoping for a decisive ory before the 1966 elections, he has enlarged the to the point where it has become intolerably dirty shameful. Mr. Johnson now has a chance to rid nself of some of the odium which he has brought himself. All he need do—and he has the power— o declare unilaterally the cease-fire which the UN ught about in Kashmir. Neither in Vietnam nor in hmir can such an action bring lasting peace by lf, but it is an indispensable step toward a solution. President is commander in chief of the armed es. He can order the admirals and generals to silence the guns and ground the planes. The troops can stand their ground and, if fired on, return the fire, but the chances are that the fighting would stop and the way would be open for negotiations.

As this is written, the President is about to undergo surgery. Together with all Americans, The Nation wishes him a speedy recovery. The Nation wishes also that Mr. Johnson might use this enforced vacation from daily responsibilities to weigh the stature and the possibilities of Pope Paul's "appeal to the moral conscience of man."

The Bigger War

What the President should do in Vietnam, and what he will do, are not likely to be the same thing. If the Pope's visit to the UN had come before the massive escalation of the war, the odds would likewise have been against peace, but for a different reason. At that time we were losing. In effect there have been two wars, the one before February, 1965, which we lost, and the wider war which succeeded it and which, by sheer weight of air power, we are winning. To quit while we were behind would have been intolerable. To quit while we are ahead, while we are in a position to negotiate from strength, is almost as difficult. We lose enthusiasm for negotiation in proportion as the balance of military strength shifts to our side. The goal then becomes total victory, with little regard for what may follow.

The recession of peace as American force in Vietnam approaches the Korea level is accelerated by the fact that the Vietnamese, North and South alike, are only pawns in the game. The real, the important enemy in the American military viewpoint is Red China. Secretary Rusk made this plain in his speech of October 5 before a group of editors and publishers. From beginning to end, the address was a tirade against "Peiping" (as though he were a pre-World War II Japanese militarist, the Secretary cannot bring himself to say "Peking"), which was held solely to blame for all the trouble in Asia. Mr. Rusk was supplying the diplomatic justification for a build-up of American strength in Vietnam of enormous proportions. U.S. News & World Report (October 11) carries an article by staff correspondent K. M. Chrysler on the base at Cam Ranh Bay, 200 miles northeast of Saigon on the South China Sea, which is being converted into "the mightiest U.S. military complex in Asia." Cam Ranh used to be a fishing village. It will be one of the world's largest military harbors and supply centers. Warehouses containing nearly 4 million square feet of dry storage space are under construction. A tank farm for gasoline and oil storage, connecting pipe lines to a tidewater ammunition depot, and other elaborate—and permanent—installations are being built. The base will be operated by 5,000 U.S. military personnel, who will be housed, fed and entertained in the usual American fashion of making war pleasant except for the actual moments of combat; and across the bay 2,000 South Vietnamese civilians will be quartered. More than 7,500 of our troops are there now, working around the clock, and a few miles to the north a private contractor is building what will be the biggest air base in the Far East. If anyone thinks that these gigantic operations, which are going on at a number of sites, are directed against the Vietcong, he is underestimating the prescience of Secretary McNamara, Gen. Maxwell Taylor and the Joint Chiefs of Staff,

Argentina's Friend

Once Robert S. McNamara sold automobiles, and he was very good at it. Now, in addition to his other duties, he sells arms, and he is just as good in that line. He has announced that since mid-1961 the United States has sold $9 billion worth of arms to free-world nations, and intends to keep up the pace indefinitely. The great peace-loving power of the West used to give away arms; now, with McNamara in charge, it sells them. Give or sell, the result is the same, as witness the outburst in Kashmir.

Mr. McNamara justifies America's role as a merchant of death—in the quaint phrase of the thirties—on the ground that since 1961 it has brought nearly a billion dollars of profit to American industry, and eased the balance-of-payments problem by some $5 billion. This is the economic side of it, but of course McNamara always has a moral reason for what he does. In this case the arms exports buttress the free world's defenses against communism. These defenses are internal as well as external; that is, the free nations must not only be in a position to fight Communist nations (or other free nations) but they must also be well armed against any of their own citizens who may have revolutionary designs.

One of these grievously threatened nations is Argentina. Here McNamara saw to it that the Argentinian generals got a real bargain. The French were trying to sell them Mirage jet bombers, which are rock bottom at $600,000 apiece. Instead, Argentina will receive fifty A4-B Douglas jet attack planes at about $250,000 each, a saving of more than $7 million which, conditions in Argentina being what they are, is no small consideration.

Of course critics who lack Mr. McNamara's inside knowledge and solicitude for the strength of the free world may ask why Argentina needs these aircraft at all. Who threatens Argentina? Red China, perhaps, or Ecuador? Neither seems very plausible, nor does any other probable enemy arise, yet we know there must be one, since Mr. McNamara surely would not be pushing these aircraft if there were nobody to shoot at. There is somebody, however, and Jack Scott, the Latin American correspondent of the Toronto Star, has discovered who it is.

Argentina, to no one's surprise, is to be saved from communism once again, and once again by the a navy and air force. A military coup is in prepar by the armed forces, supported by business gr industrialists and, says Scott, right-wing element the Catholic Church, who have evidently not h Pope Paul's plea for peace. A 55-year-old retired general, Edgar J. Landa, has been designated as savior. "The majority of our citizens," he annou "are clamoring for a dictatorship in the hope th will impose order, discipline and morality." An course, prevent a Communist take-over. In Ge Landa's book, President Arturo Ilia is little better a Communist, while his predecessor, Arturo Fron was an authentic Communist. Nor is there any nificant difference between Communists and "radical-liberal element."

What are we to conclude? Obviously, that Argen or at least the upper crust there, has no better f than Robert McNamara. And the same goes for American arms manufacturer.

The Real Conflict

We trust that Roger Stevens will soon be reli of Congressional harassment on the ground tha former activities as a theatre producer suggest a flict of interest with his present position as Chair of the National Council on the Arts. The notion Mr. Stevens would somehow use his government tion to assist the fortunes of productions in whic had an investment is ludicrous. The Stevens re tion is based precisely on the fact that the show chooses to back become bonanzas; he need sca resort to malfeasance to support the tottering fort of such properties as West Side Story, Mary, Ma Cat on a Hot Tin Roof.

The reason (beyond simple justice) for relie Mr. Stevens of this suspicion is that his appoint involves a different conflict with the public inte which the question of financial probity obscures. Council on the Arts was established, after many of struggle, because of a growing dissatisfaction the quality of art that is nourished by our comme enterprises, and particularly by our commercial the Problems of the market place, it was thought, stunted America's aesthetic vigor. If those wer moved, its art would flourish.

Granted, this is a theory, and the Council is a periment. But it is an experiment handicapped the start by the fact that President Johnson has fit to place at its head a man whose professiona has been shaped by the very situation the Coun designed to relieve. Roger Stevens is the symb Broadway success; his world is that of the box o the weekly gross, movie rights and the biggest n in the brightest lights. He is good at his job, an has given playgoers some excellent evenings i theatre. But it is inconceivable that he is the best available to free art from the shackles of comm To Roger Stevens, commerce is no shackle; it i backbone of his life's work.

Civil War on Madison Avenue

“You must know,” said the speaker, “. . . that among lucated Americans, and particularly among today's llege students, advertising is highly suspect; its ex- sses have made it so; and there is no indication at there is the slightest effort being made currently the part of the guilty advertisers to curb these.” It as not some black-hearted enemy of the advertising dustry who made this charge but one of its brightest minaries—Fairfax M. Cone, chairman of the execu- e committee of Foote, Cone & Belding—and he was eaking not to some assemblage of eggheads, but to e Chicago chapter of the Public Relations Society America. Mr. Cone is one of those admen who, ithout conspicuous success, have tried to prevent eir colleagues from killing the goose that lays the lden eggs. The goose is killed in two ways. One is preposterous claims that leave a trail of disillusion- ent; the other, which perturbs Mr. Cone and other ges of the industry even more, is an increasing ndency to disparage the competition.

It has been a rule of decorum in modern advertis- g that, though you may puff up your product to e bursting point, you must not openly attack a rival roduct. If once the ad profession started on that ath, what scandalous revelations might not be laid efore a still partially trusting public? And besides, ow impolitic to run down the product of another gency's client when, with all his frailties, he may e your client next month.

This prudent policy has in fact been incorporated the codes which guide the ethical adman. Since the ient who foots the bills has something to say about ch matters, and the adman's ethics are perforce bject to some modification by the practical demands business, these commandments are a little vague their wording. Section 10 (6) of the National As- ociation of Broadcasters TV code, for instance, says that advertising copy “should contain no claims dealing unfairly with competitors, competitive products or other industries, professions or institutions.” But what is unfair? For years the gas and oil interests, and lately the electric utilities as well, have been disparaging one another's products in the home heating markets. By claiming that gas is clean, for instance, the advertiser implies that oil is dirty; by urging the customer to “move up to electric heat” the advertiser implies that if the customer selects either of the other fuels he is buying a backward technology and degrading his family's social status. However, the oil, gas and electric interests have not, for the most part, named the allegedly inferior fuel.

This gentlemanly restraint is now vanishing. A Western distributor of Renault cars has been picturing Renault running circles around Volkswagen. American Motors intends to employ a “friendly giant killer” theme in an upcoming campaign and to name General Motors, Ford and Chrysler. A Gillette TV commercial displays Personna, Schick and Wilkinson blades—not, one may be sure, to the disadvantage of Gillette. Procter & Gamble claims that its Safegard soap will deodorize the user better than the “leading deodorant soap,” which everybody in the anti-body-odor industry knows is Armour's Dial, incidentally handled by Foote, Cone & Belding.

All these campaigns Mr. Cone deplores in a tone of moral indignation, but he rests his case on the argument that overt disparagement in advertising will be bad for business. Perhaps so, but what about the public? When advertisers fall out, isn't it possible that honest men will get valuable information? Mr. Cone concedes that some advertising is outrageous, an insult to the intelligent buyer. One would expect that in this sector the bloodiest battles will be fought. The good guys will be separated from the bad guys, and the gullible section of the public may begin to see that a lot of advertising is plain imposture.

The Nuclear Club

WHY THE OUTS WANT IN

. . . . . Milton Viorst

Washington

here was surely oversimplification, not a touch of hyprocrisy, in Pres- lent Johnson's statement last Au- ust that the proliferation of nu- lear weapons is the “gravest of all nresolved human issues.” It is not e spread but the use of nuclear eapons that can wipe out the orld; and while the United States has been pious in the cause of limiting nuclear spread, it has been strangely silent on the subject of limiting nuclear use.

By ignoring the problem of nuclear use, the treaty on proliferation proposed by the American representatives at the disarmament conference in Geneva would affect only the nonnuclear powers. It contains no suggestion that halting nuclear proliferation might somehow be linked to restraining nuclear use. The American proposal, said the President, “demonstrates that a treaty can be drawn which meets the legitimate interests of nuclear and nonnuclear powers alike,” but to an outsider the draft treaty looks like an offer by one state to give away the prerogatives of others. It could have no conceivable impact on American policies and practices. There is little reason for surprise, then, that the President's statement, along with the proposal itself, was received around the world with stony silence.

By proposing limitations on proliferation before reaching agree-

---

ilton Viorst is the author of Hostile llies: FDR and De Gaulle (Macmil- in). He is currently working on The ecline and Fall of the Republican arty.

ment on use, the United States puts the cart before the horse. If the nuclear powers could agree upon terms governing the use of their weapons, the nonnuclear powers would be relieved of much of the incentive for joining the nuclear club. The United States, however, has shown no inclination to make any agreement that would replace total anarchy with a set of rules, even very limited rules. As long as Washington persists in this position, it seems delusive to believe that other nations of the world will voluntarily forswear all opportunity for nuclear weaponry.

The American differences with France illustrate most vividly the national confusion of cause and effect on the subject of nuclear proliferation. Sen. John Pastore of Rhode Island, commenting on Sen. Robert Kennedy's June speech on proliferation, declared that "much of our trouble with de Gaulle today is due to the fact that he is trying to become a prominent member of the nuclear club." But Pastore had the situation precisely reversed. De Gaulle is trying to become a prominent member of the nuclear club because we have had trouble with him. He wants his own nuclear force because French and American interests in certain vital areas are so different that he feels unable to depend on American weapons when he thinks France may need them.

As Pastore's statement indicates, America attributes de Gaulle's position to an excess of French nationalist ardor, to a quest for national prestige. It finds no merit in France's reluctance to put its fate in American hands. It regards as unreasonable the French Government's demands to make—or, at least, to share fully in making—its own life-and-death decisions. It recognizes no legitimacy to the argument that a nation cannot surrender to another nation the power to determine its own interests. Americans largely believe that a country need only rely on the United States to be assured of security. De Gaulle does not so much doubt America's integrity as its willingness to violate its own national interests when those of France are at stake.

The draft treaty submitted at Geneva says nothing about American guarantees to the nonnuclear powers. Senator Kennedy proposed that the United States put all countries which agree to withdraw from the nuclear race under an American "nuclear umbrella." Kennedy would have the United States say to the nonnuclear states: "You give up your right to acquire your own nuclear weapons and we will take care of you with ours." But Ambassador Goldberg, in a speech to the UN on September 23, did not go nearly that far. He promised simply that the United States would support the General Assembly in devising means to prevent nuclear blackmail. Goldberg's statement seemed to make quite clear that the United States is not willing to mortgage its own security in return for another government's consent to forswear nuclear arms.

But assuming American adoption, at some future date, of the Kennedy concept of a "nuclear umbrella," there is no certainty that it would attract the nonnuclear powers. Kennedy stipulated American guarantees would apply only to cases of "nuclear aggression." He declared that "such an umbrella . . . must be divorced from and superior to the other policy aims of the nations involved." But how can a sovereign, self-respecting nation accept a control over its fate that is "divorced from and superior to" its policy aims? One of its policy aims might be to save itself from nuclear blackmail, such as Hitler, for example, practiced with less sophisticated instruments on the Czechs in 1938. Another of its policy aims might be to save itself from a force that is not armed with nuclear weapons but otherwise vastly superior. Under such circumstances, would the American "nuclear umbrella" be of any service? Presumably, it would be up to the United States to decide. The very premise of the American proposal is that the United States is morally and intellectually, as well as militarily, competent to look after the well-being of the rest of the world. The rest of the world is not persuaded that the premise is valid.

India is a classic example of a country that is not unfriendly to the United States, has philosophical objections to nuclear weapons, does not want to go to the expense of building or buying them, but might, nonetheless, be forced by considerations of national security to seek membership in the nuclear club. Under an American "nuclear umbrella," India would be reasona certain that the United States wc retaliate in kind if Commu China exploded a nuclear bo over New Delhi. But if Chin hordes—to say nothing of Pakista —begin pouring over the front the United States will not star nuclear war in India's defe Since the recent border fighting, mestic pressure on the Shastri g ernment to initiate a nucl weapons program has been alm irresistible. India's dilemma ill trates the problem of the nucl bomb as deterrent against "conv tional" war. India would feel more secure against Chinese atta nuclear or nonnuclear, if it had own nuclear weapons to rat They would have far greater g eral utility than any conceiva American guarantee.

The situation governing defense of Western Europe is once more simple and more co plicated. It is more simple beca the United States has alre pledged itself under the NA treaty to defend Western Euro with nuclear weapons if necess But it is complicated by Ameri statements on strategic plann which suggest that the response a nonnuclear Soviet attack wo be a nonnuclear defense. Af twenty years of peace and p perity, Western Europe appears l than satisfied with this arra ment. France and Germany, countries best able to influe strategy, see little generosity America's willingness to save world — and the United States from nuclear destruction by s mitting Europe to "conventio destruction. They indicate that t would rather gamble on a lightn nuclear war than acquiesce in extended bloodletting such as suffered in the two most rec conflicts. De Gaulle's force frappe strategy is founded on gamble. To many Europeans, a clear arsenal is more important a deterrent to conventional than nuclear war.

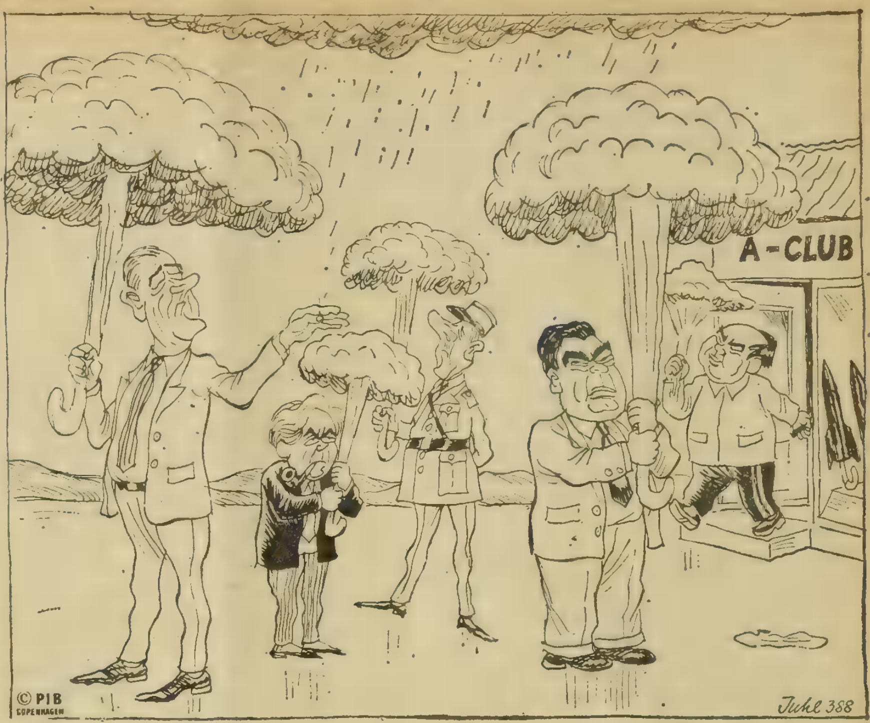
The Western European situa is further complicated by Bo interest in German reunificat which is, presumably, the most portant of its "policy aims." In past, Germany has indicated it would not seek nuclear weap in order to achieve it; more rec ly, government officials have at Germany would agree to re- ain a nonnuclear power only if ngible progress was made toward unification. Since de Gaulle un- ertook his nuclear-weapons pro- am, the United States has ac- pted the view that Germany could ot be kept indefinitely in a state nuclear inferiority. To forestall national nuclear force, Washing- n invented the Multilateral Nu- ear Force (MLF). It was designed give Germany some theoretical cess to nuclear decisions but ould, in reality, retain American ntrol. Nevertheless, MLF has be- me the Russians' bête noire; they e in it a German finger on the ATO nuclear trigger. The Ger- ans are willing to accept the MLF mpromise but other major powers NATO are not. Meanwhile, Bonn cognizes the anxiety it can create nd has quietly begun a game of uclear blackmail with the avowed m of unifying Germany.

India and West Germany are vo of the twelve countries named a 1960 study as being capable manufacturing nuclear weapons. wo of the remaining ten coun- ies—France and China—have al- eady become members of the club. ll that they needed was an in- entive to make the effort. The sraelis, whose incentive is defense gainst the Arabs, may have the apacity and may be using it. The wiss, in a 1962 referendum, in- tructed their government not to ake an anti-nuclear pledge. In- onesia's Sukarno insists, in the ace of much skepticism, that his ountry will explode a nuclear de- ice by the end of the year. The nited States may invoke the vir- ue of abstinence in perfect sin- erity, but as matters stand it has ittle chance of talking countries uch as these out of manufacturing heir own bombs.

The United States is awkwardly laced to mount an anti-prolifera- ion campaign because of its own se of the nuclear threat. A coun- ry that will not accept temperance or itself can scarcely urge prohibi- ion on others. The United States as never gone even as far as hina or Russia in swearing never o be the first to use nuclear weap- ns. Washington has never con- ented to any of the nuclear inhibi- ions that it now asks others to ac- ept.

On its own, the United States rought the world to the threshold of nuclear war during the Cuban crisis of 1962. It was, to be sure, severely provoked by the Soviet Union. Perhaps Russia was even guilty, by some definition, of that "nuclear aggression" which Senator Kennedy regards as justifying a nuclear response. Still, it was President Kennedy's decision, made unilaterally, that the Soviet missiles upset the international balance of power. Many who were friends of the United States thought, even while backing Kennedy, that the missiles merely subjected this country to the same dangers that its allies had long experienced. Kennedy's decision, while it may have been correct for the entire West, was made in the national interest of the United States. As Sorensen wrote, President Kennedy had determined upon "going ahead, regardless of how the allies reacted." Millions who live within range of hostile missiles had a right to wonder if the circumstances justified the risks to them.

The tacit American threat to employ nuclear weapons in Vietnam raises even more serious questions. There, the United States does not rattle its bombs openly. Instead, it declares a policy of escalation, then declines to renounce the nuclear ultimate in escalation. The American role in the Vietnamese war, unlike the Cuban crisis, has not won widespread sympathy. Washington's allies are, at best, cool to it, and the government cannot claim that it acts for the non-Communist world. "Nuclear aggression" is not involved. But the United States nonetheless employs the threat of nuclear war as an instrument of its own diplomacy. It can scarcely ask other countries to abjure such weapons while it makes use of their power, real or potential, for its own "policy aims."



Ben Roth Agency

The Soviet Union has already rejected the American draft treaty at Geneva, although Moscow opposes proliferation at least as strongly as does Washington. Since their first bomb was exploded shortly after World War II, the Russians have pursued a policy of sharing their knowledge of nuclear weaponry with no one. If they are angry about the American draft, it is not because they object to its goals but because they mistrust its proponent, who has left in its provisions a conspicuous loophole to permit Germany and other NATO countries to participate in a Multilateral Force.

The remaining nuclear powers appear to bring somewhat different approaches to Washington's draft treaty. Great Britain is as committed as the United States and the Soviet Union to restricting membership in the nuclear club, but it is not convinced that it should replace its own nuclear force with that of MLF. The French and the Chinese claim no aversion to proliferation as acute as that of the other nuclear powers. Neither, of course, signed the test-ban treaty. However, there is no evidence that either France or China has provided information on nuclear weaponry to any would-be nuclear powers. It is conceivable, though not considered likely, that Peking is somehow behind Sukarno's nuclear boasts. It is far more probable that all five nuclear powers want to halt nuclear spread, even if they cannot, for various political reasons, agree on a treaty that would ban the dissemination of weapons technology.

More than any other, it is the nonnuclear powers—friendly, neutral and enemy—that stand in the way of an anti-proliferation treaty. What the United States has asked them to accept at Geneva is not a bargain, in which some quid pro quo would be involved, but a self-denying ordinance. It is true that these same nonnuclear powers voluntarily limited their capacity to develop weapons by signing the test-ban treaty in 1962. But under that treaty, it was not they alone who accepted limitations. All the signatories, nuclear and nonnuclear, agreed to refrain from further tests in the atmosphere. The treaty not only retarded weapons development among the signers but saved the atmosphere from further fallout. The draft treaty on proliferation burdens only one group of signers, without any demonstrable benefit to all.

Goldberg sketched areas in the September 23 speech on which the United States might be willing to compromise. In terms hedged with limitations, he avowed that the United States was interested in freezing the manufacture of delivery vehicles, halting the production of fissionable materials for weapons use and dismantling, on a one-for-one basis with the Soviet Union, a reasonable number of nuclear weapons. Goldberg sounded pious enough but it is no secret that the United States is already far ahead of the rest of the world—the Soviet Union possibly excepted—in its stockpile of delivery vehicles and fissionable materials. As for the weapons themselves, even the Pentagon acknowledges the possession of a substantial "overkill" capacity. Once again, the nonnuclear powers might legitimately ask of the American overtures, what's in it for them?

It is not impossible to think of concessions that the nuclear powers might offer to make an anti-proliferation treaty more palatable to the nonnuclear powers. The concessions, presumably, would have to take the form either of increasing the access of nonnuclear powers or decreasing the access of nuclear powers to existing nuclear arsenals. Certainly no agreement can be completely satisfactory to all nations and probably none can be devised that might not, under certain circumstances, actually increase the chances of war. Nuclear weapons are credited by some with having thus far prevented World War III. They may, at this point, be more a mixed blessing than an unmitigated curse. Nevertheless, it is hard to imagine a riskier way to preserve civilization than to place bets on its obliteration. Few sane citizens of the earth would not feel safer if agreement could be reached for reducing the possibilities of nuclear war. Few believe that the present anarchic system is the best that can be devised.

The nuclear powers could, of course, go all the way and agree to scrap their bombs. Nuclear disarmament, quite apart from general disarmament, would certainly make a persuasive argument against proliferation. It may ultimately prove to be the only argument. But would the Western powers, fearful of being outnumbered by the Eastern hordes, ever agree to surrender their most potent defense? A strong argument could be made that the nuclear weapon is the West's last line of defense. Even if the argument is refuted, the mutual distrust of the nuclear powers appears to preclude any meaningful disarmament agreement in the predictable future.

As an alternative concession, the United States could make some provision to extend the concept of the "nuclear umbrella" to the very "policy aims" that Senator Kennedy would divorce from it. The institutional technique would, at best, be complicated. It would require that a mechanism be established by which potential nuclear powers could influence decisions that affect their fate. There must, of course, be safeguards against the deployment of nuclear weapons "policy aims" that are in any w aggressive, but countries such India or Israel must be permit to share in decisions on wh their defense depends. Such co tries might agree to step under American "nuclear umbrella," they could be assured that United States would not walk to leave them standing in the ra

The institutional mechani could take a variety of forms. T nonnuclear power might make bilateral arrangement with United States, the Soviet Union conceivably, both. A multilate system might be devised, within apart from existing diplomatic strumentalities. Careful organi tion and established rules co avoid the paralysis that consul tion normally generates. Above the mechanism must provide means whereby a nonnuclear pow need not throw itself upon mercy of a nuclear power if it lieves that a threat to its integr requires some sort of nuclear sponse. The way must be open a government to plead its nation interest prior to any nuclear de sion.

Perhaps Moscow's deep hostil to MLF signifies that any arran ment to "democratize" nuclear de sions will be regarded as a fo of proliferation. The Soviet fear not groundless, but a carefully co structed mechanism need not me more fingers to pull the trigger; could mean more fingers to stop from being pulled. At its best, su an arrangement could produce greater spread of the nuclear ve

The system would, necessari deprive the United States of co plete nuclear independence. On own, the United States would longer be free to drop a bom whether in the defense of Euro or South Vietnam. In more pra tical terms, Washington would required to give up the threat nuclear war as an instrument national diplomacy. But this wou probably be the most convinci demonstration it could make.

Still another alternative ava able to the nuclear powers to tard proliferation would be to lin the use of their weapons to certa very specific circumstances. T least that the nuclear powers cou give, in return for an anti-prolife tion agreement from a nonnucle power, would be a pledge never nuclear weapons on that power. h of the nuclear powers could a step further in the cause of -proliferation by pledging to re- in from being first to use their nbs. These pledges would have overwhelming advantage of nplicity. They would require no pection. They would not impose armament on suspicious nuclear vers. To be sure, they would not isfy a nonnuclear power that ked to nuclear weapons as deter- its to conventional attack, but they would reduce the nuclear have-not's fear of nuclear neighbors and thereby eliminate a strong incentive to proliferation. Such pledges would have the additional advantage of applying to weapons that already exist and not simply to those which might exist at some uncertain time in the future.

It is clear, above all, that the current system possesses the very lively dangers of both nuclear proliferation and nuclear use. "The threat to peace—and to human life itself" —said President Johnson, in submitting his treaty, "is universal. If the response is universal, the threat can be met." But the draft treaty that he proposed represents no significant step to meet that threat. Surely the United States can come up with a plan that is not so singularly self-serving, that contains some suggestion of understanding, that will genuinely reduce the possibility of nuclear war. The seriousness of the situation demands further reflection.

EW CURRICULUM FOR TEACH-INS

Christopher Lasch

e organizers of the teach-in move- nt, most of them professors at University of Michigan, still m a little dazed by their unex- ted and almost inadvertent suc- ss. They tell you with a mixture pride and uneasiness that teach- have been held, in imitation of one at Michigan, in England, Australia, in Japan, in South Viet- m itself. At the same time they e the impression of shrinking ck from some of the implications the position into which events ve thrust them. They talk about need to move on from "mere" iticism to "constructive sugges- ns," as if they were groping to- rd a more acceptable posture an that of moral outrage, a pos- re which would not expose them the charge of being fuzzy-minded ealists who know nothing of the mplicated issues involved in Viet- m; a posture, moreover, more nsistent with the academic self- age. Protest, accordingly, gives y to the "study group" earnestly arching for "alternatives." Specif- lly, on September 14-18 at Ann bor (scene of the first teach-in st March), it gave way to an in- rnational conference on "alterna- e perspectives on Vietnam."

The teach-in movement has been vided from the start between those the one hand who see themselves as protestants and who wish to broaden the base of protest by reaching out to the student community and the civil rights movement, and those on the other hand who see themselves essentially as expert advisers to the government. The desire for a "confrontation" with McGeorge Bundy, which was finally consummated last summer in a televised debate between Bundy and Hans J. Morgenthau, is a good example of the latter line of thinking. The failure of the televised debate gave point to the objection of a minority within the teach-in movement: that debates with the government inevitably take place on the government's ground and degenerate into quibbles among experts about the facts of the situation in Vietnam, thereby blunting the moral issue raised by American involvement and by the progressive enlargement of the war. In their call for the Ann Arbor conference, the Michigan group appeared to have made certain concessions to the protestants within the movement. They spoke of the importance of the moral issue and held out the promise that "by approaching these questions from the moral perspectives of all great religious and philosophical systems, we may find solutions that are more consistent with fundamental human values than current American policy in Vietnam has turned out to be." They also expressed the hope that by making the teach-in movement genuinely international—the Ann Arbor meeting stressed its international character—they could "approach American policy from fundamentally different perspectives." These statements seemed to imply that the conference would devote itself not so much to finding specific alternatives in Vietnam as to looking at America itself—American foreign policy in general, and beyond that, the society of which it is an expression—from perspectives which transcend the American "consensus."

Judged in the light of these expectations, the conference was a disappointment. Several "study groups" met in closed sessions for three days and then reported the results of their labors in a public session in Hill auditorium, a cavernous place in which a large audience—mostly Michigan students—sweltered patiently in unseasonable September heat. After the reports, the meeting, with two hours out for dinner, heard a succession of speeches, ending, late in the evening, with an address by Arthur Miller. The conference then broke up—in accordance with the "Michigan teach-in tradition," we were told—into a number of simultaneous seminars, each running far into the night. The next and final day was devoted to "action workshops" charged with generating specific proposals for protest and/or "confronting" the government. There were a few bright spots in this lengthy program, but the general effect was dreary. Indeed, the terminology itself, together with the appeal to the "teach-in tradition," suggests that spontaneity has already given way to a certain amount of bureaucratization — inevitable, hristopher Lasch, a member of the istory Department, the University Iowa, is the author of The Amer- an Liberals and the Russian Revolu- on (Columbia University Press), d most recently, The New Radical- m in America 1889-1963: The In- llectual as a Social Type (Knopf).

---

perhaps, in any organization, but depressing nevertheless.

The "alternatives" generated within the "study groups" struck one as platitudinous. "We examined the assumption," one group reported, "that threats are more effective [in reaching some kind of settlement in Vietnam] than positive incentives." After painful consideration, the group had decided that incentives were more effective than threats. Too much of the discussion was on that level. Furthermore, too much of it turned on narrow questions of fact. Was the National Liberation Front representative of the popular will? Was it primarily a nationalist or a Communist movement? Did it practice terror? Was the terror employed by the other side worse than our own?

At the end of a long afternoon, Robert Parris, field secretary of SNCC, pointed out that this excessive preoccupation with facts defeats itself. For every fact on one side of the debate it is possible to produce facts on the other side; and the government, in any argument over facts, necessarily has the last word, since it can claim to have more facts than its critics. The debate over Vietnam, Parris argued, should revolve not around facts but around theory—the theory, for instance, that American atrocities in Vietnam are not chance violence but part and parcel of a criminal war. Theories, he said—the theory of racism in the South, the theory of American benevolence in Asia—are notably resistant to change. They can absorb contrary facts and explain them away. Theories must be confronted with theories. The theory of American benevolence must be confronted with the theory of the dirty war (and beyond that, I would argue, with a theory about the cold war in general, in which the whole myth of American benevolence would be tested against the theory that Americans are not exempt from the corrupting influence of great power). One of the most puzzling features of the teach-in movement, however, remains its unwillingness to open up a larger debate about American foreign policy. On the contrary, the sponsors of the movement argue that it is useless to debate the larger issue until the war in Vietnam is brought to an end.

What can be done, then, to bring it to an end? The assumption of the teach-ins seems to be that the government must be persuaded, by a combination of argument and orderly demonstration, to end the war. It must be made to see that other alternatives exist, that it is possible to negotiate a settlement, that the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front are ready to negotiate. But what if the government chooses to remain deaf to such appeals? We have been told that at least one approach from North Vietnam was rejected by the Johnson Administration because it came during the Goldwater campaign, and Johnson was afraid to appear before the voters as an "appeaser." I did not hear a single reference, during the entire conference in Ann Arbor, to the domestic political implications of a settlement in Vietnam. I heard many references to the fact that France had been able to withdraw from Algeria without losing its international prestige, but no one pointed out the obvious differences between the French case and the American.

France was able to remove itself from Algeria because a national hero coupled withdrawal with an appeal to glory; and even then, de Gaulle found it necessary to suppress the opposition by force and impose on the country a regim of repression which has not bee lifted yet. Johnson is not a nation hero, nor is he in a position to su press the Republican Party; and h political vulnerability—the vulner bility of any Democratic Presiden on cold-war issues—opens up t prospect that we may have to wa for a Republican President, anoth Eisenhower, to put an end to t war in Vietnam. (By that time the will be nothing left of Vietnam Appalling as this prospect is, it one that critics of President Joh son would do well to take in account.

Those critics would do well, i short, to consider the possibility th no amount of persuasion wi change the central fact of America politics—the fact that there is n opposition party, no political o position at all to the rhetorical b enormously effective demand th we stand up to the Communist resist "aggression," avoid anoth "Munich." Until the political com plexion of the country is radicall changed, the political liabilities liquidating the cold war will co tinue to outweigh its advantage As long as the appeal to anti-com munism brings automatic and u failing success, we shall continu to be faced with the phenomeno superficially so hard to explain, "liberal" Presidents who execute th policies of their most outspoke critics on the far Right. Thing would be different if the America Left had not long ago committe itself to outdo the Right in its ant Communist zeal; but once the Le itself accepted anti-communism the sine qua non of political respec ability, it became the prisoner its own immediate success, survi ing the postwar hysteria only to fi that hysteria had become a pe manent feature of the politic scene.

These facts, so notably al sent from the discussions at th University of Michigan, so indi pensable to any consideration American policy in Vietnam or an where else, explain why it is futi to reason with the present Admi istration, or indeed with any a ministration. The Administratio cannot be persuaded, it has to forced to change the direction American policy. The real questio which critics ought to be conside is what kind of force promises earliest success.

here would seem to be two pos-lities, not necessarily incompat-but difficult to pursue at the ne time. One is mass civil disdience, the weapon of the civil nts movement; and it is interest-
, in this connection, that Robert ris and a few other leaders of civil rights movement were pres-in Ann Arbor. One of them, lton Goodlett, editor of the San ncisco Sun-Reporter, cited the e-speech movement at Berkeley an example of the possibilities civil disobedience; and one could all many such examples—begin-g with the Montgomery bus boy-t—from the civil rights struggle the South. Whatever the moral plications of civil disobedience, atever the importance of making witness" against arbitrary power, essence of civil disobedience, as odlett tried to show, is coercion.
bringing the normal processes government to a halt (as, for in-nce, when more arrests have to made than the normal agencies law enforcement can possibly ndle), masses of demonstrators n sometimes force authority to ld on a given point. And mass il disobedience is a tactic that nceivably might be used in the ace movement as well.

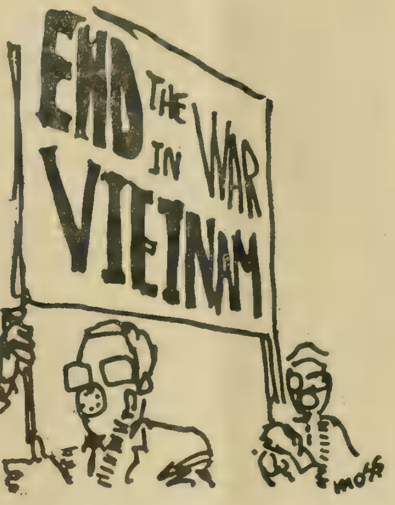
So far, civil disobedience in the ace movement has figured only the form of isolated acts of con-ence, possibly educative but hard-coercive. If civil disobedience re to be really effective, the move-nt would have to become much ger than it presently is. That is e of the difficulties in the way of ing civil disobedience as an in-ument of agitation against Amer-n foreign policy. The other dif-ulty is that the situations in ich civil disobedience has been ccessful are not precisely analous to the foreign-policy crisis. In e case of Montgomery and Berke, civil disobedience was effective cause it could be used against al authorities who were fully imicated in the policies under dis-te. Those policies—racial discrim-ation, free speech—were issues of tional importance which never-eless had a local dimension and local impact. Questions of foreign licy, however, rarely present emselves as local issues; and even hen they do, as in the case of the ening or closing of military installations which have local significance, so much of the ultimate power of decision lies in Washington that it is hard to bring nonviolent coercion to bear. Some people have been predicting for several months that the power of the civil rights movement will shortly make itself felt in the agitation for peace, but these predictions still seem to me somewhat unconvincing, because of the inherently different nature of the two issues.

The other alternative, the other means of forcing a change in American policy, is to build an effective opposition along traditional lines—a body of opinion, translatable into votes, which will be resistant to cold-war clichés and skeptical of anti-Communist crusades. Communism has too long been an obsession of American politics; it is time some drastic therapy laid it to rest. I do not propose a direct assault on the radical Right or even on the Center. It is the anti-Communist Left which most needs to be purged of its obsession with the menace; for it was the failure of the Left, its failure to function as an opposition, which in the forties and fifties made possible the emergence of the "bipartisan" foreign policy from which we still suffer. Even now the political climate is beginning to change, for a new generation is emerging for whom the trauma of Stalinism is a dead issue. But older liberals, with their tremendous emotional investment in the disappointments of the past, assume toward the new generation an irritating condescension, and assure them that they will live to suffer the same disappointments and learn the same bitter lessons about the incompatibility of freedom and revolution. The new Left, in reply, denounces the old as "irrelevant"—the fate of all middle-aged people in America. The generational split on the Left thus mirrors a deeper sickness of American life, the absolute discontinuity between youth and age; and to attack the problem at the political level might suggest the possibility of attacking it at other levels as well.



END THE WAR IN VIETNAM
moth

The importance of the generational issue is what made the device of the "teach-in" initially so suggestive as a technique of agitation. Teach-ins represent precisely the mingling of age groups which has to occur before an effective Left can take shape—for the students alone do not constitute an opposition, whatever some of them may say about the irrelevance of their elders. Unfortunately, the very political crisis which created the teach-ins—the war in Southeast Asia—prevents them from becoming an effective instrument either of opposition or of education; the leaders of the movement have subordinated everything to the effort to stop the war in Vietnam. Quite apart from everything else, stopping the war in Vietnam is not a subject worth "teaching." It has very little intellectual content; a certain number of points can be made, and the subject is quickly exhausted. The real subject that needs to be "taught" is the history of the cold war and of the relation of the American Left to communism. The Left needs to reconsider its own history, as a patient therapeutically reconstructs his past. It needs to reconsider the origins of the cold war; it needs to reconsider what it means to have "chosen" the West; it needs to reconsider Stalinism itself—was it an aberration or a historical necessity?—in order to get some perspective on the history of the 20th-century revolution.

These are subjects, as distinguished from "alternatives" in Vietnam, worth teaching. Until the "teach-ins" begin to teach, they will be politically useless and intellectually boring. It will be interesting to see whether the failures of higher education—the confusion of education with expertise, the idea that students are a needless obstacle to "research"—will now repeat themselves in the political agitation to which teachers find themselves so unexpectedly committed.

Atomic Insurance

The Ticklish Statistics . . . . David E. Pesoner

San Francisco

There exists considerable evidence that the Atomic Energy Commission, under pressure from the private utility industry and the manufacturers of nuclear reactors, has recently suppressed a report that could profoundly affect the course of the atomic power industry. The report deals with the theoretical consequences of a major accident in a large nuclear power plant.

In 1954 Congress passed the Atomic Energy Act "in the hope and belief that the substantial entry of private industry into the atomic energy program would speed the further development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy. . . . " However, industry was discouragingly slow in the development and installation of large nuclear power plants, and the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy (JCAE) initiated an inquiry into the causes of the delay. It found that "the problem of potential liability and the inability to obtain adequate insurance from commercial sources in connection with the operation of nuclear reactors constituted a major obstacle to further private industrial participation in this program. . . . "

The JCAE requested the AEC's Brookhaven National Laboratory to study more precisely what the effects of a major accident would be. The resulting report has come to be called the Brookhaven Report; its official title is WASH-740. Released in limited supply in 1957, it has become widely available, over the intervening years, mostly by word of mouth and Xerox machine.

The Brookhaven Report laid great stress on the low probability of a major accident. (Six months after its release, the infamous Windscale incident occurred in England. Some experts believe that evidence from Windscale, which resulted in heavy radioiodine (I-131) fallout, has "changed the parameters" of the original Brookhaven Report.) Despite the small chances of a big accident, the report concluded that the consequences of such an occurrence would be catastrophic — far beyond normal industrial experience or ability to indemnify: 3,400 fatalities, 43,000 radiation injuries, $7 billion property damage spread over an area of 150,000 square miles.

Consequently, the JCAE drafted, and Congress passed on September 2, 1957, the so-called Price-Anderson Indemnity Act. The basic provisions of the act were: (1) the federal government assumed liability for major nuclear accidents, up to the amount of $500 million; (2) reactor owners were required to obtain an additional $60 million coverage from one of several special syndicates of private insurance companies; (3) a ceiling of $560 million was placed on public liability. If claims by survivors exceeded that amount, the total coverage was to be parceled out to claimants on a pro rata basis. The legal and procedural machinery for so massive and tragic a cutting of the pie are far from clear.

In recommending passage of the act, the JCAE reported:

> The provisions of this bill provide governmental indemnification to those licensees who obtain their licenses [from the AEC] within the next 10 years. The indemnification agreement is to run for the life of the license. During the 10-year period it is hoped that there will be enough experience gained so that the problems of reactor safety will be to a great extent solved and the insurance people will have had the experience on which to base a sound program of their own.

The act was to remain in effect for ten years, at which time the committee would review its effectiveness.

As the expiration date of the first Price-Anderson Act approached (August 1, 1967), the utility industry, the manufacturers of reactors, the AEC and the JCAE began preparing to extend it for another ten years. The AEC reported to the committee this year that "it is possible to postulate extremely unlik ly, theoretical nuclear acciden which, under certain circumstance conceivably would cause damag considerably in excess of [the] $6 million [currently available fro private sources]." And the JCAE i turn reported to the full Congres that:

> The experience in this field is not yet sufficiently great nor the technology sufficiently developed, that it is possible to deny the theoretical possibility of such an accident. . . . Accordingly, the principal reason for enacting the Price-Anderson legislation—the need to assure the availability of funds for the payment of claims arising out of a catastrophic nuclear incident—still persists.

In anticipation of hearings on tl extension, the now seven-year-ol original Brookhaven Report wa scheduled to be updated, to take in to account the increasing sophistication of reactor designs and protective measures, as well as the subsequent operating experience wit reactors in existence in 1957, o built soon thereafter. The repor was also to consider that reactor being planned today are both muc larger and closer to population centers than those contemplated te years ago. Whether these factor balance out in their effect on public safety would be of considerabl interest to citizens who may soo face the prospect of having a larg nuclear power plant in their vicin ity.

There is some reason to believ that the factors do not balance— that today's reactors pose a mor severe threat to public safety tha was anticipated in the 1957 Brookhaven Report. At the February 1965, meeting in Los Angeles of the American Nuclear Society, Cliffor K. Beck, deputy director of regulation for the AEC, made the following remarks in an address on "Reactor Siting Criteria and Practice in the U.S.":

> What is really troubling the nuclear community now in the siting of power reactors is the desire to move to a substantially different pattern for choosing reactor sites; at the same time major alterations and size increases in the reactors are taking place. . . . Pressures to

David E. Pesonen is a former consultant on conservation to the California legislature, and staff editor for the Sierra Club. In the past two years he has been executive secretary of a citizens' group that successfully opposed construction of a nuclear power plant at Bodega Head.

ove reactors closer to load [population] centers and nuclear technology at the same time has presented us with reactors of 5 times he power level and 3 or so times he fuel lifetime of reactors three ears ago.

Let me mention just one technical act to point up the significance of he changes that are occurring. here is a very large difference in he implications of a major meltdown in a 3,000 MW [megawatt] reactor as contrasted to that in a 300 MW reactor. For the small reactor, t may make good sense to surround t with a leak-proof, concrete "thermos bottle" containment, and, in ase of accident, just walk away nd let everything inside settle down nd cool off. For the 3,000 MW reactor all the thermal phenomena inside are greatly increased in magnitude and accelerated in the rate of ime-sequences. If you walk away rom that "thermos bottle," its temperature curve, after perhaps a momentary decline, will rise continuously and will simply heat up until it bursts, so a reliable cooling system must be added.

Thus, as reactors become larger and larger, as their fuel cycle lengthens, and as they are simultaneously moved toward population centers, the demand on the containment becomes much more exacting and the necessity of other systems working, besides just the containment vessels, becomes more urgent.

On December 3, 1964, at the annual meeting of the Atomic Industrial Forum (AIF), the principal rade association of the nuclear industry, AEC Commissioner John G. alfrey delivered an address titled, The Price-Anderson Law and afety," which began as follows:

My assignment today was to review with you the updating of the Brookhaven report on the theoretical consequences of major nuclear accidents, and secondly, the AEC's report on extending the Price-Anderson Act. Well, the Brookhaven study is not ready yet and the Price-Anderson Report is still in draft form, and has not been reviewed by the Commission. . . .

I think I should beg off on the Brookhaven study because my guesses on what it will say or should say could be irresponsible chatter on a ticklish subject that needs accurate reporting. All I will say is what you probably know, that seven years after the first study one is considering theoretically conceivable accidents in a reactor which is considerably larger than in 1957, located somewhat closer to population centers, with the confidence of increased operating experience and constantly improving design and engineered safeguards. My guess is—well, I just said I won't guess. (Emphasis added.)

Attending this meeting in San Francisco was one Hal Stroube, atomic information specialist (i.e., in charge of public relations for atomic power plants) for the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, the nation's largest private utility. Stroube and his company were fresh from defeat in one of the bitterest battles in the company's sixty-year history, the battle of Bodega Bay. [See "Outrage on Bodega Head" by Gene Marine, The Nation, June 22, 1963.] On October 30, one month before the Atomic Industrial Forum conference, PG&E had abandoned plans to build a 325 MW atomic plant at Bodega Head, a scenic peninsula about 50 miles north of San Francisco. The AEC had expressed some doubt as to the safety of the reactor (it was on an earthquake fault) after the utility had already invested $4 million excavating the foundations. This humiliating development was a familiar topic of hallway discussion of the AIF meeting.

About three months later, in a conference on reactor siting of the American Nuclear Society, a professional association of reactor engineers, PG&E's Mr. Stroube advised the AEC on ways to make his job a little easier next time:

My task here, of course, is not to poke fun at the AEC, and I don't intend to do that. I have simply pointed out several areas which I believe they could consider improving in order to make it easier for us to get on with our chore of public understanding. One last suggestion along these lines would be to do us a great big favor by cancelling the now-in-progress up-dating of the Brookhaven Report. I've eaten a steady diet of WASH-740 in the past three years as it became the bible of the anti-Bodega crowd, and no amount of pointing to the disclaimers in the three-page covering letter in the front of the report could overcome those chilling words. "3,400 people killed, 43,000 injuries, $7 billion in property damage" which rolled so glibly off their tongues from the depths of this theoretical study of the possible consequences of a major accident—and so forth. I agree with Mr. Lowenstein when he says that these figures are damaging when taken out of context, but simply putting them back into context as he suggests is about as easy as trying to unscramble an omelet and return it to its several shells.

And at the end of the printed proceedings of this meeting (published by the AEC's Division of Technical Information), under the heading "Summary of Discussion," occurs the following paragraph:

Two more ideas were proposed as means of helping to gain public acceptance of nuclear power. One was the suggestion that the public be made aware of how the hazards of various industries and various other aspects of daily living compare with atomic energy experience. The other was that the planned updating of the Brookhaven report, WASH-740, be dropped. The opinion was expressed that the original report has already caused serious problems in gaining public support > of nuclear power and that the revision would tend to begin a new cycle of problems.

Con Edison Nuclear Plant, Indian Point, N.Y.

The proceedings indicate no formal resolution requesting the AEC to abandon the Brookhaven revision: but both the ANS and the AIF are extremely powerful influences on the AEC and the Joint Committee. Indeed, many AEC personnel are members of the professional association, and the meetings of the trade association are studded with AEC participants.

However, in June, 1965, six months after AEC Commissioner Palfrey had told the AIF conference in San Francisco that the Brookhaven study "is still in draft form," JCAE Chairman Holifield wrote AEC Chairman Seaborg, and asked him to bring the committee up to date on (1) Price-Anderson indemnity, and (2) the Brookhaven Report. In his reply of June 18, Chairman Seaborg proceeded for two pages to skirt any mention of a specific report from the restudy of WASH-740. With studied vagueness he summarized the findings, in the following paragraph, which would seem to suggest that a report does exist somewhere in the closely guarded AEC catacombs:

> In answer to the second question, a restudy of the theoretical consequences of hypothetical accidents by our staff and that of Brookhaven has led us to fairly predictable conclusions. Reactors today are much larger than those in prospect in 1957, their fuel cycles are longer and their fission product inventories are larger. Therefore, assuming the same kind of hypothetical accidents as those in the 1957 study, the theoretically calculated damages would not be less and under some circumstances would be substantially more than the consequences reported in the earlier study. (Emphasis added.)

The computations required to arrive at these conclusions are quite complex, and Seaborg would have been unlikely to state them without a completed report to back him up.

All of these facts indicate that a restudy was begun of The Theoretical Possibilities and Consequences of Major Accidents in Large Nuclear Power Plants. Either the completed study or a preliminary version reached the following conclusions:

> (1) The chances for a major accident are low but greater than zero.
>
> (2) The consequences would be substantially greater than anticipated in 1957—i.e., greater than 3,400 fatalities, 43,000 radiation injuries, and $7 billion property damage.

But the mathematical conclusions of the new study—its chief reason for being—have been suppressed. Why? Is the utility industry's public relations "chore" the only explanation?

On June 22, 23 and 24, the JCAE held hearings on Price-Anderson extension. There were four witnesses from the AEC (including Commissioners Palfrey and Ramey) who supported the legislation (H.R. 8496). The "views of industry and the public" were given by two public witnesses (a former JCAE staff member, who supported the legislation, and a civil engineer from Madison, Wis., who opposed it) and twenty-one other witnesses in the following categories:

In favor—4 insurers of nuclear reactors
In favor—7 electric utilities or utility trade associations
In favor—7 reactor manufacturers or trade associations
Opposed—3 coal companies or coal trade associations

The motives of witnesses from coal companies and associations were naturally looked upon with some suspicion by the committee—a suspicion, one might add, that was not extended to witnesses from interests who supported the legislation. The coal industry has never exhibited a conspicuous concern for human welfare, but it appears that on this matter the self-interest of the coal industry coincides with the public interest. With respect to the elusive new Brookhaven Report, Joseph E. Moody, president of the National Coal Policy Conference, testified:

> It is also rather curious to us that, with full knowledge that this hearing was coming up in this session of Congress, and that the Joint Committee was to consider this important piece of legislation, a little special effort on the part of the Brookhaven Laboratory people could not have produced their new, basic evaluation for determining potential damages in the event of a nuclear accident. . . .
>
> I have the impression that there are doubts as to whether the extension of Price-Anderson in its present form is, indeed, good for the nuclear power industry. In fact, > it was stated that it tended to p > sent a massive façade to the pub > indicating a lack of confidence
> the part of Congress and, indeed, > the utilities themselves in the > tremely complicated machines us > to produce nuclear power.
>
> The alternative would be to ta
> a strong positive approach and > Price-Anderson expire, which mig > well develop an industry guided a > operated only by those who h > confidence in it.

The utility witnesses we unanimous that they would ab don plans to build nuclear po plants, unless the governm indemnity were extended. Th argument was a curious o although they were confident t atomic power plants were perfec safe, and they wouldn't dream risking the lives and property their many good customers, nev theless, if a big accident were occur they would not like to b
the responsibility. And this c sideration was great enough to decisive in future choices betwe coal and nuclear fuels. The follo ing exchange, for example, curred during the testimony
George C. Kinsman, vice preside of the Florida Power & Light Co
pany:

> Representative Price: If you fe > that your company could not secu > its construction permit before th > expiration of the Price-Anderso > Act of 1967, would you continu > your interest in the building of a > atomic power plant?
>
> Mr. Kinsman: That is a decisio > that I don't know that I can spea > to entirely. I think our directo > would take a very hard look befor > they went ahead, Mr. Price.

And with an eye to the cu tomers for their reactors, the man facturers echoed the utilities' po tion. As Charles H. Weaver, vi president of the Westinghou Electric Corporation, testified:

> There is no inconsistency betwee > saying, on the one hand, that atomi > power plants are safe for locatio > in large cities and that, on the othe > hand, Price-Anderson protectio > should be extended. There is onl > recognition that some men continu > to feel concern. If Price-Anderso > were not extended, we might wel > encounter the argument in reverse > namely, that we cannot locat > atomic power plants in large citie
> because there is no Price-Anderso > protection.
>
> Chairman Holifield: In your opin > ion, what would be the effect o
> the delay until next year in acting n the proposed Price-Anderson ex-nsion?

Mr. Weaver: Mr. Chairman, I iink the problem there is simply the ınger you delay the more difficult is for people to formulate their lans with any degree of finality.
articularly in the commercial area,
he electric utility industry is cerainly actively considering what hey are to do. I would feel that hey would question the desire to ontinue the development of atomic ower to the extent we have indiated is our wish to date if we were ıot to act on this promptly, once ıaving brought it to the table the vay we have.

It is hard to say what effect rease of the new Brookhaven Reırt might have had on these heargs and subsequent Congressional bate. The Price-Anderson extenon passed the Senate without deıte and cleared the House on Sep-mber 16 by a 337-to-30 vote. Durıg the one-hour limited debate, veral Appalachian states vainly ised constitutional objections to e ceiling on indemnity and object-l to the unseemly haste in renew-ıg the act two years before it ex-res. What might have been the te had the AEC not withheld the w report indicating potential dam-ges of perhaps $35 billion over 50,000 square miles? Only two ongressmen raised the old Brook-aven Report in House debate—nd that just in passing. After all, ıe only figures they had to work with were more than seven years old.

In a speech to the Atomic Industrial Forum, in October, 1957, a month after the first Price-Anderson Act was passed, AEC Chairman Lewis L. Strauss made these points:

> In line with the established, time-proven American tradition of free competition, as opposed to government control, and in conformity with both the letter and the spirit of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, we seek to bring about the development of nuclear power within the structure of private enterprise.
>
> We seek to establish at the earliest feasible time, an independent nuclear power industry—independent in all its stages from concept to operation — independent from government domination or government subsidy.

The AEC has proved itself most dexterous in defining the term "subsidy," as its support of the Price-Anderson Act suggests. And it has also shown enthusiasm for suppressing information that might prove inimical to its objectives. Perhaps the most celebrated instance occurred in the so-called PRDC case. Faced with a lawsuit brought by the United Auto Workers, against the granting of a construction permit for a reactor to be constructed at Monroe, Mich., by the Power Reactor Development Company, the AEC suppressed a report that doubted the safety of the installation. The commission's Advisory Committee on Reactor Safeguards had recommended that a permit for the plant be denied. Their report, forwarded to the commission on June 6, 1956, was immediately classified "Administratively Confidential." On August 4, 1956, the AEC granted a construction permit to PRDC to begin work on the reactor. Immediately thereafter, Chairman Strauss announced that he would attend the ground-breaking ceremonies and give a speech. But after word leaked on the confidential report, and after considerable pressure from the Joint Committee, the AEC released the adverse report in October. By that time, site preparation was well under way.

The evidence bearing on the latest updating of the Brookhaven Report strongly suggests that a comparable situation now exists with respect to Price-Anderson extension.

The 1957 Brookhaven Report has been a serious public relations liability in the promotion of nuclear power installations. For public relations reasons, as well as for legislative success in extending Price-Anderson, the AEC appears to have abandoned or suppressed the updated report—a major research project of potentially widespread public importance.

HOSPITALS WITHOUT NURSES

. . Jean Martin

ſike Nichols and Elaine May have rought out a record in which they id the medical profession on a ariety of levels. On the last band, ſike and Elaine are in rehearsal, orking up a new skit. Mike tells laine, "Be a Jewish mother"; and ıen, as a young son, he comes to er with the news that he has deided what profession he wants to nter. "It will take a lot of work, a ot of sacrifice on all our parts," he arns. But the mother is entranced y the prospect of this kind of sufering, for she has the burning ambition of all Jewish mothers: a son who is a "professional." "Mother," Mike confides to her, lowering his voice rhapsodically, "I have decided what I want to do with my life. I want to be a nurse." Whereupon the two comedians dissolve in laughter, this being after all only a rehearsal.

The skit is strangely prophetic, but the joke is ephemeral, for the same scene may soon be played in all seriousness. The United States now suffers a shortage of nurses so severe that an incredible number of good nursing positions are going begging. One-fifth of all hospital nursing jobs were vacant in 1962 (in the South it reached an unbelievable 50 per cent). And the first stumbling blocks to remedying the situation are the additional facts that in 1963, 58 per cent of those entrusted with training new nurses lacked graduate degrees considered essential for good teaching, and that 11 per cent of budgeted faculty positions were vacant. Yet if nursing is to keep up with the rise of hospitalization, it must increase by 75 per cent the number of registered nurses to meet the needs of 1970.

The new comprehensive insurance plans, plus the growing population with its rising percentage of old persons with long-term nursing needs, have made immense demands on nursing; the new complexities in the practice of medicine, the added responsibilities delegated to nurses because of the doctor shortage—all

---

ean Martin is a free-lance writer, iving in Chicago. She reviews freuently for the Sun-Times and writes rimarily on cultural topics for varius magazines.

these have changed the pattern of the profession. But the salary—average $84.50 per week — has scarcely changed at all. If nursing schools can somehow induce 6 per cent of all high school girl graduates to enter the nursing profession, the supply of RNs will still reach only the minimum demand for 1970. It is considered desirable that nurses should provide 50 per cent of direct patient care in a hospital, but the highest goal realistically obtainable for 1970 (according to the Surgeon General's Consulting Group on Nursing) will provide only 38 per cent.

How does the nursing shortage make itself felt? While the situation has long been obvious to hospital officials, who often must close wards or reject patients because of a lack of nurses, it comes to public awareness as what appears to be hospital inefficiency. "I never see a nurse," says the patient, and the patient is the one who feels the shortage in terms of real, physical deprivation. The sick person, for example, who has an untrained aide instead of an RN attending him may experience a drug reaction that is not reported as speedily as it should be; he may go through a respiratory crisis which could be alleviated by the presence of better-trained help. Or, to take a more widespread example (somehow nursing lends itself to statistics, probably because it is the most studied and thoroughly documented of professions, and the statistics abound), there are 718,000 patients in psychiatric hospitals in this country, a number that exceeds all other hospitals combined. For these there are employed 16,300 nurses, 9,600 practical nurses, and 101,000 aides and orderlies, the nurses managing to deliver a bare 10 per cent of direct patient care as contrasted to the 30 per cent now being given in (also understaffed) general hospitals. For the psychiatric patient, whose need is not only for the tranquilizer but for the knowledge that the person giving it to him cares about him, this is tantamount to withholding medication. And a similar shortage of human sympathy exists on every level in every hospital and is felt by every patient, rich or poor. The resultant lessening of patient-nurse respect, compounded by the deterioration of doctor-nurse respect (the doctor shortage has resulted in a blurring of what a nurse should be expected to do or not do) has tainted the old Florence Nightingale-Clara Barton image. Nursing, which is fundamentally a "calling," has lost its greatest reward. For (as yet another study of nursing has indicated), contrary to all ideas that girls go into nursing to marry doctors or meet rich patients, the fact is that 80 per cent become nurses out of a desire to serve. But while nursing appeals to the humanistic emotions, nowadays it also requires a better than average mind. For admission to most nursing schools, the applicant must be in the upper third of her high school graduating class. Paradoxically, while the nursing shortage is severe, the lack of unsuitable applicants is not. And so strong is the "call" of the profession that these rejectees suffer deeply when they are turned down.

The applicant for nursing has a choice of training programs. She may get a degree from a college or a diploma from a hospital school. She then takes a state exam and, if pronounced "safe to practice," becomes an RN. There are also two-year programs which turn out "practical nurses," these in increasing numbers of recent years. And hospitals are employing a growing number of unskilled nurses' aides. But while the jump in the number of licensed practical nurses has been large, a considerable percentage work part time, and among the nurses' aides (who lack background and education) the turnover is enormous. The real need is for very highly trained nurses and for nurse educators. Fifty years ago a nurse did everything for her patients; her ward was one big bedroom. Now she is increasingly an executive who must decide which of her too-numerous patients may be entrusted to the practical nurse, which to the nurses' aide. The nurse today is entangled in mountains of paper work and a complex of drugs to be dispensed and kept track of—some hospitals are experimenting with IBM machines to release the nurse from this clerical activity and free her for human contacts. But somehow, amid all this growing complexity of duties, the RN manages to receive a salary somewhat less than that of the average secretary.

Lately, there has been some talk of a union for nurses, but most of the profession look askance at suggestion. Most of the power salary bargaining has already b removed by a standing agreem made tacitly between nurses and states that the nurses will not stri But raising the salary would at le bring back to the profession a nu ber of married nurses who do otherwise choose to return. Od enough, these married nurses te to prefer the "lobster shifts," wh are otherwise so difficult to fill. Al salary increases and the addition fringe benefits enjoyed by m other workers would attract to profession older women ready return to work, minority grou eager to get ahead, and (as so experts maintain) a greatly ov looked possibility—men.

While the number of nurses traditionally tied to the number teen-age girls, there are indicatio that men may begin entering t field. At present 40 per cent nursing schools do not admit me but they are changing with the p fession. It is true that the wo "nurse" is too deeply involved feminine connotations to be appli with grace to men in hospital wo but with the shift in nursing duti with the need for administrato and educators, men may come in nursing under other titles.

The young nowadays are r notably realistic in their goals— striking example being the juven delinquent school dropout who co fided in a TV interview that h ambition was to be a "nuclear phy cist." Perhaps with some coaxing film narrated by Pat Boone is rected to high school boys and girl teen-age boys may join teen-a girls as nursing candidates. At lea under the Surgeon General's Co sultant Group on Nursing the si of the nursing shortage has been a praised, the nature of the proble realized—and diagnosis is half t cure.

Meanwhile, the profession loo for quick solutions: a Catholic ho pital in Texas sent its nuns to Ir land with a color film about th hospital to recruit nurses for i staff; an air line offered to f nurses in from the Philippines. B these solutions are deplored by r sponsible nursing leaders who kno that the shortage is not only in th country, but everywhere in th world — including Russia, whe they still keep babies in swaddlin clothes.

Teachers' Unions

RIFT WITHOUT DIFFERENCES . . . Stanley Elam

uggest in a partisan group that ducation's two warring employee organizations should merge and you are likely to be hooted from the room. "Their outlook and programs are poles apart," it will be said. But his reply ignores the facts, some of which are recent developments.

Privately, leaders in both factions admit that rivalry between the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association must eventually end in merger or alliance. Too much money and energy are being wasted that might better be directed toward common goals, and bitterness is building up which can be exploited by the enemies of both groups for decades to comes. Michael Moskow, a labor economist with the Drexel Institute, says: "Merger will definitely occur, but probably not for about five years." He notes that already some NEA and AFT affiliates have made overtures for merger at the local level.

Until recently, the rivalry between the NEA and AFT may have served some useful purpose. For example, AFT successes, particularly in New York, forced the NEA to intensify its teacher-welfare efforts [see "Organizing the Teachers" by Stanley Elam, The Nation, June 29, 1964]. The Urban Project, which has promoted scores of "professional negotiations" agreements between local associations and boards of education, was a direct result of the concessions and written contract that AFT Local No. 2, the United Federation of Teachers (UFT), won from New York City's reluctant board. The state-wide sanctions program, so effective in Utah and now on trial in Oklahoma (a more difficult state) is the NEA's alternative to the strike, on which AFT locals depend as a last resort. Sanctions may involve a variety of actions by the local, state and national units: boycott, publicity, political action. Usually, after lengthy investigation, a school system will be declared "one where no professional person would want to seek employment." Depending on the loyalty of teachers to their organization, it can close a school—but only after teachers have met their contract obligations. Because the AFT has few effective state organizations, the NEA has been sponsoring legislation which favors state-wide professional negotiations as opposed to AFT-sponsored collective bargaining in Washington, Oregon, California and Connecticut. An aroused NEA can eventually dominate the teacher-welfare field everywhere except in the big cities—where, however, unionism is a way of life.

The AFT, suddenly aware that its membership is not growing as rapidly as hoped,* decided at its August convention in Los Angeles to emphasize state organization, research and publications. The new program will involve a considerable increase in dues, making them higher than the NEA's annual $10—and that will be one more point of similarity between the two bodies.

Are there real and important differences between the AFT and NEA? AFT rank and file, for example, are accused of being less devoted to the professional aspects of teaching. Not true, says William T. Lowe of Cornell, who cites the fact that AFT members are actually more likely than NEA members to belong to professional associations (the American Historical Association, the National Council of Teachers of English), even though these groups have a working relationship with the NEA.

The most easily recognizable difference between NEA and AFT members is that a significantly higher percentage of men than women join the AFT. Related to this fact, perhaps, is a difference in morale. AFT members tend to be dissatisfied, and would choose some other career if they could make the decision again. The single salary schedule is widely accepted in teaching, and a man can hardly support a family on the average salary of less than $6,000—at least not on the level college graduates and professionals have come to believe is their due. Thus they are activists and give the AFT its reputation for impatience and militancy. They are likely to be younger teachers at the junior-high and high-school levels, where men tend to concentrate in the public schools. (That, incidentally, is probably why many of them join professional organizations, which are more important for high school than for grade school teachers.)

AFT members, then, are the people who prefer a rapid and more or less clean solution of salary squabbles (the strike) to a slow, cumbersome and messy procedure (sanctions). But beyond this difference of attitude, what ideological, programmatic and structural differences between the NEA and AFT might prevent or delay merger? Only two are usually regarded as crucial.

First, within a month of its formation in 1916, the AFT became affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. It now pays AFL-CIO dues and makes much of the "mutual benefits of affilation." NEA literature emphasizes the theme that by affiliation AFT teachers lose the independence of action that is important to professionals committed to objectivity and responsible to all the public. As NEA Executive Secretary William G. Carr puts it, "American teachers must remain free and independent of entangling alliances with any one group in society."

But what entanglements actually occur? In August, 1963, the UFT was on the verge of a strike in New York City. It was generating as much political pressure as possible against Mayor Wagner and the city administration. When Harry Van Arsdale, head of the Central Labor Council, threw his complete support behind the UFT, a settlement was reached which the union found acceptable. It didn't produce much money the first year, but it got some for the second. The questionable result, so far as the UFT is concerned, was the political debt contracted, for that debt is now being called. According to the New York World-

Stanley Elam is editor of the Phi Delta Kappan, official journal of the professional education fraternity.

*Current AFT membership is about 110,000, up 50,000 from 1961 when the UFT won exclusive bargaining rights in New York City. Almost half this increase has been in New York City itself. Meanwhile, the NEA has grown from 714,000 to about 943,000.

Telegram of April 17, the UFT as part of its annual contract proposals asked the New York City board to agree not to buy textbooks, teaching materials or equipment transported or handled by any company with which the AFL-CIO has a dispute. If this can be done, it is not fanciful to suppose that the AFT might, as the price of AFL-CIO support, be asked to boycott a textbook critical of a position the trade unions have taken in resisting new modes of production.

In the past two years the AFT and the NEA have locked horns in a series of big-city elections to choose exclusive bargaining agents. One of the first of these occurred in Milwaukee. At the time (early 1964) it was thought that direct intervention by the AFL-CIO would help the AFT cause; hence the election was not run by the AFT but by the director of organization for the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department. Walter Reuther, president of the IUD, made a personal visit just three days before the election on February 12. However, the Milwaukee Teachers' Education Association (MTEA) won by a 600-vote majority out of 4,012 votes cast. The MTEA campaign stressed independence for teachers and freedom from ties with organizations outside the profession. Clearly, teachers resented the AFL-CIO "invasion," and since the Milwaukee debacle the IUD has remained in the background of bargaining elections.

The experience of the organized profession in England and Canada is instructive on this point. In both countries, the leading teachers' organizations have passed through a stage of labor affiliation. The National Teachers Union in England dropped the connection some years ago. In Canada, where teacher groups are far stronger and more experienced in collective negotiations than in the United States, none is now affiliated, although at one time—before provincial groups became effective in themselves—they were in the national union movement. The reasons given are primarily economic: it is believed that the considerable sums once spent in affiliation fees can be used more effectively by the Canadian Teachers Federation itself.

It can be persuasively argued that should the nearly 2 million U.S. teachers band together, their economic strength would be such that the disadvantages of affiliation with organized labor would far outweigh the advantages.

A second much discussed point of difference between the NEA and AFT concerns membership in the bargaining unit. A basic labor-relations tenet is that management employees should not be in the same unit as nonsupervisory employees. Accordingly, the NEA is routinely dismissed by the AFT as a "company union" because it welcomes all certificated employees—including principals, supervisors and even superintendents—in national and state organizational units, and in most local units as well. But the picture for bargaining purposes is by no means as simple as AFT literature suggests, and the NEA-AFT difference here is more assumed than real. The fact is that in one place or another the AFT welcomes "management" people and in one place or another the NEA exclud them. Overall, the NEA seems hold the more flexible and pra matic position on this question· the AFT would call it equivocal· because NEA policies vary with l cale, with job descriptions and wi leadership qualities of individual

Donald H. Wollett, a labor lawy serving as a consultant to the NEA Urban Project office, says that wh holds a unit together is communi of interest, which is not the same identity of interest. In the printin and building trades, he points ou everyone who possesses the skill organized, whether supervisory not. He adds: "I would wish th in structure and membership eve teachers' organization could be lil the Utah Education Associatio There, in an outrageous breach faith over a year ago, Govern George Clyde refused to follow th recommendations of his own con mittee with respect to state aid fo education. A two-day walkout b teachers resulted, and it was led b the UEA president, Moroni I. Jense Jensen is a high school principa The teachers didn't complain abou administration domination. Th complaints were leveled by schoo boards because their administrato were dominated by teachers."

Wollett reminds teachers that big advantage in having an all-in clusive bargaining unit is that som of the most effective leadership ma be found in the ranks of the supe visory personnel. The UFT itself di covered this when it chose Charle Cogen for its leader in early Ne York City negotiations. At that tim he was a department head, and in eligible to vote in the election force by his own group.

As a matter of fact, the AFT po sition on administrative personne membership is by no means as co sistent as the official line suggest According to Wollett, the AF wanted department heads exclude in Newark but included in Phila delphia, although Philadelphi heads had more of the duties o supervisors than did their opposit numbers in Newark.

From the foregoing it would ap pear that the facts do not suppor those who say there are two insupe able ideological barriers between th AFT and the NEA. Certainly labo affiliation is not essential to effec tiveness for a national teacher or ganization. And the ancient diffe ence over administrative membe ip in the bargaining unit is more agined than real. It is true that e AFT won't permit superintend- ts to be members at any level, ile the NEA will. But the NEA s learned that certain administra- rs cannot be accepted in the local it when the time comes for hard rgaining. And NEA teacher oups are apparently learning how make use of leadership skill from e administrative branches when nflict of interest is not disabling.

Mel Weinstein

If within the next few years erger is seriously considered by T and NEA leaders, what could e AFT bring to the marriage that e NEA doesn't already have? Be- des some very energetic and ef- ctive leaders, it could bring a ructural change which has made e AFT more responsive to its embership than the NEA has usually been. This change is the caucus system.

At AFT conventions two very lively parties are in action, each with a well-defined program, a slate of officers and a mechanism for presenting both to the delegates. This means that there is always an organized group in opposition to the people who run the federation, a group looking for issues on which to embarrass those in office, and offering a platform to dissidents and minorities.

Myron Lieberman, a frequent critic of both organizations, points out that there is nothing like the caucus in the NEA. In an organization of almost a million members, he says, there is no political machinery, no center around which a systematic, continuing basic policy can be developed and then brought back to the organizational machinery. If merger with the AFT should politicize the NEA, then democracy would be well served within this huge, cumbersome organization.

Speaking before a national institute on collective negotiations in public education at Rhode Island College in July, AFT President Cogen said: "Increasingly, educational commentators have proposed that the AFT and the NEA merge into one organization. We would not rule out such a possibility." He went on, of course, to say that there are fundamental points at issue between the two organizations, but we are still waiting to hear an NEA spokesman come as near as Cogen to recognizing the need for merger. Perhaps, like the U.S. Government in Vietnam, NEA leaders are waiting for military success. At that point the teachers' new-found negotiating skill can bear fruit.

The Westchester Gorillas . . . . David Cort

ll the news is not bad in the ani- al kingdom. As man and the other ammals both get more sophisti- ated, they have grown more tol- ant of each other's company. Re- ntly we have had new and over- ue researches showing that wolves, orillas, and even tigers are really uite decent and sensible creatures. And apparently the animals have one some research of their own, tisfying themselves that in some ses man can be comfortably ved with. For an abundant wild fe has been found to be co-inhabit- g prosperous metropolitan sub- rbs, especially those, as in New ork's Westchester County, Minne- polis-St. Paul, or San Francisco's utskirts, which are backed by large mpty areas. Some of the animals ctually prefer cultivated suburban over to the forest. Westchester ounty, for example, now has re- pectable populations of raccoons, possum, weasel, fox, mink, skunk, oodchuck, muskrat and deer. ome of the larger estates invite in rchers to shoot the surplus deer, irearms being forbidden.

Most animals, of course, are noc- urnal and generally try to avoid uman attention. Of the night birds, Vestchester has five breeding species of owls—great horned, screech, barred, barn, and occasionally long-eared. This past summer the county was finally exasperated by a population of 1,700 Canada geese. They were charged with committing nuisances on golf courses, attacking children, and being health hazards at reservoirs and swimming sites. The penalty for attracting human attention was that 300 were captured by game agents and deported to Maine. They are perfectly capable of returning to the very pond from which they were shanghaied.

Still, a lesson in unintentional conservation had been taught by Westchester's respectful use of the land. A still better use is a well-managed sanctuary, and the best use a swamp. Incredibly, within New York City limits, the Jamaica Bay Sanctuary has had breeding glossy ibis, black skimmer, American egret, snowy egret, Louisiana heron, least bittern, pintail, ruddy duck, redhead, shoveler, blue-winged teal, gallinule, coot, piping plover, quail and others, some of them exotic in the area.

Man's tolerance of other species met its most severe recent test in the gorilla, the last big ape to be discovered by science. The gorilla has always had a terrible press; everybody agreed that it was "ferocious to a degree" and lost no opportunity to tear people to pieces. Then George B. Schaller spent a year fraternizing with various groups of them—in perfect safety, as he described in The Year of the Gorilla (University of Chicago Press). He found them peaceful and social animals with only occasional twitches of nervousness, relieved by roaring and breast beating.

The mountain gorilla barely survived the first good press relations it had ever had. As The Nation's reviewer, W. S. Merwin, wrote, the new governors of Uganda, Ruanda-Urundi and Congo saw "no practical merit in the gorillas," which chiefly occupied a limited section of the Albert National Park in the Virunga volcano region. Gorillas spend their lives moping through the forest, stripping off vegetation and munching it. They are not even a tourist attraction, because they don't want to be. Cattle were moved into their range, rapidly ruining the herbage. In final contempt, hunters were allowed in. The mountain gorilla may very well now be extinct. There remains the West African lowland gorilla in the area from Nigeria to Rio Muni, and inland as far as the Ubangi River.

Since the gorilla is fairly closely related to us, this episode should seem to us tragic. But the question avid Cort is a frequent Nation con- ributor.

---

naturally suggests itself: why not move the gorillas from Africa to Westchester County? First, the gorillas wouldn't like it since they need year-round vegetation and are subject to pulmonary diseases. Second, even ganders make Westchester nervous. For gorillas, Africa has advantages over Westchester.

But the principle of moving animal species is far from fanciful. A number of species survive only or largely in zoos and preserves. On the Russian steppe where the tarpan, the wild horse, was exterminated, the Russians run eland and zebra from Africa. And protection also works, even sometimes when the prognosis seems hopeless. The Russian antelope, the saiga, was down to a few hundred animals in 1930 but, with protection, has come back to 2 million and furnishes 6,000 tons of fine meat a year. The Alpine ibex was extinct except for sixty animals in the Italian Alps when King Victor Emmanuel II made its habitat a royal hunting park By 1938 there were 3,000. Hunted savagely by the Germans in World War II, but now back at 3,000, they are recruited to repopulate the mountains of Switzerland, Germany, Austria and the Carpathians. For another example, the European bison has been rescued from extinction and is being redistributed to its old European ranges from stock in Poland's Bialowieza Forest.

A curious fact is that it is far more considerate of the land to graze wild-meat animals than domesticated cattle, sheep and goats; domestic herds eat everything while the wild ungulates specialize, leaving much of the herbage intact. The goat is said to have ruined all southern Europe. Its old pastures are now naked, eroded wastes. The terrible word, "overgrazed," is rarely applied to country inhabited by wild animals with their accompanying predators.

It might be suggested that man has corrupted his domesticated cattle, sheep and goats into the vice of overgrazing. And certainly this vice is irreversible. Nor do I hope to revolutionize the ranching business, or introduce eland meat to the American public. Still, the vast herds must take their toll of the American landscape, and also of the African landscape.

There now remain such protected enclaves as Westchester County. Europe in particular gives us contrasting examples of Westchesters and also of the ruined lands, brilliantly described and pictured in Kai Curry-Lindahl's Europe: A Natural History (Random House).

The Mediterranean shores were badly overworked by the ancient empires. During the neglect of the Dark Ages, they made a partial recovery. They are now in trouble again and "the ruin of the Mediterranean countryside" is at full gallop, from Portugal to Greece. Within a hundred years the Sahara Desert will almost certainly have leaped the Mediterranean to southern Europe. The soil has departed from hillsides; sand dunes are overpowering forests; in large areas no small bird sings. It would be surprising if the economies and politics of these nations did not somehow reflect the grim, and not invisible, process.

Against this background, Curry Lindahl describes four great wilc life sanctuaries in southern Europe They are all deltas, meaning tha they are the accumulation of th debris from the heartland of Eu rope. One is Las Marismas at th mouth of the Guadalquivir; the sec ond the Camargue at the mouth o the Rhone; the third the Danub delta into the Black Sea; the fourth the vast Volga delta into the Cas pian. (However, this last is dryin up, as is the Caspian, because o upstream dams. The shallow north ern section of the Caspian is shrink ing faster than the cartographer can change their maps.)

All four deltas serve as indispen sable winter quarters for million of birds from the north. The Danube delta is even more important as a breeding paradise, and has a rich mammal population of wild boar badger, otter, brown hare, fox,

(Continued on page 260)

Cuba's Bestseller: A Gusano Returns

Jose Yglesias

wever committed revolutionary ba may be to the Communist camp, literary life is wide open: everyone eing published, and an old Marxist tic like Jose Antonio Portuondo can challenged in his estimate of Robbellet by a young writer like Ambro-Fornet and the debate go on for eral issues of one of their literary gazines. The Biblioteca Para El eblo, a publishing venture specializ-in foreign classics, brought out a this year which included Proust, fka, Dos Passos, Faulkner, Mann.
t nothing has excited as much talk the big bestseller of the summer, nonliterary work by a middle-class man about the twenty-eight months spent in exile in the United States ore she decided to return. Bajo Para — "on parole" — came out in ril, and the first edition of 10,000 s sold out in three days; by midmmer, another 100,000 copies were
d. Castro has worried aloud about ors committed in 1959 and 1960 ich resulted in so many middle-ss professionals leaving, but that s two years ago and no concerted ort has been made to woo anyone ck, or to convince those on waiting ts not to leave. Marta Gonzalez's ok on the life of a refugee in Miami y do the trick.

Marta Gonzalez's father was dean the College of Education of the iversity of Havana. She attended bilingual Ruston Academy, and nt on to the University of Havana a degree in foreign studies to pre-re her for a diplomatic career. She s a typical member of that liberal ddle class who welcomed the revo-ion at the beginning, and even rked in the Ministry of Foreign Afrs until she left Cuba in April, 1962.
e did not have a bank account in United States, as some of the althy exiles did, but like all of them left with the intention of return-when the Castro government is erthrown. She knew that the United ites encouraged this temporary emiation—it is our best argument that Castro government has alienated the people—and was convinced, as are all in Cuba waiting to leave, that in Miami there would be a warm welcome and useful, temporary work.

In Miami, she immediately learned that, under United States immigration laws, she held the status of a parolee: her passport was taken from her and a card issued, saying: "Your admission cannot be authorized at this time. You are PAROLED INDEFINITELY." This card reproduced on the jacket of the book has an explosive effect in Cuba: a symbol of the humiliations that the exiles suffer. Card in hand, she went to the Refugee Center and there underwent experiences similar to those of any American on relief, but which at every turn wounded the sensibilities of people who came full of illusions about their worth. For the $100 a month that a family group received (Miss Gonzalez came with her husband) she submitted to all the humiliating investigations that even a trained social worker cannot soften. In the case of the exiles, however, the investigators in the Miami Refugee Center were in the main Batista followers, and the first to get the plums. She had many complaints, not the least of which was that she was often hungry, for the monthly check was not enough to cover both rent and food, and jobs were not to be found.

The Cuban colony in Miami had, in 1962, hardened into a miniature replica of Batista Cuba: corruption and prostitution; scrounging for jobs and positions; frustrations turned inward, so that spying and denunciations became rife, with people suspecting one another of treachery when, for some, the monthly check was stopped. By 1962, also, there were no more TV interviews at the airport when they arrived, and the natives were becoming restive about the Cubans who had flooded the area; the Negroes' resentment was the most obvious, for they had begun to lose their menial jobs to desperate refugees. The proud rejoinder to the revolutionaries' epithet for the exiles, "Yo soy un gusano" (gusano means worm), had already begun to sound self-lacerating.

The book's popularity in Cuba is due, no doubt, to the many vignettes on the staples of life in the exile colony: the items in the monthly issue of surplus food; a visit to the Refugee Center; a Sunday at the public beach in Miami; the ruses worked out by family groups to get more than the $100 a month; the children's home in Florida City where those whose parents had sent them on ahead were cared for; the dentists practicing clandestinely in the colony. There are portraits of people well known in Cuba, so that the book serves as a kind of gossip column for, say, what Rolando, the famous dancing partner of Ana Gloria at the Tropicana, is now doing; or what the home life of Miro Cardona was like before he resigned his position as head of the exile Revolutionary Council, and what it turned into when he resigned. No wonder that during the period when the first edition was sold out and a second had yet to reach the bookstores it was known as the most borrowed book in Cuba.

Unfortunately, these vignettes are frequently imbedded in moralizing chapters. The author means to describe and analyze the values and mores of Americans as seen in Miami, but her observations are sometimes unfair, even for those of us who may rival Humbert Humbert in our reactions to fat women in curlers and Bermuda shorts. She is worried about young Cubans growing up in the atmosphere of sexual freedom that she thinks Americans enjoy, and she writes about boys in a public-school toilet playing with one another as an example of sexual experimentation which is encouraged. One passage deals caustically with the "American weekend"; the frenzied activity we go in for—from shopping to playing—on those two days seems unnatural to her, but she gives no indication that even popular American magazines have long been worried about how we use our leisure. Nor does it occur to her that the two-day weekend was won by American workers at the cost of strikes and picket lines sometimes as bloody as those of the civil rights movement.

In an interview after the book's publication, Miss Gonzalez explained that she had set herself only one stricture: to keep the chapters short and simple so as not to tire the reader.

---

se Yglesias is a novelist and transor of modern Spanish fiction.

And it may be this is the reason for its remaining on the surface of her experiences. More likely, it is her middle-class tastes that make the book irritating at times; certainly her language has the afflatus that afflicts so many middle-class Latin Americans, and it is symptomatic that when she arrives in Boston and gets a job at the Widener Library, and feels she is among some real human beings at last.

However, a book on the exile's life in the United States which would have been unsparing to all responsible for the mess in Miami very likely cannot be written by a Cuban who left home. The rub constantly is that while she is compassionately describing the ill-treatment the exiles receive at our hands the reader is coldly responding: "What did you expect!" Yet, with all her limitations, Miss Gonzalez has the best of the argument: the exiles are in Miami because we wanted them there, and our responsibility to them is as great as to the men we landed at the Bay of Pigs. I suspect that they are such a great irritation to us because they remind us of our arrogance and failure in our dealings with revolutionary Cuba.

Now that we are no longer playing that game, our only solution has been relocation to communities which might be able to absorb the exiles in their labor pool, and we have again felt put out that they have resisted this so strongly. It is on this point that Miss Gonzalez is most convincing: relocation means to every exile in Miami that they cannot go back to Cuba. We like to pretend now that they came here as if to mecca when they only came to that tip of our nation nearest to their own in order to be escorted back quickly once we had dealt with Castro. What we extend as an unparalleled reward is to them the final betrayal. All of them felt so, and Miss Gonzalez, who in Miami had already had great doubts about having left Cuba, felt it no less than those who did everything to avoid it. Yet, for her, relocation was a catalyst to sanity; in Boston she was able to look back at the Cuban colony in Miami and see that, despite the meanness, corruption and humiliation, the lies they concocted for the folks back home were self-inflicting and helped to buoy one another in their illusions. It was a great surprise to her that at Harvard, when she made statements which went unquestioned in Miami, she convinced no one.

What the book does not cover is how she got back, and this is the point with greatest relevance for us, for those who want to return ought to be helped to do so. As a parolee, she revealed later in an interview in Cuba, she could not get a passport to leave, only a permit, after much waiting, to go on vacation to Canada for ten days. In Canada, a travel agency sold her a ticket to Paris without asking for her passport, and at Orly airport she called the Cuban Embassy because she had no entrance visa: a road that others are unlikely to take without help. At the time she wrote, 13,000 exiles had returned to Cuba, and anyone who has had any contact with exiles during the last two years knows there are many more who would follow them.

A year and a half ago, I had an experience at La Fonda del Sol, that expensive Latin American exhibit in the form of a restaurant in the Time-Life Building in New York, that made me feel compassionate toward the exiles in a way that Miss Gonzalez has a hard time doing in her book. I had dinner there with a Cuban member of his country's United Nations mission, and we immediately noticed that the many waiters and bus boys who hovered around our and nearby tables spoke Spanish with a Cuban accent. When coffee was served, the Cuban delegate, who had just come back from a Christmas leave Havana, took out his pack of Ag rios, a brand of post-revolution ci rettes, and laid them on the table all to see. What occurred was traordinary and, for me, unexpect We were immediately approached every Cuban working at that end the restaurant; word even got to kitchen and a dishwasher came to ask for an Agrario. In that setti the delegate was taken for a w heeled, newly arrived exile, and was respectfully asked about a th sand things in Havana. Finally, af many pleasantries had been exchan and I had counted up to a dozen v tors, the delegate told them who was. With one exception, they unb dened themselves to him, told him h bitter was their disillusionment a when we left, those who had o just found out followed us through t dining rooms to shake hands w him. A bus boy, no more than said, "I was a miliciano and I wo not be here, enduring these winte except for my old man who wan to come. I would give my life just a peek at Cuba to see what the revo tion accomplished last year."

The great majority are not this b they were as willing to come and ma mischief as our government was ea to have them. We had a honeymo going there for a while, but Miss G zalez's book is a sure sign that it dead on both sides.

Cityscape at Tahoe

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA. By Raymond F. Dasmann. The Macmillan Co. 247 pp. $5.95.

Kenneth Lamott

The Destruction of California—what a splendidly evocative title it is! It calls up those sickening pictures on the TV screen of Watts in flames and, for those of us with longer memories, Nathanael West's hallucinated and prophetic vision of the burning of Los Angeles.

As it happens, none of these nightmare visions of destruction is what Mr. Dasmann has undertaken to write about. He is a biologist and a conservationist, and he has organized a methodical and useful survey of the despoiling of the land by carele indifferent or greedy men since colonization by the Spanish. T dominant tone of The Destruction California is not, as the book's pu lisher would have it, "elegiac ange Rather, the author, who teaches at state college in the forested northe extremity of California, writes plain dryly, and straightforwardly abo matters that are close to his prof sional interests. He puts the matt plainly and concisely: much of Ca fornia's land surface is rapidly bei turned into a desert of one sort another while many of its waters a being turned into sewers.

Two or three years ago, I went to Lake Tahoe to write a magazi piece telling how this once isolat vacation spot had been invaded by steady, year-round stream of gamble heading for the Sears, Roebuck-sty casinos on the Nevada side of

---

Kenneth Lamott is a novelist and has been an editor of Contact magazine. He is a long-time resident of California.

ore. The editor of the local paper ld me then of some concern about creased demands on the sewage sys- ms of the local communities, which ould soon nourish algae that, once tablished, could never be destroyed. the brief time since then, the gov- nors of California and Nevada have lemnly conferred on this matter, id various commissions and com- ittees have been appointed. The gae are no longer a threat; they are, stead, a present reality. The latest port I have in hand is from a bi- ogist who, last summer, discovered flourishing colony of algae that re caused, as he delicately put it, "human enrichment."

This is the sort of destruction at Mr. Dasmann is concerned with. did not, of course, start with the trepeneurs of gambling, nor with ose state highway engineers who erish a religious passion for build- g freeways. When, starting in 1769, e Spanish monks began to establish chain of missions that reached from n Diego in the south to Sonoma in e north, California supported 130,- 0 Indians, more Indians in fact an lived in any comparable area on e continent. Now it supports almost million people, few of whom have e modest demands of the Indians, id is adding to its population at a te of something better than 1,500 ople a day. The consequent rape of lifornia's countryside, its waters, id its animals and growing things Mr. Dasmann's theme.

The high points of the book have do with the overgrazing permitted e sheep farmers on public lands, the ear cutting of the Douglas fir and dwood forests, and the extermina- on of the grizzly bear, pronghorn telope, tule elk, beaver, bighorn eep and the California condor. He scribes the perpetual problem of rnishing increasing supplies of po- ble water to the masses of Los ngeles who insist on living in a land hose natural endowments are ap- opriate only for a sparse and un- manding population. He writes, fur- ermore, about the railroads, logging mpanies, public utilities and other ee-enterprisers whose activities have too often provided a stench in the strils of Jehovah. Mr. Dasmann is at rarity, a conservationist who is so a lover of cities, and not the least his concerns is the state of Cali- rnia's cities. Finally, he writes with oomy distaste of the chamber-of- mmerce cast of mind that rejoiced when California's population surpassed New York's, and can see the future only in terms of increasing bigness.

Some of the troubles of modern California are matters of general knowledge and differ only in degree from what is going on elsewhere in the country. Even as an adopted Californian of some years' standing, however, I was taken by surprise by parts of the dismal story.

The grasslands that we see today, untouched so far by the real estate developer and freeway builder, have little resemblance to the fields of tall grass that provided abundant pasture for the horses and cattle and sheep of the Spanish 200 years ago. The grass itself is different, for in the wool of the Spanish sheep and in the droppings of their cattle were the seeds of weedy plants exotic to California. In the place of its needle grass, wild rye, June grass and blue grass, California has inherited poverty grass, tarweed, Medusa's head, foxtail and thistle. (An ingenious piece of scientific detection has a place in the story: the original vegetation was so thoroughly displaced that it had to be identified by examining the adobe bricks used in the missions and other buildings of the Spanish era.)

The original settlers' ignorance of any notions of range management is understandable. So, alas, are the motives that brought the miners here in '49, and it is entirely appropriate that California should have become an American province through the workings of undiluted greed. I recall my own puzzlement on first driving through a moon landscape of barren fields covered by boulders. On inquiry, I was told that this land had been worked by hydraulickers, industrialized miners who washed down small mountains with high-pressure streams of water in order to extract ounces of gold from tons of soil.

To cope with California's many problems, Mr. Dasmann suggests not only that we systematically apply the lessons of the science of conservation but also that we take deliberate and radical steps to discourage future growth:

> This means not encouraging new industries to move into an area. It means not developing our water resources to a maximum. . . . It means not building those new power stations or those new freeways. No real-estate development will be built in an area where electricity and water will not be provided. No industry will come where it will not receive space, power, or water. Peo-

Cycle

SPIN
the whirling motion the pressure of the cyclical return:
earth around the sun, around, around,
the beginning dance TUMBLE
the roughness, hitting of word against word, syllable against syllable,
the tension between phrases, to sing and not to separate WASH
to clean the sound of errors, pierce through the merely smooth, create the true texture that the glistening shines dimensional with depth DRY out of the damp mystery to dry the final language on the bodiless page, the word without water, air, earth that speaks and cannot die

as the action becomes the poem

James Schevill

ple will not come where there are no new jobs or new housing. . . .

Hear! Hear! But I am obliged to add, sadly, that I can't imagine my friends and neighbors standing still for a moment for a program that so completely outrages the conventional piety of all right-thinking Californians.

Illuminating and intellectually satisfying as Mr. Dasmann's study is, I have an uneasy feeling that even if his recommendations were promptly put into effect, California would still be a dreadful and bewildering place for many of its citizens. Did the last-minute reprieve of Bodega Head (which was threatened with a nuclear power plant) make Watts or San Francisco's Hunter's Point a better place to raise one's family? In the long run, it surely did, but it is difficult to see an immediate connection.

What I should like to see next—not as a substitute for The Destruction of California but as a complement and companion piece for it—would be a book by a biologist of the spirit, a conservationist of the collective psyche. Together, the two books would tell us a great deal not only about what has happened in California but also about what can be expected elsewhere in the country. The winds of change are blowing from west to east, and what is true in California today may very well be true in your state tomorrow.

The Journey to Identity

COMING OF AGE IN AMERICA: Growth and Acquiescence. By Edgar Z. Friedenberg. Random House. 300 pp. $5.95.

Michael Vincent Miller

Brooding, like Edgar Friedenberg, about how a society runs its schools tends to get one entangled in the intricate meshes where social psychology meets political theory. After parents, it is the schools through which society perpetuates itself by inscribing its moods on the psyches of the young and shaping their behavior to its styles. Ever since Freud, we have been aware that our individual natures take a beating for civilization's sake. The relationship, which compulsory education helps monitor, between individual freedom and the social organism, hinges on a delicate balance if both are to flourish; but there is every indication that in the modern industrial world the scales have tipped much too far in society's favor. Professor Friedenberg's aim, in his new book, is to analyze the part our high schools play toward maintaining this imbalance in America.

Friedenberg is one of those rare hybrids — a social scientist blessed with a muse. In Coming of Age in America he writes with compassion and irony about the clashing encounter in the high schools between the adolescent, bristling with vulnerabilities and experimental stances, and the values of our relentlessly manipulative mass culture. His prose is fired by an extraordinary sympathy for the ordeal of growth, combined with anger at a society he feels is mangling the chances for a rich individual life. With Erik Erikson, who appears to be one of his chief influences, Friedenberg regards adolescence as the point of no return on the journey to identity. Adolescence is, or should be, the period when the rapidly growing youngster begins to test deeper emotions and explores ways to give meaningful shape to his private experience. A social atmosphere that encourages the teen-ager's subjectivity and permits him to select and reject various life styles is an essential precondition if he is to develop into a mature adult capable of passion, independent judgment and creativity.

There is little sign, however, that America is interested in producing adults with these character traits; if anything, they would pose a grave threat to the social order. Why should this be the case? "The essence of our era," Friedenberg writes in the first chapter, "is a kind of infidelity, a disciplined expediency." By infidelity he means a mode of role playing which springs from an invasion into all walks of American life by public relations and a vulgar pragmatism. The roles in which we choose to cut a figure are presented to us as the safe and easy means to successful personal relationships and achieving status. They make for smooth sailing through the society, but at the cost of genuine confron tion with oneself and with othe

A society which depends on ke ing its members aligned in extern ly defined roles cannot afford leave its young too much to the selves. The main impression one g from Friedenberg's portrayal of American high school is of a co tinual vigilant busy-ness on the p of faculty administrators engaged shaping, restricting, rewarding a punishing student behavior. Fried berg depicts the overregulated soc landscape of our high schools w a novelist's attention to nuance a detail. He has little to say about c riculum, as his interest centers other matters. For instance, he wri about a typical small-town sch with a predominantly working-cl student body: "Milgrim High's m memorable arrangements are its c ridor passes and its johns; they do nate social interaction." Milgrim a frighteningly totalitarian wo where even the students' natu bodily functions are subject to regu tion; the lavatories are locked cept during brief periods betwe classes. There is no refuge from t sound of buzzers, the steel gates li ing and closing in the cafeteria, the scrutiny of teachers on gua duty. Free time simply doesn't exi

At other schools, the methods controlling students are subtle an on the surface, benign. High sch administrators often draw on p psychoanalytic notions to justify i tervention in students' private liv
When a student violates the cano of established behavior patterns, is promptly hauled on the carpet fore the school psychologist or cou selor to be straightened out. Psych therapy is stood on its head: inste of fostering self-knowledge, its effe is to brutalize the privacy and se respect of the young.

In order to examine the sch system's effect on student values a attitudes, Friedenberg and two c leagues went into several high scho to test the reactions of 250 st dent volunteers to six narrative tal about situations arising in an ima nary high school. Accompanying ea tale were nine cards which describ alternative possibilities for evaluati or dealing with the situation. St dents were to arrange the nine ternatives in a hierarchy rangi from best to worst. Friedenberg di plays and interprets the results in long central chapter which, althou

Michael Vincent Miller has edited Revolution at Berkeley (Dial Press) and will be teaching American literature and a poetry workshop at Stanford University next spring.

it is highly intriguing, strikes me as the least convincing section of the book.

The trouble is that one can see how the language in which some of the narratives are framed could limit the students' responses in content and depth. For example, one episode goes something as follows: A king from a foreign country is arriving on a visit and wishes "to meet with some interesting and representative high school students during his visit." It is suggested that the students chosen to meet him "should be persons to whom the school could point with pride as expressing what was finest and best about their school." The cards offer descriptions of nine student types as candidates for the job. Considering the quoted phrases, t doesn't seem very revealing about he volunteers' personalities to discover that they picked candidates who conformed most closely to conventional images of model high school students. Such candidates are obviously ones "to whom the school could point with pride." Mostly, what we earn from the kids' choice of cards s that they know exactly what the school expects from them.

Take another episode: Mr. Clarke, a teacher, finds a student named Johnny Barto smoking in the men's room in defiance of school regulations. Johnny is "a somewhat notorious character around the school." Moreover, "Mr. Clarke knows that Johnny should be in class this hour and furthermore, that he is a troublemaker, is having difficulty with his courses, is on probation, and that he s old enough to quit school." The alternative that Friedenberg's students like best, to his chagrin, involves having Mr. Clarke send Johnny o the school psychologist for counseling. Since school psychologists end to be administration finks, this amounts to selling Johnny out to the system which will try to adjust him o its imperatives. Friedenberg would ather see Johnny given more leeway o find himself. However, here again think that Friedenberg is looking or more richness of response from his group than the information he provided them merits. All that the kids are told about Johnny is that he is notorious, a troublemaker, on probation, and so forth. In other words, he is presented to them only n terms of an official school role, lthough a negative one (elsewhere n the book, Friedenberg points out that "troublemaker" is a school administrator's catch-all category for students who don't conform to code), and they respond in kind.

I am not taking issue with Friedenberg's thesis that high school students learn to think along utilitarian and public relations lines. His research results for the most part do bear out this thesis. But if it is true that the responses of the group being tested are conditioned by expectations that the tests themselves create, then these results do not add very much to what is said elsewhere in the book. Friedenberg the social critic, who dominates most of Coming of Age in America, seems to me far more perceptive and interesting than the Friedenberg who puts in an appearance as a professional research sociologist.

What Price Discount?

THE GREAT DISCOUNT DELUSION. By Walter Henry Nelson. David McKay. 237 pp. $4.50. (Discount house price: $3.69.)

Victor Lebow

The laissez-faire tradition commands obeisance to the virtues of competition, but the plain fact is that businessmen generally abhor and fear it. Competition is sacrosanct, but competitors who stray from the accustomed ways are heretics; and in spite of still another tradition, which glorifies enterprise and ingenuity, they are assaulted on pseudo-ethical and quasi-theological grounds. Each new species of competitor has received this treatment: chain stores in their time, and the cut-price stores, the manufacturer-owned stores, and many more have had to face this special form of pious disapproval.

It is now the turn of the discount houses. This book not only declares holy war on them, but also accuses the bargain-hunting shopper of being downright subversive. The Great Discount Delusion claims to be a defense of independent retailers, branded-line manufacturers, non-price-cutting establishments and, of course, the consumer, that most precious asset of the American economy. As consumers we are flattered, tempted and seduced by salesmen and ad men. Credit terms, ever more generous, enable us to gratify every whim. At a price, we can buy the products of 300,000 manufacturers and 3 million farms in 2 million retail establishments.

But at what price? Mr. Nelson wants to know: list price, discount price, "fair trade" price, off-price, trading-up price? Most consumers prefer to pay as little as possible. The discount house claims its prices are the lowest. The "fair trade" lobby wants to put the discounters out of business by requiring all retailers to sell their goods at manufacturers' list prices.

This is not to say that discounters are not guilty of misdoings. The author has compiled many instances of cheating, misbranding, overpricing and dishonest claims by discount stores. This, too, is in the holy-war tradition—only the sins of the heretic are recounted. The author is appalled at the thought that discounters may be bringing back the era when the injunction was: "Let the buyer beware."

He is, of course, doubly naive. Caveat emptor is still the safest guide. Examples of every one of these "sins"

OCTOBER

World Marxist Review

Special U.S.A. Issue

Original articles by leading American Marxists

Gus Hall: Struggle Against Imperialism

Henry Winston: Communism and the Mass Movements

Hy Lumer: Poverty in the "Affluent Society"

Claude Lightfoot: Path to Negro Freedom

Vic Perlo: U.S. Government and the Economic Cycle

AUGUST

Latin American Issue

July: Social Doctrine of the Vatican and the 20th Century

50c per copy per Issue; $3.50 per Subscription

NEW ERA BOOKS

80 East 11th Street Room 212
N. Y., N. Y. 10003 GR 7-6850

Victor Lebow is a New York marketing consultant and a member of Columbia University's seminar on the Economics of Distribution.

can be compiled for all the other classifications of retailers from the records of the Better Business Bureau, the Federal Trade Commission, the Food and Drug Administration, local inspectors of weights and measures and district attorneys.

At the door of the discount house, this author lays the high rate of destruction of independent retailers. But well before we saw the postwar emergence of the discounters, the Temporary National Economic Committee monograph on the problems of small business, in 1939, pointed out that "in the first thirty-nine years of this century, 19 million enterprises opened their doors and 16 million closed them." Since retail stores comprise by far the largest proportion of business establishments, this statement reflected a perennial phenomenon.

Like most assaults on one type of business practice on behalf of ananother, this is a silly book. It is a mishmash of propaganda for retail-price maintenance, March-hare economics, and a purely medieval concept of competition. The author apparently does not know that practically every new form of retailing made its start as a price cutter—the chain drug stores, the supermarkets, the basement departments, even the department stores themselves. (Who was it that proclaimed he sold for "6 per cent less"? R. H. Macy & Company, no less.)

There are, indeed, real problems to be faced in this consumption-oriented society and its distribution system. "Waste! and want not," appears to be the prescription. There is waste in the duplication of products and the multiplication of brands. There is the built-in obsolescence of myriad products, from nylon hosiery to automobiles. There is the enormous cost of advertising, now probably well over $20 billion a year, if we take into account not only the conventional media but also such advertising materials as packaging, direct mail, displays, coupons and all the devices our ingenious promotion people devise.

Why is it that the farmer receives only 18c out of the consumer's dollar spent for bread and cereals, or only 29c out of the dollar paid by the housewife for her fruit and vegetables? How account for the fact that between 1957 and 1965 the wholesale price index for all commodities went from 99.0 to 100.4, while the consumer price index rose from 98 to 110?

We have been told that competition tends to lower prices. The best proof that it does not is provided by the supermarkets. When they first made their appearance, during the depression years, they operated on a margin of 11 or 12 per cent. Today they require double that percentage, and in July the index of food prices reached an all-time high of 110 per cent of the 1957-59 average.

The poor and the affluent together pay about $80 billion a year for the upkeep of the retail distribution apparatus, plus about $25 billion for the running of the wholesale establishments. Obviously, such rich plums will attract entrepreneurs, and since all newcomers to retailing use price as their chief lure, the discount house came to flower in the lush postwar economy. What helped make their success possible was the establishment of manufacturer-owned distribution warehouses by the big appliance makers. The infant discounter needed to carry no stock on his own floor; he shipped from the manufacturer's warehouse.

Mr. Nelson's opus arrives late. The discount house is fast becoming respectable. It has more than doubled its margins of gross profit, it has located its stores on the best streets and in the best shopping centers. nd it has not solved the basic prob m.

It is now almost thirty years s ce the publication of the Twentieth n-tury Fund study, "Does Distribu on Cost Too Much?" That report ti-mated that close to 60c out of e ry consumer dollar went to pay for he cost of distribution. Surely, it is gh time that the Fund published the ol-low-up, the up-to-date study prom ed several years ago.

But Mr. Nelson is not really n-cerned with the cost of distribu n. And one must, indeed, question is knowledge of the economics of di ri-bution as well as his understan ng of the nature of competition. H is shocked by the sentiment expre ed by one former discount-house ex u-tive and places this quotation at he head of one of the chapters of is book: "I have not found that pe le go into business for holy or m al reasons." Evidently, Mr. Nelson r st feel that such a statement could c ne only from a heretic, a discounter. d he read Adam Smith he would su ly have come across that now fam us sentence in The Wealth of Nat ns (published in 1776): "It is not f m the benevolence of the butcher, he brewer, or the baker, that we ex t our dinner, but from their regard to their own interest."

ART

Max Kozl

MOTHERWELL

In the history of 20th-century American art, it is difficult to find a major painter who was not decisively held in thrall by the spectacle of European modernism, abstraction in particular. Perhaps the one among our artists whose longing was the greatest, and whose attitude toward this tradition became the most complex, is Robert Motherwell. Youngest of the original Abstract-Expressionists, he shares their achievement — and their self-consciousness about it. In the forthcoming catalogue to his retrospective, now at the Museum of Modern Art (directed by Frank O'Hara), is included a slew of his writings. They are lofty speculations about the role of the artist, and of creation, as defined by our epoch. No one talks as voluminously, and with such lack of embarrassment, as does Motherwell of the problem of emotional continuity in art. It is as if Delacroix had been an Exis tialist, erecting defensive, poetic ages of himself under the cloak aesthetic theory.

Yet, had I lacked the curiosity read the artist, I would still h seen in his work the resonance his cultural situation, and, in tu discovered some special pleasu This is not to speak of the ic graphical baggage of his painti nor even of their obvious connect in their immense scale and reduc simplicity, with the grand manne the New York School. However r vant, such matters are, I think, sec dary to a larger issue. To fuss c problems in words is one thing; to f them on canvas is quite another. I career edited at the Modern with c summate finesse, and installed w extraordinary grace, there crystalli a tension between celebration of senses and a pessimistic awareness ie limitation of sense. Time and gain, one witnesses a frustrated heonism—frustrated not by physical de-ciencies, but by the perception that njoyment is only one aspect of creaon. ("The drama of creativity is that ne's resources, no matter how unsual, are inadequate.") Motherwell's uter consciousness works against ar-stic realization, but cannot be sub-ued; his inner unrest can generate reat feeling, yet is not easily sum-ioned. And, in my view, this so hu-ian predicament gives off an aura, ither than establishes the presence, passion in the show.

But auras can have their life, ieir exquisiteness even. Perhaps this ems scarcely the right word to deribe a host of very large, flat and ry paintings which play off only vo or three colors, and which are ned to purvey some quite elemen-ry looking shapes: ovals, vertical abs, curved loaves. There is an arid, mpered quality about these images hich is yet not to be confused with landness or faintheartedness. Had e wished, Motherwell could easily ave plunged into the indulgent, ftly luminous pastose Impression-m of Philip Guston. Or he could ave gone sexy and visceral-bioiorphic, like Gorky. Or he could ave latched on to the aristocratic ysteria of de Kooning. Instead, while ffected by them all, he saw his chief roblem as expressive constriction ither than expansion of pictorial ma-rial. That is, he saw the forces at his isposal—even the colors to which he as the greatest attachment—as an natomical source for invoking his per-onal responses rather than as a physal enactment of them. Invocation nposes a spareness upon the artist's ocabulary, and a deviousness upon is performance. It therefore fell to otherwell to synthesize all the myiology, eroticism and automatism of ie forties by the condensation of rms, and the discovery of ciphers.
ut simultaneously, he had to effect iis goal through the heightened ar-culateness of pigment, demanded by ie avant-garde ethic to which he subribed. More than any of his peers, otherwell sublimates his conflicts, which the paintings themselves are sual embodiments.

As an example, let me take a 1962
invas, "Chi Ama, Crede" (Who oves, Trusts), in which a recurring aw, a disproportion of the general-ed over the particular, is held at
iy. It is a 12-foot frieze of wandering tan zones, surrounding two utterly eccentric, squirming turpentine blots of cool rusts: all this laid on in very close values. Basically, the picture posits a contrast between restful opaque fields which hold the surface, and uneven stains, which, with their shifting shadows, open up a translucent space, and suggest a watery, organic agitation. But these rather hormonal blots are hemmed or even locked in by the ground at every stop of their fading perimeters. Here the artist reveals an overloaded liquidity that has dried up and been absorbed, and a mat, diffident façade that discloses an unsuspected strength. But suddenly, at one point, he withholds the paint tissue, and in an irregular glimpse of white canvas, flicks a whip of splatters that are almost electric, under the murky circumstances. The whole thing glows as a vicarious pageant of his psyche.

Oppositions of this nature are not difficult to discover throughout Motherwell's career. An amorphous spasm is found to eat away at some band or block, and yet be contained by it. In order for such struggles to seem truly serious, they must never appear urgent. This even applies to the seemingly brutal "Elegy" (to the Spanish Republic) series, which has become the trade-mark of his entire sensibility. On a wall in which five of these canvases (from the fifties) display their giant black silhouettes against white grounds, in one of the most magisterial ensembles I have seen in a long time, the "Spanishness" and obsessiveness of Motherwell come forth in about equal measure. Considered on one level, they are a monotonously decorative juxtaposition of vertically oriented black ovoids and thick bending pillars. On the other hand, they are all variously configured images of the same horizontal pressure, in which the ovoids are gently crowded or sometimes squeezed together. If these forms were meant to convince as individual structures, then there might be cause to view their more than seventy versions as redundant. As opposed to this, I judge them to be affecting proxies, occasionally brittle, at times relaxed, of the artist's deepest apprehension, unfolding in the slow, full beats of a pictorial pavane.

To any visitor of the exhibition, it should be obvious that Motherwell deals constantly in polarities. If black and white is one extremity, then barely differentiated value changes, accruing large fields, is another. This is not an art of small incident or variegated transitions. The same is true of his color, which impresses often enough by the absence of basic

NO ONE ADMITTED WHILE THE CLOCK IS TICKING!
BUNNY LAKE IS MISSING

AN OTTO PREMINGER FILM
starring LAURENCE OLIVIER · CAROL LYNLEY · KEIR DULLEA · NOEL COWARD
NOW PLAYING AT 3 THEATRES!
VICTORIA BROADWAY AT 46TH ST. / BEEKMAN 65TH ST AT 2ND AVE / 34TH ST. EAST NEAR 2ND AVENUE
FOR STARTING TIMES CALL PLAZA 1-3071
. . . and please come on time!
A COLUMBIA RELEASE
NOT RECOMMENDED FOR CHILDREN UNDER 12.

hues, rather than by chromatic imagination. When, as in the thirty-fourth Elegy, he adds a deep blue, grayed yellow, and red with orange next to his dark-minded anagram, the effect is of an unparalleled elegance. But only once, in the magnificent "Je T'aime," IV (1955-57), does he really plume a vision of painting which otherwise is quite Franciscan in mood and guise. In general, the alkaline palette runs toward sandy ochres, discreet siennas, olives and a powder blue, oddly piercing when he wants it to be, but more typically sulky. And all this is manifested by a declarative, yet thin brushing that neither pauses to ingratiate nor to skimp the weight of any area. Like Jules Renard, Motherwell seems to care for "cakes that taste a little like bread." His cool handling and subdued color not only act as a foil for his hieratic forms but conserve an energy that does not have to test itself.

Historically, finally, the retrospective has considerable interest. Here, for instance, are the important early collages (how congenial they seem to his temperament): "Pancho Villa, Dead and Alive," 1943, or "In Yellow and White," of 1949. They are fresh, unstudied works that yet, in the first, pull Cubism and Surrealist calligraphy tightly together in a decorative linear compound; and, in the second, demonstrate a new painterliness—in paper. Here also, is the small-scaled "Beside the Sea" series of 1962, in which an arabesque of lightly flung paint is permanently suspended over a bar of shore. Then too, one has the mammoth current works, whose direction is yet too problematical for me to gauge. At any rate, what is distinct about Motherwell among the Abstract-Expressionists is the muted, distraught echo he alone gives of the Mediterranean tradition. For him, a, shape does not exist to be exploded or to be employed decoratively, but as an instigation of ancient memories. It is not so much the look of his pai ngs as it is their romantic premise tha brands him vividly of his time Be- tween the turbulent Expressi ist and the monolithic color-field in ers, he reiterates a third altern ve provocatively hard to describe. A the moment, his paintings have to ak their way in a world in whicl ar is not sacred. If I at one time f re for their staying power, I now se that, contrary to Motherwell's wi doubt, their resources are ade at after all.

The Best Way
To Get
THE
NATION

THE NATION 10-18-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

THEATRE

Harold Clurma

HAPPY DAYS

The alternant performances of Beckett's Happy Days at the Cherry Lane: Madeleine Renaud in French, Ruth White in English, offered a contrast not simply in languages but of acting styles. One might say that Madeleine Renaud and Ruth White, being separate individuals, would naturally differ in their presentation of Winnie, the lady who speaks with very little interruption by her husband for an hour and twenty minutes in Beckett's play. But the difference extends beyond personalities. There is a difference of approach that is related to national character, to tone and techniques characteristic of the actresses' cultural backgrounds.

Renaud's interpretation made the impression of a remembered performance. She herself does not seem fully there! By this I mean that the French actress went through the part, studied the meaning of its every phase and phrase, and perfected every device of voice and gesture which she might use to convey those meanings. These signs or indications of the character's traits and of the author's intentions are rendered with sharp accuracy, intelligence and polish. The result strikes one as a duplication or copy of something initially conceived and perhaps felt. It is a superb demonstration or explanation, but none of the original impulses seem to be present.

This is classically French. For the French — as Diderot once preached and Coquelin practiced—believe that the actor first experiences or recognizes the emotion of his part and then, observing its manifestations, fashions a form that will most attractively embody it. There is of course an intimate correspond ce between the actor's first inspir tion and the means by which he cho se to reproduce or imitate it. Still, the attempt is made to forge them nto an organic unity. This gives the prac- ticed French actor—and Renau is one of the most accomplished e m- plars of the tradition today—a er- tain objective quality which ind es in the spectator a sense of se ng the finished portrait at a dista ce.

An American actor will aim to make his chacracterization hap en, so to speak, immediately and af sh at each performance, to make i an event being born and living at he very moment we witness it. W en the French actor is inferior, we et a disillusioning artificiality or er ti- ness; when the American actor ils he becomes strained or self-indulg nt.

Happy Days changed with he alternation of cast. Renaud made he play crisper, harder, more iro c. Ruth White lent it greater hu r, humanity and much more var y. The play thus acquired a tender ss which adds to its stature by ma ig it more complex or, at any rate, ss pessimistically unilinear.

If Beckett is at all like Gork n this respect, he might say, as e Russian dramatist did, of two pro c- tions of one of his plays which v e produced in Moscow at about e same time: "Both are right." But y own preference is clear. Ruth W te is one of our most talented actres s. Only the sorry state of the New Y k theatre situation in general has e- vented wide recognition of this f t.

After seeing its first productio n 1961, then reading the play, t n seeing it twice again in the surprise "repertory" scheme of the Cherry Lane, I thought I had had a surfeit of Happy Days. I suspected that it was more suited to performance on radio or to disk recording than to the stage. This I now realize is not at all true. Just as there is in its spare writing a wealth of subtle allusion, so every image and stage property—the use of pistol, parasol, lipstick and reticule, etc.—becomes strangely telling, indeed vital to the play's total effect and meaning. It is a bitter, funny, touching work — gratifyingly inconclusive.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE MARRIED WOMAN
MICKEY ONE

Jean-Luc Godard uses the screen less as a blackboard on which to outline a story than as a canvas on which to compose idiosyncratic montages of contemporary experience. Thus The Married Woman is built up from fragments of action; even fragments of people. Its time pendulum fluctuates wildly, its encounters are often enigmatic, and it is set against a background of social typography (primarily advertising) that is symptomatic of, rather than relevant to, the events under observation. The film is also punctuated by the visual puns (the camera zooms in on the word "danger" to produce the word "ange") which with Godard amount almost to a tic.

The woman of the title is trying to choose between her lover and her husband. The camera finds her in bed with the one and then the other—these are fine scenes of lingering sensuality; the camera itself seems aroused. We see her fleeing swiftly across Paris from rendezvous to rendezvous; we look over her shoulder as she thumbs anxiously (though it is implausible that Macha Meril should feel anxiety on the subject) through pages of brassiere ads and bust-development brochures; with her, we eavesdrop on two schoolgirls discussing intercourse. Once, briefly, we see her as an ironic, sophisticated hostess entertaining her husband's guest, but overwhelmingly she becomes, by Godard's ellipses, a woman in heat.

And that, it seems to me, is where Godard's method hobbles him. Lurking behind his flash-bulb pinning of people to the screen there is a story, and the viewer tries to piece it together. We learn that the husband is besotted by memory, that the wife suppresses the past in order to play in guilty irresponsibility with the present, that the lover is an actor who is made irresolute by an inability to know when he is acting. But Godard merely teases with his data of characterization, and one is forced back on the carnality of his people (in which they are much like everyone else) and never comes to terms with the minds and habits through which they might achieve some individuality.

He has not quite contented himself with a tableau that might be called "Modern Venery" and not quite given us the narrative for a story of modern love. The ambiguity is disagreeably pornographic (pornography being the sexuality of characters in whom otherwise we take little interest) and in grotesque contrast with the wit, elegance and invention of the supporting milieu.

Mickey One, in Arthur Penn's film of that name, is K from Hamtramck—a young stand-up comic of Polish extraction on the run from a trial to which he has not been summoned, for a crime at which he can only guess, presided over by judges he cannot identify. Is it real or in his mind? Given the flare and cut, wipe and jump style of slightly portentous photography, I believe we are meant to understand that, as for him, it may be largely in his mind, but for the rest of us it is real enough. Mickey is on the lam from the gangsters who hunt us all for the sins we forget having committed. And at the end comes an apocalyptic moment when, it seems, K at last meets Godot.

This is a very heady metaphysics that Penn has framed in slightly quaint Prohibition-era gangland. He has brought some flamboyant actors to it: Warren Beatty in the title role, Hurd Hatfield as an epicene nightclub proprietor, Franchot Tone as Mickey's angel of doom. His camera work and editing have a slapdash energy that is invigorating. I enjoyed watching it — enjoyed particularly Beatty being as emotionally hair-trigger as Marlon Brando, and Hatfield engaging with Jeff Corey (who plays his partner) in fragments of Ionesco absurdity. Afterwards, though, Mickey One seemed to me less an organized creation than a quick run through of all the "in" devices of contemporary letters — the idea being that if you spin enough of them, and make it fast and noisy, something is bound to happen.

The picture sums itself up in a night scene wherein a mad artisan cavorts in front of a huge outdoor mobile that is engaged in destroying itself, to the delight of its creator and an attending crowd, when the process of pyrotechnic entropy is interrupted by the arrival of an indignant fire department. If this means that Penn sees himself as firing off in all directions for the innocent pleasure of lighting up the sky, it is a disarming admission. It would have been still more disarming if he had found a way to give Jean Tinguely credit for the self-immolating mobile, and had otherwise acknowledged that he was making sport with a vaudeville of borrowed ideas and techniques.

'English'

If she stood with you where the men playing "bocce" roll the lead ball so it thumps on the hard sand then twisting aim their bodies like tight dancers along the subtle planned invisible line it must cleave to to win, would she then at last know why you in that double-jointed fear of telling her and not telling her will sit hours over coffee sometimes pressing your hands around the hot cup, and not look at her, and then touch her long hair like some affectionate brother or old man, never what you are?

Richard Lourie

GORILLAS

(Continued from page 250)

tree-climbing wolf, steppe polecat, marbled polecat, European mink, raccoon dog, etc. Even better than Westchester.

But unlike Westchester, the virtue these wetlands have is their unsuitability for man. Certainly they could be filled, drained, and turned into golf courses. Then they would be dead; now they are the most biologically alive and productive kind of country on earth.

The European model for the Westchester way of treating the countryside, according to Curry-Lindahl, is of course England. There is only normal erosion and plenty of room for wild life, though not for wolves, wild boars or gorillas. England far surpasses Westchester in intelligent love of the flora. Even Scotland, though largely deforested, has kept its moors from erosion, and has a good game population.

Belgium, to my surprise, is another Westchester. A single Belgian town park holds more birds of more species than an area in Sweden twenty times as large. The Ardennes Forest, grimly famous as the strategic key to the Battle of the Bulge, is more graciously a splendid game sanctuary.

France, though careful of its flora, is much less sympathetic to its fauna. Its first national park was created as late as 1914. Even in he Camargue reserve, shooting is oen heard, and often at night! In he latter case, most of the game wold escape, wounded, to die in the dk.

Naturally, animals do ot want to live with people like that n contrast, the Swedish moose as learned to adapt itself to farmlad, which it shares with the decat Swedes. The American moose, hvever, still boycotts people.

The obvious fact about Amerca is that with mechanized agricultue. less and less land is needed to fd its people. A program of removg surplus land from the tax rolls d letting it revert to its wild, virgial condition would seem perfey feasible. This is happening anywy. unsystematically, without premitation or coordination, in New Egland, Appalachia, parts of e. Rocky Mountain plateau and otr marginal areas. The land goes p for tax sale and is not bought.

Man has two opposite choices n dealing with the land. One is to ce for it, as in Westchester. The otr is to let it alone, as in the wetlans. In the United States, the lettg alone should be extended to lae parts of southern Florida and Losiana, the salt marshes of the Soueast coast, such as the Disrd Swamp, the Texas coast, the wland behind Charleston, S.C., Nv Jersey's Mullica River salt mar, New York's Montezuma marshs and those along the Hudson Riv, the swamps near Ipswich, Ma, the Illinois refuges along the Missippi, upper Minnesota, and Cfornia's Petaluma and Suisn marshes. To a politician's or a retor's mind a marsh is so much lt development and lost taxes; a man sorely needs the protection of pple who really like this count. Sometimes one wonders how may of them there are.

Some citizen groups have alreay been formed to persuade local gernments to grant tax forgivens to such abandoned land, or to move it entirely from the tax rol Since local government is never thusiastic about renouncing tax, such a program probably needs feral support. Meanwhile, throu such organizations anybody w really likes his country can go work saving some of it right no or at least tomorrow morning.

Now, where do we put th gorillas?

STATEMENT OF OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND CIRCULATION (Act of October 23, 1962; Section 4369, Title 39, United States Code).

1. Date of filing: October 1, 1965.

2. Title of publication: THE NATION.

3. Frequency of issue: weekly except July and August when bi-weekly.

4. Location of known office of publication (Street, city, county, state, zip code): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

5. Location of the headquarters or general business offices of the publishers (Not printers): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

6. Names and addresses of publisher, editor, and managing editor:

Publisher (Name and address):
George G. Kirstein
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Editor (Name and address):
Carey McWilliams
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Managing Editor (Name and address):
Robert L. Hatch, Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

7. Owner (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a partnership or other unincorporated firm, its name and address, as well as that of each individual must be given). Name: The Nation Associates, Inc. (no stockholders), 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014; George G. Kirstein, Pres. and Treas., 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014; Carey McWilliams, Vice-Pres. and Sec., 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014.

8. Known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages or other securities (If there are none, so state): None.

9. Paragraphs 7 and 8 include, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, also the statements in the two paragraphs show the affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner. Names and addresses of individuals who are stockholders of a corporation which itself is a stockholder or holder of bonds, mortgages or other securities of the publishing corporation have been included in paragraphs 7 and 8 when the interests of such individuals are equivalent to 1 percent or more of the total amount of the stock or securities of the publishing corporation.

10. This item must be completed for all publications except those which do not carry advertising other than the publisher's own and which are named in Sections 132.231, 132.232, and 132.233, Postal Manual (Sections 4355a, 4355b, and 4356 of Title 39, United States Code):

A. Total no. copies printed (net press run): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 34,867; single issue nearest to filing date, 35,000.

B. Paid Circulation:

1. Sales through dealers and carriers, street vendors and counter sales: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 3,509; single issue nearest to filing date, 4,000.

2. Mail subscriptions: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 23,658; single issue nearest to filing date, 24,006.

C. Total Paid Circulation: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 27,167; single issue nearest to filing date, 28,006.

D. Free Distribution (including samples) by mail, carrier or other means: Average no copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 160; single issue nearest to filing date, 160.

E. Total Distribution (Sum of C and D): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 27,327; single issue nearest to filin gdate, 28,166.

F. Office use, left-over, unaccounted, spoiled after printing: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 7,540; single issue nearest to filing date, 6,834.

G. Total (Sum of E & F—should equal net press run shown in A): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 34,867; single issue nearest to filing date, 35,000.

I certify that the statements made by me above are correct and complete.

GEORGE G. KIRSTEIN, Publisher

Crossword Puzzle No. 1123

By FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

1 By the way, the children's toys are capable of holding us up! (10)
6 See here! You might have to do it to your clothes, if you do it to your clothes! (4)
10 Calm content. (7)
11 Magnify. (7)
12 Evidently father is at home, suffering. (4)
13 Need import of it? Try saving. (10)
15 That mechanism which turns the cart? (7)
16 How one might be entitled to have company coming and going, if hot, dry, and uncomfortable. (7)
17 Might one get sainted in place of it? (7)
20 You might find a favorite around as an accompanying figure for a poet, musically speaking. (7)
22 Take care not to be guilty of it.
23 Just a little water! (4)
25 Casca-like? (7)
26 His barber certainly had a lot of side-lines. (7)
27 A late spell for the hunter, possibly. (4)
28 Water hole? Quite the opposite, in Oregon. (6, 4)

DOWN:

1 Is more rent to be confused with 2 down, having posed a problem concerning certain Congressmen? (15)
2 Top problem with 12, set apart. (7)
3 Pack animal stand? (4)
4 Food stuff? (7)
5 People who find things to be so, traditionally? (7)
7 Chief city of Michigan. (7)
8 Where the carriage returns, or the station wagon might meet you. (3, 3, 2, 3, 4)
9 A sort of larch found around a normal, but different growth. (9)
14 Paper press? (5, 4)
18 Spanish city artist. (7)
19 For a literary man, his tragedy was national. (7)
20 Desert when on deck, or does one just steal away? (4, 3)
21 The place referred to in 19's clue. (7)
24 Is what he should be doing exhausting? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1122

ACROSS: 1 Throwbacks; 6 Ebbs; 10 Rubs out; 11 Inferno; 12 Diagnose; 13 Erase; 15, 25 and 20 Light housekeeping; 17 Infatuate; 19 Take steps; 23 Edema; 24 Crichton; 27 Initial; 28 Amusing; 29 Gags; 30 Unredeemed. DOWN: 1 Tyre; 2 Ribbing; 3 and 21 Wrong-doing; 4 Authorize; 5 Knife; 7 Barbara; 8 Stonehenge; 9 Effected; 14 Flattering; 16 Tasmania; 18 Fascinate; 22 Idolism; 24 Colon; 26 Aged.

TRAVEL

TEACHERS—travel free to Europe leading your own college or high school tour. We help you plan your own general or study tour and make all arrangements for you and your group at rates available only to us. Write for free complete kit on how to do it: Dept. T7, U.S. National Student Association, 265 Madison Ave., New York, N.Y. 10016.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

"LET THERE BE A WORLD." Felix Greene's pictorial account of humanity's dilemma. One dollar a copy. Concerned Citizens, Box 191, Palo Alto, Calif.

ART

ORIGINAL ART COSTS LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! GRAPHIC CIRCLE offers you contemporary original signed lithographs, etchings, woodcuts for $3.00 monthly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Free Brochure — Graphic Circle, Dept. NA, 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

PERSONALS

THE FAMOUS ALEXANDER TECHNIQUE (teaching natural, efficient body use) improves posture, reduces muscular tension, promotes sense of well-being. Endorsed by John Dewey, Aldous Huxley, GBS, Sir Charles Sherrington, etc. New students: four lessons half-price. 799-2956. NYC.

Bumper Stickers—MAKE LOVE NOT WAR —50c each; 3 for $2.00, from STUDENT UNION FOR PEACE ACTION, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Divsion
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

For Fall Semester

THE NATION

In the Classroom

California State College
Los Angeles, Calif.

"Wherever I go, I continue to introduce The Nation to my classes in International Relations as a journal whose informative articles are accompanied by sane, constructive editorials, pungently and effectively expressed. This fine combination leads to excellent discussion."

D. F. FLEMING

Middle Tennessee State College
Murfreesboro, Tenn.

"I have used The Nation for twenty years in my courses in American Government and American foreign policy. Its consistently high level of performance has made it the most useful aid of any periodical attempting to interpret the American scene to the college student. It challenges them to think, to dispel the fog of intellectualism in which they have moved, to put to examination the easy assumptions of their community. We find particularly useful some of the issues devoted exclusively to a single topic. The Nation is also useful in what it ignores if students can be prodded into asking why."

NORMAN L. PARKS

San Diego State College
San Diego, Calif.

"As a class tool, The Nation has the virtue of stimulating the students, of awakening them to a whole new world of unhappy people, of conflicts and injustices and frank discussion of problems which the polite world of our local journalism ignores. During World War II, when I was employed in the Office of Censorship, I frequently noticed that secret information about incipient rebellions and trouble spots around the world, the men and the issues involved, had come to me weeks or months earlier in an article or editorial in The Nation. To some extent you still precede the public prints, though less spectacularly than twenty years ago."

SIDNEY L. GULICK

For the convenience of teachers, who want to use The Nation in the classroom, we offer a special classroom rate.

65c per month per student in bundle orders of ten or more delivered to the same address. Desk copy is supplied free to the teacher. Simply fill out the coupon for immediate service.

THE NATION, Education Department
333 6th Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me .... copies per month for .... months. (Minimum order ten copies per month.)

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

10-18-65

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
CT 25 1965

PLAYS and POLITICS: Harold Clurman

THE NATION

October 25, 1965 . . 35c

The Best Torture: A Vietnam Dialogue

'ONCE YOU'VE BROKEN HIM DOWN . . .'

Marshall Sahlins

British Peace Movement: LOOKING FOR THE MARCHERS

Theodore Roszak

Moscow Restoration: THE DRAGON OF BUREAUCRACY

Isaac Deutscher

HEMINGWAY'S LAST LAUGH

Kermit Vanderbilt

LETTERS

China coverage

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: An editorial in your October 4 issue, titled "The No-Enterprise System," makes this statement with regard to the reports of Charles Taylor from China:

"The articles have appeared frequently in The New York Times, and occasionally in The Washington Post, the San Francisco Chronicle and a few other papers, but the bulk of the American press has ignored them."

Regrettably, your statement as regards "the bulk of the American press" may be true—but you have overlooked completely one of the largest newspapers in this country, The Philadelphia Evening and Sunday Bulletin.

The Bulletin . . . has printed every article Taylor has written and has used as much as a full page at a time of pictures taken by him in China. . . .

William B. Dickinson
Managing Editor

Frost and The Nation

Port Credit, Ont.

Dear Sirs: It is with mixed feelings of dismay, anger, incredulity and depression that I note the absence of even the barest reference to Robert Frost in the article by Alexander Laing, "The Nation and Its Poets," in your One Hundredth Anniversary issue. . . . Since you did not publish Frost during his and your long lifetime, the first question is, why didn't you? If your answer should be that he didn't offer you his poetry then the next question is, why didn't you go after it—at least some of it? If you did go after Frost and he turned you down, then say so, and if you know why he turned you down say that also. If you just didn't like his poetry then why didn't you say so? If you regret not having paid him any attention, then say so. . . . I think you and Alexander Laing owe your readers an explanation.

Byron A. Waite

Hanover, N.H.

Dear Sirs: Robert Frost first appeared in The Nation in 1921 with "The Pauper Witch of Grafton." "The Armful," "Blood" and "The Bear" followed in 1928. Since I wanted the objectivity that comes from using only the public record, I have seen nothing in your files that might tell us why poet and publication got together so tardily and parted so soon. Frost was first brought to wide public notice in The Independent, in 1894. It had published seven of his poems by 1908. The Atlantic Monthly, beginning in 1915, and other notable journals, have published many more over a longer period. Thus, in a piece on "The Nation and Its Poets," there is not much reason for claiming Frost as one of "its." . . . To meet a space limitation, I gave priority to an adequate treatment of the poetry prizes of the twenties and regretfully substituted one phrase — that the magazine, in that decade, "honored the stronger established poets"—for a large amount of material that I had hoped to include. Frost's four appearances all occurred in that excised period. . . .

Alexander Laing

Moral bomb

Bronx, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: At the Vatican Council it was the "ultraconservative" Alfredo Cardinal Ottaviani, secretary of the Holy Office and éminence most grise in the eyes of Church reformers, who led the fight to outlaw atomic armaments. He said all forms of violence, nuclear or conventional, should be condemned. The American "progressives" meanwhile were arguing that nuclear weapons are morally acceptable when used for deterrence. They emphasized the distinction between "offensive" and "defensive" arms.

God spare us from the forces of enlightenment! Their radiance burns the skin. George Koski

Puppet press

Racine, Wis.

Dear Sirs: As I read "The Crackdown" [editorial, Oct. 11] I suddenly realized that Marthin Luther King has become completely absent from news copy and television reporting since his statements about our Vietnam policy. In addition to the fact "that the decision makers in Washington are sensitive to the teach-ins and other forms of public protest and discussion of the war in Vietnam" ["A Presidential Front," editorial, Oct. 11], it appears that they exercise an extraordinary degree of control over the news media. Is our "free press" free only to write what is acceptable to the leaders and some of the followers?

Charles Conrard, III

Rant

Lincoln, Neb.

Dear Sirs: David Mandel's statement, "The great art of our day without exception favors the Left" [letter to The Nation, Oct. 11] parallels the bigoted nonsense I am used to seeing in newspaper letters-to-the-editor columns. I am a profound admirer of Malraux, Silone and Picasso. I also admire such great modern artists as Conrad, Hesse, Stevens and Rilke. . . . Must The Nation print rant in order to remain a democratic forum?

Mordecai Marcus

THE
NATION

Monday, October 25, 1965
Volume 201, No. 13

In this issue

EDITORIALS

261

ARTICLES

264 Moscow Restoration:
The Dragon of Bureaucra
Isaac Deutscher

266 The Best Torture:
"Once You've Broken Hin Down . . ."
Marshall Sahlins

270 Plays and Politics
Harold Clurman

273 British Peace Movement:
Looking for the Marchers
Theodore Roszak

278 Southern Juries:
The White Hand of Justic
Paul Good

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

281 Mythic Voyage
Allen Guttmann

282 Washington's Top Banana
Larry L. King

283 Correspondent to the Underworld
Sol Yurick

284 The Last Words of E. H.
Kermit Vanderbilt

286 Records
Benjamin Boretz

287 High Office (poem)
William Burford

288 Films
Robert Hatch

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 28
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Warren Miller, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Oct. 25, 1965. Vol. 201, N

The Nation is published weekly (except in and August, when biweekly) by The N Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Av New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class po paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two y $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice i quired for change of address, which cann made without the old address as well as the Information to Libraries: The Nation is inc in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Review Digest and the Public Affairs Info tion Service.

~~MAY 31~~
OCT 3

EDITORIALS

Africa on the Verge

Since World War II, European countries have with few exceptions allowed recalcitrant colonies or members of commonwealths to go their own way. If Rhodesia were a united country in quest of independence, Britain would no doubt be prepared to accede. But "independence" in this instance is only a front for tyrannical racism. The freedom which Prime Minister Ian D. Smith demands is the right to maintain the control of some 217,000 obdurate whites over 4 million blacks, so that the exploitation of the blacks may continue. Smith and his followers, like the white racists in neighboring South Africa and the white racists in our own South, are living in the past. To them, "independence" means the right to balk the forces of the 20th century.

By all indications, time will run out on the white dictatorship in Rhodesia before it runs out in South Africa or in the United States. After his last meeting with Prime Minister Harold Wilson, Smith emerged from No. 10 Downing Street white-faced but resolute. He now has more reason for the qualms which showed on his face. Out of 117 member states of the United Nations, 107 supported an Assembly resolution calling upon Britain to "take all steps necessary" to prevent or end the threatened Rhodesian rebellion. The only dissents came from Portugal and South Africa, where white minorities are in the same situation as the whites in Rhodesia. Britain took no part in the proceedings, on the ground that Rhodesia was a constitutional problem for the United Kingdom, and the UN had no right to intervene. This was a necessary technical move. Actually, the British welcomed UN support, which may have been the last hope of bringing the rebellious Rhodesians to terms.

The U.S. stand must have been particularly heartening to the British and dismaying to the Rhodesian die-hards. Ambassador Goldberg pledged that we would "take the necessary concrete steps, in concert with others" to balk a unilateral declaration of independence. The sanctions which Prime Minister Wilson has threatened include cutting off Rhodesian tobacco purchases, freezing sterling reserves, refusing to recognize Rhodesian passports, and corollary measures. If these do not avail, military action will follow. It would hardly be easier for Ian Smith and his followers to prevail in such a war than it was for Cheddi Jagan to prevail against London's intervention in British Guiana. The difference is that morally Jagan had a case; Smith has none.

If Smith is frightened, so is Wilson, and with good reason. The white minority in Africa, to use an outdated metaphor, is sitting on a powder keg. The black majority in Rhodesia might be the first to suffer if civil war should break out, but all Africa could be set aflame. White enclaves might resist for a time, perhaps for a long time, but in the end white domination of Africa "South of the Sahara" is doomed. It would be far better if Smith's followers, and the racists the world over, could learn this lesson without a blood bath.

Poor Karl Mundt, Poor GOP!

Sen. Karl Mundt is so conservative that one finds it hard to conceive of anyone to his right. Imperturbable and happy, he sat at Joe McCarthy's side and assisted in the inquisitions of the Senate Internal Security Committee. Before that he was one of the luminaries of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Denouncing atheistic communism and baiting labor were the foundations of his political career, along with supporting farm prices, which is of course essential in South Dakota. He has a plaque from Americans for Constitutional Action certifying to his hyper-Americanism. He supported Barry Goldwater.

In the face of all these good deeds, poor Karl is getting hell—from the Right. Richard Murphy, a member of the John Birch Society who says he was born and reared in Huron, S.D., has returned to his native state from Orange County in California, a Birch stronghold, where he practiced law and managed the successful state Senate campaign of another Birchite, John Schmitz. Mundt is not conservative enough for Murphy, who has announced his intention of running against the old fellow in the Republican primary. Mundt, it is reported, cannot understand why the Birchites should pick on him. He does not think that he is in danger in the primary, but he acknowledges that Murphy may cause enough dissension among the Republicans to throw his Senate seat to a Democrat in the general election next year.

Mundt is not alone in his fears. Somewhat belatedly, Sen. Thruston Morton, for years a big wheel in the GOP, declares in stentorian tones that the party ought to kick the John Birch Society "square in the tail." No one saw him booting members of the Society at the 1964 Republican convention, although there were plenty of them around. Senate Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen and House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford join in reading the Birchites out of the GOP. Even Barry Goldwater, writing in the National Review, puts the Society on probation. Either Robert Welch should resign or the members should, Barry advises.

The Nation takes pleasure in announcing that with this issue Warren Miller joins the staff as literary editor. Mr. Miller is the author of six novels, notably The Cool World and Looking for the General; in 1961 he published Ninety Miles from Home, a report on Cuba based on his visit there. His short stories have appeared in The New Yorker, Paris Review and The Saturday Evening Post. Mr. Miller is a graduate of the University of Iowa, where he taught for a time in the English Department, and the recipient of an award from The Academy and National Institute of Arts and Letters.

Grandin Conover, the previous literary editor, has resigned from the magazine to accept a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

All these staunch advocates of traditional Republicanism should have begun the purge of Birchites earlier, if they meant business. Their chance of success now is rather slim. The Republican organizations in the five states that went for Goldwater are for the most part firmly in the grasp of the Birchites. The Republican organization in California soon may be. The top leadership of the GOP can invite the unwelcome rightists to leave from now to 1968, but the invitation will probably be declined. The moral is that if party crashers are allowed to stay and dance with the girls, it is difficult to oust them at the stroke of midnight.

New York's Newspapers

Washington may be the political capital of the country but New York comes closer to being the information capital, partly because The New York Times is published there. The primacy of the Times was handsomely acknowledged by David Lawrence in his syndicated column, which appears in the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Lawrence pointed out that the Times presents daily a comprehensive record of public events and, in full text or only slightly abridged, pronouncements on governmental matters of incalculable value to historians. When the Times is blacked out, historians of the future, and commentators of the present, are proportionately handicapped. Yet this calamity in information gathering and recording has occurred twice in less than three years, lasting twenty-five days in the labor-management battle which has just ended, and 114 days in the even more woeful showdown of 1962-63. And as matters now stand, when the present contracts expire in less than eighteen months, New Yorkers will again be deprived of their newspapers for an indefinite period.

There must be a better way to run an industry! Daily and weekly newspapers, The Nation included, advise and comment on everything under the sun Nothing escapes their omniscience, except perhaps how to run their own business. Nor is this failing confined to the New York sector of the industry—newspaper strikes occur in other cities, and some have lasted not for months but for more than a year.

If a cure, or at least a palliative, can be found in New York, it might be applied elsewhere. Some fumbling attempts have been made. The trouble is that they are started but never carried on. In the last three labor-management confrontations of the New York press, Theodore W. Kheel has been the mediator. Mr. Kheel bears the scars of a quarter century of industrial peacemaking, and his ideas must be given due weight. He is quoted as saying that he has never en a worse mess than that which has been created by the joint efforts of the newspaper publishers nd unions in New York. Yet Mr. Kheel has made on-structive proposals which, had they been followed up might have averted the last strike and could a ert the next one.

After the 114-day shutdown Mayor Wagner, at Mr. Kheel's behest, set up a Joint Industry Board for he discussion, on a continuing basis, of automation nd other issues which trouble the industry. The prop ed board has never functioned. The basic reason is at there is a lack of unity among the publishers on he one hand and among the unions on the other In 1963 the Post defected, in 1965 the Herald Trib ne. On the union side, the rivalry between the Newsp er Guild and Typographical Union No. 6—the printe — is another stumbling block to any rational solu on of the industry's problems. On both sides, the atti de is basically that every unit must strive for its n advantage, and the devil take the hindmost. In s ne New York industries, the garment trades for insta e, a wiser attitude has succeeded this invitation to ch s. One can only hope that after this last costly lesso a concerted effort will be made to put Mr. Kheel's rec n-mendations to practical use. If discussion of the ne s-paper industry's problems can be started now d carried on resolutely, a less costly method of sett g disputes may yet be worked out. The alternative is fewer papers and fewer jobs, and more revenue r the television networks.

The Nonprofits Again

The Nation's editorial of May 24, 1965, "Is A o-space Corp. Necessary?" was a pat on the back c n-pared with the blistering report of the Subcommi e for Special Investigations of the House Committee n Armed Services, of which Porter Hardy, Jr. (D., V), is chairman. Aerospace Corporation is a "nonpro " auxiliary of the Air Force which got out of con l to such an extent that even an aerospace trade jo -nal refers editorially to "the Aerospace mess" d agrees that the blame must be laid at the door of e Air Force. Apparently what the Aerospace preside t, Dr. Ivan A. Getting, was trying to establish wa a novel type of institution which would give its exe -tives all the privileges of a profit-oriented corporat n together with the advantages of working for the g -ernment, but without the responsibility of a corpo -tion to its stockholders or of a government age y to the Congress and the Executive. And until l . Hardy's subcommittee caught up with him, he v s not unsuccessful.

It is no secret that one purpose of a nonprofit c -poration of the Aerospace type is to get around g -ernment salary restrictions. The subcommittee poi out that a vicious circle is in the making here. Ir message to Congress in May, 1965, President Jol son gave support to the argument that federal sal rates should be kept in "appropriate relationship" w rates prevailing throughout the economy. Then the government sets up nonprofit corporations as a means to pay higher salaries to the aerospace elite, with the result that federal salaries must be raised to make them competitive with those of the nonprofits, and so on, around and around.

Dr. Getting himself is an example. At the Raytheon Corporation, which is no niggardly employer, Dr. Getting's salary as vice president for engineering and research was $45,000 a year, plus stock options. Aerospace hired him at $75,000 a year, plus "incentive compensation" of $15,000, making a total of $90,000; there were also fringe benefits. His relocation expenses were $7,840.14, including $3,133.02 for trucking his 40-foot yacht from Gloucester, Mass., to San Pedro, Calif. The cost to Aerospace of a banquet Dr. Getting gave for eighty-eight people in 1962 was $1,981.76. A premium of $1,800 a year was paid by the corporation for his group life insurance of $350,000. Nor does this exhaust the list of benefits.

However, it would be unfair to pillory Dr. Getting for what everybody else in Aerospace was doing to the best of his ability. They may have turned out some valuable work for the Air Force—as Gen. Bernard A. Schriever, the founding father of Aerospace, claims — but the upper managers were riding the gravy train for all it was worth.

Nor was the life of the intellect neglected. A 44-year-old executive was granted a leave of absence to work for his Ph.D. at Princeton in theoretical research on statistical quantum mechanics. During his year of learning he received a stipend of $16,000 and $14,000 of his $40,000 salary, or $30,000 in all—perhaps a record for completing one's education in comfort.

Of course, these sums are trifling when compared with Aerospace's business expenditures, the results of which the Hardy committee did not attempt to evaluate. In the five years of its existence Aerospace's contracts have amounted to $309 million and its fees, which correspond to profits among the unregenerate, have totaled about $16 million, or nearly 5.2 per cent of sales. This corresponds to a net of more than 10 per cent for a private corporation, since the nonprofit is exempt from income tax. The fee is what gives a nonprofit latitude in spending, since expenditures which cannot be charged to disbursement, which are itemized, can be taken out of fees, which are not. One Air Force contracting officer asked 200 times for data on the disposition of Aerospace fees and was turned down 200 times, on the ground that it was none of the Air Force's business. The contracting of-icer's superiors, right up to General Schriever, did nothing about this gap in fiscal control, which was corrected only after the revelations of the Hardy committee.

The new Secretary of the Air Force, Dr. Harold Brown, has the obligation to see to it that such lapses do not occur again. And it would be prudent for Secretary McNamara to reconsider whether nonprofit corporations are the best means of carrying out the broad functions which have been entrusted to them.

Atomic Water vs. Atomic Power

Whether nuclear control can be achieved at all is extremely doubtful. It calls for a degree of international trust and cooperation that does not exist and probably cannot be created in time to avert a free-for-all, with another dozen nations muscling into the nuclear club. The difficulties will be compounded by the inevitable development of dual-purpose nuclear plants for desalting sea water and generating electric power. Some of these plants may become triple-purpose, openly or surreptitiously turning out explosives for nuclear bombs. This additional complication points up the folly of U.S. State Department policy, supported so far by President Johnson and Prime Minister Harold Wilson, in clinging to the multilateral-force concept, which is a primary obstacle to even a token eighteen-nation agreement on measures to halt, or at least retard, nuclear proliferation.

Small nuclear water plants are in the design stage or beyond, and large ones are under intensive study, both in the United States and abroad. New York State, with federal aid, will have a small plant in operation near the eastern end of Long Island by 1968. It will generate 2.5 megawatts of electricity and produce about 1 million gallons of fresh water daily. American Machine and Foundry Company has been selected as the contractor. For New York City, staring a water famine in the face, a million gallons a day, even if it were available now, would be a drop in the bucket, but the city is discussing with federal officials a nuclear plant capable of desalting about 250 million gallons a day, or approximately a fifth of normal consumption. On roughly the same scale, the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Office of Saline Water are considering a plant which would generate 1,800 megawatts of electric power and distill 150 million gallons of sea water daily.

In the United States the chief problems in connection with such plants are siting and disposal of radioactive wastes. Presumably weapons-grade plutonium would be separated and sold back to the government, but it already produces more than it needs. Abroad, the situation is different. Israel, for example, has a 24-megawatt research reactor, built with French help, which by the rule-of-thumb figure of 1 gram of reclaimed plutonium per day for each megawatt of capacity could produce perhaps 7.5 kilograms per year or, in something over a year, enough for a "small" or Hiroshima-type bomb. The United Arab Republic has only a 2-megawatt Soviet-built research reactor at present, and it may be that the 150-megawatt desalting reactor on which Nasser had been receiving bids from American and West German firms would likewise be used only for peaceful purposes, but the Israelis might have their doubts. Yet the entire Middle East is in a chronic state of water shortage, and both Israel and Egypt are justified in planning to convert sea water for domestic and agricultural use.

In Brussels, talks between our Atomic Energy

Commission and the European Atomic Community (Euratom) have considered a heavy-water reactor cooled with organic materials for desalting sea water, generating electric power, and producing fissile material. All this technological progress is in contrast with the utter lack of political progress in the nuclear sphere. Preventing proliferation is a forlorn hope at best, but any remaining chance of control is dashed by the British-American insistence on "strengthening" NATO with atomic weapons, primarily to satisfy V st German demands. The Russians will not consen to what they feel would ultimately put atomic weap is under independent German control. With Polaris b-marines already congesting European waters, i is hard to see what added strength a multilateral f e would provide, but right-wing British Labour, d Mr. Rusk's static State Department, are solicitous ly for NATO and the importunate Germans.

MOSCOW RESTORATION

The Dragon of Bureaucracy . . . Isaac Deutsche

The Soviet Union has just become the scene of a gigantic economic and administrative upheaval. At its last session, the Party's Central Committee decided to undo and obliterate most of the Khrushchev reforms of the 1950s. The whole structure of the Soviet economy is to be overhauled, and Prime Minister Kosygin has made it clear that it will be two or three years before the resulting disarray is brought under control. The overriding purpose of the changes is to reinvest in Moscow the strict central control over the economy that was once, before Khrushchev's days, exercised from there.

Eight years have passed since Khrushchev struck a heavy blow against Moscow's bureaucracy, ordered the disbandment of scores of central economic ministries, and set up more than a hundred Sovnarkhozy, or Economic Councils, each of which was to manage the affairs of the hundred or so economic regions into which the country was divided. That reform was intended to break the rigidities of the Stalinist super-centralization, to do justice to local interests, and to release local initiative and social energy. In the years 1957 and 1958, Moscow bade farewell to its managerial aristocracy, whose members were leaving the capital for more modest posts in remote provinces. In vain did Molotov, Kaganovich and Malenkov then try to rally the industrial "barons" and to preserve the central management of the economy. That was the heyday of de-Stalinization and Khrushchev appeared to be the Soviet St. George slaying the dragon of bureaucracy.

Now, a year after Khrushchev's downfall, the dragon seems to be reviving and returning in triumph. The central economic ministries are being re-created, the regional Sovnarkhozy are disbanding. A new migration of the bureaucracy is beginning: after a diaspora lasting eight years the barons are about to return to their old seat of power in Moscow. Meanwhile, there is an interregnum in the immense realm of Soviet industry: the Sovnarkhozy have lost power; the central ministries are not yet formed; and for the time being the Gosplan, the State Planning Commission, which has no experience in the practical management of industry, is supposed to wield authority.

It is with some obvious misgivings that the Soviet Prime Minister has launched this counterreform. Between the lines of his long and grim speech at the Central Committee he tried to reassure the country that what it is experiencing is not a relapse into the absurdities of the Stalinist bureaucracy. While he insisted on the necessity to restore central control of industry, he also dwelt on the need to restrict that control to a few selected but crucial areas, and to guarantee the rights and prerogatives of local managers and producers. A special Charter of the Socialist Factory is to rationalize the system of management on the spot and to protect it against arbitrary interference from the top. The new ministries, unlike their Stalinist predecessors, are to avoid pressing managers and workers for mere quantitative production recor . They are to judge the work of a factory not so much by its indi s of gross output, which often conc l inferior produce, but by the indi s of actual sales, which measure m accurately the socio-economic va of the output. In this respect, K sygin has intimated, Soviet ind try should move even further aw from the Stalin era than it has do so far.

The state, he has further a nounced, will gradually stop payi subsidies to all industrial concer working at a deficit; hencefort every industrial unit should produ at a profit. This does not amou to the "rehabilitation of the pro motive" predicted by some Weste Sovietologists in connection with t the so-called Liberman Debate. F one thing, there has hardly been t need for any "rehabilitation profit." In each of the last two yea for instance, profits shown by S viet industry amounted to som thing like 40 billion rubles, betwee 20 and 25 per cent of the net n tional income. At present, half the national investment funds ar other government expenditure provided by industry's profits ar half by indirect taxation. The ba ance between the government's rev nues from these two sources ha decisive economic, political and cu tural significance. Throughout t decades of forced industrializatio Stalin obtained most of the accum lation funds from heavy indire taxation, which served to keep dow popular consumption, to subsidiz deficit industries, and to expand i dustries which were growing muc faster than their own accumulatio funds. With the progress of indu trialization, indirect taxation ha

---

Isaac Deutscher is the author of many books on the USSR, among them The Great Contest: Russia and the West, and a three-volume life of Trotsky (both Oxford University Press).

Ben Roth Agency

played a decreasing part and industrial profits an increasing part in financing further economic development. (Therein, to put it in technical Marxist terms, consists the transition from "primitive" to "normal" Socialist accumulation.)

Kosygin has now stated that the government is going to carry this policy a long step further. Henceforth, industry is to insure its continued expansion by means of self-finance, that is, by drawing on its own profits. This implies a further relative reduction in indirect taxation and a relative increase in the population's purchasing power, which must find its outlet in an increased volume of available consumer goods.

In a state-owned economy, however, the question of whether any industry can draw on its profits is often a matter of bookkeeping, for the profitability of an industry may depend on the prices it can obtain for its produce, and the government fixes the prices. A new Price-Fixing Commission is now therefore to revise the entire price structure of the Soviet economy, with an eye to enabling producer industries to become financially self-supporting and consumer industries to expand faster than hitherto.

Eager to justify this overhaul of the industrial machinery and the new policies, Kosygin spoke emphatically about the slowing down of Russia's rate of development in recent years. This has shown itself in the not-quite-satisfactory results of the Seven Year Plan now coming to a close. Although gross industrial output has risen by 84 per cent since 1958, this growth has been, according to the Soviet Prime Minister, far too slow in relation to fixed capital investment; and, similarly, the rise in productivity per man-hour has been sluggish. The continued crisis in agriculture—this year has again brought poor harvests—limits the volume of available consumer goods and affects badly the morale and the efficiency of industrial workers. All this, Kosygin concludes, compels a recentralization and a rationalization of economic management. The Soviet administration, he claims, has not been able to cope with its mounting difficulties because Khrushchev, in his zeal for decentralization, deprived it of the means of effective economic action.

There is undoubtedly some truth in all this. It has been clear for quite a long time that the Khrushchevite reforms, far from curing the Soviet economy of the ills of too rigid bureaucracy, have added to these the drawbacks of extreme decentralization. The regional Sovnarkhozy have developed their own local interests and particularisms and have thus weakened the cohesiveness and the momentum of the national economy.

Yet it is exceedingly doubtful whether the present return to central control will prove to be the remedy. The curse of a bureaucratic regime is that it cannot strike a sound balance between central control and local initiative, and Soviet management has periodically floundered between the extremes of despotic over-centralization and particularist-bureaucratic anarchy.

There is also in Kosygin's counterreform more than a mere reaction against the excesses and disappointments of the Khrushchevite decentralization. The Soviet Premier has made a special appeal to the managerial groups, with whom Khrushchev had been in some conflict. He promises to raise them up again and to restore their privileges and prestige. He has pledged himself implicitly to resist the egalitarian trend that has been stirring in the post-Stalinist USSR. His Charter of the Socialist Factory is to be, above all, the Charter of the Factory Manager, who is now given the right—unprecedented in the USSR—to hire and fire workers. He also gains wide discretion in distributing his wages fund among the workers. Nothing, apart from a repetition of the much overworked promise of consumer goods in future abundance, is offered to sweeten the pill for the mass of the workers. It remains to be seen what the reaction to Kosygin's policies will be at the factory level and in the trade unions.

The adoption of these decisions has been a maneuver of some political delicacy. It is not clear just how much support Kosygin has obtained for his moves either in the Presidium or in the Central Committee. His most influential colleagues have behaved in a noncommittal manner. He obviously feared considerable opposition within the Central Committee, and he reduced that opposition to silence by the simple device of inviting many outsiders to the Central Committee's session, a procedure which Khrushchev once favored and which was held against him when he fell. Nor is the postponement of the Party Congress till next year, which is beyond the statutory time limit, a good augury for the present ruling group. Disregard for the Party's statutory rights has, in recent years, been denounced all too often and all too loudly as the hallmark of Stalinism!

There is indeed a distinct flavor of Stalinism in some of Kosygin's moves, and the country will hardly relish it. The workers are certain to look askance at the increased powers of the managers. In the capitals of the non-Russian nationalities, people will resent the return of economic power in Moscow. The country as a whole may suspect a shamefaced attempt at something like a bureaucratic Restoration.

It seems quite implausible, despite the failures of Khrushchevism, that the Soviet people should be in a mood for such a Restoration; and if they were, Molotov or Malenkov, rather than Kosygin and Brezhnev, might be the men to preside over it. (Incidentally, there are some signs that Molotov is to be rehabilitated, while Khrushchev remains an ‘n-person.”) And in any case, Kosyg's performance has been politicall so ineffective and unconvincing – it has indeed been such a strange n ture of bureaucratic obtuseness d recklessness — that it only un lines the fact that the crisis in viet leadership, which opened w h Khrushchev's downfall a year a , is still unresolved.

THE BEST TORTURE

‘Once You've Broken Him Down...’

Marshall Sahlin

Marshall Sahlins, professor of Anthropology at the University of Michigan, was one of the organizers of the first teach-in, held on the campus of that university. As a result of this activity, Mr. Sahlins visited South Vietnam as a representative of the Inter-University Committee, which sponsored the National Teach-in in Washington on May 15, for debate on foreign policy.

Under these auspices, Mr. Sahlins spent some time last August in Saigon and American outposts in the provinces. This article is a segment of the data he brought home with him.

Advanced anti-communism trades places with the enemy. It becomes opposite-communism, and “opposites” are things alike in every respect save one. The final stages of American dissolution in Vietnam will be marked by imitation of the enemy's techniques. I have heard it foreshadowed in the talk of Saigon officialdom: discipline, a senior American civilian officer told me, is what the South Vietnamese government needs; power, he said, is the only thing the Chinese can understand; history, he said, will prove us right. In a remote provincial outpost I found two Americans who had appropriated to their own use draconic Chinese methods of interrogation and indoctrination (“motivation,” in the American newspeak). The forced destruction of people's beliefs can no longer properly be described as something “they” do. Torturously exacted confession and conversion are no longer things we fight against. These are now part of our own arsenal, weapons of our own struggle.

The two Americans were leaders of a “motivation” team working among Vietnamese Popular Forces. The team included four Vietnamese instructor-cadres, two of these ex-Vietcong. The dominant of the two Americans was a field representative of a civilian agency; he was assisted by a Special Forces officer. Both were competent in Vietnamese language and custom, and dedicated to Vietnam and their vision of its future. Their program was anti-Communist revolution; they were training Popular Forces as revolutionary cadres. The texts were classic Communist handbooks on revolutionary warfare, books these Americans studied and clearly admired; it does not go too far to say they were disciples, at least revisionist disciples, of Mao Tse-tung, Ho Chi Minh and Che Guevara.

I lived with them during a night and a good part of a day. They briefed me and allowed me to see the work for myself. But it is not of this guerrilla program that I write. It is of a discussion I had with the Americans about torture and the transformation of Vietcong prisoners to anti-communism. The two Americans made clear that they had some experience with it, and some ideas of how it is properly done.

The interrogation methods, as the Americans themselves explained, are copied from those used most effectively by the Chinese. (Of course, there are other precedents —for example, the Inquisition.) The treatment seems a compressed and abbreviated version of the procedures used on American POWs during the Korean War. The interrogator has at most four or five days before he must send the prisoner on. Physical torture is p cluded. A special type of “men torture” (their term) is instead flicted. But it aims not merely eliciting military information. T prisoner's disclosures are at same time a betrayal of his ca and a confession of his errors, a nunciation of belief.

If the technique really is eff tive, and the Americans claim th it is, I think it must be because some rather special qualities revolutionary warfare and warrio It must be understood that a Vi cong prisoner comes in with certa comprehensions and expectatic that are deeply entwined with revolutionary (“Communist”) co mitment. A guerrilla movement pends decisively on secrecy. members are visible daily to t enemy, but must be unknown him. They maintain a hinterla conspiracy of silence, and a sing traitor wrecks the organization a whole village, perhaps a distri The guerrilla thus understands th secrecy is a first principle of t revolution. But by the same toke intelligence becomes a first prin ple of the counterrevolution. T prisoner, therefore, expects to tortured for information and ul mately killed if he remains stea fast. He meets his interrogators pr pared to resist the worst: it is test of his revolutionary soul.

Something must be said well of the two Americans who d scribed the interrogation metho to me. First — and it is a thi seriously to consider — these me are not strangers, not people wh have been metamorphosed by son satanic forces to a point beyor ur understanding or recognition. let on a college campus or in a usiness office, they would not at-act unusual attention. Their at-tudes toward Vietnam are indeed iore scholarly than demonic. They 'ant to involve themselves in the ountry. They profess with sincerity ieir respect for the people — so iuch so that they actively wish iem a better fate. After I left them had the sickening feeling of "there ut for the grace of God. . . ."

The main protagonist—identified s "Mr. X"—describes himself as n "agnostic atheist," but clearly he elieves in the Devil if not in God. 1 fact, his is a holy work: to exor-ise the Communist devils possess-ıg the Vietcong. He undertakes the risoner's "conversion" for the pris-ner's own good; he is "helping" the ıan, saving him. I ask, "What gives ou the right?" "Your belief," he nswers. It gives him the right to roselytize."

And now consider this interview, 'hat they said and what they re-ealed of themselves. What follows re excerpts from the tape record-ıg I made of our conversation. 'hree asterisks in the transcript ıdicate that a portion of the inter-iew is skipped over; three dots, ıat a portion of an answer is lided; and a word in parenthesis ollowed by a question mark indi-ates an imperfect rendering on the ıpe and my guess of the word in-olved.

Ir. X: At this time [the prisoner] kind f feels an emotional dependence upon ou because for two days you've been rotecting him from the big outside gly world that he doesn't understand: eeding him good chow, talking with im, calling him a (kambelo?) of the ILF, not the derogatory term of Viet-ong. . . . Then you indicate that this ice treatment that he's had so far ıas] not been disinterested good treat-ıent, that we expect his cooperation. Ve're cooperating with him in a sense; 'e expect cooperation from him. This gain reintroduces the whole issue of ıe big ugly outside world. What's go-ıg to happen to him now? Well, he ıight tell you a couple of things, be-inning with rather innocuous things. Vell, you can imply that you know ıat already, what you're really after re better things and this might rather uncalm?) him. Then you might say, Jeez, that scrape you got on your houlder . . . it obviously needs atten-on; we'll have to give you some penicillin." And while you're giving him the penicillin, you're telling him that, "You know, there are these other types of people who just. . . ."

* * *

Mr. X: Actually again, this is the technique that Captain [Y] . . . and myself have been trying to promote in an advisory relationship. Again, it's a technique that's been used most effectively by the Chinese, in which you've pulled the man out of his familiar environment: he's dependent . . . upon you for his continual well-being. And even though the prisoner may (resist?), it's kind of an emotional interdependence that's created, and what you try and do is (use?) this emotional interdependence in such a way that he comes to the point where he must tell you what he knows.

Sahlins: It's in effect brainwashing—is that the point of this?

Mr. X: No, what it is is breaking him down. But . . . once you've broken him down, it comes to the point where he wakes up in a sweat one morning and tells you, "All right." Then he tells you the names of the two people in his cell; or, he gives you the location of the camp that he just recently came from. Then you're through with him, in practical terms. You've got what you needed to continue operating. But at this point, if you really believe in anything yourself, what you've got to do is give him something to hope for before you send him back for further processing. Because you have just brought this individual to the lowest point in his life in terms of human meaning and existence. So at that point, that's when you've got to stress that, "Well now, we're releasing you for further processing. But for you, what you've just told us is the beginning of a positive affirmation. We just can't process you right into our unit now, because you don't know what we stand for and what we're fighting for, but we hope that some day you will be joining us." See, we don't have time to get any brainwashing. The Chinese can do that because they have POWs for months and months and months. If we get a guy, we've got him for two to five days, and then he's out of our hands. In that two to five days, we've got to get the information we need. But we will not get the information we need by physical torture. We've got to get it by an emotional and mental torture. And you can do that because that's what they're least adequately prepared for. It's what Americans are least adequately prepared for when they find themselves in the other side's hands.

* * *

Sahlins: What kind of control do you have over Arvin [Vietnam army] types of interrogation [i.e., physical torture]?

Mr. X: Well again, that's an advisory function. And what you're trying to do is—this is just a traditional, feudal Asian society; mainland style—and what you're trying to do is change the course of warfare in Asia. To some extent this has been done: the Chinese People's Liberation army; it's happened probably in the Japanese army, the Japanese Self-Defense and Home Defense armies. But until the end of World War II, we always thought of the Japanese army as a real cruel, vindictive bunch of cutthroats. Well it turned out in post-World War II analysis that the Bataan Death March was something that they handled to the best of their ability, given the available transport and the way that they would have handled their own prisoners. They just moved them, and they moved them as fast as they could. People who couldn't keep up the pace in some cases were helped and in some other cases—just according to the individual guard—were bashed and thrown aside. Vietnamese to our eyes seem rather cruel sometimes to prisoners, but they're not doing this with any ideological vengeance. They're doing that because that's just been the bent of warfare in Mainland Asia for a thousand years, and what we have got to try to do is sophisticate it, and tell them, "Look, that's just not the way." It's a slow process; we're attempting a reformation of a whole society.

Sahlins: What practical is being done to discourage this kind of thing?

Mr. X: Well, guidance on the spot—

Captain D (Sahlins' escort): It's up to the individual advisers—

Mr. X: The individual adviser giving guidance on the spot.

Captain D: Sometimes it's successful, sometimes not—

Captain Y: In most cases, it's not.

Sahlins: From what you say about mental torture, you wouldn't make any distinction in the morality of either kind [i.e., physical vs. mental torture]?

Mr. X: Hell, no! I don't make any distinction in morality at all: torture is torture, and when you fuck around with a guy's mind and his whole basic raison d'être, you're really hurting him —especially when he's prepared mentally, spiritually, for the physical torture.

Sahlins: Then the attempt to discourage Vietnamese water torture . . . is just because the other type doesn't offend American sensibilities as much?

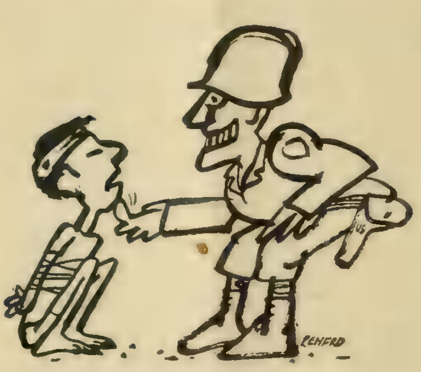
Mr. X: No, it's not because of that. Because we don't concern ourselves here with American sensibilities. We concern ourselves with what will work.

Captain Y: It's relatively ineffective.

Mr. X: It's ineffective. It may sound hard-boiled to say that we don't concern ourselves with American sensibilities—but we don't. We're concerning ourselves with Vietnamese sensibilities.

Sahlins: What about the sensibilities of the Americans who are involved. . . . the person who's torturing?

Mr. X: To most of the Americans, to most of the simple-minded Americans who get involved in Vietnam—that's all the boobus Americanus that H. L. Mencken spoke about — undoubtedly they think that the mental and emotional torture we're talking about is the least objectionable, because they've never really paused to seriously reflect about it themselves; or perhaps they did not go through the experience of being a POW in the Korean conflict themselves. And they can probably tell you, "Oh, Jesus, I'd try and stop that physical torture, because I know it's just wrong"—you know. But we think that we're looking into it a little more deeply, and we see that the mental and spiritual torture that we bring a man through to the point where he voluntarily gives you the information is pretty rough stuff to get involved in too. But it works.



Sahlins: How do you offset the damage to yourself?

Mr. X: Your belief. Your belief: you have to sincerely believe that in the long run you're helping this man. It's like an AA cure. If you're just breaking the guy down for the sake of getting a poor helpless alcoholic who's hipped on NLF propaganda to admit that he was wrong and give you the information, then you're going to send him out in the street a crushed derelict, then there's something wrong with you. But you have to really believe, as we do—although we get discouraged sometimes by our [Vietnamese] counterparts—you have to really believe that you're helping this guy to something better.

Sahlins: Conversion from communism is involved in the torture.

Mr. X: Conversion from anything anything involves a certain degree self-torture. We just accelerated process because we need that fucki information.

Sahlins: This is better for him?

Mr. X: He's alive, and you can s help him. . . .

* * *

Mr. X: Most Americans, unfortuna ly, don't bother to think deeply abo the stuff they get involved in and th make superficial judgments: "We it's wrong to torture this guy physic ly because we're all part of the sar (background?)"—

Captain Y: If you ask you'll get pro ably 80 per cent of the people [U. military] will say, "Well, I didn't g involved in it. When they captu them, when they capture the Vie namese Communists, I just turn n back and go and have a cigarette

Mr. X: They take a drink from the canteen and light up a cigarette. Ar that's discouraging. . . . I'd rather g —not get involved in it, not in th actual physical torture myself—bu I'd rather be right there and see done, and then laugh like a hors when it doesn't work and they don get the information. And then in th long run you're affecting the situatio when you just laugh at this guy an say: "Look, you think he's gonn break? So you cut up his stomach little bit and his insides fell out. . . He got the last laugh on you, becaus he didn't talk a bit." And maybe it' make the guy think, you know, an ten times later, after ten more peopl have faded out because he physicall tortured them, maybe he'll say: "Okay wise American adviser, what woul you do?" . . . We have a moral re sponsibility, it seems to me, once we'v stepped into this country to involv ourselves in the complete fabric of th country, and to understand it, an then try and help the Vietnamese t look at some different alternatives . . . We should be acting as a catalyst as a thinking catalyst in Vietnam. Bu you cannot be a catalyst unless you know the entire fabric of the thing And lighting up a cigarette when they bring a prisoner in for questioning is —well, that's an immoral—

Captain Y: It's just like saying, "I doesn't happen."

Mr. X: That's just about the height of immorality, I think. To think that you can just absolve yourself. That's saying that every man is an island;

at least when it is comfortable, hen it's comfortable for me to be island unto myself, then I am; d the bell's tolling for that poor cker under the knife, not me. That's al bad. And again, it's a simple-inded approach.

* * *

r. X had mentioned that one of the les imparted to the cadres in train-g was "be kind to prisoners." I asked that wasn't a rule he disobeyed.]

R. X: Well, if the final result of it —it's a cruel process—but the re-lt of bringing him closer to you, of nversion—it's a tortuous process of nversion—but the result is a kind ne. . . . If you believe in your pro-am, this is what you do. . . .

AHLINS: Do you believe in breaking eople down so they agree with your rogram? And breaking them down stifies the end?

R. X: No. . . . That's why we would ot take a guy who's been broken di-ctly into our unit at this time. . . .

AHLINS: Either you will rehabilitate im by converting him to your be-ef or you're going to leave him a ental wreck. . . . Can your ends be God-given as to give you this ght among humanity to do this?

R. X: I don't know. I don't really elieve anybody's hands are God-given. m an agnostic atheist.

AHLINS: No, your ends. I'm not ask-g you for religious beliefs. What I'm sking is, do you believe you have e right to impose by this method—

R. X: I think I've got the right to y. Nobody's got the right to succeed -guaranteed. But everybody's got the ght to promote and proselytize what ey believe.

* * *

APTAIN Y: If we do not break this uy, if we do not attempt to change is ideas, then in essence what have e done? We've said that basically e's right!

AHLINS: No, that isn't so. One agrees disagree as a matter of principle a democratic system.

R. X: Oh wait, this is [where] we egan. . . . I've had some tremendous onversations with these guys, and e begin by agreeing to disagree. But ou can soon get this guy so flustered nd so shaken up that before he knows , he's agreeing with you—because is assumptions to begin with were ather vulnerable.

SAHLINS: But that isn't the issue here. The issue here is whether you will impose your will by this technique, which is—

MR. X: We don't know what our will is yet.

SAHLINS: You will impose your ideas by this technique—

MR. X: What ideas?

* * *

SAHLINS: . . . I asked the question, how do you justify the effect upon yourself of acting in this way? And you said you're doing the guy a service. Now, I'm asking you, do you believe you have the right to impose your will on somebody, impose what you believe—

MR. X: We are not imposing our will. We are not imposing will. Even after you've broken him and gotten the information, he's still a free agent.

* * *

MR. X: Not impose will—if he fails to accept . . . an alternative. And not our alternative; there are a number of alternatives. Because in essence that's what we're trying to show him.

* * *

SAHLINS: . . . So as a matter of fact by this process you either transform him from that belief into one of a range of acceptable beliefs, or you will leave him a mental wreck—

MR. X: But we don't leave him this way. We have brought him to a point where he realizes that the faith he placed in his previous system was essentially not powerful. He has volunteered the information. At this point he's got to find a new way. He's got to have a way out of his dilemma, and the people at the training centers should be skillful enough to point out to him a number of alternatives.

SAHLINS: We come back to the question: whether you have the right—by these techniques, which are external to him—to deny him [the] belief that he came in with in his hand, and only accept a set of alternatives which you propose?

* * *

MR. X: Listen, I've met guys. . . . We had a guy in Phu Yen Province in the summer of '63 who was the propaganda director for the NLF in that province; and boy, we just worked ourselves literally ragged in four days trying to bring that guy to the point where he'd tell us a few things, and he was tremendous—just tremendous. Didn't tell us a thing.

SAHLINS: You admire this guy?

MR. X: Tremendous—tremendous.

SAHLINS: So you admire more a person who will not acquiesce to the thing that you say is right than one who does?

MR. X: No, not true. I didn't say that at all. I admire a guy who will tortuously admit—if he really believes—that, "Oh Jesus, I never thought about that before. Those guys [NLF] they told me something else; and you're really doing something else." A guy like that who will examine his previously arrived conclusions and change his mind, I admire that—

SAHLINS: That's very admirable, but it doesn't describe the process you went through, which was to leave him in a situation where either he takes this set of alternatives which you give him, or he is a mental wreck.

MR. X: Remember, this was an act of affirmation on his part, where he yields the information voluntarily. But it's only a beginning; it's only a beginning; and it's not fair to leave him at the point where he's just made the beginning.

* * *

MR. X: It's just like an alcoholic. An alcoholic can attend the meetings and he can see everybody else get embarrassed; and if he doesn't want to join them he can just back out again. But once a guy begins to join this little society of alcoholics—

CAPTAIN Y: These cadres we have [as instructors]—these ex-VC, ex-NLF, ex-Viet Minh—they all in some way or another gave up something in their own mind when they turned, came to the government.

* * *

MR. X: . . . what we're trying to show these guys when we're interrogating them, through this tortuous process, is that you're not better [off] under the NLF. "Your whole series of assumptions has got to be re-examined here, and we're here to help you re-examine them. And, Jesus, there's some guys here have got some more basic ideas of how they'd like to examine you, but we're just holding these guys off . . . and we'll take good care of you." That's kind of a dirty trick—[but] when you've only got four days. . . .

SAHLINS: Have you done this with Vietcong?

MR. X: We don't do anything because we're advisers—in every sense.

PLAYS AND POLITICS . . . . Harold Clurma

To the question, "What has the American theatre to say at the present time about the state of American politics?" the answer is "very little." The question which might then more pointedly be put is "Why?" Those who ask either of these questions are usually more interested in politics than in the theatre. Still, they are good questions for people devoted to the theatre to ask themselves. The effort to answer will momentarily make them ponder politics and also induce them to think a little less superficially about the theatre.

In any discussion of the theatre one of the first things to inquire about is the nature of the audience. On Broadway, where most new plays originate in America, the audience never pays less than $2.50 for the poorest seat, and often more than $6.90 for the best. One can hardly call this a representative audience, even in the era of affluence. It excludes most teachers and students, many professional people who are not in the high income brackets, and what used to be called the "working class." It is an audience of the business community: manufacturers, buyers and moguls of the plushier trades. It demands titillation. Hence musicals and light comedies are almost the only shows which sell out. The economic setup of the New York theatre makes it extremely difficult for plays that don't sell out to return a profit. And what doesn't make money soon disappears. What is believed likely to disappear doesn't get produced.

This facile explanation tells less than half the story. To proceed beyond it leads to perilous ground. I have no statistics, but I venture to say that Americans are not genuinely concerned with politics.

The ordinary American might define politics as something to do with elections and graft. He is convinced that China is a menace, that communism is evil, that taxes are too high, that juvenile delinquency is outrageous, that while the atom bomb is dangerous it is necessary, that our way of life, being the best, must be defended. Politics is something to which one lends oneself for a few minutes a day on TV, or can be disposed of by a cursory glance at the headlines and by gossip about "personalities." Politics is a sort of sport, and no one except a politician needs to devote himself to it.

This view is understandable, given our history. There have been very few deeply disturbing political events since 1865. Compared to its effects on Europe, the First World War was for us a mere scratch. Such scandals as those of the Harding administration or of the Jimmy Walker regime were jokes. A mere handful of people were aware of the implications of Franco's assault on democratic Spain. To judge by the aspect of our big cities at the time, the Second World War was a happy occasion. We disapproved of fascism because of its bluster, and we heartily disliked the Nazis because they produced sick-making sensations in our stomachs. The cause of the war, our own or our Allies' responsibility in its outbreak, were obscure to us.

The depression of 1929-39 shook us up. For a time we responded politically although, the crisis once passed, many of us grew impatient with Roosevelt and his reforms. But the depression was a condition no one could overlook, and our theatre gave striking evidence of the fact.

Came Eisenhower, the new n malcy and McCarthy. The Sena scared the wits out of us before destroyed himself, and we have r yet recovered from the infecti he spread. For years, now, not o political discussion but all disc sion of vital issues has been tim ous or feeble. Such discussion m lead to dissent. Nowadays we ha ly know what to dissent from cept such enormities as totalitaria ism, the insults of inimical powe narcotics and teen-age killers. D sent usually involves criticism our country, than which there none better on earth. Dissent, mo over, smacks of softness toward f eign ideologies. We had enough that in the thirties.

Today the civil rights strugg —especially in its painless forms-stirs a great many people. B when prejudice of this stamp dealt with on the stage it is in musical like West Side Story in a sentimental play like A Rais in the Sun. Nearly everybody, a especially those who are peculiar touchy about aesthetics, shudde at the hate in LeRoi Jones's play
I myself am frightened and mo tified by it, but we occasional need to realize its presence and see it dramatized in full terror.

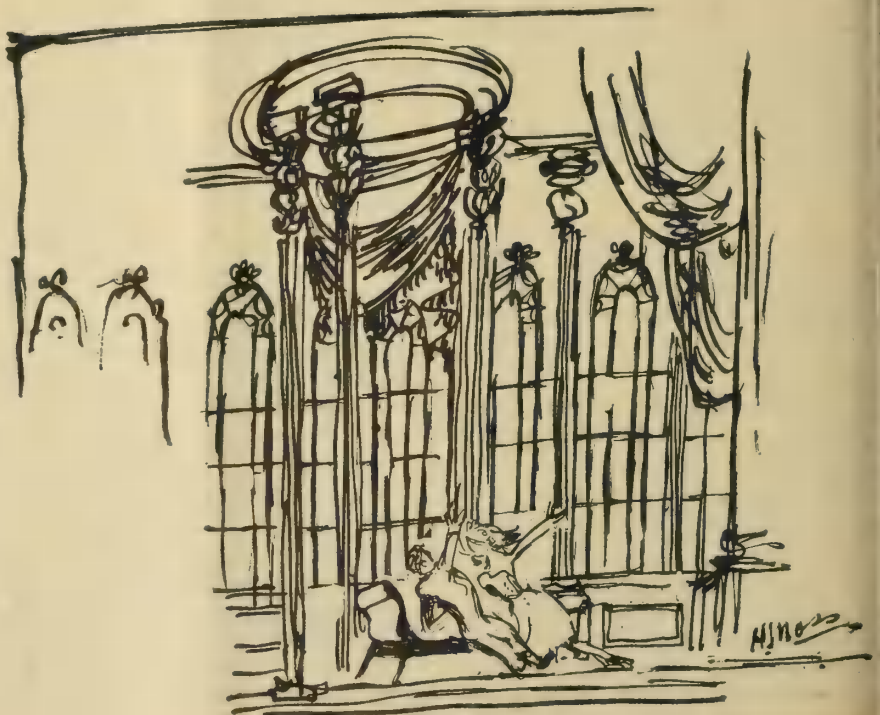
We hear that there is a ne



The Apple Cart

dicalism in the colleges and nong the young who are exasrated by the flatness, the inexessiveness of our lives. Though e manifestations of this trend e sometimes raw and foolish, it ould be viewed as a hopeful sign it leads to the discipline of study, ought and firmness of convicon. Nerviness is not enough.

The fighting in Vietnam troubles ; and we are becoming increasgly vocal about it. The majority our countrymen react automatally, either approving the governent's policy as a matter of sime patriotism, or denouncing it ithout facing the central issue: hether or not the possible victory communism in Asia is someing that non-Communists are epared to accept.

If I am only partly right in iese assertions, politics as such in hardly be expected to prove a roper subject for American therical entertainment. But should I e thought mistaken there are still ther phases of the question which ie liberal mind often overlooks.

Granted that plays dealing with olitics on our stage usually are educed to such convivial dramazations of columnist chatter as he Best Man or to empty melorama like the play made from llen Drury's Advise and Consent, ne must also recognize that very ew political plays of more than iomentary value exist in dramatic terature generally. What we someimes name political plays are more ccurately plays of social signifiance or historical plays of broad olitical application.

Shaw wrote several political lays — The Apple Cart, Geneva, n the Rocks — but they are hardy among his best. Shakespeare's Histories possess general political ieaning, but they are political only y extension and analogy, as is the ase with Miller's The Crucible, herwood's Abe Lincoln in Illinois, ingsley's The Patriots. There are lso social-political "allegories," vritten in various veins, like most f Sartre's plays or Genet's The alcony and The Screens.

Look Back in Anger

Not long ago a play about the Iiss case was produced on Broadvay but, like most such accounts f recent events, it was an inconiderable piece. Only the Germans nd French have thus far accepted stage version of the Oppenheimer case. Even Kingsley's dramatization of Koestler's Darkness at Noon, cited as the Best Play of the Year 1950-51 by the New York Drama Critics' Circle, remained largely inoperative. I could name several other similar plays, like Maxwell Anderson and Harold Hickerson's Gods of the Lightning (about the Sacco-Vanzetti case) or John Wexley's They Shall Not Die (about the Scottsboro boys) which flashed by without attracting anything but the most limited attention.

Far more effective than any of these were the documentaries presented by the Federal Theatre Project at low prices — Triple-A Plowed Under and One-Third of a Nation—which produced audience impact through their novel staging and immediacy. But for the popular treatment of topical subjects the movies and television are more appropriate media. Even Odets' Waiting for Lefty (about the taxi drivers' strike in the thirties) proved forceful not because of its political message but because of its colorful idiom and youthful fervor. For the rest, with the exception of his anti-Nazi Till the Day I Die, Odets' plays are not political at all but social, akin in this respect to O'Casey's early work.

A social play stems from a particular environment which to a degree is a reflection of a political condition. Chekhov's plays and Shaw's Heartbreak House are examples. Osborne's Look Back in Anger has English social connotations though its political direction is by no means clear. Gorky's dramatic work, rightly held to be inflammatory in Czarist Russia, was not at all propaganda for a particular party or a guide to an unequivocal political solution.

Since all plays are the products of mores and attitudes common to particular sectors of society and are addressed to a public presumed to be attuned to the dramatists' state of mind, one might maintain that all plays are social. (Even The Ziegfeld Follies, I have often said, could be regarded as a mirror of its times.) The reason why the social basis of drama is not more often pointed out is that audiences and reviewers prefer to think of plays wholly in terms of entertainment or, betimes, of art. In this way they avoid the discomfort of dealing with troublesome matters. They want to divorce entertainment (or art) from their daily concerns. The wish is justifiable, since their concerns are often trivial, but by this amputation they frequently rob both entertainment and art of their primary value.

There is a sense in which the theatregoer who seeks relief from his workaday cares is right. The domain of the theatre is universal, nothing human is alien to it; but the most durable and hence most profoundly influential plays are those which transcend their immediate "journalistic" material. What we seek finally in the theatre is an escape—into reality.

Our ordinary activities are dross of transitory interest even to ourselves. What we truly long for is to be transported to some realm of truth, the purest consciousness. This super-reality which lifts us above the ordinary traffic of existence is what the theatre (along with the other arts and, some may add, religion) aspires to, and in its greatest and rare occasions achieves.

What makes Chekhov's plays so touching is not their depiction of the unhappy middle class of Russia at a certain period, but the use he makes of this subject matter. From it he wrings the "music" of idealistic yearning, the aspiration which both torments and elevates the hearts of not particularly bright folk everywhere. What lends stature to Ibsen's Hedda Gabler is not so much the psychology of a lady caught between two social classes, but our recognition that we are all a little like her—unable to find any sphere which satisfies our innermost needs.

Plays of so-called classic breadth, from Aeschylus to Racine, attain such heights. The better realistic plays of modern times move willy-nilly toward the same goals. Patently social plays, like those of Shaw and Brecht, Büchner's Danton's Death or Hauptmann's The Weavers, are sustained by a similar afflatus. Political plays, if they are intelligent and honest (Hochhuth's The Deputy), are to be welcomed even when they do not qualify as art. How many plays of any sort do? Still the annals of drama teach us that specifically political plays seldom reach the loftiest peaks—unless one calls Trojan Women or Julius Caesar "political."

Nearly all social plays of merit exercise political effect, although the degree or exact orientation of such effects are not always determinable. We may cite such old examples as Beaumarchais' Marriage of Figaro as relevant to the French Revolution and Gogol's The Inspector General as relevant to all bureaucracies. There is no doubt that the naturalistic plays of the middle and late 19th century exerted liberalizing persuasion, first in Germany and Russia, and later in England and France. On the other hand, a sizable portion of the Paris audience just before the Second World War applauded Shakespeare's Coriolanus as a reactionary play which others (Brecht, for instance) have interpreted in another sense.

We come now to what for our present purpose is the crucial problem: "How is one to account for the fact," a friend writes me, "that the more dramatic the general political situation becomes, the more intensely private and ingrown are the preoccupations of our more talented playwrights?"

The answer is that the plays referred to in this query, though hardly political, constitute our social drama! There is a connection between the theatre and politics. It is sometimes direct and positive; at other times indirect and negative. Today it is mostly negative. The Theatre of the Absurd, seen as a generic phenomenon without judgment as to individual talents, is, whether the writers themselves agree or not, a direct consequence of the social-political climate in most of the "free world." It represents despair and sometimes an oblique protest in regard to the societies from which the plays emer They are mockingly bitter outcr signifying a sense of impoten They present our world as a frig ful mess, a ridiculous fraud; a trag farce. There is nothing left for to do, they tell us, except to suf and wait (for what?), jeer and t to avoid hurting anyone or, in e treme instances, burst the bonds decorum and reason (which ha been of no avail) to find sor sado-masochistic "mystical" releas America, they intimate, is smug a hypocritical. Britain's stiff upper l has gone slack with indecisio France poses in a caricature grandeur. The Soviet Union abid in a strait jacket; China is a threa ening tyranny. According to son of these playwrights it is entire possible that life itself is no damne good and probably never has bee So they turn their backs on all th and now and then seek repose wit in some no man's land of bleak co templation or lunacy.

I do not speak in contempt. T day many artist-intellectuals (n to mention others) feel spirituall homeless. They believe themselve deprived of any reliable politica social, religious base. For them a the old faiths are meaningless. Tha is why in America they appear take special satisfaction in patroniz ing the credulous thirties. Their p litical posture consists of their re fusal to assume any. And, on should add, no wonder. The mora and political atmosphere of th world is confusing everywhere. I is easier to assail these new an personally benign nihilists by argument than to reassure them with concrete proposals. The most "advanced" among them are trying t formulate an aesthetics of non-art

Insofar as these impulses represent protestations against all tha is bogus in our society, and if in the process of protest new means of expression are discovered, this anarchic tendency performs a positive function. But a persistent turning away from the world ultimately leads to a conformism as dull and debilitating as accommodation.

Very few of the new plays have any action. Indeed hardly any of them require it, because they deal with states of being in which will power has become superfluous. Since most such plays are based on the assumption that nothing is changeable, they present characters who never bother to change any-ing. We approach the dead end drama.

The Deputy

To extricate himself from this lemma the future playwright must nsent to dwell in "error." He must ke a walk into the awful world, t to know it ever more intimately d widely. What is chiefly wrong ith Soviet realism is that it is not fficiently realistic. It is usually tle more than publicity. Still the ms of that realism, liberated from ficious supervision and Philistine gma, are healthy. They bid the dramatist make contact with society, explore the hardships and triumphs of labor, probe the souls of men and women in the travail of the new civilization as it is being formed, or of the old as it destroys itself. This tradition gave Russia and the rest of us such writers as Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, Chekhov and Gorky—none of them literalists—and has still much to offer.

As soon as they have attracted notice through early success, American playwrights now tend to become encrusted in professional circles and thus rapidly to detach themselves from their creative sources. They deteriorate into provincials in the sterile ground of fashionable Broadway intellectual coteries.

When we learn to see ourselves and our neighbors truthfully against the broadest horizons of human concern, we shall perhaps not need to clamor for political plays; good ones will do.

ritish Peace Movement

OOKING for the MARCHERS

Theodore Roszak

hen I left the United States in e summer of 1964 to become the rst American editor of Peace ews in London, the great question among my friends and col- agues was: whatever happened the American peace movement? was a question accompanied by at kind of morose, self-defensive ul-searching which never seems yield satisfactory answers. For ose who were part of it, the merican peace scene for the years 63-64—during that paralytic lull llowing the partial test-ban treaty d preceding the recent, turbulent se of the "New Left"—was rapid- suffocating in pessimism and smal introspection.

Would England be any better? had hoped so, but much to my smay it was not. The same agged-out self-analyses, the same ejection and frustrated back-bit- g had, I soon discovered, all but owded the British movement off e political stage. If anything, the oom was even greater. For in merica, we could at least doubt at there had ever really been a novement" to mourn for; maybe e had never been more than a andful—a game, outspoken rem- ant that had generated a few od rallies, some eye-catching ewspaper advertisements and sev- al organizational titles, and that ad been lucky enough to get some aggerated publicity. (One always lt a bit queasy about the fact that many American peace organizations seemed to share the same few New York and Philadelphia addresses, and too frequently used one another's stationery.)

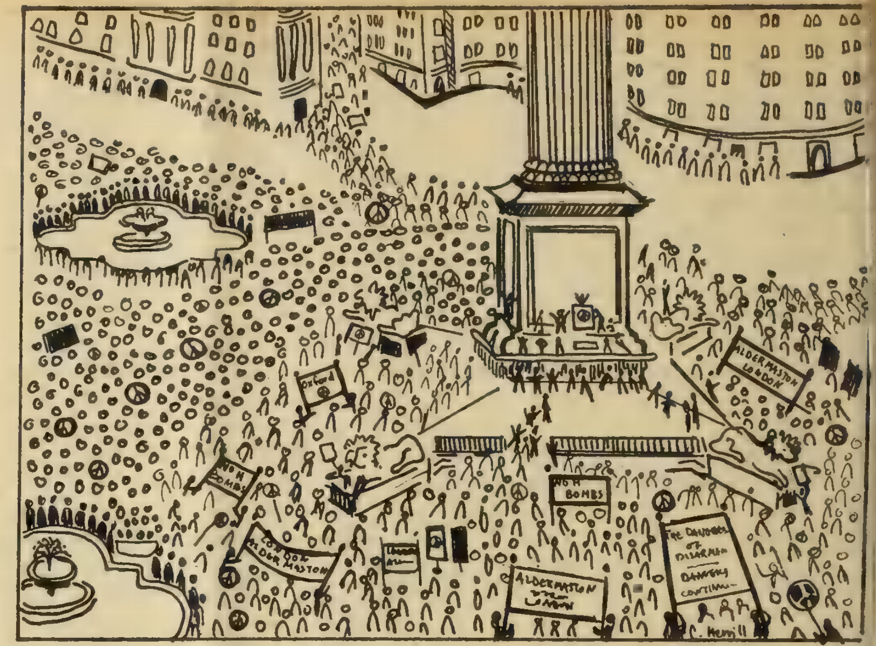
But in England there could be no doubt about the matter: there really had been a movement. Year after year, from 1958, the great Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament had mustered twenty, fifty, 100,000 people to its Easter rallies in Trafalgar Square. The Committee of 100, CND's maverick, direct-action offshoot, had more than once filled the streets of Whitehall with anywhere between 5,000 and 12,000 sitters-in that included dozens of British intellectual and cultural celebrities among its militant rank and file. The trials of the civilly disobedient "100" had injected magnificent statements of conscience into the British courts and press. And in 1960, CND unilateralism, stubbornly supported by several labor leaders and their unions (especially Frank Cousins of the giant Transport and General Workers Union), had succeeded in "winning over" the Labour Party at its Scarborough conference. Of course, Hugh Gaitskell and the party leadership never endorsed the unilateral nuclear-disarmament plank thrust upon them at Scarborough and did manage the following year to prove Labour's "fitness to govern" by replacing it with a more "responsible" position on the bomb and NATO. But still, imagine! The movement had actually captured the major opposition party. For some three years at least the Campaign put disarmament on Britain's political map, and jolted its society into a short, sharp interval of moral awareness and frantic debate far more searching than any discussion Americans have ever had on nuclear warfare.

But now—well, take for example this: In England my family shared a north London cooperative housing project with four other families—beautifully conscientious people who had worked tirelessly to bring the H. G. Wells Housing Cooperative into existence, and with whom we struck up warm friendships. We lived right next door for three months before we discovered—and then inadvertently—that two of the couples had been in the thick of Committee of 100 activities. They had been in the sit-downs, had been arrested and jailed along with Bertrand Russell and the other great names. Yes, they recalled, those were exciting days. But now they never talked about it much, were out of touch, inactive, didn't even subscribe to the paper I edited. What was it that had subtracted them so silently and completely from a movement for which they had risked so much? They couldn't be sure . . . somehow the steam had gone out of it all . . . there had been too much factional infighting . . . the wives had had babies . . . the issues had gotten less clear-cut . . . and it wasn't as if the British bomb meant that much any more . . . other worth-while causes (like cooperative housing) had taken their attention . . things had just changed. . . . Their answers were typical.

heodore Roszak teaches in the His- ry Department of California State ollege at Hayward.

Everywhere in my work I came across people who had been part of the great crusade, and had drifted away. Both the Campaign and the Committee had just seemed to go limp and lose staying power. Even militant members and one-time leaders had seemed to vanish from the scene: to take up other causes, to return to school or family cares, to do research or write books. People wondered now what had become of colleagues they had once been imprisoned with. Among those who stayed close to the movement, the general elections which kept threatening throughout most of 1964-65 seemed a more important priority. Here was the great chance to get Labour elected after thirteen years out of power — and wasn't that what CND was all about?

CND's unrequited love affair with the Labour Party is far too complicated to be rehearsed at any length here. There had always been those—in the Campaign leadership as well as the rank and file —whose first allegiance was to Labour and for whom electing Labour was the Campaign's first goal. Canon John Collins, CND's first chairman, had never been ambiguous about that. And still today, the Campaign's capable and amiable chairman, Olive Gibbs, and its hard-as-nails general secretary, Peggy Duff, both hold local office (in Oxford and London) for Labour. The magic that Labour, with its great evangelical tradition of social justice and its awesome intellectual backing, holds for English radicals is something an American finds difficult to appreciate. At CND rallies the mere mention of Keir Hardie still draws a storm of applause. And for peaceniks it is impossible to forget how many of Labour's great leaders had been outspoken religious pacifists: Ramsey MacDonald, Philip Snowden, George Lansbury. Indeed, the editor's office at Peace News is named "The George Lansbury Room." And, though I could take no inspiration from it, there hung above my desk all year a smiling portrait of that good, gray man whose pacifism had so embarrassed Labour during the thirties, that the party finally removed him from the leadership in favor of Clement Atlee (who as a "responsible" leader, was to initiate Britain's own A-bomb program in 1948).



But there are many others who never understood CND to be a wheel horse hitched to Labour's wagon; nor simply a pressure group feeding ginger to Labour's left wing. Rather the Campaign was . . . well, perhaps the beginning of a broadly radical "New Left," drawing inspiration from the rebellious broadsides that Angry Young Men were firing at the entire structure and character of British society in the wake of the Suez fiasco; perhaps the rudiments of a rival party that should be running independent candidates for Parliament in as many constituencies as possible; perhaps, through the Committee of 100, the beginning of a nonviolent social revolution. From the very outset, the ideological tastes of the university-based New Left Clubs — too doctrinally Socialist to gain acceptance from the Labour leadership—have circulated through the Campaign freely. And so also has the amorphous social alienation of British youth, which could never be reconciled to Labour's dowdiness or to the cautious paternalism that characterizes the party's youth groups.

It is difficult now not to believe they were right, those who refused to give their hearts to Labour and who wanted more, much more, than a Labour victory at the earliest possible election. For now Labour is in power, and the party could not be more thoroughly infiltrated than it is by Campaigners or former Campaigners. Frank Cousins, Anthony Greenwood, Barbara Castle are all in the cabin Stephen Swingler and Harc Davies hold junior positions in t government. And the Parliame tary party includes between seven and eighty MPs who march faithfully from Aldermaston Trafalgar Square every Easter. B still the "independent deterren (purchased now from Americ remains in Britain's arsenal a Britain remains in NATO. Of "po tive neutralism" and "unilater ism" one hears nothing from Whit hall. What one does hear, agoni ingly enough, is unending syc phantic endorsement of America policy in Southeast Asia, and Ki ling quoted to celebrate Britain embarrassing involvement in M laysia. To all of which CND an its Left Labour allies object heart ly—but still not strenuously enoug to rock the government's boat.

In March of this yea Frank Allaun — an old Cam paigner — resigned his position i the cabinet in order to associat himself with the seventy-five c 100 Labour MPs who have bee constantly, though not aggressive ly, protesting the party's Vietnar policy. But that's as much of dent in party discipline as th Campaign has achieved — or de sired. After all, Labour's majorit is down to two, and the party hasn' had a chance yet to make a show ing of its progressive domestic pol icies. One wouldn't want to put th Tories back in power, would one'

Meanwhile, the breakaway Com mittee of 100 survives as a heroic few, surrounded by an obstreperous few more. Most of its great names have departed. Lord Russell has disowned the child that he and the young American expatriate Ralph Schoenman (now Russell's personal secretary) created, but only to become a largely unattended, thoroughly predictable voice that speaks too often on too many issues. His own peace foundation (like so many others in the American and British movements, Lord Russell and his secretarial entourage seem to have retired from politics into research) purports to be doing great things, but its achievements and general purposes remain obscure. Lord Russell's most responsive public seems now to be among the rebellious Asian and African political movements to whose conferences he frequently sends representatives or tape-recorded messages that are dependably and fiercely anti-Western.

The surviving "100," brimming with youthful exuberance, periodically picket the American Embassy, sometimes for excellent and sometimes for mysterious reasons. In one very impressive show of courage, a small band of the 100 turned out to stage a counter-demonstration last March in the presence of 5,000 angry aircraft workers who had assembled in Hyde Park to protest the government's cancellation of several bomber and fighter plane contracts. (Sad to say, Labour, despite six years of peace activity in Britain aimed especially at it, explained the cancellations wholly as an economy move, and voiced not a single word in behalf of disarmament.) But Committee of 100 chapter meetings tend to be marred by dissension and a kind of amateurish, overdone militancy. And its current exercises in direct action are often of dubious political and moral quality. For several weeks this year the Committee's journal, Resistance, was seeking to whip up support for what it calls "telephone sabotage": Resistance prints the phone numbers of unlisted government agencies which members are then urged to call and, under assumed names, to bug with all sorts of false information . . . and then hang up quickly before the call can be traced! Thus, the passive resister yields to the prankster.

Peace movements are transitory and delicate blossoms. They bloom almost overnight in a climate of crisis, take on the most nearly impossible of crusades—that of resisting international war—and wither quickly when they fail to succeed all at once in their superhuman mission. It is very likely the sign of its demise when any political movement slows down sufficiently to permit having history books written about it. And with the publication late last year of Christopher Driver's The Disarmers, CND and the Committee of 100 found themselves packaged neatly in a very competent history, which ended with the conviction that the Aldermaston marchers have "hung up their boots." At Easter this year CND still turned out 30,000 supporters in Trafalgar Square — but even this achievement did not dispel the uncertainty and gloom of many. To a very large degree the rally succeeded because it spoke much more of the American war in Vietnam than of the Campaign's old ideals of banning the bomb and getting out of NATO.

It is a depressing account, and of course the situation was bound to leave its mark on the fortunes of the paper I edited. During the thirties and forties, when it was the voice of the charismatic Rev. Dick Sheppard and his Peace Pledge Union, Peace News was a high-circulation weekly, widely read and recognized (and despised) as the organ of a worrisomely large peace movement that had persuaded considerably more than 100,000 young men to refuse conscription in any future war. During the war years, times were hard for PN; news dealers refused to carry it, and at one point, when printers refused to handle the paper, the famous sculptor and fine-arts printer, Eric Gill, had to step in to set several copies of PN by hand at his own press. (They are now collectors' items.) But still circulation remained high and even Fleet Street carefully followed the war commentaries of PN's prestigious editor, the critic and social philosopher, John Middleton Murry; it was the best and most responsible dissenting opinion on the excesses of "unconditional surrender" and "saturation bombing" available.

Now PN, one of the veritable institutions of the peace movement, a publication that can claim Aldous Huxley and Bertrand Russell, Gandhi and Jayaprakash Narayan, Danilo Dolci and Herbert Read, Alex Comfort and H. G. Wells, Vera Brittain, Max Plowman and George Lansbury among its one-time voluntary contributors, and through whose pages three decades of the heroism and folly of the Western peace movement have played themselves out, may be approaching the end of its days. "Cause journals" have no more life in them than the movements they speak for. And in Britain, at least, it is difficult to tell for whom a peace journal ought to speak: the old-style religious pacifists with their taste for hot-gospeling testimonials and high ethical sentiment, the disgruntled anarchist youth who believe that any "movement" that numbers more than twenty-seven people has lost its ideological virginity, the peace research intellectuals for whom political action at any time before 1980 is bound to be "premature," the social-issues activists for whom everything but war is worth talking about — stubbornly exclusive audiences all, and presently lacking any great project that can subordinate the differences dividing them. The tack I tried—which was simply to open a forum for all comers and wait for a new movement to crystallize out of the debate and the "objective situation"—was, alas, not a solution that satisfied many. And PN is a "cause journal" the like of which we do not have in the United States. Even its sales are in the hands of voluntary street sellers, a quaint old British custom that sends the faithful of various political movements out to hawk their journals on street corners even in the rain of the English winter. A lovely grass-roots tradition, but pity the poor editor whose policies alienate the loyal sellers! Lose a seller (and I lost many) and you lose 200 sales.

Is there anything Americans can learn from the recent history of the British peace movement? Very little, I fear. For the British movement has been gifted and cursed with a peculiar institution that has no counterpart in America: the British Labour Party.

The essential problem of any peace movement, which invariably begins as a tightly knit, often religious cause group, is that of converting the "gentile" public — and this the group must do by the sheer force of ideas and ideals. Unlike labor, Socialist, feminist, or racial-justice movements that deal in the bread-and-butter grievances of majority groups, or at least large-sized minorities, peace movements may often have to demand highly principled, altruistic sacrifices of those to whom they appeal. War resistance is not readily translated into concrete, immediate and personally advantageous objectives—not until war is imminent, and that is usually too late. Only when the movement can make its goals seem immediate—as in the case of bomb testing with its intimate danger of atmospheric pollution — can large numbers be easily mustered.

There are essentially two gentile publics to whom the movement must speak if it is to grow: the workers and socially disadvantaged, and the great complacent middle class. Thus, in America, Turn Toward Peace was created to permeate the ordinarily uninvolved and indifferent middle class, by way of the leadership of its many voluntary organizations: church groups, professional associations, etc. And, more recently, Students for a Democratic Society has sought to work the war-peace issue into the consciousness of the disadvantaged minorities and disorganized down-and-outs of our society. The fact that these two groups seem not to understand that they are addressing themselves to very different publics and must deal with very different problems in doing so is a great misfortune. The objectives of both TTP and SDS make sense — because neither of the publics they are dealing with is adequately embraced by or hopelessly integrated into the existing political parties. Besides, the rhetoric of the New Frontier and the Great Society notwithstanding, nothing that looks much like idealism or ideology stands a sporting chance of slipping by the gates of the Demacratic or Republican establishments. If folk singers are the bards of our New Left, it bears some thinking upon that the only songs they sing about the major parties are sung for satirical effect.

But in Britain, there is the Labour Party, and it guards the political Left impregnably, a Gibraltar of working-class aspiration, proletarian heroism, artistry and intellect. It has thoroughly integrated the larger and more militant British working class — and it has, through its more moderate welfare statism, done an effective job of attracting middle-class allegiance. Moreover, and very importantly, Labour retains the aura of a crusading "Cause party" of tremendous moral persuasion and intellectual support. Here, seemingly, is the royal road to the hearts and votes of the British gentile public. So it was inevitable that the peace movement should try to win its way by first "taking over" this one great national powerhouse and, upon Labour's election, the government itself. The feasibility of this strategy is of course enhanced by the fact that in Britain a political party, upon taking over the government with a decent majority, is practically omnipotent in the formulation of policy: there are no troublesome Congressional checks and balances. What then could be a more obvious strategy?

But that strategy failed in its ultimate objective, and so did the Committee of 100's direct-action alternative. With their failures, the peace movement was stranded without a political vehicle. In America, the gentile public does not come as conveniently packaged as in England; that makes getting at it so much the harder, but it also makes peace politics here less an all-or-nothing proposition.

One great exception to Labour's broad embrace and humanitarian reputation should be mentioned. That is its abysmal record on t very new domestic issue of ra relations. By supinely taking ov the Tories' policy of severe i migration restriction, and by fa ing to speak boldly to the worse ing problem of color discrimin tion, Labour is alienating whatev adherents it once had among Br ain's 800,000 Indian, West India and Pakistani immigrants. It is disgraceful display and has left tragic vacuum in the political o ganization of the immigrants. Do this provide an alliance for t peace movement? Some think s and with this possibility in min a group of us, a few Committee 100 veterans and a few immigra spokesmen, began late in 1964 small operation called "Multiracia Britain." Then, with a really in portant assist from Martin Luthe King and Bayard Rustin — wh stopped off for two days in Londo last November on their way to Osl where Dr. King was to receive th Nobel Peace Prize — Multiracia Britain metamorphosed into th larger and more representativ Campaign Against Racial Discrimi nation. CARD still functions as th voice of moderation in Britain's ra cial problem, but has lost groun to more militant groups and, un happily, no longer has any connec tion with the peace movement.

Where, then, does the British movement go from here? Fo it is important that the British movement survive and progress Britain's voice in the world is fa from negligible; moreover, becaus of their imperial experience an Commonwealth connections, the British could play at least as great a role as the French presently d in contributing some sophistication and insight to America's heavy-handed dealings with the Third World—where, it now seems clear, the major danger to peace will lie in the next few generations.

It was my own conviction that neither CND nor the Committee of 100 has anywhere to go unless they radically recast themselves — and emerge with a broad program that presses forward on a number of domestic and foreign issues. It is quite hopeless at this point for any group to compete head-on with the major parties for mass appeal, since both Labour and the Tories have subscribed to advanced welfare-state policies that cover all the ost obvious grievances of their ciety. But the welfare state is a rge-meshed net that provides so- al security at the expense of let- ng many more subtle human eds drop through. Race relations, inority rights in general (and itain's minorities, only now be- ming visible to the society, in- ude some exotic groups like Greek ypriots, Armenians and Gypsies) a very apparent "drop through" sue. So are many of the problems at beset old people and juveniles, e bored residents of many of the ew towns" and of the often cul- rally slack provinces, ex-convicts d the families of men still in ison, widows without family, or- ans, derelicts. In fact, the whole oblem of alienation, in an indus- ial society in all its disheartening rms, lies beyond the welfare state.

In all these scattered pud- es of social inadequacy there are ople whose lives can't be touched mended, but only worsened, by e manipulation of expert social gineers. What we need to stabilize d enrich the lives of these alien- ed many is that "participative de- ocracy" our own New Left is so ncerned to bring about at every vel of American society—and it is new and subtle a project that we arcely have as yet the political etoric with which to discuss it. In itain as in America, when politi- l parties talk about anything orth while at all, it is the bread- d-butter issues — which is the uff man does not live alone by.

Can there be a politics beyond the elfare state? In Britain those I met ho are talking most imaginatively out it are the contributors to the ew Left Review, and the people lin Ward manages to draw into s little monthly, Anarchy. And ose who are doing the most about are the "activist sociologists" hom the remarkable Richard auser has organized into the Cen- r for Group Studies in London. In- sting that there must be no re- arch that does not lead to action, d no action that does not stem om thorough research, Hauser, ho is perhaps best known for the lauser Report" on homosexuality hich he prepared for the Home ffice, has managed to set in mo- n several scores of self-help proj- ts among Britain's convicts, aban- ned widows, orphans, disadvan- ged minorities and social misfits. His object is always the same: to find among the disorganized and inadequate the resourcefulness that will allow them to solve their own problems—and so form themselves into a "fraternal society" that can make its own way in the world. A student of Gandhi's philosophy and techniques, Hauser believes that this kind of activity could provide the bridge across which the peace movement might travel toward its goal of international conciliation. One must, he contends, begin rooting out violence where it is nearest at hand in order to test and perfect the methods of nonviolent problem solving. Then, perhaps, the peace movement could undercut the Labour Party and find the allies it needs. It was the most hopeful prospect I came across in Britain, and its implications for the American peace scene are quite as great.

What It Means To Be An American

Editing a little journal for a noble cause teaches one many things—and not a little about human folly. There was, for example, the strange young man from the fringes of the Committee of 100 who showed up in my office one afternoon and tried to convince me that he had successfully "infiltrated" the Ministry of War and swiped the plans for Britain's entire air-defense system. Wouldn't I love to publish them in PN as a blow for peace? And then there was the little old Quaker lady who, upon discovering that I was an American, appealed to me to get in touch with the oil tycoon, J. Paul Getty, at his Dover home, and please to ask him for $1 million so that she could stage an international festival for children and their pets at the Albert Hall. Mr. Getty, I was to understand, loved children (and small animals) and would surely come across if a fellow countryman were to ask him.

But by far the most impressive lesson I bring away from London has nothing directly to do with Peace News or the movement. Still, I cannot forgo relating the single experience that added most to my political understanding.

While in London I did a number of interviews at the B.B.C. for the Pacifica stations, one of them with two South African exiles. One hears a great deal more about South Africa in England than in America—and it all adds up to the picture of a regime so brutal and despotic that one must look to Hitler's Germany to find a society of comparable criminality. The two young men I spoke with—one, an exceptionally talented poet, the other, a journalist—had many stories to tell of the discrimination and degradation they and their families had undergone, living as dispossessed blacks in a country they had never been able to call their own. Neither spoke with bitterness, but rather with an indignation that had cooled and solidified into calm defiance. Both were sworn to return to their society to fight when the inevitable revolution came.

Was there no chance of a nonviolent solution in South Africa? It was a question both were familiar with. No, there was no chance. The government had shattered the nonviolent forces and their leaders; the Verwoerd regime would never be softened or won over by an appeal to conscience. Nor would the Western governments — primarily Britain and the United States—that keep Verwoerd in business, but which have the power, by way of economic boycott, to shatter the apartheid system.

Would they, I asked, accept weapons and support for their struggle from Communist sources? Yes, from any source. "But," I asked, with an embarrassment that was all too obvious, "if you accept Communist help, you must know that America will side against you." They both looked at me quizzically and answered, with some amusement: "Of course. But, in any case, which side does an African or Asian expect America to be on?"

If only they had said that bitterly, angrily, brutally, I might perhaps have accepted it as an understandable, but wrong-headed and fanatical outburst. But these were not fanatics. They were gentle, intelligent, quietly proud young men. And in fact they spoke admiringly of many things I mentioned about America. But when I spoke of America's relationship to their struggle in South Africa, they replied with confident simplicity, as if I had suggested that two and two might not equal four: what does every Asian and African know with a mathematical certainty but that he will find his independence and human dignity withheld from him by the bayonets and napalm of the United States?

At that moment, more vividly than at any other time, I realized what it means to be an American in this age of revolution. And it was a very dirty feeling.

Southern Juries

THE WHITE HAND OF JUSTICE . . Paul Goo

The verdict is in.

Deep South juries still will not convict a white man for murdering a Negro or another white man who pleads the Negro's cause. The acquittal of Deputy Sheriff Thomas Coleman in Hayneville, Ala., in the slaying of theology student Jonathan Daniels has only confirmed what already had been demonstrated in trial after trial.

But the current exclamations of outrage, the scurrying about for remedy on the part of reasonable Americans, might lead an outsider to think that some new phenomenon of injustice had suddenly appeared. It is, of course, as much a part of our judicial scene as juries themselves, and this furnishes the key to cause and possible remedy.

By unofficial and modest count, there have been twenty-one civil rights murders in the deep South since 1961. Not one white man has been convicted of murder in any of these crimes, although white guilt has often been palpable. To stretch the count back into earlier decades would only increase numerical proof of a moral certainty.

A demand for new federal legislation has resounded from many quarters. Dr. Martin Luther King said: "It is obviously clear that federal anti-lynch legislation must be passed."

Alabama Attorney General Richmond Flowers, who tried to take the Coleman prosecution out of local racist hands, only to be thwarted by Circuit Judge T. Werth Thagard, declared: "Those who feel they have a license to kill, destroy and cripple now have been assured that license. It is our duty to do what is necessary to retrieve it."

And the New York Post said of the white people of Lowndes County: "But even they, in their innermost hearts, must have quailed at the chief defense attorney's post-trial comment: 'Tom Coleman has been tried in a temple of justice. . . .' "

Decent men feel passionate about Hayneville because the miscarriage of justice was as gross as the death of Daniels and the wounding of Father Richard Morrisroe were poignant. Reverting to a well-thumbed and bloody script, the defense—backed by state police—said that young Daniels had flashed a switch-blade knife as he and his black and white friends sought to enter a general store where Coleman stood guard with a 12-gauge automatic shotgun. A few months before his murder, while he still was ministering in Selma, Daniels had written:

> There are good men here, just as there are bad men. . . . Sometimes we confront the posse, and sometimes we hold a child. Sometimes we stand with men who have learned to hate, and sometimes we must stand a little apart from them. Our lives in Selma are filled with ambiguity, and in that we share with men everywhere. We are beginning to see the world as we never saw it before. We are truly in the world, and yet ultimately not of it. For through the bramble bush of doubt and fear and supposed success we are groping our way to the realization that above all else, we are called to be saints. That is the mission of the church everywhere. And in this, Selma, Ala., is like all the world: it needs the life and witness of militant saints.

It takes a certain kind of American juror to believe, in the face of this testament and the plausible evidence, that Daniels advanced on an armed deputy, switch-blade knife in hand. But one familiar with trials of recent years knows there is nothing that Southern white jurors will not believe or purport to believe in defense of their pigmented supremacy.

For example, I think of the second trial of Byron de la Beckwith for the ambush slaying of Jackson NAACP leader Medgar Evers. During the first trial, which ended in a hung jury, scales of justice hanging on the wall above the judge's bench had been tilted. The press commented and the scales were straightened for the second trial, hanging neat and balanced as the prosecutor told the jury: "I am a segregationist. I believe it. I don't believe any possibility of good coming from forced mixing of the races."

He was trying to ingratiate hir self with the twelve white men. H knew that however persuasive h evidence he must win a trial withi a trial by convincing the jurors n to deny justice in the name of se regation. I remember de la Bec with smirking as the prosecutio placed in evidence a letter he ha written to a magazine after the mu der, offering an article about "shoo ing at night at varmints in the sun mertime."

Three policemen (white, natura ly) from de la Beckwith's hom town testified that they had see him there when the murder was b ing committed in Jackson with h gun, and another jury was hun De la Beckwith went back to Gree wood and immediately resumed h Negro-baiting. The Mississippi pro ecution, unlike that in Haynevill had at least tried.

In Georgia, when Lemuel Pen a Washington, D.C., Negro educato unconnected with the civil right movement, was slain as he drov home from army duty, the pros cution tried still harder. Negroe even appeared on the jury list i Madison County.

"We read in the papers," sai Sheriff Dewey Seagraves, "whe the Supreme Court said you had t have both colored and white in th jury box. Up to this term of cour there's never been a nigger in tha box."

Two Negroes were called bu neither was chosen. Ku Klux Klans men J. Howard Sims and Cec Myers had been identified as th murderers in a confession made t the FBI by fellow Klansman Jame Lackey. The prosecution did n pander to white supremacy as ha been done in Jackson, did not us the word "nigger." The judge, Care Skelton, was an urbane man, friend of the late President Kenned and a respected jurist.

Yet Georgia's efforts availed noth ing. A florid-faced 60-year-old de fense lawyer addressed his neigh bors in the jury box, flailing hi arms and shouting: "Gentlemen, am not afraid to stand up agains the untold resources of the federa government because I am standin in the presence of the symbol of th

---

Paul Good is a journalist who has been on assignment in the Southern states for the past eighteen months. He is writing a book on the South.

reatest tradition mankind has ever nown . . . the jury system . . . welve good men and true, a jury f peers through whose veins flow he rich Anglo-Saxon blood and the nilk of human kindness."

He went on from this dripping netaphor to an apoplectic denunciaion of Washington for having sent he FBI to Georgia with instructions o "bring back white meat." I vatched Klansmen fill the courtoom and Negroes disappear as the ury returned and the defendants tood with arms folded in a secret Klan attitude. The verdict was acuittal. The next night at a Klan ally in Atlanta, Klan Wizard James 'enable told an assembly of the obed faithful:

> You'll never be able to convict a white man that kills a nigger what encroaches on the white race of the South. They tried it in Philadelphia [where the three Mississippi civil rights workers were slain] and over in Danielsville. You see a jury there last night turn 'em scot free. Now, Mr. Hoover and Mr. Johnson, what do you say about that?

What do we say about that? Vhat do we do about "twelve good nen and true" who turn out to be dozen bigots condoning murder?)emands for federal anti-lynch laws re the impassioned call from a naional sense of frustrated justice. 'his sense was pricked by the inxplicably casual reaction of U.S. ttorney General Nicholas Katzenach:

> I think this kind of result is expected from time to time. This is the price you have to pay for the jury system, but I don't think it is too high a price to pay.

In light of decades of such unarying verdicts, Mr. Katzenbach erhaps knows what he meant by from time to time." But federal nti-lynch or personal security laws aise questions both constitutionally rave and practically complex. Asuming, for example, that a satisactory definition of civil rights nurder could be drawn and made) hold legal water, and assuming ne Supreme Court ruled it constiitional, how would it work?

Would indictments be obtained rom federal grand juries chosen om the deep South areas where ne crimes were committed? If so, ast experience gives no assurance nat white federal grand jurors 'ould invariably function with nore regard for justice than state urors. And federal trial jurors would either be picked from local venires or else the cases would have to be tried without a jury before federal judges, thus depriving defendants of their right to jury trial.

It has also been suggested that such cases might be removed North, possibly to Washington, where some kind of super-federal juries would sit. But this immediately smacks of police state-ism, perhaps even of Kafka — select government jurors somehow pruned of passions, creatures of central authority invested with the awful power to condemn whomever the government brings before them.

Faced with these alternatives, Sen. Clifford Case (R., N.J.) winced at Katzenbach's detached reaction and said:

> The federal government is not impotent. It has the power and we can find ways to provide adequate protection of the constitutional rights of all our citizens anywhere in the United States.

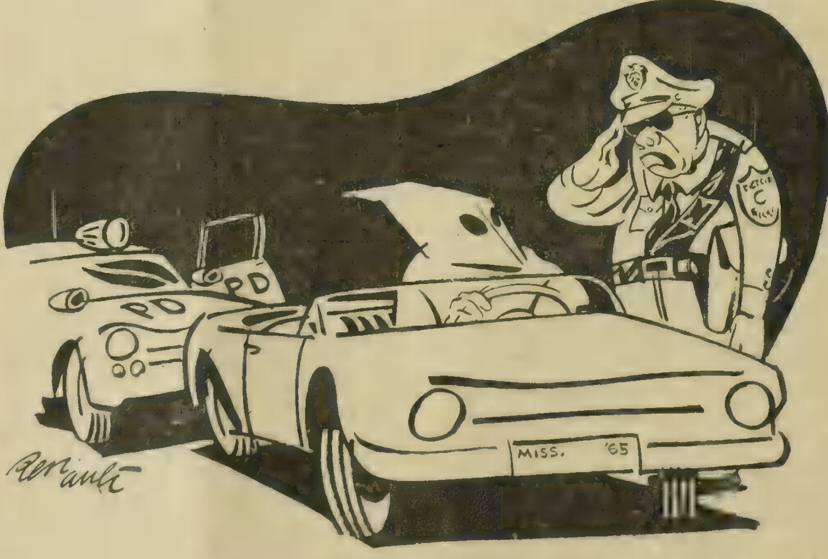
Senator Case has several bills pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee—some co-sponsored by New York Sen. Jacob Javits—to promote adequate protection. None approaches the severity of an anti-lynch law. They are mainly designed to put more bite in existing laws. One, for example, increases penalties against those who harm a person while attempting to deprive him of his civil rights. Another would make municipalities liable for damages arising from civil suits when a policeman or sheriff is guilty of such deprivation. Civil action by the families of Daniels or Father Morrisroe against Lowndes County might come under the purview of this legislation.

But none of these remedies seems to go to the heart of the malady—the "twelve good men and true." Charles Morgan, a former Birmingham attorney hounded out of the city in 1963 for his civil rights efforts, and now director of the American Civil Liberties Union Southern regional office, says of Mr. Katzenbach's statement on the price of a jury system: "I'm willing to pay any price too. And speaking of the jury system, I think we ought to try our jury system some time."

Mr. Morgan's contention, presently backed by more than half a dozen ACLU suits that are approaching court hearings, is that enough legislation presently exists to prevent judicial travesties like Hayneville; the government has only to use it.

"The cry for fresh federal legislation lets the federal government off the hook," he says. "I'm not saying I'm against an enforceable personal security law. Maybe with one we could protect civil rights workers better. But we will be ignoring every other aspect of the American system of justice by doing that alone. We have the obligation to work things out so that the average Negro or poor person is not afraid of the law whether it is in Lowndes County or in Cook County, Illinois."

Mr. Morgan cites Lowndes as an example of how the quality of justice in the deep South might be dramatically improved if the hallowed



Ben Roth Agency

"Forgive Me for Not Recognizing Y'all, Sheriff"

concept of the jury system were made a reality. The county is about 80 per cent Negro, yet only in the last year were the names of two Negroes placed on the jury rolls for the first time since Reconstruction. Eighteen more went on after the ACLU unsuccessfully tried to obtain a temporary injunction barring all criminal trials in the county on the ground that Negroes were systematically excluded from juries.

Sixty names were called in the venire from which the Coleman jurors were chosen. No Negro name was among them, but coincidentally enough, Coleman's was. From all accounts, no Justice Department officials were present in court to witness this aberration of the jury system. That is nothing new—the department has a history, North and South, of indifference to flagrant injustice in the form of state and federal jury selections.

Mr. Morgan argues that if Negroes had been represented in anything like mathematical proportion, the jury would have been predominantly or totally black. This is anathema to most white Alabamians, who insist that justice is a white hand protruding from a black robe. But the federal government should not adopt the Alabama point of view. A predominantly black jury is no insurance of justice, of course, but in civil rights cases, it could be a guarantee that judge, defense—and even prosecution — would not use race as the determining, if officially unsubmitted, prime exhibit. Morgan reasons further:

> Or consider the de la Beckwith trial. If Jackson's 40 per cent Negro population was anything like represented on the venire, you would have had a black and white jury. Or else defense lawyers would have wasted all their peremptory challenges on the Negroes. Whether Beckwith were guilty or not, some whites on that jury did vote to convict, looking past prejudice. You would have had more white men of that caliber sitting if the selection system were fair and equal.
>
> We are constricted under a system of segregated justice from the jury list to the clerk of the court, the bailiffs, the prosecutors, the state and local police, the defense lawyers and the judges. Intraracial Negro crime is judged paternalistically with light sentences encouraging racial self-degredation. In civil damage suits, a Negro leg, broken or amputated, is worth one-fifth the settlement for a white leg. But we have the weapons to break this ring of segregated justice at the vital point of the jury.

He points out that the Justice Department could immediately begin prosecutions under Title XVIII, Section 243 of the U. S. code. This bars the systematic exclusion of any qualified citizen from jury service and authorizes a $5,000 fine against the jury commissioner or judge guilty of fostering such exclusion. It has been enforced only once since it went on the books in the Reconstruction days of the 1870s. It is true that in the past individual appeals from Negro criminal defendants have successfully been argued before the Supreme Court on the grounds of exclusion. But none of these has been in the form of a class action which would open the door to sweeping injunctive recourse against officials in places like Lowndes County.

On November 26, the ACLU will go before a three-judge federal court in Montgomery in a jurv exclusion case which could prove historic. Its suit is entitled Gardenia White v. Bruce Crook. Crook is the Lowndes County jury commissioner; Miss White is a Negro resident of the county. It is a class action and she is joined by others, including the mother of the slain seminarian Daniels. The ACLU will cite Section 1983, Title 42 (and others) of the U.S. code which deals with deprival of civil rights, in this case as applying to jury service. If successful in Montgomery or on appeal to the Supreme Court, it could be the wedge opening Southern jury boxes to Negroes.

On Dec. 16, in New Orleans, the full Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals will hear six more exclusion cases. Four apply to state jury lists, two to federal rolls. The ACLU will present an array of citations asserting that there is already available ample legal recourse to end racially stacked juries.

On the federal level, a rule of criminal procedure enables the Justice Department to challenge federal grand jurors. And when it comes to the states, ACLU's Morgan will argue in Billingsley v. Clayton that the United States generally and Jefferson County (Birmingham) in particular empanels Literary Digest juries. The reference is to the disastrous Literary Digest poll of 1936 that predicted Alfred Landon would win the Presidential election. T persons polled came mainly fr telephone lists and auto-registrati records, and that neatly—and e barrassingly for the magazine— cluded the mass of the poor.

"This will be the first case of kind to reach any appellate co in the country," Mr. Morgan sa "If the poor—and the Negro min ity is predominant among the po —are entitled to representation a poverty program, surely they entitled to representation on juri We've passed a voting bill this ye But the Western world gave m the right to serve on juries lo before they had the right to vot

The American jury system is shambles, North and South. The are, for example, ninety-two feder district courts and ninety-two di ferent jury-selection systems. would seem urgent business for t Congress, as it reapportions in ord to assure legislative equality ar the one-man, one-vote concept, move to insure that every qualifie American is guaranteed a dem cratic jury vote—both when he cas it and when he awaits its outcom

Such a law or court decisio stemming from the ACLU sui could possibly result in a flood appeals from men now in priso for retroactive justice. This undoub edly plays a part in Justice Depar ment inertia concerning the issu But retroactive justice, howeve legally complicating, must be pre erable to condoning injustice b perpetuating it. If an honest jur system were established, Byron d la Beckwith could be retried. Th Alabama state trooper who allege ly murdered Negro Jimmy Lee Jack son last spring in Marion, and whon a Perry County grand jury refuse to indict during the same week Cole man was acquitted, could be in dicted and tried. The Klansmen ac cused of killing the three Philadel phia civil rights workers woul have their day in an interracia court.

The ghostly ranks of those wh have died in the South for huma rights can never be wholly avenged nor should vengeance be the drivin purpose. But a dynamic and demo cratic justice that can punish ca also by example give pause to thos who would strike the defenseless The South has seen enough martyr doms. The conscience of this Republic can bear no more.

Mythic Voyage

ARTING OUT IN THE THIRTIES. By Alfred Kazin. Little, Brown & Co. 166 pp. $4.95.

Allen Guttmann

ıe frontispiece to Alfred Kazin's A alker in the City (1951) was Alfred ieglitz's famous photograph, "The eerage." The title page had for its igraph lines from Whitman's "Cross-g Brooklyn Ferry": "The glories rung like beads on my smallest ghts and hearings—on the walk in e street, and the passage over the er." The book itself, an autobiog-phy to which Starting Out in the iirties is the sequel, was about the ıonymous immigrants whom Stieg-z fixed forever at the moment of eir arrival in the promised land, ıd about Kazin's own passage from e heymish streets of Brownsville "the great world" beyond the ıetto, the world that he, like Whit-an, was to claim as native ground. ere, "ratty little wooden tenements, rn with the smell of damp in them, which there grew up how many hoolteachers, city accountants, rab-s, cancer specialists, functionaries the revolution . . ."; there, the nerica of Homer, Eakins, Ryder ıd Sloan, of Walt Whitman and nily Dickinson. The imaginative est of the book is the moment when wis Mumford's The Brown Decades, ıd his own walks through what was ft of 19th-century New York, came gether to spring open "the great unk of forgotten time." To keep at trunk open, Kazin read "as if oks would fill my every gap, legit-ıize my strange quest for Amer-an past, remedy my every flaw. . . ." is account of himself as walker and ader was as memorable as Ben anklin's description of that first roll, a loaf of bread under each arm, rough the streets of Philadelphia. ıtobiography, in Kazin's first vol-ne, was mythic voyage.

Starting Out in the Thirties is very fferent. It is still Kazin's story—the ıtline of his literary career from his first impetuous interview with a Famous Man (John Chamberlain) to the moment when he stands on the threshold of what the reader knows to be success. But now the story includes other people, living lives of their own, as well as Whitman's "glories strung like beads." Social history (seen, to paraphrase Zola, through a temperament) replaces Bildungsroman; we identify the people rather than the mood.

In large part, the book is a series of portraits brilliantly painted. V. F. Calverton, the independently Marxist editor of Modern Monthly, becomes an 18th-century theologian, ready with the argument-from-design: "He was indefatigably and thoroughly an intellectual Socialist. Evidences lay all around him, waiting to form a system." Calverton's home was an arena where all the elements of the anti-Communist Left clashed by night. Max Eastman, very much the Americanizer of radical doctrine, who "would have liked to sit down with Marx and talk him out of his unfortunate German tendency to metaphysics," takes on Sidney Hook, whose passionately logical defense of Marx and Dewey, two and indivisible, overwhelmed all comers. An anonymous Pole appears as a "veteran of the revolutionary wars," kindly, disillusioned, "expert on all Socialists and socialisms, utopian, scientific, social democrat, libertarian and dogmatic, a man with a heavy bald front and a face shaped like a stone by every obstacle in his path." Scenes shift but not the milieu: "With his long, lean, bony body in blue trunks, [Bertram Wolfe] sat cross-legged on the beach at Provincetown, a volume of the Marx-Engels correspondence in German before him, looking intellectual, saintly and nervous, like a harried American version of Mahatma Gandhi." Some of the harshest sketches are of Mary McCarthy, whom Kazin discredits with "a wholly destructive critical mind," and of Philip Rahv, whom Kazin accuses of excessive interest in Partisan Review and its "inner group." (Kazin quickly admits that the Partisan Review group was loyal to a great cultural tradition that was his tradition as well.) Judgment has always been Kazin's mode. His assessments will be countered by others. Mary McCarthy, for one, can certainly take care of herself in literary rough-and-tumble.

The common denominator of all the important characters is a concern with both politics and literature. Adolescent Kazin appears on the first page with a brief case full of college essays on the metaphysical poets, but the authors that count in this second volume are Silone and Malraux, rather than Donne or Marvell (or Whitman and Dickinson), novelists of society rather than poets of the self. Malraux, especially, matters. La Condition Humaine is one of the books Kazin reads in order to find the answer to the most crucial of questions: What must we do? What must I do? Kazin hears Malraux, at a rally held to raise money for the Spanish Loyalists, and feels the phrases, later a part of the great novel, L'Espoir, stab and drive "the agony of Spain like nails into our flesh." (The novel is now out of print and, I am told by publishers, no longer of interest.) When Ralph Bates, another novelist who fought in Spain, talks to a group at Muriel Draper's, Kazin detects a falseness in him, a concern not with his subject but with his own skill as a user of language. The mauvaise foi reappears, on a vastly larger scale, when the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of 1939 brings the two totalitarian dictatorships together in a bloody bargain that Kazin (and other Socialists) abhorred, which the Stalinists quickly "explained." Like many other Socialists, Kazin had clung throughout the thirties to some shreds of faith in the Soviet Union, even after the Moscow trials (which he knew to be faked), but disbelief could no longer be suspended. "All my life I had lived among people who had seemed to me beautiful because they were the dust of the earth; I had taken literally the claim that they identified their suffering with the liberation of humanity." Now he saw them as ideologues more interested in power than in freedom. "They were as cold as their leader, as self-concerned, heartless, mediocre. . . ." This judgment, itself cold to the point of heartlessness, is too broad and too harsh, too much the familiar, frozen gesture llen Guttmann is the author of The ound in the Heart: America and e Spanish Civil War (Free Press), ıd has written many essays on merican literature and politics.

---

of cold-war anti-communism. It is, like the denigration of Wilfred Mendelson in A Walker in the City, a false note.

The loss of political faith, the collapse of European society and the outbreak of war, undercut the attainment of literary success. The book ends somberly, with an epilogue devoted to an event five years later than the latest section of the narrative. In 1945, in a London theatre, Kazin saw a newsreel of the release of the prisoners from Belsen. "It was unbearable. People coughed in embarrassment, and in embarrassment many laughed." These lines, which end the book, are hard to understand, but perhaps the key is in A Walker in the City, when Kazin described the moment, also in London, when he heard a broadcast of the first Sabbath service at this same concentration camp. Then, he was taken back in time to sundown and Sabbath in Brownsville, to the primitive togetherness of the community he left behind in his "strange quest for the American past." The opposition of the frontispiece and the epigraph remains unresolved, and the career is (one hopes) far from ended.

To speak of unresolved tensions is not to disparage. The drama of assimilation is seldom as simple as it was in Mary Antin's unambivalently grateful autobiography, The Promised Land. Kazin has shown himself to be a master of realistic as well as romantic prose, but his special value is, precisely, in his personification of the dilemma of one who feels the contrary pull of past and present. He is, in short, one of Emerson's representative men, one who symbolizes a certain kind of excellence. It is, unfortunately, the excellence of these two autobiographical volumes that makes them dangerous in the hands of unwary readers. We long to have an age, or even a decade, summed up between the covers of a single forceful book. Benjamin Franklin's autobiography is, for example, undoubtedly a clue to one tendency in American life — the utilitarian and pragmatic, the rationalistic and the scientific — but Franklin is a poor guide (for instance) to the pietism that characterizes the religious life of the common man from his time to our own. Kazin's accomplishments make him credible, and overly credulous students will surely see the thirties through his eyes, and wrongly assume that everyone in the "Red Decade" really was a Socialist or a Communist, that the Spanish Civil War was an important part of the consciousness of the man in the street, that the literary life of the Modern Monthly and the Partisan Review was the whole of the literary life of the nation. Kazin is surely not to be blamed for the ways in which his book will be misused. Still, it is ironic that he chose, in a recent review, to lampoon studies of American culture, to reap — McCormi like — a whole field of straw m and to ignore one of the basic ficulties of cultural history, the p clivity of even the best scholars to in the complex work of art a key unlock all the doors on Main Stre
We have all, for instance, heard qu enough about the Jew as the arc type of all Americans. Kazin written so well that we shall ha to try hard not to misuse him.

Washington's Top Banana

THE JOHNSON HUMOR. Edited by Bill Adler. Simon & Schuster. 124 pp. $2.95.

Larry L. King

It is not the fault of editor Bill Adler, nor of the Messrs. Simon and Schuster, that The Johnson Humor does not capture the President's true wit.

Despite his free-wheeling, supercharged, flambouyant image, Lyndon B. Johnson usually takes care to turn a "safe" public face to watchful voters. No man can divest himself of cornier, more time-tested, acceptable political flapdoodle. Thus we see the Lyndon B. Johnson who lavishly praises motherhood, waves the flag, invites every high school band on the campaign circuit to parade at his inauguration, bellows from his limousine to curious curbstone gawkers, "Yawl come ta tha speakin'," kisses babies, presses flesh, delivers folksy sermons that are the envy of all the one-gallus parsons of the world.

Without detracting from the President's near water-walking feats in bewitching Congress (and the public) into accepting almost everything he asks in domestic legislation, one notes that he is a master of timing. So are all good comics. As Bob Hope builds, one-liner by double-take, toward the climax of his stand-up routines, so LBJ builds (speech by bill by handy circumstance) the foundation stone of his career. He cashed in on the martyrdom of John F. Kennedy to crash the Civil Rights Act through a foot-dragging Congress, exploited the stupidity of Governor George Wallace, Sheriff Jim Clark and their red-neck
Alabama disciples to attain enactme of the Voting Rights Act, hoisted Ba Goldwater by the Senator's many o petards. Thus his performances calculating rather than bold, his umphs planned rather than accide tal. The Johnson public humor is lil wise calculating, planned, safe. It therefore, often dull and commo place. It fails to inspire, when reduc to print and bound in hard cover.

The private, behind-the-scen Lyndon B. Johnson can be a ve funny man. He is an excellent mim in broadly aping the talk, manne isms, con games and dreams of h many political associates. At su times he is a rubber-faced, perceptiv charming, bright-eyed elfin. Lame tably, few see Washington's top bana in these fascinating performances. N author, or editor or book can whol capture them.

Sometimes the Johnson humor crude. To speech writers on his o Senatorial staff he once said: "Th might be a good speech for ole Adl Stevenson or for Cabot Lodge up the
at the UN. But I'm not at the UN. represent the boondocks. Don't scared to take off your writin' sho and wade in barnyard juices." Joh son once joshed a Senate colleagu who had been giving him a hard tim on key bills: "You keep on screwi me the way you have, you're gonn have to buy my groceries—or at lea gimme a little kiss!"

Often his humor has bite. I attende a meeting, when Johnson was Sena Majority Leader, where numerou Texans appeared before a conventio of bureaucrats to urge the opening a new international bridge on th
United States-Mexico border at Paso. Employing the negative doctrin so often favored by professional bu reaucrats, representatives of agenc

Larry L. King, a Texan, served as assistant to two Texas Congressmen for a decade and traveled with the Kennedy-Johnson campaign team. His work has appeared in Harper's and his novel, The One-Eyed Man, will be published next year by New American Library.

fter agency sang recitals of special roblems the project would pose. Fi- ally, Johnson said: "If St. Peter at ie Pearly Gates takes the attitude you eople take, the Pope and Billy Gra- am will have to shoot their way into eaven."

Much of Johnson's humor is at the xpense of others. Pierre Salinger and ubert Humphrey nervously perched n horseback at The Ranch, dressed s if for the annual Drugstore Cowboys all, break the President up. Some f his wit is inspired by a monumen- l ego, and is unintentional—as when e said with a straight face to John . Kennedy on election night in 1960, 'ou're losin' Ohio, but we're ahead ı Pennsylvania."

Some of Johnson's funnier per- rmances are given when his mind far from comedy. A couple of years go, talking politics at his Washington ome with a Texas Congressman one aturday morning, Johnson abruptly rabbed the phone, announcing that: George Reedy never takes enough ıirts along on our trips." Reaching the Reedy home, he spoke as follows:

"Mrs. Reedy, what size shirt does George wear? (Pause). Naw. (Frown). He wears a bigger shirt than that. George is a bigger man than that." Johnson hung up. He dialed a department store, identified himself, asked for the manager. Waiting, he said (more to the walls than to his open-mouthed guest), "She don't know what size shirt George wears." Ordering a dozen shirts a full size larger than Mrs. Reedy had recommended, the then Vice President wanted them delivered to his aide's home: "You get 'em over there this afternoon? Fine, fine! You're a can-do man." Then, hanging up the phone, he turned to his slack-jawed companion. "Go ahead," he said. "I'm listenin'."

Regrettably, The Johnson Humor tells no such tales. It is confined to Johnson's utterances in speeches, at press conferences, or repeats well-worn Presidential bromides that have appeared in older print. One is left wondering, as with Jack Paar, what he is really like.

Correspondent to the Underworld

'OTES FROM A SEA DIARY: Hemingway All the Way. By Nelson Algren. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 254 pp. $4.50.

Sol Yurick

ike one of his legendary gold-heart hores, Nelson Algren has been caged y the craving to tell us the way it eally is. He sticks his hand out ırough the bars and begs for the andout of recognition. "I was en- ouraged to give a boggling world et another Hemingway essay . . . melling of salt." Who's the pusher? Vho hooked him? Maybe it was the resistible reflection of the world- hattering possibilities of Truthful Jelson: or possibly, because it is a me when entertainment is badly eeded, we seduced him into this lownish position. Now, continuing exploit the fiction of the real self, tastelessly worked out in his last wo books, he recounts the sad tale f how a nice boy like him got into he Profession.

But, we must never forget that efore he got hooked, Nelson Algren rote one great book: The Man With The Golden Arm. Are there ten living American writers who have written a great book? Five?

Algren's latest campaign to uncage himself runs this way: he takes a sea voyage to Eastern ports; he undertakes to vindicate Hemingway from his detractors; he excoriates American corruption, especially in the Republic of Letters; he witnesses suffering the world over; he alludes to past rapes made on his soul; he strives to interrelate the forces of evil, all converging on Nelson Algren: for, whatever he is talking about, he is Presenting Nelson Algren. The symbolic compound doesn't bond: the retort holds a petulant amalgam. There is a certain innocence about the performance, as if someone is going to do something about it. Perhaps he believes in the social-work philosophy of our time.

In making the sea voyage, Algren allies himself with all the kind-hearted, hard-boiled men of the world, paying homage to the idea that experience ennobles and is the core of literature; the myth of verisimilitude. The trip should serve as a sea-change-of-luck, magically putting uncrossable water over which the demoniac critics cannot pass in pursuit: it is also an isolation and revivification motif. But, since all the world's an Algren-hell, he didn't escape the critics: worse, he found himself.

By beating Hemingway's sharkish host-munchers off, Algren becomes the kingly co-victim. He relates a mystic investment between seer and acolyte which would have us believe a liturgical dialogue took place, but it sounds as if they were both stupified by reputation into incanting Hemingwayish nonsense-stichomythia. What Algren is trying to say is that The Writer, because he alone has really suffered, is able to translate that suffering and is above criticism. And: sincere writers truly understand one another. Presumably, critics don't suffer but wax saprophytically. Which is why they have never given Algren-Hemingway his due. But why worry about Hemingway: if his work is great, critical dissection can only canonize him. If not. . . .

It is Algren's misfortune that he wrote his great book at the wrong time. He arrived after the end of that great romantic period of the thirties: who wanted lyrical natural-ol Yurick is the author of the re- ently published novel, The Warriors Holt, Rinehart & Winston).

---

"The American Civil Liberties Union has long needed a popularly written history of its 45 years of defending the democratic liberties embodied in the Bill of Rights... a remarkable job."
—ROGER BALDWIN, Civil Liberties

The Noblest Cry is an impressive, sympathetic, yet critical report on the defense of our freedoms. At a time when the rights of racial minorities, of political extremists, and of individual citizens are a matter of wide concern, it is an especially important and disturbing document. $7.95

by CHARLES LAM MARKMANN

ST. MARTIN'S

ism, no matter how superb, in 1950? Algren failed to properly initiate the next fad-step, expressed as absurdity and homage to junkie-heroes. Algren merely created a total world: it included absurdity but didn't overspecialize, it had suffering, perpetual darkness, and underground men peopled it without special pleading; but that world seemed to be vitiated by a dated syntax. So Hemingway appeared to be an initiator; Algren a culminator. Yet Hemingway looks wistfully back to Byron and more writers will be, in the long run, influenced by Algren.

As for Algren's diatribe on corruption in American letters: it is silly. Algren behaves as if he is uncovering a scandal no one knew existed. It has always existed; it is a fact of life. After all, Algren has written knowingly about the corrupt world. Is it possible that this determined innocent made the error of thinking that the civic pustulation did not infect him, that he alone was immune? And this is the point: talent and achievement exempt no man; horror, like light speed, is a constant to all men in all situations.

When Algren gripes about the world — the alienation of modern man, machine society, literary clowns, predatory movie producers, academic fustiness—it is naively done; it is the innocent asking us to get excited about what is dissected for us every day by experts. He has forgotten that fiction transfigures sociology, and has therefore taken on the job of a roving correspondent to the underworld. Traditionally, with all the other oppressed, he has a secret. But he isn't putting out with that secret, that fiction, because if a whore gives her love freely, she will be hurt, betrayed, exhausted, dead. But if no love-truth is given, no fiction written, Algren is dead anyway. Who is cheated here? The literary con and fad men are happier if he doesn't threaten them with the possibility of a genuine contribution: those who have believed in his importance are done out of another possible great fiction.

This is the age of the great stranger-than-fiction confession: the world demands entertainment and all the Thersiteses fight for the bright abasement of the hot center. But the peevish literary clowns who mistake themselves for meta-literature have a more natural flare for exhibitionism than Algren ever had. Yet it is the peculiar value of fiction that it transubstantiates polemic into truth. Hemingway knew that much till he succumbed to the childish paraphernalia of bats and bulls and athleticism.

A few years ago Algren asked the question, Who Lost An American? As long as he continues to write books like this we have all lost an American.

The Last Words of E.H.

Kermit Vanderbilt

Ernest Hemingway Reading (Caedmon TC 1185) is a recent addition to the growing library of writers reading from their works. Some of the excitement of the creative act may be suggested in such recordings, carried by the cadence and resonance of the author's own voice. Often the work gains meaning through the author's intonation. Though successful readings are scarce, those by Allen Tate, Wallace Stevens, E. E. Cummings, T. S. Eliot, Katherine Anne Porter, and above all Dylan Thomas, immediately come to mind. To this distinguished group, one can now add Ernest Hemingway Reading. Indeed, because it offers a number of improvisations along with the readings, Caedmon's recording may very well be placed in a category all its own.

Surprisingly, for a man who loved to act many roles, Hemingway was microphone-shy. The present record was culled mainly from tapes made in Cuba between 1948 and 1961. They have been released by A. E. Hotchner, adapter of several Hemingway stories for television in the fifties. Not only do they provide revelations of Hemingway the man, but they also suggest a few insights into his work.

The least eventful of the six offerings are "The Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech" and "Work in Progress." The main interest here is Hemingway's voice, a clear, vibrant low-tenor, unexpectedly youthful, almost boyish. It reminds one of a recurring theme in the fiction, that of age reaching b toward youth. So too, incidentally, d the album cover, which pictures older Hemingway standing beside youthful portrait.

More interesting is "The Fifth umn," Hemingway's explanation his Spanish Civil War play. The marks are pointed and, to the deg that they are self-disparaging, o glimpses into an appealing side the Hemingway personality. He mi have presented this comment along with introductions to some his stories, on a projected televis series. But Hemingway turned do the lucrative offer. The sample in duction to "The Fifth Column" ma one feel that television and poste lost far more than Hemingway in rejected offer.

The three other pieces are the m valuable. They may disturb a standard assumptions about Hemi way's work and his view of hims Again, the comic self-denigration be heard as nowhere in the prin interviews or the autobiographi fragments. "Saturday Night at Whorehouse in Billings, Montana" an ad-libbed reminiscence with touc of Rabelaisian fantasy. Hemingw recounts, among other adventures, ordeal as a young writer working bouncer in Western bawdy hou after the Great War. During th early years, he broke his hands ev single week in Saturday night bra with the local customers. Such was gagne-pain. For a severely maim writer, work was difficult and life self precarious.

"Second Poem to Mary" is a w poem he wrote privately for M Welsh in 1944. Here is the famil Hemingway blending of wartime di lusionment and sacrilege, toget with a plea for universal love a compassion. In addition, the voice a comment register the recurring note self-effacement amid the bluster a rhetoric.

The selection which best d plays Hemingway's changing mo and masks is "In Harry's Bar in V ice." It is Hemingway's own parody Across the River and into the Tr shortly after the novel appeared 1950. The book had been receiv hostile reviews. Critics especially d liked Hemingway's main charact 50-year-old Colonel Richard Cantw presumably Hemingway in thin d guise. In the novel, one will recall th Cantwell is spending the final we end of his life in Venice, eating a drinking at Harry's Bar, intermittently nursing his cardiac condition, and talking incessantly about life, war and himself. His audience is chiefly Renata, a teen-aged Italian contessa, who holds the Colonel's mutilated right hand, listens devoutly, and engages briefly in whatever physical love her elderly partner can still undertake. She then says goodby, her aging lover goes duck hunting in the lagoon, and presently dies in an auto on his way back to Trieste. Reviews of the novel considered the action and the hero adolescent and unbelievable, or at best merely pathetic and boring, an unwitting parody of Hemingway's ficional world and his own vainglorious career.

---

Kermit Vanderbilt is the author of Charles Eliot Norton: Apostle of Culture in a Democracy (Harvard University Press).

Caedmon Records now permits a slightly different view of the matter. Mr. Hotchner, on a visit to Cuba in 1950, was reading E. B. White's parody of the novel, "Across the Street and into the Grill" printed in The New Yorker. Hemingway's response to the parody was first defensive anger, quickly supplanted by the impulse to wing it" with his own self-parody. Holding a drink in one hand and a ape-recorder microphone in the other, he delivered the improvisation included in the Caedmon record.

The latest novel came to him "in a ort of haze in Harry's Bar," Hemingway explains to his imaginary audience. The hero, "if he can be called a hero," is a trigger-happy, 18-year-old colonel, commissioned "no one knows quite how." His superiors have requested that he go on indefinite leave. He arrives in Venice and immediately begins to shoot fanatically at objects floating down the Grand Canal. Next he embarks on forty-eight days of continuous drinking, on credit, at Harry's Bar. (For those who have complained that he interlards his prose with foreign phrases, Hemingway inserts, and explains, a localism or two.) During this extended interlude at Harry's, the colonel loses sight of his true love, an 86-year-old Venetian countess. She has left him to his marathon drunk and taken refuge in the upper reaches of the neighboring basilica. The false hero elopes with a local maiden. On an offshore island they are able to enjoy a brief period of dalliance, aided by their chaperone, a priest, who has conveniently passed out. "But there is tragedy in all this": the girl has a defective heart. The sensitive colonel is not able to witness human suffering and so he leaves. He is last viewed swimming into the sunset, on his way to a fishing port down the coast. Hemingway closes with a plea to his readers to respond generously to the book's publication, for he hopes to channel part of the royalties to the support of a real-life foundation, already established to the memory of his fictional heroine.

This self-parody invites some of us who have hyphenated Cantwell and Hemingway to return for another look at Across the River and into the Trees. Cantwell in the novel is by turns cynical and soft-boiled, and so was Hemingway. Their ages are identical and their experiences in both wars similar. But Hemingway may have intended Cantwell also to be a comic figure and perhaps even a wry commentary on the author. If so, the focus is unsteady, shifting between sympathy and satire, but let us assume that the comic dimension was clearly part of the design. The colonel is in fact a demoted general, and the more Hemingway allows him to rant, the more justified to the reader this loss of rank begins to appear. He noisily berates those who were not his military equals in the war—Patton, Eisenhower and Montgomery. A braggart and bogus philosopher, Cantwell resembles the classic miles gloriosus of Plautine comedy. His surname becomes an obvious pun on what he talks well. It reminds us, too, that his prowess as an aging lover has seriously declined: Cantwell resembles also Plautus' senex amator. As for the young Renata of the long, dark hair, she plays his spurious Mary Magdalene. She fancies that his mutilated hand is the hand of Christ, and apparently hopes to be born again ("renata") by listening to his cant, which she mistakes for wisdom, as does he. ("How many times have you been hit in the head?" his doctor asks.) She also thinks of him as Richard the Lionhearted, while he reaches for his glycerin pills and washes them down with 15-to-1 martinis. With Jackson, a T/5 who drives the colonel's Buick, on which final payments are due, Cantwell holds conversations that recall Steinbeck's George and Lennie. Riding back to Trieste at the end, after an unsuccessful duck hunt, Cantwell remembers the famous dying words of Stonewall Jackson and quotes them to the Civil War General's slow-witted namesake behind the wheel. Cantwell then crawls into the back seat of "this god-damned, over-sized luxurious automobile" (his own final words) and expires. For all the novel's uncertainty of tone, Colonel Richard Cantwell becomes essentially a comic hero, "if he is a hero," a grotesque version of the earlier Jake Barnes and Robert Jordan who savored experience and tried to derive meaningful answers from it. Read in this light, Hemingway's portrait of the American military man as an ineffectual and befuddled loser might have given us some welcome comic moments in our fiction of the fifties, the decade when American humor hit an all-time low, first in the White House and then in the nation at large.

If Ernest Hemingway Reading has allowed Hemingway to have the last laugh, it also provides his readers, who have apparently taken him far more grimly than he seems to have taken himself, the opportunity to listen for and appreciate the Hemingway wit.

EMERGENCY APPEAL
TO "NATION" READERS FROM MISSISSIPPI COOPERATIVE WORKERS

The McComb leather-work cooperative has been seriously damaged by local whites, just at the outset of production. The workers need your help to rebuild.

Make checks payable to:

Poor People's Corporation
Room 1037 5 Beekman St.
New York, N.Y. 10038

For more information contact Ellen Maslow: RE 2-3996

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 10-25-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

RECORDS

Benjamin Boretz

BELLINI: Norma. Joan Sutherland, Marilyn Horne, John Alexander, Richard Cross. London Symphony Orch. and Chorus; Richard Bonynge, cond. RCA Victor LSC 6166.

VERDI: La Forza del Destino. Leontyne Price, Richard Tucker, Robert Merrill, Shirley Verrett, Giorgio Tozzi, Ezio Flagello. RCA Italiana Orch. and Chorus; Thomas Schippers, cond. RCA Victor LSC 6413.

Macbeth. Birgit Nilsson, Giuseppe Taddei, Bruno Prevedi. Chorus and Orchestra of l'Accademua di Santa Cecilia, Rome; Thomas Schippers, cond. London OSA 1380.

Rigoletto. Anna Moffo, Robert Merrill, Alfredo Kraus, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello. RCA Italiana Orchestra and Chorus; Georg Solti, cond. RCA Victor LSC 7027.

The Victor Rigoletto reveals, primarily, the continuing destruction of Anna Moffo's once brilliant vocal quality. Here again, the overuse and overprojection required of singers on the international opera circuit appear as the inevitable killer of any genuinely individual vocal sound. Instead, what pass for "qualities" in the coarse vastness of the opera houses are such exaggerated mannerisms as Birgit Nilsson's "metallism," Leontyne Price's off-center fuzziness, or Joan Sutherland's muscular chirp. In Sutherland's case, her métier is actually rather appropriate for the special requirements of Norma, which otherwise deserves much more attention to detail and phrasing than can be discerned in the present recording. Among the others, Macbeth is somewhat primitive if frequently striking Verdi, La Forza del Destino is mature middle-period Verdi con tutte le forze, and Rigoletto, helped by Solti's intelligent control, is ever more unmistakably the classic essay in masterly music-dramatic timing. On the other hand, the performances directed by Mr. Schippers testify mainly to Verdi's astonishing ingenuity in guaranteeing striking dramatic results even under the shabby routine of careless opera-house tradition.

DEBUSSY: Pelléas et Mélisande. Erna Spoorenberg, Camille Maurane, George London, Guus Hoekman. L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande; Ernest Ansermet, cond. London OSA 1379.

Pelléas is evidently Ansermet's music (though, I admit, not really mine—it always seems a far too literal and limited instance of a prodigiously subtle composer's capacities); this is a thoroughly "characteristic" performance that probably reveals everything important about the opera's time proportion and its articulation—through its peculiarly neutral vocal and instrumental contours—of the verbal and dramatic progression of the play.

BLITZSTEIN: The Cradle Will Rock. Gershon Kingsley, musical director. MGM SE 4289.

Although I find little in this work beyond a rather less inventive and sophisticated depression musical, its re-recording will undoubtedly exert a powerful nostalgic pull on those for whom it will recall the do-it-yourself atmosphere of theatre, art and music of the WPA days, and even more especially on those for whom the hope of a real "serious music for all the people" is a sadly lost—or still envisioned—artistic millenium. For anyone interested in American music as a whole, it is a fascinating insight into a direction that was taken quite seriously in the prewar period by some of our most prestigious composers. Apart from these considerations, though, what remains to be noted are mainly cartoon-stereotyped characters and musical ideas, all considerably stripped down from the sharply contoured Kurt Weill works of which the Cradle obviously hoped to be an American extension. But it seems to have been dwarfed in every such respect even by Weill's own later Broadway works. Still, the "message" must have been, then as now, unmistakable!

WAGNER: Götterdämmerung. Birgit Nilsson, Wolfgang Windgassen, Gottlob Frick, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Christa Ludwig, Claire Watson, Gustav Neidlinger, Helen Watts, Grace Hoffman, Anita Välkki, Lucia Popp, Gwyneth Jones, Maureen Guy. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; Georg Solti, cond. London OSA 1604.

Like the recent Siegfried recorded by London, the present performance is especially distinguished by the superior orchestral resources, Solti's generally intelligent control and care for total sound and pace as well as detail. And again, the vocal performances are on the highest level currently available in opera houses—higher n fact, since recordings can utilize fi t-rate singers even for minor roles. e result is a total performance on a le l far superior, for example, to the R g that I heard at Bayreuth two summ s ago. The sound, too, seems even cle er and more effectively projected t extremes of intensity and density th in the earlier Siegfried.

All this is particularly impress in view of the special interpretive c ditions confronted in Götterdä merung. Of all the Ring, it is the m t multilaterally ramified (natura enough, since there converge in it dramatic-musical threads of each the more singly developed earl parts). In one sense, the variety th generated presents less of an arti lative problem than do the lo spanned unitary textures of some the others. On the other hand, total time span of Götterdämmeru is commensurately (though not lit ally) extended to connect the ti sense in each section with its g erative origins (for Wagner was co pletely serious in regarding the Ri as a single four-evening work!), that the individual sections prese an at least equally difficult task the realization of their organic uni

BERLIOZ: Romeo and Juliet. Glad Swarthout, John Carris, Nicola M cona, soloists; NBC Symphony; turo Toscanini, cond. RCA Vic LM 7034.

Romeo and Juliet. Rosalind Eli Cesare Valletti, Giorgio Tozzi, so ists; New England Conservat Chorus; Boston Symphony Orch tra; Charles Munch, cond. RCA V tor LD 6098.

Symphonie Fantastique. Berlin Ph harmonic; Herbert von Karaja cond. DGG SLPM 138964.

Berlioz was the 19th-century Varè and his absolutely original sonic visi was most fully and multi-dimensio ally realized in Romeo and Juliet. this level, it seems to me that Berli still awaits his conductor; neith Munch's fondling nor Toscanin crackling efficiency really explor much of what one can "hear" fro even a superficial reading of t score: the violin line at the openi of "Romeo Alone," for example, quires an awareness of the inflecti sense of every turn in its fantastical complex course to guide its cohere articulation. But Munch's indiscri nate hesitation on every note and To canini's brisk observance of exa noted duration are equally inadequa to project either this or its development in the passages—through the end of the Love Scene—that follow.

On the whole, however, the complexity of the score gives the contemporary sound resources on the Munch recording the decided advantage, although the neatness of the playing that Toscanini evokes at great heights of speed and complexity (aside from the "live"-performance accouterments of audience coughs, conductorial vocalism and instrumental gaffes) is rather more attractive than Munch's somewhat messy, blurred outlines.

Von Karajan's performance of the Symphonie Fantastique is restrained and well played for the most part, much the most impressive of the recent recordings he has made with the Berlin Philharmonic.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 4. Rudolf Serkin, piano. NBC Symphony; Arturo Toscanini, cond. RCA Victor LM 2797 (from the broadcast of November 26, 1944).

The Fourth Concerto is perhaps the most extraordinary manifestation of Beethoven's idea of the piano concerto as an extension of the piano sonata (rather than the symphony) into the piano-orchestral domain. Here, however, the result of the confluence of Serkin, the young Schoenberg pupil, and Toscanini, the Verdian, is like a mixture of oil and water, and does little to help the speciality of the work emerge. The record is nevertheless a fascinating document of a unique concurrence, with a sonic clarity remarkable in a recording of its age.

MOZART: Symphonies Nos. 35, 36, 38, 39, 40, 41. Angel 36128, 36129, 36183, 36246. All with Philharmonic Orch.; Otto Klemperer, cond.

Whatever individual reservations these performances may evoke, Klemperer obviously knows how the Mozart Symphonies go, and on a level quite close to the fundamental formal centers from which every significant relationship follows. And again, this penetration of generative principles results in a rhythmic precision and incisiveness (most notably in No. 35) that totally belies any initial impression of metrical "slowness." In particular, the slower tempo range gives the last movement of No. 40 a clarity and brilliance it rarely reveals, for the complex chromatic successions sound, for once, in tune, and in beautifully congruent proportion with the successional sense of the whole work.

Here, as in the performances reviewed below, the now extinct Philharmonia Orchestra seems somewhat less reliable than formerly—such bad lapses as one hears in the horn duo in the third movement of No. 40 were, at least, never heretofore permitted past the editing sessions. But the level of timbral and articulative distinction in both ensemble and solo components remains unusually high.

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4. Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel 36245.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 9 ("From the New World"). Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel 36246.

Klemperer's integrative gifts achieve spectacular results in music like Bruckner's, where long, and not always equally weighted, spans threaten to wander into perceptual randomness. In particular, the "white" registration of Bruckner's organ-derived orchestration is beautifully realized in this recording, and the larger time units in which essential rhythmic shapes are projected—overlying point-to-point literal reiteration — are immediately and continuously evident. Thus the pacing and dovetailing in both phrasing and instrumental entrances in the slow movement are an especial discovery. Still, this is perhaps the least exploratory of Bruckner's symphonies, and the merely "characteristic" quality of its turns of harmony and sonority often seems more decorative than relationally significant. There remains a considerable subtlety in the movement-to-movement association that is made remarkably apparent in this performance and may be sufficient reward to listeners patient enough to wait for them during the long stretches of internal inactivity.

The Dvorak "New World" Symphony represents, along with the recent recording of the Tchaikowsky Fifth Symphony, Klemperer's most significant contribution to a seriously misunderstood domain of the music literature. For these performances make profound structural sense out of pieces that are usually exploited entirely for their local prettiness, brilliance or orchestral opulence. The real originality of Dvorak's vivid orchestral sonorities is in their primary function as formal articulants; and they "sound" even more stunning when their formal impact is realized. In this light, the way Klemperer evolves a dynamic curve to which every nuance of harmonic, linear and timbral inflection contributes should give a new dimension to most listeners' concept of orchestral virtuosity.

Other new recordings:

BEETHOVEN: Sonatas Nos. 17, 26, 28. Wilhelm Kempff, piano. DGG 138942.

SCHOENBERG: Gurrelieder. Bavarian Radio Orchestra; Rafael Kubelik, cond. DGG 138984/85.

STRAUSS: Daphne. Hilde Gueden, Fritz Wunderlich. Vienna Symphony; Karl Boehm, cond. DGG 138956/57.

VERDI: Quattro Pezzi Sacri. Chorus and Orchestra of the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino; Etorre Gracis, cond. DGG 138962.

WEBER: Piano Sonatas Nos. 3 and 4. Annie D'Arco, piano. L'Oiseau-Lyre SOL 271.

High Office

No man could shoot through that Gray solar glass almost black
And an inch thick up where he is At the top. Even the sun's shafts
Are blunted, turned back.

Must we be mad to want to blast?
To think the beautiful
Should be our rulers, who can stand
In the day's light? Valuable Even in their wounds and worst chance.

But the camouflaged men,
The fish who look out at us
As fish under a brim — If law
Will not let us strike them, still Sense cannot be taught: These must win,

Hypnotising existence.

William Burford

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE HILL

The principals in The Hill, directed by Sidney Lumet from a screen play by Ray Rigby, address one another some 70 per cent of the time at the level of a British parade-ground full bellow. This accords with Mr. Lumet's taste for characterization by excess and it may be accurate enough for a drama set in a Saharan military prison during World War II. But since the actors are customarily 2 feet from the microphone when they launch their blasts, the manner lamentably frustrates communication. Lines so delivered convey little beyond undifferentiated menace.

And that, it seems to me, is the overall fault of the picture. It is keyed to such a pitch of physical violence that any variations of motive or behavior are overwhelmed by the spectacle of spurting blood, reeling bodies and breaking bones. Thus, it seems to make little difference that the regimental sergeant major who runs the prison (the commandant being preoccupied with his Arab whore) is dedicated into pounding what he terms human garbage into splendid British fighting men, whereas his most diligent aide, Guard Williams, is determined simply to beat the semblance of humanity out of any unfortunate who comes under his authority. In either case, the men are treated with a brutality that approaches insanity.

In the absence, then, of a rational conflict in the picture, one tries to settle for a moral. But the thesis that it is improper to send soldiers guilty of various military transgressions out into the desert sun to be driven into coma by an egomaniac sergeant major and his staff of carefully selected sadists is not sufficiently controversial to hold the attention of an audience for two hours.

The situation is the more tantalizing because the ghosts of more relevant dramatic material — ectoplasm apparently from the script—cling to the picture. Thus there seems to be something dubious about the ministrations of the "kindly" guard, whose every arrival on the scene seems to coincide with further abuse of the prisoners, and whose maniacal titter suggests that he is himself well around the bend. And perhaps some interesting plausibility could have been given to the character of the cowardly medical officer (Michael Redgrave) who convulses himself into a lion when confronted with a really venomous threat. It is possible, and usually interesting, to show how a worm that has repeatedly declined to turn will in the end do so, but such character assessments cannot be brought off in an atmosphere of bedlam. Again, there is a theme in the determination of the rocklike hero (Sean Connery) not to be cowed by his hellish jailers—a resolution that subjects not only himself but his cellmates to repeated deliriums of torment, but this too remains unresolved in the smashing and shouting.

There is one moment of drama, as opposed to hippodrome butchery. A soldier from the British West Indies (Ossie Davis), maddened by the racial obscenities flung at him, abruptly resigns from the British army. Stripping off his uniform, he stands naked but for his white shorts (loincloth), assumes the exuberant arrogance of an African chieftain and patronizes the custodial staff with a languid benevolence that paralyzes their aggression. Only for a moment, one may be sure, but it is a moment when issues of character and imagination and wit take the stage away from juggernaut.

A parallel scene in which Connery accuses the sergeant major (Harry Andrews) of being in thrall to an out-of-date set of army regulations seemed to me less successful. Connery calls the rules Victorian; from observing their application, I suspect they would have appalled Tamerlane.

I doubt that The Hill was made, at least deliberately, to pander to the cruelty that lurks in every audience, and I wonder therefore why it was made. Perhaps as a tract seeking to abolish military prisons commanded by lechers and operated by brutes. I'm for that.

TO DIE IN MADRID

Would you suppose that a quarter century had mercifully dulled the poignancy and the cry to conscience of the Spanish Civil War? Do not attend To Die in Madrid in that misapprehension. The people who made the film—Frederic Rossif, who put together the narrative and directed it, Madeleine Chapsal, who wrote the commentary; Helen Scott, who translated it into English; John Geilgud, Irene Worth, William and George Gonneau, who spoke words; Maurice Jarre, whose sco played—all these people who ma still care today as not enough o cared in 1937 and 1938.

I don't want to analyze this f
What is there to say? It is assem with unfailing and unflinching t mostly from contemporary news footage (the cameramen had the courage of their profession). It plays the least possible anger; i clear, unemphatic, dispassionate. It tells the story.

It is a story with too many villa
Franco and Mola, the princes of S ish Catholicism, Mussolini, Hitler, the heads of all the Western pow the oppression of centuries (5, men owned half of Spain)—so m villains that one cannot focus o rage. And the one change tha quarter century has made is tha no longer seems important to do Time has turned the villains triv only the Spaniards remain.

There seem to have been no bat fields in Spain. The people died the fields and in the olive groves, stony pastures, and in the rubble their fragile white towns. Guern now means to us Picasso's pole masterpiece. It was a high-set villa spare and pure of line (from, I s pose, generations of fasting).
Luftwaffe razed it in an afternoo by mistake. It is appalling to see dead flung down amid such cle beauty; but as always when guns turned on the populace, the postu of the living are still more unbeara
And there were so many children Spain.

All civil wars are insanely cruel a man fights his brother with a s cial lust. But this one was bloody yond a nation's predictable capac to torment itself because it beca the proving ground for World War Franco did not win his war; Itali and German mercenaries gave h the victory. He has it still.

I can think of no way to sum a picture which simply shows h Spaniards died for a freedom th had scarcely tasted, and how the p pose, though not the meaning, their sacrifice was nullified. It is picture full of faces, dwellings, mon ments and tended land — all ve beautiful in a terrible time.

Vietnam, I have heard, is beautif
Who are the mercenaries there? I sh be told that the historical analogy not exact, but I shall stand by t analogy of the people.

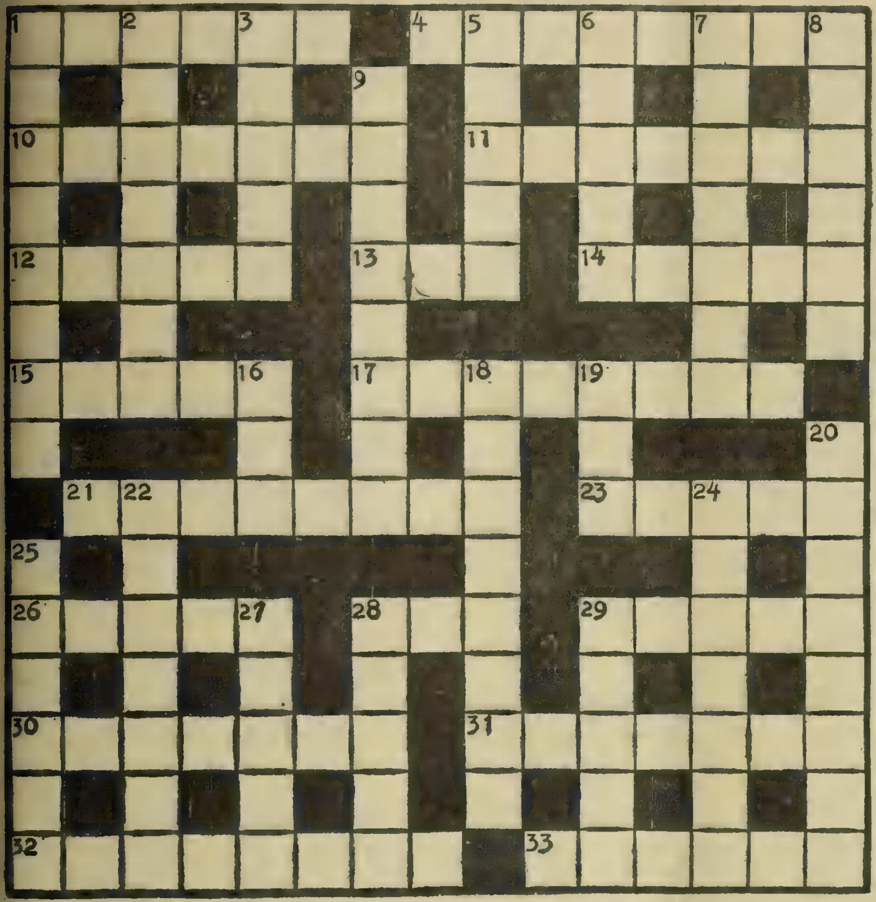
Crossword Puzzle No. 1124

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 and 22 down Material for the picnic tennis-match? (6, 7)
4 Shouts about a girl to go with 3 down. (8)
10 To engage in a lover's quarrel could be dangerous! (4-3)
11 One might call tails a handy substitute for seals. (7)
12 Studs, perhaps, comparatively hard, as they say. (5)
13 This man is a comer on the stage.
14 and 20 down Is the tunny a quadruped sea-creature? (5, 8)
15 The heart? Naturally, console with it. (5)
17 Over-advertise the dance with fungi.
21 The position of the last horse might cause an expression of surprise and censure. (5, 3)
23 Dance composition of drum, banjo and rhythm. (5)
26 It could be O.K., as a variety of port. (5)
29 By the sound of it, have a care for ruin. (5)
30 After nine, they're extra. (7)
31 One shouldn't really make a pronouncement that the poet seems even more funny. (7)
32 Yellow reed associated with California or Alaska-Canada. (4, 4)
33 Began in trouble, with a number from the divided province. (6)

DOWN:

1 How a switch might go occasionally. (3, 3, 2)
2 Lists might imply it, either way.
3 An absence of approval of secluded areas. (5)
5 Take away someone's weapon? (5)
6 and 25 down Next to this, the sound of a 14 gets tedious. (11)
7 Befitting the manner of an emperor, if missing a way to endanger things. (7)
8 Suffices aces, hopefully. (6)
9 Negus is important here. (8)
16 Born military leader, as Napoleon might say! (3)
18 Duck this autumn, if you want to find it! (One might be prone to do so.) (4, 4)
19 and 28 across An owl might be, as the McCarran Act is supposed to. (6)
24 Browning's was at night. (7)
27 Biblical or comic character. (5)
28 God's last words might be on file.
29 How 14 finishes a twig. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1123

ACROSS: 1 Roadblocks; 6 Spot; 10 Appease; 11 Enhance; 12 Pain; 13 Redemption; 15 Ratchet; 16 Sirocco; 17 Instead; 20 Peasant; 22 Negligence; 23 Mere; 25 Envious; 26 Rossini; 27 Teal; 28 Crater Lake. DOWN: 1 Reapportionment; 2 Appoint; 3 Bear; 4 Overeat; 5 Keepers; 7 Pontiac; 8 The end of the line; 9 Chaparral; 14 Sheet iron; 18 Segovia; 19 Dreiser; 20 Pack rat; 21 America; 24 User.

PUBLICATIONS

Fun to Read

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E. Washington, D.C. 20002

Just out!

The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

BOOKS
AND PERIODICALS FROM THE CHINESE MAINLAND (in English)

Literary, scientific, political, children's and art books. Subscriptions taken for all Chinese magazines. Catalog available upon request. CHINA PUBLICATIONS, 95 Fifth Ave. (cor. 17 St.) N.Y. 10003 Tel.: (212) 924-1132. Open from 9 a.m. to [illegible] p.m.

ART

ORIGINAL ART COSTS LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! GRAPHIC CIRCLE offers you contemporary original signed lithographs, etchings, woodcuts for $3.00 monthly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Free Brochure — Graphic Circle, Dept. NA, 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

PERSONALS

Bumper Stickers—MAKE LOVE NOT WAR —50c each; 5 for $2.00, from STUDENT UNION FOR PEACE ACTION, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

BOSTONIANS: Hear Carey McWilliams speak on "Johnson's Great Society," Sunday, October 31, 10:45 A.M. Conservatory Auditorium, 31 Hemenway St. Community Church of Boston program.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion—which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you as a bonus copy upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION's portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my bonus issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME________________________

ADDRESS________________________

CITY____________ STATE____________ ZIP No.________

10-25-65

NOV 1 1965

AVANT-GARDES: Elisabeth Mann Borgese

THE
NATION

November 1, 1965 . . 35c

NOTES ON THE TORONTO TEACH-IN
The Irrelevance of Morality

Robert H. Welker

Profits vs. Engineering
THE CORVAIR STORY

RALPH NADER

Latin America
CONTINENT ON A TEETERBOARD

Donald D. Ranstead

LETTERS

Facts vs. theories

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: It is no doubt true, as Christopher Lasch approvingly quotes Robert Parris as saying ["New Curriculum for Teach-Ins," The Nation, Oct. 18], that an excessive preoccupation with facts defeats itself. But to center the debate on Vietnam on theories, to the exclusion of facts, gives no greater assurance of "victory," for just as each side has corresponding (and conflicting) facts, so will each side have corresponding (and conflicting) theories.

The confrontation or testing of theories, one with another, is, to be sure, operating at a formally equivalent level of argument, but if one is to hope to win the debate (which in this case probably means convincing an otherwise unconvinced audience, if not the opposition) one must ultimately have recourse to facts. . . .

None of this is meant to belittle the very profound problem of how to convince a largely apathetic public that what is being done in its name is horribly wrong. The two approaches under consideration seem to stress in the one case the horror, in the other the wrong. Ezra Shahn

Primitives as people

Baltimore, Md.

Dear Sirs: In "Facts of Life on the African Plain" [The Nation, June 21], Mr. James Wellard does grave injustice to a talented and honest author by grossly misreading her book. He is ponderously condescending in his assumption of either naive error or dubious presentation in Elizabeth Marshall Thomas' Warrior Herdsmen. Since this is as misplaced as it is offensive, I wish to record, on the basis of three years' professional anthropological field work in that area, that her description of the Dodoth is both reliable and perceptive.

To make matters worse, Mr. Wellard bases his inept appraisal on a completely erroneous view of what an anthropologist's business is. Contrary to his assumption, it is not "the first duty of the anthropologist . . . to recognize that squalor, ignorance, cruelty, greed, indifference to suffering and the quasi-enslavement of the weak . . . cannot be glossed over." These are merely the pious distorting simplicities of a century ago. Anthropology now is not concerned with evaluative simplifications (whether for or against primitive life) but with objective representation of a descriptive or analytic kind. Moreover, its practitioners approach primitive communities with a fundamental assumption that here are human beings not unlike ourselves, conducting their lives in intelligible terms according to statable premises and perceptible goals.

The ultimately disturbing feature of Mr. Wellard's stance, however, is its implication that "primitives" are definable in terms of moral, emotional and intellectual deficiencies. The Dodoth, for him, can satisfactorily be presented as tyrants snatching pop bottles from their victims, cruel adults removing children's teeth with awls, cattle bandits perpetrating "unpleasant tricks in their petty war." But this registers a comprehensive failure to perceive the humanity of beings who have habits different from our own. The truth (among many others) is rather that there are no petty wars for those engaged in them; that spearing children to get cattle is precisely as horrifying as dropping atom bombs on Japanese children to secure democracy; that each is equally adequate (or not) for defining the society where it occurs. We are all people, Mr. Wellard. However we look, we are all human. Whatever our technology, we are all complex. If we are ever to understand and deal charitably with one another, it must be in those complex and human terms.

Neville Dyson-Hudson
Department of Social Relations
The John Hopkins University

Deprivation

Hamilton, O.

Dear Sirs: Each week the government releases the heartening news that we are making splendid progress in depopulating Southeast Asia, and have slaughtered quite a few people who were guilty of looking very much like Communists from the air. They then, however, are apt to spoil the effect by admitting—a little sheepishly—that the total has not been fully confirmed by a body count. It is intolerable that we should be denied the comfort of a body count: can one really enjoy a war without it? William Palmer Taylor

Anger of Ike

Toronto, Can.

Dear Sirs: Recently, former President Eisenhower stated that he strongly disapproved of public demonstrations against U.S. policy in Vietnam. "What do they know about it?" he said with his eyes flashing, according to the A.P.

Eisenhower assumes that the American people do not know and, in fact, have no right to know about the war in Vietnam. . . . [He] has shown a complete disregard for the democratic process, a dangerous disregard which is indicative of present American politics. John Ayre

THE
NATIO

Monday, November 1, 1965
Volume 201, No. 14

In this issue

EDITORIALS

289

ARTICLES

292 Latin America:
Continent on a Teeterboa
Donald D. Ranstead

295 Profits vs. Engineering:
The Corvair Story
Ralph Nader

301 Notes on the Toronto Teach
The Irrelevance of Morali
Robert H. Welker

304 Recompense for Violence
Jennifer Cross

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

306 Virgilian Whodunit
Richard Howard

307 Invisible Man
Paul Zweig

310 The Substance of Spirit
Harold Clurman

311 After Sedley, After Pound
Donald Davie

313 Letter from Rome
Elisabeth Mann Borgese

314 My Hand, My Legs,
The Boss Hires (poems)
Charles Simic

316 Films
Robert Hatch

316 Acropolis, A Dream Like W
A Bird (poems)
William Gerchow

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 31
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Warren Miller, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry

Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Nov. 1, 1965. Vol. 201, N

The Nation is published weekly (except in and August, when biweekly) by The N Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Av New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class po paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two y $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is quired for change of address, which canno made without the old address as well as the

Information to Libraries: The Nation is ind in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Review Digest and the Public Affairs Info tion Service.

EDITORIALS

he Honor and the Hazard

The protest parades and demonstrations of the Oc- ber 16 weekend came off well. The turn-outs were ·ge––in New York City well above the organizers' vance estimate of 10,000––and a broad spectrum opinion was represented. To the disappointment of e photographers, attacks on the demonstrators, East ıast and West, were few and mostly inconsequential. a first attempt to orchestrate a nation-wide protest ainst the Johnson Administration's role in South- st Asia, the occasion was highly successful.

But if any of the participants joined this move- ·nt under the lighthearted impression that they uld persist in this course without risk or penalty of y kind, the reaction of the government and the press dicated that as the situation develops, courage will needed not only on the battlefield, but here at me. However moderate and reasonable protest may . the protesters will be called draft dodgers, slackers, wards, Communists, and traitors. A certain amount abuse will come from respectable quarters, includ- ; some of the churches, as well as from hoodlums d frenzied patriots. That official stigmatization will t be lacking was shown by the release on Oc- ıer 13 of the report of the Eastland-Dodd Internal curity subcommittee: "The Anti-Vietnam Agitation d the Teach-In Movement," subtitled "The Prob- n of Communist Infiltration and Exploitation." As · overt acts, however symbolic, the maximum sen- ıce for draft-card burning—five years in prison and 510,000 fine—is a harbinger of how rash transgres- rs will fare.

Whatever the future may bring, the protesters al- ıdy have the consolation of being taken seriously. at is not because the movement is, at this stage, real threat to the prosecution of the war. The Ad- nistration and the war hawks whose thinking now minates it are looking ahead. This is already a od-sized war, and it is going to get bigger. If Pen- ;on aims are to be realized, it is going to be ong war. It is a dirty war now, and it is going to get ·tier, if that is possible. Any nucleus of opposition therefore dangerous; like the war itself, it is likely grow. Nor can anyone guarantee that other wars, ewhere, may not spring up as suddenly as the not- -settled trouble in Santo Domingo. What we are tnessing now is massive prophylaxis against mas- e future opposition.

It is important, on all these counts, for the dis- ıters to know what they are doing, and why they doing it. Most of the accusations that are flung them are motivated either by political expediency by passion. In neither case can reason avail; as stice Brandeis said, "War kills all love of truth." asonable arguments, however, must be weighed.

n the October 17 New York Times, James Reston made the point that opposition to our course in Vietnam was justified as long as President Johnson refused to define our war aims and rejected negotiation; but that since his Johns Hopkins offer to negotiate, opposition encourages Hanoi to prolong the fighting and so is self-defeating. Before writing this column, Reston should have read William Beecher's long article, "Vietnam Turnabout," in the October 14 Wall Street Journal. Beecher shows conclusively that, in proportion as the war goes better for our side, our interest in negotiation slackens. (The Nation made the same point editorially in "The Bigger War," October 18.) Unremitting opposition to the war is the only force that will keep the idea of negotiation from being completely smothered. The average citizen, conditioned as he is, takes a purely opportunistic attitude. When the war goes better, his passion for victory rises. The polls show this mechanism clearly. Only a determined, vocal minority can counterbalance the perpetual alliance of the directors of "national interest" and their unthinking followers.

A parallel argument — that the leaders in North Vietnam are really convinced that a majority of Americans are on their side—is one of those fictions that can be propagated only in wartime. If Ho Chi Minh and General Giap can read the stories about the demonstrations, they can also read the figures in the polls. Their thanks to the demonstrators are gratuitous: the opposition is not for their sake, but for the sake of the United States. If Americans may not protest the bombings because North Vietnam also protests them, total conformity is the only course left. Opposition must and will continue. It will be intensified. Victory in a war such as the United States is waging in Vietnam would demean our country more than defeat. That is the crux of the opposition. In the words of Ernst Bacon, professor emeritus at Syracuse University, this generation "has the honor, no less than the hazard, to lead perhaps the most significant peace movement in history." That movement will not be crushed.

The Long Pull

The chances are that the Vietnam war will neither be wholly won nor wholly lost but, partly because of rising internal opposition, will eventually end in a precarious peace which will satisfy neither side. The goal of the United States is clearly one of maintaining the encirclement and ostracism of Communist China; to this end, the Pacific Ocean is to be mare nostrum and we are to hold on to the formidable bases we have established in South Vietnam. Thus the problem of American policy in Asia transcends the present conflict and will remain after its close, however far off that may be.

It follows that various kinds of opposition have a place. Those of military age, and inclined to histrionics, can burn their draft cards, and since they will go to jail their action is not without dignity. However, the political significance of such gestures is limited, not only because few will resort to it but because martyrdom requires neither thought nor talent. More realistic groups, such as the "New Left" Students for a Democratic Society, are in a position to exert greater influence, but they will suffer defections as their leaders are pilloried by the investigating committees and the university administrations assist in the crack-downs. A more mature, less vulnerable, and probably longer-lived group is ARFEP — Americans for Reappraisal of Far Eastern Policy. Its national headquarters is at Yale (404 Yale Station, New Haven 06520), it has area directors at universities all over the country, and its national committee of non-student members is so studded with well-known names — Roger Baldwin, John Bennett, Mrs. Helen Buttenwieser, John Hersey, Rollo May, Harold Taylor, Norman Thomas among others—that the J. Edgar Hoovers, Eastlands, Dodds, et al., will be hard put to redbait it into silence.

The present purpose of ARFEP is to promote a negotiated settlement in Vietnam. It calls for an immediate cease-fire by both sides, preferably to be administered by the United Nations and to serve as a prelude to unconditional negotiations "which should include all parties involved in the conflict"—meaning the Vietcong. Further, the United States should announce its readiness to negotiate toward recognition of the People's Republic of China and its admission to the UN. And the United States should "declare its readiness to join China in projects of mutual advantage and concern, including establishment of controls over the production and testing of nuclear weapons and the end of special restrictions on trade, communications, and exchange of personnel."

In short, a complete and, for the present, politically inconceivable reversal of policy as administered by President Johnson and his three predecessors — although President Truman did send General Marshall to China in an effort to reconcile the winning Communists and the losing Kuomintang before the civil war between them reached total victory and total defeat. But the proposals, although not new, are put forward anew by an organization which will not be easily shoved around. It should serve as a rallying point for university students and faculty members who, though not of the Left, find present American policy headed for ultimate disaster. And not just these elements alone. Plenty of impeccable American industrial and financial leaders, as well as leaders of farm, labor and civic organizations, are convinced of the need to reappraise American policy in the Far East. Sooner or later "protest" politics must always move into the phase of political persuasion based on the discussion of alternatives to existing policies. Formation of ARFEP represents, therefore, a real "breakthrough" in the discussion of policy alternatives; it merits the widest measure of public support.

Ditched Again

Washington's pork-barrel engineers, determined make this planet as crisscrossed with canals as Ma is only one step — Senate approval — away from t biggest and rawest victory of them all: a half-billio dollar barge canal from Dallas to the Gulf of Mexic which is an uncertain distance as the boondoggle fli but roughly 250 miles.

Nothing will stop it. Certainly reason and logic w not, as Sen. William Proxmire proved this sessi when he spoke out against that more modest pie of pork, the Cross-Florida Barge Canal, a mere 10 mile project that will cost the federal governme only $145 million.

The Senate-House Conference Committee specifi that no money will be appropriated for the Dalla Gulf canal until the Army Corps of Engineers su mits a re-evaluation of its economic justification.
though that were some kind of precaution!

The Corps re-evaluated the Florida canal, too. Twe ty-three years ago the Florida canal was authoriz by Congress as a way to avoid sending merchant shi past the submarines waiting off the tip of Florid
Then, realizing this was a plan born more of pan than wisdom, Congress forgot about it. But land pr motors in Florida didn't. The Corps' wartime stu showed the building of the canal would have an u economical benefit-cost ratio of 1.05 to 1. To the e of the Eisenhower administration the Corps stuck that. But in 1962 it boosted the benefit-cost ratio an attractive 1.20 to 1.

It did this by estimating the probable cost to 13.5 per cent less than the cost would have been du ing the war—although all construction costs in t nation had risen an estimated 32 per cent in t interim. And aside from a masterful job of juggli prospective interest rates, the Corps developed its fi ures by increasing the value of the shore-line land th would result from the canal, but without deducting t loss of property that would be flooded!

If the Corps can re-evaluate like that for Florid think what it can do for Big Daddy and—as they c Dallas down his way—for Big D.

Same Old HUAC

Over a large part of the South, murder goes u punished, as long as the victims are rebellious N groes or whites who join them in civil rights struggle
This immunity of criminals has shamed the Unit States among its own law-abiding citizens, and amo those nations of the world that are not openly raci Accordingly, the more prudent segregationists ha come to see it as a peril to their continued politic dominance. That, and nothing else, explains the sh of the House Un-American Activities Committee fro twenty-seven years of Red-hunting to its current p occupation with the Ku Klux Klan.

Investigating committees are an essential tool
the Congress, for the purpose of originating legisl

on, not for sensationalism, circuses or persecution. his process has been perverted by HUAC and its gnates in the Senate. On the record, these committes are beyond redemption. As long as they remain existence, they are a standing threat to American litical freedom and common political morality. The ly remedy is to abolish them. Those who know the story and the purpose of these bodies will not change eir opinion of them one iota because, for the devious asons characteristic of them, they are now putting a grandstand play with the Klan instead of with mmunists or progressives.

A slight and passing benefit may be found in holdg the Klan up to ridicule or, possibly, in exposing few Southern cops who have formally joined it. one of this can weigh against the harm HUAC has ne and will continue to do. Everyone knows that e Klan membership is the scum of the South. What rther exposure is necessary? Nor do its victims need forum; the entire nation—indeed the entire world has heard their stories just as it has read of the urders committed by Klansmen. Few victims will obably brave the dangers of testifying in Washingn in any case. Smart segregationists are not memrs of the present ragged mob (although their grandthers may have been), and they will carry on as fore, after the investigation. If any criminals are ught, the existing law-enforcement agencies should ve brought them to justice long ago. The South has vs against murder, and the Mosaic code existed fore these laws. If the South wishes to cleanse itf, all it need do is enforce the laws. In the 1870s d again in the 1920s, Congressional investigations ght to discredit the Klan and may have had some dency to stunt its growth, but in both instances it s finally checked because the citizens decided to put top to its lawless depredations by lawful means. As g as Southern opinion is indifferent—as long as is willing to sanction the terrorism of the Klan— outrage against the dignity of the United States l persist. HUAC remains what President Truman e called it, "the most un-American thing in the ntry," and no one should be fooled by the present nge of costume.

erils of Omnipotence

Omnipotence is a rich but fragile garment—give tweak and the seams split. J. Edgar Hoover and minions are presently suffering this dishevelment the hands of Rex Stout, whose Nero Wolfe detec- stories have entertained the American reading lic since well before World War II. In The Door- l Rang (Viking), the twenty-second novel in the ies, a woman who has distributed copies of Fred Cook's The FBI Nobody Knows among her friends ls that she is being harassed by the G-men and s Wolfe to rid her of the nuisance. This he does h a thoroughness so humiliating that Hoover him- is goaded into seeking a private interview with obese sleuth. Alas, he has forgotten that Wolfe sees strangers only by appointment and he is turned away at the door.

Lest anyone think that he is hiding behind the notoriously autocratic manners of his hero, Stout gave a prepublication interview to the Sunday Herald Tribune in which he called the FBI "an outrageous outfit" and termed their censoring of movie and TV scripts "goddam impudence and arrogance." He also characterized Hoover as a megalomaniac "enemy of democracy" who grows "sillier and sillier." Asked whether he expected "trouble" as a result of The Doorbell Rang, Stout guessed that the FBI hadn't yet become that silly.

This sort of thing is devastating to a man like Hoover who has presumed to place himself and his organization beyond criticism. When The Nation originally published Fred Cook's study as a special issue, Hoover may have smarted in private, but publicly he could save face among his admirers by implying that he would not take notice of a journal whose political views he deplored. That tack will scarcely work in this instance. Stout has not attacked Hoover; he has simply called him down as he would any servant (in this case a public servant) who had forgotten who employed him (in this case all of us). Omnipotence cannot survive such treatment. And yet we predict that nothing will happen to Rex Stout (except that his new book will sell very well indeed), and America may now awaken to the fact that J. Edgar Hoover bears a striking resemblance to King Log of the fable.

The Silence of the Bar

For the moment, something like a complete dead end has been reached in the problem of the all-white Southern jury. The failure of the Alabama Supreme Court to disqualify eleven prospective jurors for self-acknowledged racial bias, in the Hayneville case, means that still another "not guilty" verdict is to be anticipated. Such verdicts, of course, preclude the possibility of redress. At the same time, little progress is being made in the various efforts to enjoin pending criminal prosecutions until more representative juries can be selected. Predictably, therefore, public pressure is building up nationally in support of various proposals to extend federal criminal jurisdiction over certain offenses. For example, the Southern Conference Educational Fund has proposed that it should be a federal offense to injure or kill a person because of his color, his civil rights activities or his exercise of other constitutional rights. But even if federal criminal jurisdiction were extended in some such fashion, the problem of Southern juries would remain. To be sure, more representative juries might be chosen, the prosecution would be more vigorous, and the prospects of a true trial might be improved. But federal criminal jurisdiction should not be extended if it can be avoided. What, then, can be done?

A small but important step forward might be taken if the organized bar could, by some miracle, be induced to recognize that it has a responsibility in the matter. That it is responsible is clear enough. Lawyers are not spectators of the judicial process; they are officers of the court and have specific obligations to assist in the administration of justice. In the counties and states where the all-white jury problem exists, there are lawyers who recognize the dangers implicit in any situation that tends to discredit the administration of justice. The performance of State Attorney Richmond M. Flowers in Alabama is a case in point. But individual lawyers are not likely to act and, where they have taken creditable positions, they have been driven from their practices. The problem is one the organized bar of the nation. How long can American Bar Association, for example, continue ignore the harassment of Southern lawyers who h honored, under very difficult circumstances, t oath to support and defend the Constitution? Le Francis X. Morrissey get into its limited range of in est and the American Bar Association will roar lik lion; but when all that is involved is the integrity the judicial process itself, the lion retreats into cage.

LATIN AMERICA

Continent on a Teeterboard . .

Donald D. Ranstea

> In the short run a non-military answer to subversion does not exist.
> Rep. Dante B. Fascell (D., Fla.), A.P. Sept. 20

> Military intervention to smash communism succeeds only in smashing the popular movement.
> Father Roger Vekeman, S.J. (Sociologist and adviser to Chilean President Eduardo Frei), Channel 9 TV, Santiago de Chile, July 19

> The Achilles' heel of this nation is Central and South America.
> Rep. Daniel Flood (D., Pa.). A.P. Sept. 20

> I have always condemned . . . the ideological counseling that the North Americans feel called upon to exercise on our peoples, in spite of not knowing or understanding them.
> Chilean Senator Francisco Bulnes (Conservative), Ercilla, Sept. 15

Santiago de Chile

Before those USIS films arrived in South America showing the Marines dispensing chocolate bars to grateful children in the streets of Santo Domingo, at least one of the continent's artists expressed his feeling of horror of that "security" action. The canvas, now hanging prominently in Santiago de Chile's leading gallery, is entitled "Santo Domingo, Mayo 65"; it may not be another "Guernica," but it does manage to convey the same message to concerned democrats.

Anxiety in South America has grown appreciably these past six months in all but the ruling circles of military regimes. Since April 28, the split among the ten independent countries between those whose civil governments enjoy popular support in varying degrees and those which are gorila (military) regimes has widened. The line-up shows four countries—Brazil, Paraguay, Bolivia and Ecuador—as undemocratic in any meaning of the word. Few of the continent's democrats or intellectuals would agree with President Johnson's characterization of the coup of April, 1964, in Brazil and the junta which has since been in power as one of the "three positive events" in the first four years of the Alliance for Progress. Semi-democratic Argentina, Peru, Colombia and Venezuela, all of which have recently experienced relatively free elections, exist precariously and under threat primarily from gorilas on the Right, but also from intransigent activists of the extreme Left. Only Chile and Uruguay enjoy democracy in the American Civil Liberties Union sense of the word.

This "line-up" also cuts across boundary lines and splits the various countries themselves, especially within the "precarious four." The issue on which it thus divides the continent is how best to deal with popular discontent and/or "subversion." The responses range from "hard" Brazil to "soft" Chile. Brazil has made clear since its cooperation in the OAS force in Santo Domingo that it believes there should be a permanent Inter-American Peace Force. Foreign Minister Vasco Leito da Cunha put it dramatically in mid-June: "Through the concept of ideological frontier, the frontiers of Brazil can be extended, as U. S. frontiers are extended in lation to Berlin." He further cl fied the matter by saying that "d ger of subversion" is "promo from outside" Latin America a that the "most clear proofs of t aggression were in Cuba and Dominican Republic."

By the end of August he was claring that his country sym thized with Portugal's difficulties containing "subversion" in its A can colonies. Clearly the Brazili gorilas see themselves as the C sacks of two continents. Not unj tifiably, therefore, when Brazil bl ters about the (undeniable) f that democratic Uruguay "tolerat within its borders followers of President Goulart, as well as dom tic "subversion," that small nati grows extremely anxious. And B zil's reactionary press has repeate predicted that Chile's Presid Eduardo Frei would soon foll Goulart into the "ash can of histor

Perhaps that is because Chil new Christian Democratic Presid has provided the most articulate joinder to Brazil's position. On J 24, for instance, he described "vast popular movement seeki profound change" in Latin Amer and stressed that though there w Communist groups within t ground swell it was nevertheless healthy movement. Most importa ly, he stressed that "it would very dangerous if this single f [of Communist penetration] c tributed to a policy which wo place all popular movements un suspicion of being Communis When Chile's Foreign Minister, briel Valdés, stated recently bef

---

Donald D. Ranstead, an American lecturer in history, has been teaching in a Santiago private school for the past year and a half. He has published articles on Latin America in Commonweal, The New Republic and elsewhere.

e UN Assembly that just as the l Holy Alliance tried in vain to ipede progress, in order to defend worn-out system, so would any w one be doomed to failure, there is little doubt that he had the ojected Peace Force in mind.

There are many arguments ainst such a force besides that fered by Chile's Chief Executive that reactionary governments ill feel each day more secure in eir power," being convinced that e Marines will come to their aid ien they characterize the opposi- n to their excesses as "Communist bversion." Such a force, given the ntinent's present division, would ike the projected Common Market ll-nigh impossible, since such ar- igements presuppose mutual ist and scrupulous observance of e principle of nonintervention. ien again, the military approach vays engenders an oversimplified nedy for complex social and nomic issues and a disdain of pular feeling.

Most disastrously, the cost is inous. Quite literally, the choice between President Frei's "Revolu- in en Libertad" or being saddled th gigantic arms budgets. Ger- n Chancellor Erhard told Gabriel ldés last July that he could not derstand how the underdeveloped untries of Latin America could eam of spending up to 30 per nt of their national budgets on ns. When one recognizes that the ss income of all of Latin America a mere 10 per cent of that of the iited States, the full enormity of buying just one modern bomber becomes apparent. The price of a single bomber could pay the total salary of 250,000 schoolteachers for one year in Chile. (Argentina has just purchased fifty Sky Hawks from the United States.) Finally, and all too reminiscently for North American liberals, reliance on police responses to "subversion" encourages rampant witch hunts. Father Vekeman of Chile put it succinctly when he declared: "The Johnson doctrine . . . is a type of neo-McCarthyism applied to the geopolitical interests of the United States."

Peru, one of the most teetering of the "precarious four," has been plagued by small bands of leftist guerrillas since last June. Two elements have an interest in exaggerating the importance of these bands: the Movement of the Revolutionary Left itself (MIR) and the reactionary opposition to the mildly reformist President Fernando Belaunde. The U. S. wire services have consistently characterized the MIR as "Communist," though A.P.'s "Man in Lima" must be aware that both the "Chinese" and "Moscow" Communists of that unfortunate country have condemned the uprising as "premature" and "adventurist." Luis de la Puente's MIR has disparaged in print these "old-line" organizations. Meanwhile, and predictably, the Right (which controls Parliament and most of the press) has accused the President of being "soft" on communism and is whipping up a first-class Red scare — investigating "subversion" in the universities and the like. Belaunde's attempt to minimize the actual military threat of the MIR has been seized upon by the local McCarthyites. This element speaks of the President's naïveté and clamors for arrests of well-known urban radicals — there have even been demands for the President's resignation. In the midst of this controversy, last August, the State Department saw fit to proclaim that of the countries of this hemisphere, Peru was second only to the Dominican Republic (!) as regards an internal threat of "Communist subversion." This declaration hardly helped Belaunde and his small band of beleaguered liberals. Naturally a U. S. military mission of Vietnam veterans is there to "cooperate" in putting down the rather pathetic group of rebels, and the French wire service has affirmed that napalm has been employed. Is anyone in the United States protesting (or even aware) that the death penalty is provided for captured guerrillas or for anyone aiding them? What if Fidel had made a like announcement!

A rightist coup in Peru would be a disaster from the point of view of Chile and all democrats of South America. One doubts if it would make page 3 two days running in The New York Times. A favorite liberal phrase in the United States has it that rightist dictators are "just as bad" as those of the Left. One wonders if they might have the courage—and intelligence—to join President Frei in asserting: "Communism is not as great a danger as a coup from the Right which hinders the progress and emancipation of Latin America." Until they can bring themselves to agree, they will always feel ambivalent about hemispheric "peace" forces. Considerably more than 200,000 Cuban refugees are now in the United States under the law providing solace for victims of Communist police states. The economic and political conditions in Paraguay, which has one-fourth the population of Cuba, are such that some 600,000 have chosen or been forced into exile in neighboring countries. Is there any talk of changing the law to include victims of reactionary regimes? Until there is, Latin America's liberals can only wonder at the strange mental world U.S. liberals live in. Yet liberals from both regions may rest assured that Paraguay's Caudillo, General Alfredo Stroessner, is not being neglected by some elements in the States: twenty of the leading functionaries of Paraguay's security police (reread Our Man in Havana for a description of the type) have been especially trained in counter-subversive techniques by the FBI in Washington.

La Prensa, Mexico; Ben Roth

President Johnson described the program of the Alliance on its fourth anniversary as the most important event in the hemisphere since 1492 (that's how it read in Spanish!), but the staunchly conservative pro-U.S. Mercurio of Santiago de Chile took a less hyperbolic view. In a diffident editorial on August 15 it sadly noted that foreign aid toward "military defense of the continent" was replacing aid for economic purposes and that this represented a "new factor of weakness" in the program of change as originally conceived. The "maintenance of the internal order, whether or not that order is democratic," seems to be the end result of four years of the Alliance. When the Haitian Ambassador to the OAS can speak, as he did last July, of the threat of subversion to the free and democratic institutions of the nations of the hemisphere and receive only applause, one must sadly agree with Mercurio.

The United States, being the greatest status quo power since Rome, would be hard put to perceive "genuine popular movements" under the best of circumstances. Wealth and complacency go together, along with varying degrees of Angst at the presence of "barbarians at the gates." One might have predicted that Time's Latin American editions would carry no news of President Frei's remarkably successful European trip of last July, but Italy's Foreign Minister was not being naive when he assured his Chilean counterpart that the dispatches of United States wire services had led him to believe that objections to American intervention in Santo Domingo came only from the extreme Left.

The United States presents two images to its southern neighbors. The first is that of eager, well-intentioned Peace Corps youths, doing their mite in rural and urban slums, the sending of relief to victims of earthquakes, and U.S. ambassadors opening new schools made possible by U.S. funds. The other picture is not so pleasant and a bit blurred: operating schools to train officers of gorila regimes in "counter-insurgency" techniques, insisting that OAS countries break all ties with Cuba regardless of how they perceive their own national interests, but above all, stressing the need for "order." The Pentagon is not alone in displaying this conservative psychology. The Inter-American Affairs Department of the AFL-CIO has been obstreperous from the beginning in its defense of the Santo Domingo intervention. By the end of August, its director had the presumption to declare that Dominican workers were ready to support "whatever provisional government is acceptable to the . . . OAS." Presumably he received his "information" from the CIA. It is fortunate for American industrial workers that the CIO was not so compliant toward the powers that be twenty-five years ago.

General Juan Carlos Onganía, Argentina's number one gorila, recently proclaimed that his country's army would stand shoulder to shoulder with Brazil's in the "never-ending struggle" to stamp out "subversion" anywhere on the continent. (The speech caused some embarrassment because neither the President nor parliament had been told of it beforehand—an oversight typical of political life in a "precarious democracy.") General Onganía visited Chile on the occasion of that country's Armed Forces Day (September 19), and one can only conjecture at the shock he must have suffered during Monseñor Rafael Maroto's sermon in the National Cathedral. The Monseñor, speaking of the Chilean democratic tradition, included Luis Reabarren, founder of the country's Communist party, in his list of Chile's "greats."

Generally the first question U.S. citizens ask on arriving in a Latin American country is: "Is there much of a Communist danger here?" —"Communist" and "danger" being usually run together as one word. (They seldom ask: How do the majority of the people live and do they enjoy civil liberties?) The fact that Chile has the largest Communist party in Latin America, with an active press, not to speak of five Senators, should frighten people convinced of the wisdom of the Johnson doctrine. Yet after these people have lived in Chile for a time they are no longer alarmed (similarly, Italy's Communists do not deter U.S. citizens from visiting that country in the millions). There are, then, Communists and Communi
And there are radical grou throughout South America t seem to behave like Communis but are not. One wonders what "terrible simplifiers" (Commun and anti-Communist) make of B zil's recent attempt to negotiate $250 million loan in Moscow.

As long as people like Jua Castro, who lectures HUAC on Red menace south of the border a eagerly endorses the "principle" intervention, are looked to as perts, the United States Congr will do foolish things. The House Representatives (and one is afr that they are representative in th view of subversion in the her sphere) evidently disagrees w Samuel Johnson. The legislat seemed to have been "filling" stead of "clearing" their minds cant before they passed on Septe ber 20 that peculiar resolution dorsing the unilateral use of for by the United States or by any oth Western Hemisphere country to p vent a Communist take-over an where in the hemisphere. Even t Brazilian press wondered what h possessed these Congressmen make such a declaration on the e of the OAS conference. To decla unilateral intervention a "righ without even seeing the necessity amending the OAS Charter (not mention that of the UN), w strange enough, but to reaffirm t principles of the Monroe Doctri in 1965 strikes all literate Sou Americans as positively weird. N being in a position to know, here
Chile, one nevertheless suspects th Pravda's protest was the one play up in the United States. The tru important fact is that the parl ments of Colombia, Venezuela, Pe Uruguay and Chile all emphatica rejected the House resolution.
the six stable and "precarious" mocracies, only Argentina neglect to condemn officially the "feeli of the House." The Christian Dem cratic President of Chile's low house spoke for millions when asserted that only if the Unit States Government and State D partment "firmly and openly co tradict the Resolution" can some the damage be undone. But wh that oft-postponed OAS conferen does meet on November 17, in R de Janiero, the United States w have at least four South Americ countries on its side—they have parliaments.

Profits vs. Engineering

THE CORVAIR STORY . . . . Ralph Nader

August of 1961, Mrs. Rose Pierini st her left arm when the 1961 hevrolet Corvair she was driving rned turtle just beyond the San arcos overpass on Hollister Street Santa Barbara, Calif. Exactly irty-four months later, in the same ty, General Motors decided to pay rs. Pierini $70,000 rather than ntinue a trial which for three days ad threatened to expose on the blic record certain driving char- teristics of their brand-new auto- obile.

Mrs. Pierini's experience with a rvair that went suddenly out control was not unique. Too any Corvairs of this model have own such inclinations for her case be singular. What was distinctive out the "accident" was the at- mpt to find the cause of it on the sis of investigation, instead of re- rting to the customary practice of tomatically blaming the driver.

As described by a California High- ay Patrol officer, John Bortolozzo, ho witnessed the flip-over while otoring in the opposite direction, e Pierini vehicle was traveling out 35 miles per hour in a 35- ph zone in the right lane headed ward Goleta. He saw the car move ward the right side of the road ar the shoulder and then "all of sudden the vehicle made a sharp t to the left and swerved over." rtolozzo testified at the trial that rushed over to the wreck and th two other men helped Mrs. erini out of the vehicle while try- g to stop the torrent of blood ishing forth from the stub of her m. She was very calm, observed rtolozzo, only saying that "some- ing went wrong with my steer- g."

The officer made a check of the hicle while it was on its top. He ticed that the left rear tire was flated. Looking at the road, he ticed some gouge marks made by e metal rim of the left rear tire. gave his opinion at the trial that e distinctive design features of the Corvair caused it to go out of control and flip over as had other Corvairs in accidents he had investigated. It was during the cross-examination of Officer Bortolozzo by defense lawyers that General Motors decided to settle the case.

Up to this point no engineering experts had been called to testify by plaintiff Pierini, but already the case had been going badly for General Motors. Two members of the respected California Highway Patrol had taken direct aim on the Corvair design. One of them, Charles Hanna, mentioned a confidential circular put out by the highway patrol which dealt with handling hazards of certain rear-engine cars, including the Corvair. Hanna, a fourteen-year veteran of the patrol who had investigated over 4,000 accidents, testified that "I have had many, many chances to observe accidents involving this type of vehicle. And they all have the same type of pattern."

Mr. James A. Johnson, service manager of Washburn Chevrolet Company, where the Pierini Corvair was purchased, told the court that his company sold an accessory specially designed for the Corvair by a nearby manufacturer. Attached underneath the vehicle to each end of the lower control arms, this accessory reduced excessive caving-in, or tuck-under, of the rear wheels on cornering or other stress situations.

The dealership's proprietor, Shelton B. Washburn, confirmed that as early as 1961 General Motors provided dealers with regular production option 696, which they could sell to Corvair owners. RPO 696 included heavier suspension springs and shock absorbers, a front stabilizer bar, and rear-axle rebound straps to reduce tuck-under. This RPO was a factory-installed kit and not openly advertised. It was intended to meet the demands of knowledgeable Corvair owners who take their cornering seriously.

Mr. Johnson, in reply to questioning by plaintiff's counsel, stated that he had been at a General Motors training center at Burbank in 1959 to receive instructions and training about the new Corvair model. There, General Motors personnel told him that the differential tire pressures, front and rear, in Corvair automobiles were a critical factor in their stability. There followed this exchange:

Counsel: Were you instructed by your superiors to tell members of the public that tire pressures on the Corvair were vital, important, crucial, and critical?

Johnson: No.

Counsel: Did you instruct your subordinates to tell members of the public and customers of Washburn Chevrolet that tire pressures on the Corvair were vital, important, crucial, or critical?

Johnson: We didn't tell the public this, no.

Counsel: Is it true that tire pressures on a Corvair are a must: they have got to be just right for the stability of the car?

Johnson: Yes.

When General Motors called a halt at this point, Judge Percy C. Heckendorf appeared as one summarily deprived of a great drama. He told the court: "I am disappointed from your standpoint, members of the jury, that you are not going to be able to see both sides perform and hear their arguments and go into it. It is a real experience and I would love to have heard that."

Other judges in this country are not likely to be so deprived. Even at the time of the Pierini case, there were more than thirty cases filed against General Motors in the Los Angeles area—all alleging in common that Corvairs went suddenly and unexpectedly out of control. General Motors lawyers knew what they were doing in settling the Pierini case. A jury verdict against the company might have ignited a mass litigation over the entire country at a far faster pace than was actually occurring.

The Corvair's peculiar friskiness had not escaped the notice of the automobile writers and editors who put out those sprightly car magazines that fill shelves in drugstores. To this animated cult of auto lovers, the introduction of the "Waterless Wonder from Willow Run" into a world of automobile design, mired for three dec-lph Nader is an attorney who has g been interested in safety prob- ns relating to the automobile. This ticle is adapted from a chapter in Unsafe at Any Speed, to be pub- hed this month by Grossman.

---

ades in the rut of follow-the-crowd compromises, was a dream realized. The Corvair was different. It was the first modern American automobile to offer a swing-axle independent rear suspension with an aluminum. air-cooled engine mounted in the rear. This was news, challenge, and controversy —the combination that makes for good copy and lively reading. Immediately following the car's introduction in September, 1959, the articles began pouring forth on the Corvair road tests, on its rear-engine placement and its suspension system. By 1963, sports car racer and writer Denise McCluggage could begin an article on Corvair handling idiosyncracies with words that assumed a knowing familiarity by her auto buff readers: "Seen any Corvairs lately with the back end smashed in? Chances are they weren't run into, but rather ran into something while going backwards. And not in reverse gear, either."

Then Miss McCluggage went on to describe a phenomenon she termed a "sashay through the boonies, back-end first." "The classic Corvair accident is a quick spin in a turn and swoosh!—off the road backwards. Or, perhaps, if half-corrective measures are applied, the backward motion is arrested, the tires claw at the pavement and the car is sent darting across the road to the other side. In this case there might be some front end damage instead."

Was Miss McCluggage trying to frighten anyone? Not in the least. The vehicle's provocative movements were not to be viewed pessimistically as a danger, but merely as a challenge to driving expertise. The Corvair on a sudden detour could be "brought back" before reaching the point of no return, according to the author, given know-how, anticipation and concentration.

Not all this country's 95 million drivers, however, could qualify for the Shell 4,000 Rally. For the 99 per cent not in Miss McCluggage's class, the automobile "after-market" entrepreneurs provided other remedies. Hardly had the first Corvair hit the highway in 1959 before an enterprising company in Riverside, Calif., EMPI, realized that money was to be made from the Corvair's engineering faults. The company developed, tested and began to sell an accessory rear stabilizer called the EMPI Camber Compensator that was specially designed for installation beneath the rear suspension control arms of Corvairs. Quite simply, it was a bar to help keep the wheels in optimum contact with the roadway.

EMPI advertised broad claims for its device: "keeps wheels on the ground," "designed and engineered to correct oversteer," "increases stability in winds," "reduces body sway," "lowers roll center," "reduces lean on turns." Estimates of the compensator's effectiveness in meeting all of EMPI's declared objectives varied, but there was a solid consensus that these objectives defined very real Corvair problems. And there was widespread endorsement that the compensator was a sizable step forward in safety.

EMPI was not the only company offering stabilizing equipment for the Corvair. Several competitors entered the field as the commentary began to build up from the auto magazines. A reader of such magazines who owned a Corvair could well become interested in extra equipment after seeing such reports as:

> —The car can be a handful if the driver doesn't understand its peculiarities.
>
> —The rear weight bias and independent springing together give the car rather unsettling properties at higher speeds. Take cornering, for example. The rear starts to swing outward. The rear tires dig in but the shift in weight places them at rather odd angles relative to the pavement. These angles are great enough to increase steering force and, suddenly, the car is negotiating a tighter curve than intended. The phenomenon of oversteer has intruded into the scene.
>
> —Another problem with the Corvair is extreme sensitivity to cross winds. If a sudden gust hits the car, it causes the rear to sway rather severely.

The foregoing comments are made by men who know the Corvair and are enthusiastic about the relative newness of its engineering as far as mass-produced American cars are concerned. Their criticisms are serious and are meant to be taken as such by their authors. But critics are not necessarily crusaders. They never indulge in commentary about the kind of engineering and management operations within General Motors which led to such an unsafe vehicle. In the automobile magazine world such c mentary is considered poor t e. It may also be indiscreet. One centrates on the vehicle, not o ts makers.

But the auto magazines d the Corvair specialists did have effect on General Motors and ts Chevrolet division. Not that y defects in the vehicle's hand g were suddenly revealed to Che let's engineers. Whatever the i pendent specialists could do by of testing and modifying, Che let could do better. And whe a prosperous business can be lt up by small companies on the b is of making Corvairs safer, the vious implication is that the fac y models are dangerous, and that plication might seep beyond e tight little world of auto fans d magazines. It took General Mo s four years of the model and 1,1 076 Corvairs before they decide o do something for all unsuspect Corvair buyers by installing sta ard equipment to help control e car's handling hazards.

Ever since the Corvair was troduced, General Motors' offi reaction to criticisms has been lence. The handling hazards of C vairs did not proceed from gineering mysteries or the pre lence of one technical school thought over another. The Cor was a tragedy, not a blunder. T tragedy was overwhelmingly cau by cutting corners to shave co This happens all the time in automobile industry, but with Corvair it happened in a big w What was there for General Mot to say?

The tragedy of the Corvair not begin that 30th day of S tember in 1959 when it went display in dealer showrooms. N did it begin when Ford test driv got hold of two Corvairs somew prematurely from a dealer in ea September, and had them go of control at the company's t track. It began with the concept and development of the Corvair leading GM engineers — Edw Cole, Harry Barr, Robert Schilli Kai Hansen and Frank Winchell

Cole, now a General Motors ecutive vice president, provided managerial ignition. He was an devotee of rear-engined cars a right after World War II beca involved with a short-lived exp mental Cadillac having a rear Positions assumed by rear wheels of unmodified Corvair showing breakaway, extreme tuck-under and incipient roll-over.

ne. A prototype, ponderously be- cked with dual tires at the rear r stability, was soon shelved. Cole, owever, continued to be attracted the idea of a rear-engined car nd he carried it over with him to hevrolet and developed a project oposal as he rose in that divi- on's hierarchy. In 1955, as chief ngineer of Chevrolet, Cole saw a arket for a small, "compact" car. lready an unpretentious import ith a rear, air-cooled engine and dependent suspension was "pre- sting" the American market with sing commercial success. But Cole d his associates were not in any ind merely to produce an Ameri- n imitation of the Volkswagen. his was to be a brand new kind car utilizing the lessons of past odels and the advances of the test automotive technology. When rose to head Chevrolet division the summer of 1956, Cole put me of his finest engineering tal- t to work on preliminary design erations. In the spring of 1957, rr, Schilling and Hansen made rmal presentations before the top- vel GM engineering policy com- ittee and the executive commit- e. It was then that the official go- ead to build the Corvair was ven to Chevrolet. Kai Hansen was ade head of the project.

Hansen's group knew well the nds of priorities which would rce them to dilute their engineer- g standards. First, the new au- mobile had to sell well and make "target rate of return" on invest- ent. The way to do this, General Motors' management decided, was to make a small, lighter car, with fuel economy, which would seat six passengers comfortably and give a ride comparable to a standard Chevrolet passenger sedan. If these objectives could be achieved, the quest for maximum profit would have reached new frontiers. An automobile achieving a reduction of 1,332 pounds of material, or more than one-third the weight of a standard 1960 Chevrolet, that could sell for only about $200 less than standard models, would constitute a marvel of production cost efficiency and sales ingenuity.

In January, 1960, Hansen told a meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers: "Our first objective, once the decision was made to design a smaller, lighter car, was to attain good styling proportions. Merely shortening the wheel base and front and rear overhang was not acceptable. To permit lower overall height and to accommodate six adult passengers, the floor hump for the drive shaft had to go. Eliminating the conventional drive shaft made it essential then that the car have either rear-engine, rear-drive or front-engine, front-drive."

Chevrolet engineers decided that the best and most "aesthetically pleasant" utilization of passenger space dictated the use of a rear-engine, rear-drive design. Hansen's job was to get the various factors working for safe handling—principally, front and rear weight distribution, tire-pressure differentials and tire design, suspension geometry, and relative dynamic behavior in the front and rear — and still keep a soft ride and maximum cost reduction.

Hansen and his fellow engineers could not have been under any misapprehension as to the magnitude of the handling challenge before them. They had to deal with by far the heaviest rear-engined automobile in the Western world, having between 60 and 63 per cent of its weight on the rear wheels. This fact alone posed handling problems considerably in excess of those afflicting the smaller and lighter rear-engined European cars. Ocee Ritch, a well-known California auto specialist, describes the consequences of this weight and size difference between rear-engined cars by way of simple analogy: "If you swing a bucket at the end of a short rope and accidentally hit your brother in the head, is he more apt to suffer a concussion if the bucket is empty or full? Similarly, if you increase the length of the rope and swing it at the same speed, will it cause more damage?

Hansen has never publicly stated what choices he would have preferred to take had he been given more authority against the erosive demands of the professional stylists and the cost department. The secret world of the automobile industry does not encourage free and open engineering discussion of alternative courses of action. But on occasion there is an exposition of what was actually done. Before a meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers on April 1, 1960, in Detroit, Charles Rubly, a Chevrolet engineer who worked on the Corvair, gave his colleagues the practical considerations: "One of the obvious questions is: 'If you wish more of the roll couple to be taken on the front wheels, why did you leave the stabilizer off?' First, we felt the slight amount of gain realized did not warrant the cost; secondly, we did not wish to pay the penalty of increased road noise and harshness that results from use of a stabilizer. Another question that no doubt can be asked is why did we choose an independent rear suspension of this particular type? There are other swing-axle rear suspensions, of course, that permit transferring more of the roll couple to the front end. Our selection of this particular type of a swing-axle rear suspension is based on: (1) lower cost, (2) ease of assembly, (3) ease of service, and (4) simplicity of design. We also wished to take advantage of coil springs . . . in order to obtain a more pleasing ride. . . ."

Mr. Rubly's four reasons could be reduced to one: lower cost. Having made such concessions, the Corvair engineers had to compensate for the strong oversteering tendency of the design. This was done by recommending to the Corvair owner certain critical tire-pressure differentials which he should maintain between front and rear wheels. Corvair buyers received this advisory near the end of the owner's manual: "Over-steer problems may also be encountered with incorrect pressures. Maintain the recommended inflation pressures at all times."

No definition of "over-steer" is given in the manual. The recommended pressures are 15 psi (pounds per square inch) on the front wheels and 26 psi on the rear wheels when cold (defined as "after car has been parked for three hours or more or driven less than one mile") and 18 psi front and 30 psi rear when "hot." According to the Chevrolet division, such pressure differences promote vehicle stability by introducing proper steer characteristics.

It is well established that cornering stability can be improved with any weight distribution, front or rear, by manipulating tire-inflation pressures. But no policy which throws the burden of such stability on the driver by requiring him to monitor closely and persistently tire-pressure differentials can be described as sound or sane engineering practice. The prominent automotive engineer Robert Janeway expressed a deeply rooted technical opinion in engineering circles when he evaluated the use of this human expedient: "Instead of stability being inherent in the vehicle design, the operator is relied upon to maintain a required pressure differential in front and rear tires. This responsibility, in turn, is passed along to service station attendants, who are notoriously unreliable in abiding by requested tire pressures. There is also serious doubt whether the owner or service man is fully aware of the importance of maintaining the recommended pressures."

Corvair dealers and salesmen have widely varying opinions about what are the best tire pressures. It is unusual to find one who adheres to or agrees with the owner's manual recommendations, although recently Chevrolet directives have reiterated the need for following the manual's figures. The apathy among dealers about the function of proper pressures for Corvair handling is quite unsettling. Dealer employees have routinely suggested to inquirers equivalent or near-equivalent tire pressure between front and rear. A Washington, D.C., dealer advised with assurance, "Carry 24 pounds in the front tires and 26 pounds in the rear." The owner's manual was wrong, he said, and concluded with the aside, "Cars are like women. They're all different."

The Corvair driver becomes puzzled on confronting such a range of advice. If he writes to the Chevrolet division for clarification, he receives a reply assuring him that the manual's recommendations are the optimum tire pressures and were derived after exhaustive research and testing. But clearly a more heavily loaded Corvair, such as one with five passengers, requires different tire pressures to minimize differences in tire deflections front and rear. Corvair engineers knew about this problem and considered raising the recommended rear-tire pressures. Once again, however, they succumbed to the great imperative—a soft ride. Rubly recounts it plainly enough: "The 28 psi would reduce the rear-tire deflection enough but we did not feel that we should compromise ride and add harshness because under hot conditions tire pressures increase 3 to 4 psi." Remarks such as these make it difficult to give full credence to company claims and advice dealing with automotive safety. For behind the façade of engineering authority is the reality of the "trade off" — auto industry cant for the bare-bones concessions to the cost and style men. The engineering assurances cannot be taken at face value in such a context of undisclosed compromise.

Another area intimately related to Corvair stability is the load-carrying capacity of the tires. According to the Tire and Rim Association, a tire industry standards group, the maximum-rated loaded capacity of the size tire used on the Corvair is 835 pounds per tire at 24 psi. These maximum-rated loads derived after compromise betw the tire manufacturers and the a mobile companies. Yet even un these less than stringent standa the rear tires of the Corvair are o narily overloaded with two or m passengers. In a deposition ta on behalf of General Motors in of the Corvair cases, tire specia Raymond B. Stringfield stated t four passengers would defini overload the tires. He was qu tioned about the tire air-out dur cornering. His reply: "The Corv is, with any passengers at all, v near the maximum-rated load the rear tires and a sudden thr [as when a wheel is making a tu is capable of forcing the bead ward, unless the air pressure is s ficiently high to resist it. . . ."

"Under-tired" vehicles are not r to the automobile industry. Si the end of World War I, progr
sively shaving costs off tires been one of the cost departme most successful triumphs. A mu plier is operating here; a saving one tire means savings on all f tires. But although it is not unco mon for other vehicles, overload tires on the Corvair, in combinat with its other unique features, su as weight distribution, can be p ticularly hazardous.

With such a precarious wei distribution and tire load, Chev let division's relocation of the sp tire from the front, where it w in the 1960 Corvair, to the rear the 1961 Corvair Monza, w greeted with sheer incredulity by dependent Corvair specialists. T reason for the switch was to crease the luggage space in front "trunk." This switch not o added to the rear-end weight exposed the tire in the engine co partment to possibly harmful te peratures.

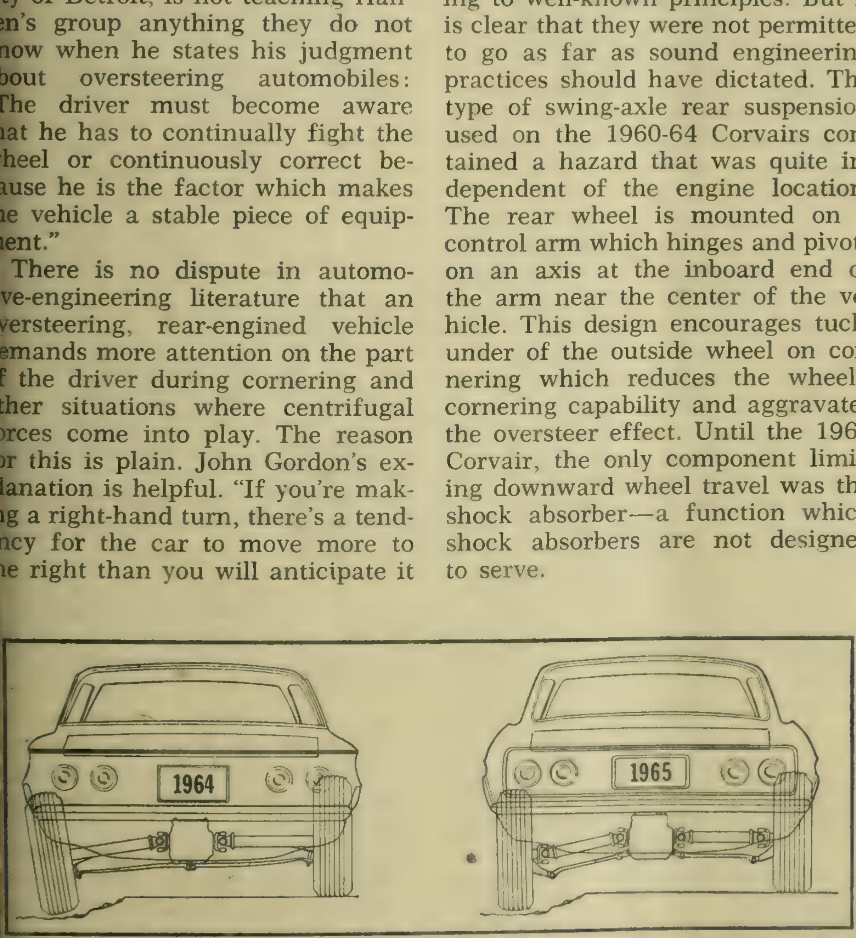
It would not be fair to that the Corvair engineers desig a vehicle but forgot the driver. Th knew the risks in a design wh the car usurps the driving task der certain expected stresses highway travel. These stresses cur not just in high-speed em gency conditions but in ordin driving situations within legal-sp limits. The combination of fact which leads to the critical point control loss may occur with a s tistical infrequency, but the tra tional integrity of automotive desi has been to embrace just such sit ions. When it serves their promoional interests, the automobile nanufacturers show great concern bout the most infrequently occuring situations. A continuing illusration is the elaborate defenses vhich they make for producing veicles with up to 400 horsepower nd a speed capability reaching 150 niles per hour. Is such power and peed hazardous? Not at all, claim he companies, for they provide an nportant margin of safety in emerency conditions. Apparently emerency conditions include speeds up o and over 100 miles an hour.

The men who headed the Corvair roject knew that the driver should e given a vehicle whose handling both controllable and predictable. hey knew that impossible demands ould be placed upon the driver by n inherently oversteering behavior. or the past thirty-five years, Amercan cars have been designed to be asically understeering. The Corair was the first mass-produced xception. Dr. Thomas Manos, the ighly respected automotive enineering professor of the Univerity of Detroit, is not teaching Hanen's group anything they do not now when he states his judgment bout oversteering automobiles: The driver must become aware hat he has to continually fight the heel or continuously correct beause he is the factor which makes he vehicle a stable piece of equipnent."

There is no dispute in automove-engineering literature that an versteering, rear-engined vehicle emands more attention on the part f the driver during cornering and ther situations where centrifugal orces come into play. The reason or this is plain. John Gordon's exlanation is helpful. "If you're makng a right-hand turn, there's a tendncy for the car to move more to he right than you will anticipate it would in relation to the amount of movement you put on the steering wheel." Robert Janeway, former director of Chrysler's research department, holds that an oversteer condition "is both disconcerting and dangerous except to an expert driver of sports cars or racing cars. The required reversal of steering-wheel direction after initiating the turn is an unstable situation that is difficult for the ordinary driver to handle without overcorrection, with potentially dangerous swings on both sides of the proper curved path. From the standpoint of safety, oversteer is an intolerable condition and has always been recognized as such by the industry in the U.S." The instability of rear-engined oversteering vehicles on a straight road when there are cross winds is also a well-known phenomenon.

During the design stage, Hansen's group tried to counteract the Corvair's inherent oversteer by employing wider wheel rims for increased tire-cornering power and by building some understeer into both front and rear suspension systems according to well-known principles. But it is clear that they were not permitted to go as far as sound engineering practices should have dictated. The type of swing-axle rear suspension used on the 1960-64 Corvairs contained a hazard that was quite independent of the engine location. The rear wheel is mounted on a control arm which hinges and pivots on an axis at the inboard end of the arm near the center of the vehicle. This design encourages tuck-under of the outside wheel on cornering which reduces the wheel's cornering capability and aggravates the oversteer effect. Until the 1964 Corvair, the only component limiting downward wheel travel was the shock absorber—a function which shock absorbers are not designed to serve.



Corvair rear-suspension actions compared. Note that with new models wheels no longer change camber as they move down to accommodate road conditions.

What most sets the 1960-63 Corvairs apart from light foreign vehicles, with comparable percentages of weight distribution and swing axles, is the sudden onset of the critical point at which the vehicle goes out of control and frequently flips over. This point is reached by any number of combinations of vehicle speed, radius of curve, and tire-inflation pressures. For example, tests have shown that a Corvair can lurch out of control at about 22 mph, with 26 psi in front and rear tires, and turning on a 50 degree radius of curvature. At higher speeds, a less sharp curve is required to achieve the same rear-end breakaway, but passing maneuvers on a highway could easily involve a severe turn during the swing out and in. Janeway points out that "critical speeds can occur in the normal driving speed range on sharp curves even at moderate degrees of oversteer." Other makes of vehicles can be made to oversteer through drastic tire inflation differentials, or very heavy loading, but as the forces produced mount toward the critical point, they give a warning to the driver in the "feedback" he receives through the steering wheel, if indeed he is not forewarned by the underinflated tires before or as he gets under way.

The Corvair is different in the 1960-63 models and to a lesser extent in the 1964 model. At a critical point of lateral acceleration (or centrifugal force), there is a sudden rear-wheel tuck-under. Technically, the positive camber increases radically 4° to 10° or 11° camber—a horrifying shift causing violent skidding, rear-end breakaway or vehicle roll-over. The change occurs without any warning and in an instant. A variety of disturbing forces may cause this sudden tuck-under—tire blowouts, gusts of cross wind, the second leg of an S-shaped curve or a comparable cornering maneuver. Near the critical point, it takes an expert driver to provide the corrective steering action—assuming that highway conditions permit and there are no obstructions, such as another vehicle or a tree. The car was built and sold as "easy handling," "as a family sedan," as a car that "purrs for the girls," according to some of the General Motors advertisements.

In ways wholly unique, the Corvair can become a single-minded, aggressive machine. One factor that has been noticed in many single-car Corvair upsets is that the rear wheel tucks under and the rim touches the roadway. When this occurs no driver can control the vehicle, which will either swerve wildly or, more likely, turn over. Rim scrapings or gouge marks on the road have become the macabre trademark of Corvairs that went unexpectedly out of control.

The Corvair tragedy consisted of a series of lost opportunities. At the time the vehicle was being designed and tested in prototype, the Chevrolet division had fully developed and rigorous proving-ground, laboratory, and theoretical tests for determining vehicle-handling characteristics and directional stability. Proving-ground facilities were equipped with instruments for evaluating the sensitivity of a vehicle and its tendencies to oversteer under a wide range of conditions. At the same time, General Motors had instruments which could even have programed steering responses of the driver and determined the extent of "feedback" that the operator depends upon, from the handling behavior of the vehicle, to govern his driving actions. As far back as 1953, Lyle A. Walsh of the GM engineering staff was writing in the General Motors Engineering Journal about well-established techniques of putting a car's suspension system under the scrutiny of scientific laboratories while the car was in action. In 1958, the same journal contained a report by Chevrolet engineers Robert W. Graham and Ronald E. Shafer about a new simulator to test vehicle suspensions. A year later, Chevrolet's Max M. Roensch described the 4-year-old Chevrolet engineering laboratory, including the elaborate test and development techniques available to supplement the findings of the General Motors proving ground under actual vehicle driving conditions.

Obviously, proving grounds, laboratory and theoretical testing and analysis provided the Corvair engineers with the data to document thoroughly the design limitations of the Corvair before it went into production. Professor Manos, who views the tuck-under problem as the most serious defect of the 1960-1963 Corvairs, has said that he would flunk any student who would not work this calculation out in an automotive engineering course. It is just that elementary and crucial a calculation to vehicle safety.

Yet a safer Corvair suspension system was not forthcoming—not in 1960, not in 1961, not in 1962, and not in 1963. With the receipt of hundreds of written complaints sent to General Motors by people whose Corvairs had suddenly gone out of control, and the real threat of many lawsuits which must have been anticipated by company lawyers, the absence of any corrective action year after year can be explained only by bureaucratic rigidities and abject subservience to cost reduction.

But at last, with the 1964 model, Chevrolet moved to make improvements. A transverse leaf spring in the rear and a front anti-sway bar were included as standard equipment for 1964 models. The leaf spring served much the same function as the EMPI camber compensator and substantially reduced the tuck-under hazard. The 1965 Corvair came out with a more fundamental change in the form of a link-type suspension with dual control arms. These improvements represented new company policy, but not engineering innovations. They drew on well-developed knowledge that went back into GM's empirical work during the thirties and extending to the experimental rear-engined race car developed after World War II by Chevrolet's key suspension engineer, Zora Arkus-Duntov.

While General Motors may have finally lumbered into engineering improvements, it would be corporate heresy for the proud industry leader to worry about the hundreds of thousands of Corvairs waiting for the law of averages to catch up with them on some S-curve or breezy straightaway. After all, those Corvairs were already sold.

At the May, 1965, annual shareholders meeting in Detroit's vast Cobo Hall, Dr. Seymour Charles, a General Motors stockholder and the founder of the Physicians for Automobile Safety, rose to plead with management to call back to dealer stations all remaining 1960-63 Corvairs in order that life-saving stabilizing components might be installed. Dr. Charles was not able to arrive at a cost estimate since there is no way of knowing how many such Corvairs are still roaming the highways. (Motor Trends' technical editor, Jim Wright, noted in 1963 that the "wrecking yards have a good selection these days.") But assuming that a million cars have s vived, the most that such a re would cost would be $25 milli equivalent to a half-day's gr sales, or less than five days' profits (after taxes) to Gene Motors.

On the platform in front of Charles were General Motors' bo chairman, Frederic G. Donner, its president, John G. Gordon.
Donner was presiding over the m ing. He deflected the request by viting Dr. Charles to come up a the meeting to discuss his proble with several of the executives.

Mr. Gordon sat impassiv watching Dr. Charles become first shareholder ever to raise op ly at a General Motors annual me ing the question of specific uns vehicle design. At the time of approval of Chevrolet's Corvair sign in 1957, Gordon was gro vice president of the body and sembly divisions. This entitled h to membership on both the t level engineering policy group a the executive committee which proved the Corvair design. He w one of the five men responsible final approval of the most "revo tionary" automotive package whi GM had ever presented to the mestic market. As an automoti engineer with several patents to credit, Mr. Gordon might have be expected to interest himself in th substantial debut. Yet on April 1965, under deposition, Mr. Gord stated that he did not recall the C vair design's being presented to t engineering policy group. He mitted that he did not know wh kind of rear-end suspension was the Corvair design that was proved for production by his co mittees.

Gordon became president of Ge eral Motors in 1958. In the ensui seven years he ordered no inqui into the Corvair design, in spite rising and unprecedented litigatio owner complaints and detailed co fidential company-sponsored inve tigations of Corvair accidents i volving directional instability.
had never heard of the stabilizi equipment produced especially f the Corvair by other, smaller man facturers.

In his defense, Gordon says h duties were primarily administ tive and that he relied on subor nates with technical competenc
One such technical subordinate w
Charles Chayne, vice president

ngineering. In the May-June, 1956 ssue of the General Motors Enineering Journal, he wrote that one unction of the engineering policy roup was "to keep informed on the ehavior of our products in the ands of our customers so that imrovements and corrections can be ade if required." He then stated key principle of General Motors' perating philosophy: "Coordinated ontrol refers to the formulation of verall policy and control of the low of information. A two-way flow f information exists at each level f management — the downward low from authority and the upard flow from initiative."

In the making of the Corvair, ere was a breakdown in this flow f both authority and initiative. Iniative would have meant an appeal y the Corvair design engineers to p management to overrule the ost cutters and stylists whose inursions had placed unsafe contraints on engineering choice. here are, however, deterrents to uch action. It is to the keepers f those most sacred totems—cost eduction and style—that corporate atus and authority accrue. Anyne skeptical about the role of penies in the production of America's ost expensive durable consumer product should heed what Buick's Edward Ragsdale says about putting a new car into production: "Cost estimates are given the closest possible scrutiny, and they frequently are calculated to the fourth and fifth decimal place. The difference of just two cents per car doesn't sound like very much—but at current production rates, two cents a car may mean $10,000 for the model run. Hence the cost decision has a great bearing upon all proposed changes."

With a spectacular profit record and more than 50 per cent of the domestic automobile market, General Motors is least vulnerable to competitive pressures that might have been the reason for cutting costs at the expense of Corvair safety. It is not commonly realized that General Motors' return on invested capital and its net income as a percentage of its sales are about double those of its nearest competitor —the Ford Motor Company. In 1964, for example, Ford had a net income, as a percentage of sales, of 5.6 per cent and an 11.3 per cent return on invested capital. The comparable General Motors figures were 10.2 per cent and 20.4 per cent, respectively. These are remarkable differences in American industry for the two leading companies in a highly concentrated product line such as automobiles. It might not have been surprising, if still shocking, to have a Corvair-type tragedy issue from an auto manufacturer whose declining sales and high costs were driving it to the wall. But coming from General Motors, such behavior—and the fact that it is tolerated—is a symptom of a sickness that radiates beyond corporate borders and into society.

On May 18, 1956, almost a year before the Corvair project was launched, GM's prolific inventor, Maurice Olley, filed a patent application (issued as No. 2,911,052 on November 3, 1959) in which he said what he thought of the Corvair-type suspension: "The ordinary swing axle, under severe lateral forces produced by cornering, tends to lift the rear end of the vehicle so that both wheels assume severe positive camber positions to such an extent that the vehicle not only 'oversteers' but actually tends to roll over. In addition, the effect is non-linear and increases suddenly in a severe turn, thus presenting potentially dangerous vehicle handling characteristics."

Olley's judgment was ignored.

Notes on the Toronto Teach-In

The Irrelevance of Morality . . . Robert H. Welker

he International Teach-in held at ie University of Toronto over the ctober 8 weekend was in all outard aspects a thorough success. xcept for the unhappy incident ivolving the denial of the stage to lichael Myerson, a University of alifornia graduate student, it was xpertly planned and smoothly preented. Many thousands attended ach session (held in the varsity rena) and reacted spiritedly: more ian once, for example, A. A. Berle rew laughter and boos and cries f "Liar!" when in various ways he declared "self-determination" to be the basis for U. S. policy in Latin America. Numerous foreign speakers gave a proper complexity of tone to the discussions. Only the published proceedings or at least a replay of the tapes can provide the sources for the kind of study these sessions deserve; meanwhile, enough was said in defense of U. S. policies (especially in Southeast Asia) to allow some preliminary comments on the current official line. With this reminder, however: no actual State Department official appeared (although several had been invited), and hence advantageous deviations were permitted — concerning the wisdom of the Dominican adventure, for example.

Mr. Berle, listed as "a consultant to the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Rusk," presumably echoed the line most precisely, but he pitched his argument at such a low level of plausibility (and, some would say, at such a high level of self-satisfaction) that little that was useful emerged. It was not so with two other U. S. apologists, Prof. Robert Scalapino of Berkeley, and Prof. Z. K. Brzezinski of Columbia. Mr. Scalapino seemed to repeat a good deal of the speech he gave at the Washington Teach-in last spring, but he was still well worth listening to; and Mr. Brzezinski, who also appeared in Washington, had in the meantime so polished and updated his material that he seemed to repeat scarcely at all. Both performances were first rate, and from the latter, especially, it is possible to infer the New Line out of Washington. It is "new" only superficially, of course, but nicely streamlined obert H. Welker, who teaches huanities at Case Institute of Techology, is the author of Birds and en (Harvard University Press), a udy of American culture, and A ifferent Drummer (Beacon Press), personal statement of dissent.

---

"Why Can't Y'all Get Along Peaceable Like?"

and not in the least implausible. Let me try to give the essentials:

(1) Pluralism. The real world is multiform, complex, turbulent, imperfect, unpredictable; hence policies which are to accord with "reality" or "the facts" must adapt to this plural rather than to any single reality. (Marxism, a "rigid" philosophy, can never do this; but Americans have always been adaptable, inclusive, free and easy.) Recognition of this pluralism must surely lead to

(2) Pragmatism. Policies must be discussed and undertaken on the basis of tentative conclusions, for immediate and even partial ends, and with a view to their effectiveness in a given situation —and not as part of some Grand Design. Take each situation as it comes; don't fit the facts to conform with your ideas, but let your ideas emerge from the facts. Hence there must be

(3) An End to Ideology. Ideological frameworks are outmoded in a pluralistic, imperfect world, and may be dangerous; they becloud rather than clarify issues; they make it difficult for the pragmatic American to reach adjustments with the Marxist powers, and hence they threaten peace. In short, ideology is out of touch with the real world of the 1960s and must be abandoned for the good of all. Hence — by clear and proper extension of the remarks made at Toronto — there must be

(4) Serious Reservations About All Moral Judgments. Presumably "moral" actions are preferred to "immoral" ones, but invoking moral principles is an ambiguous proceeding at best, and at worst can lead to actions wholly out of keeping with the pluralistic, pragmatic, "real" world of the 1960s, from which, if we only bother to look, ideology as a meaningful concept has already in fact fled, and rigid moral principles are fast fleeing.

This is not to say that either Mr. Scalapino or Mr. Brzezinski explicitly made the analysis given above; it is to say that such an analysis could fairly be drawn from their words, including the extrapolation contained in the fourth point. What follows is a set of consequences suggested by the four points.

The most obvious immediate service rendered by the term "pluralism" is to get us off the hook of designating as the Free World a group of nations governed largely by military regimes and other forms of authoritarian rule and dictatorship. This problem occasionally bothered even so dedicated a man as John Foster Dulles; one of his responses was to the effect that "those other countries, though steadfastly anti-Communist, have not yet been raised into the light of our splendid free institutions; but progress is being made, and we must be patient." That is pretty thin gruel, particularly from the highly moralistic Dulles; hence the New Line, both more lofty and more sophisticated, and therefore less vulnerable. A pluralistic world is necessarily an imperfect one; then who is so naive as to call for perfection?

A second consequence of "pluralism" is to suggest that there are really no strong currents in the world today, but only a scattering of forces, a multiplicity of vectors, none of them especially important, all of them susceptible to shrewd practical analysis and manipulation. Thus a few fanatics sincerely oppose American racism, but this is not a widespread feeling. Thus certain bleeding hearts (both inside and outside the West) deplore gas and napalm and the torture of prisoners but, in general, people are apathetic where they are not impressed. Thus the resentment of the so-called Third World toward economic penetration is found among malcontents only, and should disappear in any case when benefits begin to trickle down from the newly rich classes. Thus military conquest (as in Guatemala or the Dominican Republic or, one may hope, Vietnam) is opposed only by those who fail to see the true realistic logic behind the action — an action which may indeed be taken with sincere regret; but at all events, in a pluralistic world, the sad necessity for an occasional symbolic air drop or bombardment or actual conquest will be appreciated by many weaker, less determined people, and perhaps even admired.

The obverse of this attitude is the assumption that if the world fails to operate "pluralistically" — that is to say, with no clear reaction to U. S. policies beyond admiration or fear — but instead gives evidence of widespread alienation antipathy, even hatred toward us, then plainly some artificial force is at work: Marxism (to use a shorthand term embracing a variety of related attitudes). This force, though patently outmoded and indeed reactionary, has managed to corral the weak and the gullible in many places, persuading them that the meaningful, practical response to capitalism is revolution, instead of realistic acceptance and adaptation. Thus the gullible are tricked and regimented; thus the reality of pluralism is swallowed up in mass delusion and subversion; thus the true benefits of pluralism are denied masses of blameless, struggling humanity. And in the place of such benefits there appear the deprivations and cruelties of a rigid theoretical system which stultifies human potential, defeats individual aspiration, worsens living standards —and must conceal its failures and blunders and anachronisms by increasingly virulent propaganda and further subversions. This, then, we must oppose, responding not to some kind of global Communist conspiracy (such terms are for Senators and similar innocent persons) but to immediate challenges wherever and whenever they appear. Each must be met separately, in proper measure (this may include conquest, but as a carefully conceived, final resort only) and coolly, in the fashion of a Talleyrand or a Metternich—aristocrats both, and, like us, thorough realists.

What could be more pragmatic? If the term suggests anything, it suggests the shrewd, the adaptive, the emotionally uncluttered. William James, who also gave us the useful term "tough-minded," would surely praise us; but perhaps he too is outmoded, too close to the generation of the antique Marx, and not quite a modern ideal. Reinhold Niebuhr comes much closer; in following the tentative, the partial, the conditional, even in our Christian aspirations for this world, we do him homage. America could not ask for a better apologist and witness, and has found none.

Perhaps a more worldly warrant for our pragmatism may be found in our affluence. "Truth's cash-value" in the market place — again James provides us with a useful phrase, but we must adapt it to modern reality. In pragmatic terms, nothing can be allowed to take precedence over the magnificent material prosperity we have won in this world. Not to respond to challenges that threaten this wealth is to abandon the pragmatic and practical for the sentimental, theoretical, subjective or "moral"—and surely the pragmatic tradition tells us that before anything else, the dollars in the bank and the good food in the belly and the sleek car in the garage rule the real world of our time.

Thus we have abandoned all ideology except the true and meaningful one of material progress. So much the better for us and for the world! As Mother Courage says, all men can be bribed and so greed is our only hope — and by this sign all other ideologies are conquered not by mere force (except where necessary) but basically by agreement and consensus. "Communism?" — what ideology exists that is more concerned with clear, cold materialism? In a technological world which has made museum relics of ideology itself, what is there to prevent a true meeting of minds among experts, between one materialist and another? Only the faltering theoretical structure of Marxism itself; only the illusion on the part of Marxists that there is indeed a real difference in outlook. Let them but see the truth of this century, as most clearly demonstrated by the United States of America, and Communists will simply give up Marxism as the anachronism it is. To refuse is nothing less than to prevent peace from descending on the world. We are willing to reconsider our slogans — "the Free World," for example, or "Free Private Enterprise"; so must they also.

Any serious student of the modern world recognizes the United States for what it is, the unchallenged progressive ideal and hope of mankind; but modesty on our part, and mendacity on the part of others, have allowed the false notion to get abroad that we in fact represent counterrevolution. Even the eminent Arnold Toynbee has made this mistake, confusing modern welfare capitalism, clearly beneficial to all, with the primitive, exploitive capitalism which earlier in the century did indeed embark on counterrevolution as an ideological necessity. All that is behind us; but Toynbee's persistence in error suggests that much remains to be done to convince others that in today's pluralistic, pragmatic world, belief in "counterrevolution" is a creed outworn. So with the explicit abandonment of all ideals but Mammon will come the disappearance of such pernicious allegations; and at the same time, the Communists will have lost any claim to the opposing term "revolution," which, especially when linked to the word "popular," has lent them a spurious plausibility and force.

Mr. Toynbee even more recently has charged the United States with playing "bully" to the world. Such a charge is not merely false; it is indicative of simplistic moral standards which, should they persist, may bring all our efforts to nothing. Surely in the Niebuhrian age we all recognize that (to quote the previous passage) "invoking moral principles is an ambiguous proceeding at best"—and surely such a term as "bully" suggests such an invoking. One may feel a certain sympathy for the deluded and "tender-minded" among us, those who persist in judging separate events as moral problems in themselves; but the tough-minded know that a world of pluralism and pragmatism and expiring ideology is also a world of complete moral relativism. In fact the most realistic idea is to dispense entirely with the word "morality" itself, because it suggests a recognized standard of behavior, even a set of rules; but it is just that standard, just those rules, which have disappeared from the real world of the 1960s. William James spoke of a Moral Equivalent to War; in our time we have found a Practical Equivalent to Morals. We act not as we "should" but as we must; we proceed not in the light of some outmoded "morality" but in the light of clear necessity. Perhaps Harry Truman is the model here. He has said that he had no hesitation in ordering the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and has never lost any sleep over the decision. Realism can scarcely reach greater heights; and it is to this realism, not to some kind of ambiguous moral formulation, that we must always look.

"These are The Facts, gentlemen. You can't argue with The Facts." The quotation, properly enough, is attributed to a quondam Junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Is the situation hopeless? Perhaps not quite. To peddle such wretched fubbery, a man must have either monumental cynicism or a truly simple mind. The first sort is beyond rescue; such men belong with the death camp functionaries who "really knew better." But with the second type — here there may be hope. True, a simple man can scarcely embark on a career of patriotic prevarication without possessing beforehand all the requisite jingo attitudes; but his very simplicity can make him vulnerable in a strange and unexpected way. Really big lies have a way of convincing the simple in fairly short order, and there were never bigger lies than these. How long will it be before the simpler peddlers begin to believe what they have been given to say? The consequences could be quite bizarre: they would then actually become pluralistic in outlook and pragmatic in method, at the expense of the perfervid Red phobia in which they have lived and moved and had their being. They would abandon the shrill Manichean ideology which pits the Free World against the Red Atheist Imperialist Communist Moscow-Peking Aggressors; they would cease to belie that total moral rectitude resides our own beliefs and actions, a has been totally denied our pu tive enemies. And, having reach such a stage of moral relativis they would be free to discover th moral standards (concerning, f example, the bully, the invader, t torturer, the killer) still have i mense and quite possibly decisi force in common human life arou the world — and even, they m find, in their own America.

RECOMPENSE FOR VIOLENCE

Jennifer Cros

A few months ago, in one of California's pleasant, increasingly unsafe suburbs, a middle-aged woman was knocked down and had her purse snatched by two teen-agers who escaped by car. By the time her case came to the Superior Court in San Francisco, her injuries had cost $1,500, nearly all her savings. Her misfortune was typical of the unspectacular miseries caused by a penal code which is more concerned with rehabilitating the criminal than helping the victim. But it led Judge Francis McCarty to write to state Senator Eugene McAteer suggesting remedial legislation. Three months later, on July 19, California became the first state in the union—and the only place in the world outside Great Britain and New Zealand—to pay compensation to victims of crimes of violence.

Thirty years ago an agricultural state, California is now the richest and most populous in the country—with a per capita crime rate exceeded only by that of Nevada. Its 18,600,000 population is largely urban, concentrated in eighty communities of 25,000 and fourteen of more than 100,000, where serious offenses are most common; and in suburbs, where crime is increasing most rapidly. Los Angeles is a particularly black spot, with a record of forcible rape (29.1 per 100,000), aggravated assault (230.7 per 100,000) and burglary (1,400.8 per 100,000) that is between two and three times the national average.

Mounting expenditure by the California Department of Corrections ($60 million in 1963-64, $85 million this year) to cope with 6,000 new inmates a year, and to improve the already advanced methods of criminal rehabilitation have widened the gap between the treatment accorded the criminal and his victim. Today, legislators are publicly calling it "ironic" or "a tragic oversight." The criminal has access to facilities which, if hardly constituting a gravy train, represent a brave attempt to get him on the straight and narrow. Given motivation, he can catch up with his formal education (which stopped on average at 7th grade), take vocational training in one of forty-seven courses that range from how to be a janitor to aircraft maintenance, attend group therapy, get his face and teeth fixed, and work in one of the state-run correctional industries or open-air conservation camps. Until last summer, his victim got nothing except bills and the empty privilege of suing someone who could not pay.

While the new law is intended as a first step to remedy this social injustice, no one yet knows what the practical effects will be. Far from being a crock of gold, it has been turned into a piece of welfare legislation by the addition of the phrase "where there is need," and the imposition of a ceiling of $100,000 to meet all claims during the first year. If a victim or his family are above a certain income level, they are ineligible for aid; if the criminal's finances will stand a fine without putting his family on welfare, he must pay up commensurately with the offense.

The working model of the California bill was the New Zealand legislation, now more than eightee months old, which in turn is bas on the 1962 report of the Briti Section of the International Co mission of Jurists. Here, assistan has been tailored to match t Workmen's Compensation Act, wi safeguards to prevent the victi from ending up richer than he w before. Maximum payments a $28.70 a week for a single pers and $35.50 for a family, for capacity to work; $3,800 for oth financial losses; and $1,400 f "pain and suffering." The total b thus far for a population one-se enth that of California has bee surprisingly small. An original es mate of $84,000 was pared dow to $61,000 for the first year, which only $9,058 was paid ou this year the ceiling has been lo ered to $42,000.

Compensation under the C ifornia bill will depend on rough the same criteria as the aid to fa ilies with dependent children, whic costs an average of $170 a mon for each family, but it waives t usual property qualification. Apa from this guideline, the State D partment of Welfare says frank that it doesn't know how the admi istration will go; it was caug somewhat unawares by the spee with which the bill was passed. U like the old Danelaw, where com pensation was simplified by t fact that every man had a pri (the man in the street was wort between 100 and 200 gold shillings and unlike stereotyped fines, whic are levied according to the gravi of the offense, this new type compensation poses a multitude problems. If a woman is raped an

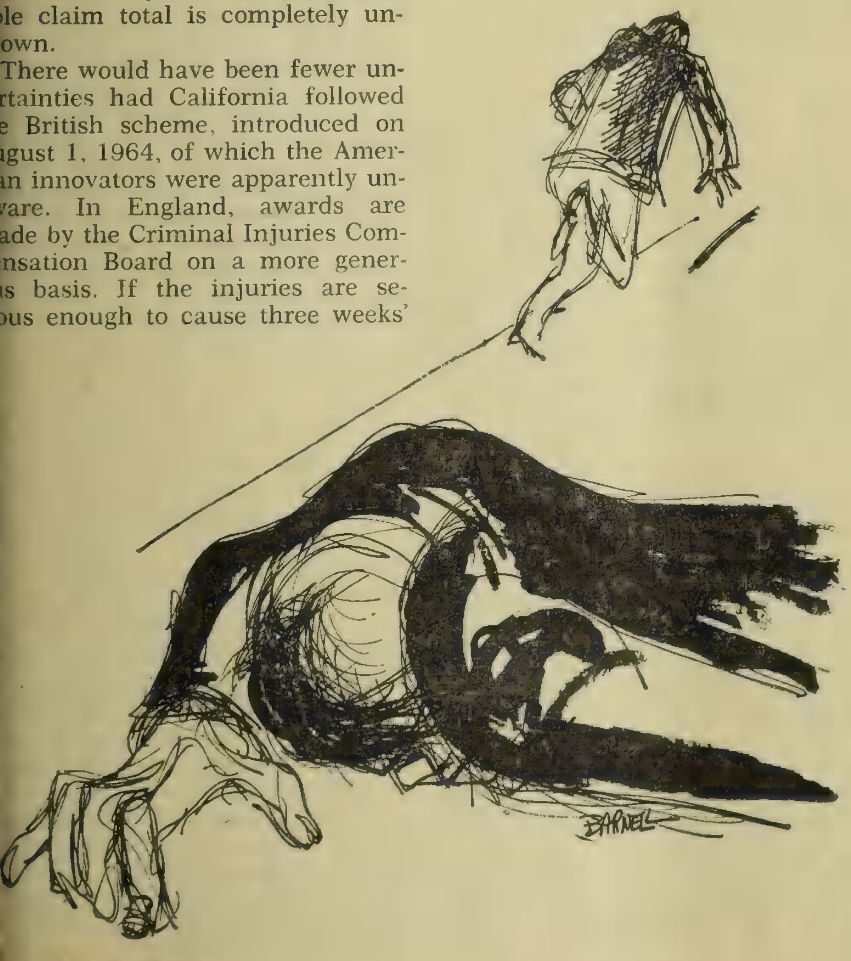
---

Jennifer Cross is a British free-lance journalist, now living in Berkeley, Calif.

has a child, should the state pay for its upkeep, and if so, for how long? If an injured man falls within the income qualifications for aid, ut is wholly or partially covered y health insurance, should he be ompensated? If he is just above he income qualification but is hreatened by a ruinously high medcal bill, will he get aid? If his bility to work is curtailed but not ullified by injury or nervous shock, ow much should he get? How do ifferent injuries compare and hat are their cash ratings: is it vorse to have an illegitimate child, broken leg, or epilepsy following evere concussion? Sheer lack of nformation about the victim comlicates the task still further, and nakes the first year of operation ighly experimental. During 1964 n California, there were 29,241 ases of murder and willful homiide, forcible rape and aggravated ssault, plus an unknown number of njuries inflicted during the course f robberies. This year there will ertainly be more, quite apart from he Watts incident, but lacking surey material into people's financial ackground, and the gravity and ost of their injuries, this year's posible claim total is completely unnown.

There would have been fewer unertainties had California followed he British scheme, introduced on ugust 1, 1964, of which the Ameran innovators were apparently unware. In England, awards are nade by the Criminal Injuries Comensation Board on a more generus basis. If the injuries are seious enough to cause three weeks' loss of work, or common-law damages of at least $140, victims are compensated for full loss of earnings up to a maximum of $95 a week (nearly double the national average wage). Even so, some limitations have been introduced, largely because of the government's fear of assuming full and open responsibility for the victims of crime, and compensating them "out of kindness" instead of as their legal right. At first there was no award for "loss of happiness," but this was later modified. There is still none for property damage, for the illegitimate child born of rape, or for the victim who was a member of the assailant's household.

Given his way, Judge McCarty would have simplified the whole thing by compensating everybody, regardless of income. He believes on principle that "if you get your teeth bashed in, you should be entitled to aid even if you are a millionaire." Families of murder victims should be fully supported, and that would include sending bright children to college. There is no chance that he will get his way, at least in the predictable future, both for reasons of principle, and for fear of the expense. Later modifications are more likely to be in the direction of raising the compensation ceiling (for which Senator McAteer is prepared to introduce fresh legislation, should total legitimate claims exceed $100,000 during 1966) than in changing or abolishing the income qualification. A more straightforward approach has been used in a companion bill, which will compensate people injured while coming to the aid of the police, or otherwise helping to prevent a crime or catching a criminal. Here the kitty will be unlimited, and there will be no income qualification — but claims for medical bills and property damage will have to be proved to the satisfaction of the appropriate law-enforcement authority, the State Board of Control, and the legislature. This generosity is relative to the infrequency with which such claims are expected (though the State Board is making no specific predictions).



In the long run, one of the most important consequences of these two bills will be the new dimension they give to state responsibility for its citizens which, though publicly deplored as smacking of the welfare state, is gradually inching its way into state and federal policies. Neither measure is likely to have an appreciable effect on criminal practice, according to Prof. Joseph D. Lohman, dean of criminology at Berkeley, nor will the second bill start people rushing to help the police, since the relationship between citizens and the law is too complex to be smoothed out overnight. But there is a good chance that the California experiment will spread to other states. Locally, it has enjoyed widespread approval, and reawakening speculation as to whether Senator McAteer intends to run as mayor of San Francisco; nationally, it has received more publicity than is generally accorded state legislation. New York and Illinois are thinking actively along the same lines, with the ultimate hope of preventing a repetition of the tragic Genovese case. Ambassador Goldberg, in a letter to Judge McCarty, expressed the view that "this beneficial legislation will be widely emulated throughout the country. It deserves to be."

Virgilian Whodunit

THAT AWFUL MESS ON VIA MERULANA. By Carlo Emilio Gadda. Translated from the Italian by William Weaver. George Braziller. 388 pp. $5.95.

Richard Howard

As each century puts its characteristic question—"Who owns it?" the 18th century asked; "Who is the heir?" the 19th — the 20th century asks "Whodunit?" and Mr. Capote's recent pieces in The New Yorker suggest the persistence of our curiosity when the crime is all the shabbier and apparently unmotivated. Concealment and Manifestation are the systole and diastole of our emotional life, and our investigation of murder provides the form in which, as Auden has remarked, society as a whole has to take the place of the victim and, on his behalf, demand restitution or grant forgiveness. "That awful mess on Via Merulana" is, among other things, a murder, assigned to Don Ciccio Ingravallo, "youngest and most envied official of the detective section: ubiquitous as the occasion required, omnipresent in all tenebrous matters."

The forward stress of Gadda's narrative, then, is accommodated and even enabled by a detective story, that inclusive, convinced form of the heroic quest in our time. "He maintained, among other things, that unforeseen catastrophes are never the consequences, or the effect, if you prefer, of a single motive, of a cause singular; but they are rather like a whirlpool, a cyclonic point of depression in the consciousness of the world, toward which a whole multitude of converging causes have contributed." It could not come earlier (page 3), this announcement of the governing image—"he also used words like knot or tangle or muddle" — the metaphoric emblem that fixes any work of literature midway between events and precepts.

Yet Gadda's novel, self-justifying, murmurous, anthological, affords difficulties precisely because it announces and so directly enacts what it is about and what it does, not at any one place but all along. As a narrative, this novel is unfinished, for such is the nature of human events, of what happens, that we cannot in words "finish" our exploration of them, cannot come to the end of anything. Gadda's work, like most great examples of modern literature —and this is one of the reasons he has so often been compared to Joyce, to Céline, to Musil—is an aporia, a confession of failure or impossibility. As The Man Without Qualities is unfinished, as Beckett will end The Unnamable "I can't go on. I must go on" — so Gadda's inquest remains without a conclusion.

Another quality of this buzzing, burrowing, exorbitantly metropolitan work that suggests its place in the primary canon of modernism is, certainly, its encyclopedic impulse. Its author, a Milanese engineer born in 1893, began it in 1938, completed a first version in Florence in 1947, and rewrote his pastiche until 1957, making it a palimpsest of Italian speech, manners and history, rather like one of those Roman monuments patched together out of ancient marble and 18th-century stucco: a baroque summa that had to be located in the capital city, where in truth all roads meet. Echoes of Italian literature from Petronius to D'Annunzio are sounded, mocked and assimilated, and in the patient exfoliation of a double crime, the "action's" focus widens from the bourgeois Roman apartment in a decaying neighborhood to the outlying towns and the countryside first qualified in literature as Virgilian: "olive groves barely silvered by the dawn and the prone skeletons of vines in the vineyards." There is even a visit to the Sibyl's cave, though in the contemporary version, all the leaves of the sacred books have been destroyed. Every style is included, every level of discourse and usage, from the most demotic to the most formal, the ritual and the oracular along with the argotic and the euphuistic (there are splendid passages of invective dressed—the time is 1927—to M solini), the broadly farcical, the pressionistic, the epic, the philosop cal and the lyric. Such a mixture is characteristic if not a vindication the great works of our time.

In a luxury apartment bui ing of an interstitial Roman nei borhood, within an interval of th days, an elderly Venetian count becomes the victim of a jewel r bery effected before her very e and—on the same floor, in the posite apartment— a pious, childle still attractive little bourgeoise, f ever searching for "nieces" to ado is found dead in a pool of blo The two investigations, conducted Ingravallo, merge into a single p suit as their trails circle more less significantly around a minister commendatore a little too attract to delivery boys, and a young cou of the murdered woman a little adept at accepting presents from h By the double clues of a street ticket found in the countess' apa ment and the testimony of a rat inexperienced whore arrested ne Santo Stefano Rotondo, the inquir widen from Rome to the Alban Hil the region of the Castelli Roma that powerfully genesic countrysi which regularly fertilizes the U with its human silt. As Rome is t central city, so the "central" writ by working outward from a beg ning—instead of onward toward end—pursues an endless quest: gravallo's epic finishing point, li Gadda's, is the starting point, rene ed and transformed by the energ of his own effort. The compositio trope is thus anabolic, and its t matic core is fecundity (what Ing vallo himself calls "the quantum Eros"). This is made explicit to t point of delirium in the person the pathetic victim Liliane, who o after the other harbors the prom ingly fertile girls she calls her niec and who already lays claim to t first (still hypothetical) scion of t cousin in whom alone the fam seed continues to germinate. T countess' jewels — bloodstones, rou or pendant — are more veiled sy bols of the same theme; a certa topaz begins, in an officer's drea to course the countryside, turning

---

Richard Howard, who has translated many books from the French, has completed his second book of poetry, The Damages. He is now working on a study of American poetry since 1950, to be published by Horizon.

in a bacchanale presided over by Circe and concluding in the latter's orgasm; in the extraordinary passage in which the recovered jewels are described, they are presented by the author as the most perfect products of the creative mechanism. And in the book's explosion from Rome to the Alban Hills, it is certainly to the initial fecundation by which the city was generated, the rape of the Sabine women, that the entire book alludes.

This thematic core of fecundation accounts for the astonishingly concrete lyricism of the "Awful Mess," the Pasticciaccio — the verbal substance of the world is expressed, in the old sense of that word, even in, or out of, its most wretched aspects: stinking whores, plucked hens, peel- ng walls. By the rotundity of a po- iceman, the splendor of a sandwich, he plethoric is dramatized; a pile of rags to be dyed, the visit of a rajah o Mussolini, a flight of chickens at he level-crossing in front of the single daily train, a sunrise over Latium—all mark an insistence on telling which, if it were not for magnificent organization by myth, theme and mage, would whelm our attention as t would our hope of reaching an end f the Event. And it is precisely this fluidity of language, this inex- austible verbal sap that constitutes, ultimately, the gist of Gadda's book, the juice or pith that makes his novel, perhaps, a scandal to the gentiles of art, and places it in a lineage, a descent not necessarily associated with art at all, but with an impulse located in the novel nowadays only because that is the name we give our dominant literary form, a "loose baggy monster" indeed, that can accommodate, baggily enough, any version of experience.

Yet this impulse has always existed in literature, in "forms" as different as those Rabelais, Saint-Simon, Boswell (the Boswell of the Journals), Horace Walpole, Sainte-Beuve and Proust have chosen to accord it. It is the impulse of process, the shaping of experience by a tone of voice, the definition of which is undertaken in the course of "endless" works. That gigantic and obsessive murmur which sometimes rises out of literature (and perhaps justifies it), from Amiel to Gertrude Stein, is again what we hear when we read Gadda—the sound of our own survival, the myth of our human continuity in a voice, "weaving an endless sentence," refusing to let go, to release existence until it has been recuperated by the only means in our power: the word. We hear, in short, the sound of ourselves when we seek to endure.

Invisible Man

MONTAIGNE: A Biography. By Donald Frame. Harcourt, Brace & World. 408 pp. $10.

Paul Zweig

When Montaigne wrote that his life ad been "humble and inglorious," e was being modest. By the time hese words were written, he had wice been mayor of Bordeaux, and more than once played host to a king (the future Henri IV) in his chateau t Montaigne. Yet these intervals of ublic life came late (he was more han 50), and they were brief. Be- ore them stretched the long years f his retirement; and before that, is undistinguished career as mem- er of the Bordeaux Parliament.

In the end, the major "events" of onaigne's life were invisible. They ere inward events, and they ced not in acts but in the words of his unique spiritual record, the Essays. Any biography of Montaigne must therefore depend heavily on the Essays. It must be an inward biography, telling the story of his mind as much as of his life. Mr. Frame, more than anyone, is equipped from the start for such an undertaking. His translation of the Essays is one of the best ever done, and stands on its own as a fine work of English prose.

The Montaigne we meet in Mr. Frame's pages is no metaphysician. His ideas are close to life; so close, in fact, that to speak of them, he could only speak of himself. As the man changed, so did his book: new chapters were added, old ones revised, judgments qualified or reversed. The result is a wayward pattern of thoughts, anecdotes and self-evaluations whose main care is to be faithful, but not consistent. Between the book and life the distinctions became vague, until Montaigne, long before Whitman or Rousseau, could say: "I have no more made my book than my book has made me—a book consubstantial with its author, concerned with myself, an integral part of my life."

Mr. Frame marshals the sparse details that have been preserved of Montaigne's life: his family, his estate, the documents and letters of his public life, the late friendship with his fille d'alliance, Marie de Gournay. The facts are rare, and each one adds a contour, tantalizingly faint, to our knowledge of the living Montaigne. The bulk of the biography, however, consists in a judicious reading of the Essays themselves. Mr. Frame unravels the mosaic of additions and alterations by which the Essays grew. In doing so, he gives us a clear sense of Montaigne's own spiritual growth, from the morbid though fashionable stoicism of the early chapters, through the great statement of universal doubt (Que sais-je . . .) in the "Apology for Raymond Sebond," to the last chapters of self-exploration, the friendship with himself that led Montaigne into his most characteristic philosophy.

Montaigne's life, we learn, was

---

aul Zweig received his doctorate om the Sorbonne, lives in France nd teaches English at the summer ssion at Columbia University.

NEW VINTAGE PAPERBACK

The Anatomy of Revolution
Crane Brinton

THE ANATOMY OF REVOLUTION
By Crane Brinton. A revised and expanded edition of a masterpiece of historical scholarship, written in an urbane and witty style.
$1.65, now at your bookstore
VINTAGE BOOKS are published by
ALFRED•A•KNOPF and RANDOM HOUSE
For catalog, write Random House,
457 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10022

abruptly deflected inward, toward the age of 30, by a tragic event: the death of his friend, Etienne de la Boetie. Until then, Montaigne seems to have been a brilliant young nobleman, only partly excited by his responsibilities in Parliament; sensitive to the pleasures of life. La Boetie's death turned Montaigne back upon himself, and the next ten years were spent in the shadow of his friend's example, exploring his ideas, attempting to resolve the loneliness caused by the loss of so close a companion. For ten years Montaigne lived with death: after la Boetie there was Montaigne's younger brother absurdly killed by a tennis ball; then, shortly afterward, the death of his father. Mr. Frame suggests that the early essays were written, in part, to fill the place left by la Boetie's disappearance. Montaigne needed to communicate, to exchange ideas and emotions. When his friend died, a gulf opened between him and the world, and he was left to converse with himself. The first chapters—written, he tells us, to occupy "moments of boredom" —are this conversation.

Thus, Montaigne's journey into himself began with a meditation upon death; and his first conclusion was that of his famous early chapter: "to philosophize means to learn how to die." Like Camus, four centuries later, Montaigne started as a moralist, convinced that death was meaningless and overpowering, and that a man could shape his life only by keeping a steady eye on that dark wind blowing in from his future. But Montaigne soon discovered that he had made too much of dying. It was his own death which taught him this, we learn from Mr. Frame, or rather what he took as a preview of his death, when he was knocked from his horse in a collision and carried home, more dead than alive. Death seen from such close quarters, he found, was not nearly as frightening as he had supposed. How wasteful, therefore, to devote all one's energies to scrutinizing, and preparing for it. It is characteristic of Montaigne that his most permanent moral lessons came not from books (as was partly the case with his early stoicism) but from close attention to his own life.

In any case, the Montaigne we know best begins to emerge around this time, in the "Apology for Raymond Sebond." It is here that Montaigne begins to recognize the world as a "perennial seesaw," a disorderly tide of events and objects, in which a man can know little beyond his own small circle of inwardness. The "Apology" was written to defend Catholicism against the Protestants, and its argument was that of fideism, a reliance on faith as opposed to reason; if individual reason was so frail, the only safe haven for the soul was the massiveness and the guarantee of God's Church.

But Montaigne remains the first and greatest of the modern "doubters." Long before the Existentialists, he discovered the absurdity not only of death but of life and of all reality. His fideism was to be inherited, in one form or another by Pascal and, later, by Kierkegaard. But Montaigne soon learned another response to the shifting uncertainties of the world. Long in seeking, late in choosing, he at last discovered a theme for his book that would give him a new, surer kind of knowledge. Since all science was necessarily doubtful, Montaigne decided to study what he at least knew best. He would make himself the subject of his book: self-study would be his "physics and his metaphysics." In a world where outward values were apt to be faulty, Montaigne learned to favor an inward attentiveness by which he could become more central to himself, and thereby to all men. In its final shape, Montaigne's self-scrutiny became a philosophy: since "each man bears the entire form of man's estate," to study one man well meant to discover truths common to all men. Self-scrutiny became, indeed, the only truly sensitive philosophy.

Montaigne is thus the first great psychological realist. And this brings us to another aspect of his originality. In Meditations on Quixote, Ortega wrote that modern "realism" carries within it a grain of sad humor. Brute, stubborn facts, he tells us, are aesthetically interesting not for themselves but for the ironic light they shed on the flight of man's imagination: his heroic impulses, his search for more than human dignity. In the "realistic" mood, reality gives a slight nudge to the hero: and as he stumbles, we taste both his comic disappointment and the tragedy of his failure. Don Quixote the hero, and Sancho the earthy realist, need each other. Together they create a new sort of comédie humaine: an essential confusion of styles and sensibilities that will characterize the world of the novel.

The psychological realism of the Essays is of the same sort, exce that Montaigne himself plays bo Quixote and Sancho. High seriousne and earthy Gascon slang nudge ea other continuously. The stoic herois of the first chapters is playfully b decidedly undercut by other passage for example, those where Montaig accurately complains about the c prices of his "unruly member," a tells of some "remedy" he once fered a troubled bridegroom. Wh Montaigne is through, there remai little of the Renaissance confiden in man as a bright compendium the universe, a microcosm, "rege and masterpiece of God's creation Instead, we see the elusive contou of the inner life, in which the be and the worst, the highest and t lowest, come far too close to ea other for comfort.

In reading Mr. Frame's accou we feel increasingly that we are sure hands. When, on the basis such meager evidence as there Mr. Frame evaluates the tone of Mo taigne's marriage, the influence his father, the mood of his ear retirement, or the kind of involv ment he felt during his terms mayor, one is not inclined to questic his judicious conclusions. Yet som thing in the very nature of his m terial seems to have posed a proble which Mr. Frame, I think, does n entirely resolve. At a distance of 4 years, there remain two extensi bodies of fact concerning Montaign One is the inner record of the Essay The other is the more general ki of information furnished by historia who can tell us what, approximatel was the life of a small 16th-centu nobleman in the southwest of Franc what was the mood and procedu of the Bordeaux Parliament; wh kinds of factions split the allegian of French noblemen at the time, et Between these two sources, howeve at the precise line where they shou intersect to give us the single separa life of Michel de Montaigne, the fac are scarce. Thus the man himse runs the risk of being blurred; lacking the kind of sharp definitic that would allow him to live agai for us as we read. This, unfortunatel is what often happens in Mr. Frame biography. The account we get clear, judicious and extremely usefu Yet the dramatic presence of Mo taigne himself is often lacking. As result the reading tends to be slo and, in places, simply dull.

Despite the limitations of his m

New...from Caedmon Records

The only recording of Ernest Hemingway
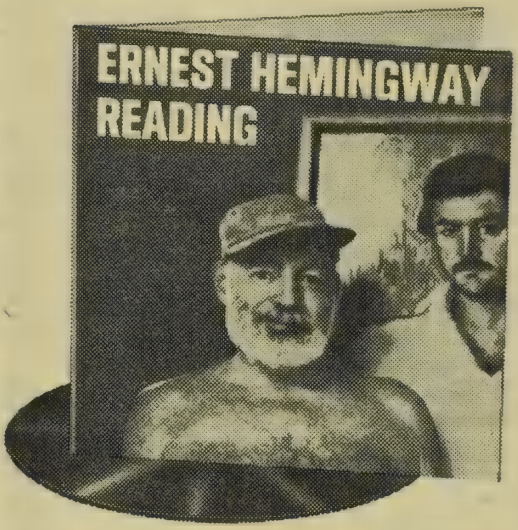
reading his works

This historic album was created from the now-legendary tape recordings Hemingway made for himself and his friends in the years 1948-1961. They have never been available to the public.

HERE is the Ernest Hemingway known to his intimate circle . . . the teller of tall stories, the tender man in love, the brash and bawdy wit, the serious searcher for truth. In this remarkable album, you will hear Second Poem to Mary; a selection from Work in Progress; the autobiographical memoir, Saturday Night at the Whorehouse in Billings, Montana; the moving Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech; In Harry's Bar in Venice, a rare moment of Hemingway parodying The New Yorker parodying Hemingway; The Fifth Column, describing the anguished Spanish Civil War days.

Mary Hemingway, and A. E. Hotchner, Hemingway's good friend, have written personal background notes for this long-awaited album. It is the only spoken testament left to us of the man Hemingway was.



OTHER UNIQUE RECORDINGS FROM CAEDMON

Robert FROST reads his poetry

bert Frost's own New gland voice reads The sture, Mending Wall, rches, After Apple king, and other poems.

DYLAN
THOMAS
reading

Dylan Thomas in ■ lyrical reading of A Child's Christmas in Wales, In the White Giant's Thigh, and other poems.

Carl Sandburg reads Windy City, In Tall Grass, Four Preludes, Southern Pacific, and other well-known poems.

E. E. Cummings in selections from his poetry, including when god decided to invent, Santa claus, i say no world.

T.S. Eliot interpreting a choice selection of his poetry, including Prufrock, Portrait of a Lady, Ash Wednesday, Marina.

William Faulkner reads his famed Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech, selections from As I Lay Dying, and other works.

At better record and book stores, or mail coupon below

AEDMON RECORDS have enriched the American literary scene by bringing into homes and schools voices of the distinguished poets and writers of r time. Notable Caedmon albums include the ned original cast recording of Dylan Thomas' ıder Milk Wood; Richard Burton reading the love ics of John Donne; Sir John Gielgud interpreting akespeare's sonnets; and Lotte Lenya, in an evocae reading of the tales of Kafka.

edmon records are available at fine record and ok stores. Or, you may order any of the albums own, simply by using the coupon provided. Please close check or money order. We pay postage.

AEDMON RECORDS

Pioneer in spoken-word recording

Caedmon Records, Dept. 108
461 Eighth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10001

Please send the albums I have indicated at the right. I enclose my check or money order for $5.95 in full payment for each album. (Add sales tax where necessary.) All are 12-inch long playing records which may be used on any 33⅓ rpm phonograph.

Name..

Address..

City..

State..................................Zip Code..............

CHECK THE ALBUMS YOU WISH:

☐ Ernest Hemingway
☐ Robert Frost
☐ Dylan Thomas
☐ Carl Sandburg
☐ E. E. Cummings
☐ T. S. Eliot
☐ William Faulkner
☐ Please send your complete 72-page catalogue.

terial, I found myself wishing that Mr. Frame had been more adventurous at times, giving us more his Montaigne rather than simply a verifiable, believable Montaigne. We get a clear picture, for example, of Montaigne's unusual early education; but nowhere does Mr. Frame allow this knowledge to shed light on the mature choices of the man, though the correspondences are surely interesting. The wayward, unconstrained learning of the boy, his preference for Ovid's Metamorphoses over all scholarly discipline, his early association of knowledge with pleasure, and with a certain sort of self-indulgence: all this echoes strangely in the mature man's talent for self-scrutiny and humor, in his mistrust of constraint, and his final affirmation of life in the face of all its painful absurdities. The scholar's trust in facts could have agreeably been supplemented here by a more creative insight into the way facts are related to one another. The result, in this case, is a dependable, scholarly biography, one sorely needed, written in a lucid style, but whose cumulative effect lacks the excitement and the stimulation of those Essays on which it is largely based.

"an intellectual event..."*

SOCIALIST HUMANISM

A far-ranging selection of essays, from both sides of the Iron Curtain

edited by

ERICH FROMM

"At the very moment when, in the name of 'humanity' we are at war with people identified as 'Communists' in Vietnam, there appears a book which unabashedly refers to the founder of Communism as a humanist and roundly denounces those who use him in any other way." —Harvey Cox, *Saturday Review "The real interest lies in comparing the attitudes of Eastern 'revisionists' with those of their Western counterparts."—George Lichtheim, N. Y. Review of Books. $5.95 at all booksellers.

DOUBLEDAY

The Substance of Spirit

NOTEBOOKS: 1942-1951. By Albert Camus. Translated from the French by Justin O'Brien. Alfred A. Knopf. 274 pp. $5.

Harold Clurman

Writers and students of literature will be fascinated by the Camus Notebooks for the insight it affords into the processes of the creative mind. Of more general and greater interest is the data the book provides as to the substance of Camus' spirit. The Notebooks reveals the essential person. What makes this important is the fact that Camus is one of the most representative men of our time. What troubled him has troubled and continues to trouble us.

In these Notebooks, the operative ingredient is the author's conscience. It is involved in a vital struggle. Though this takes place in an individual soul its setting and cause is the history of our day, which has been a period of permanent violence.

Born in Algiers on the eve of the First World War (in which he lost his father), killed in an automobile accident while the French-Algerian conflict was still sharp, Camus seems never to have known peace. At the outbreak of the Second World War he was 26. Unable to take part in active service due to a tubercular condition diagnosed when he was 17, he had to leave his wife and mother in Algeria during the war to receive medical treatment in France. He never saw them again till the cessation of hostilities. He edited an underground paper and, to quote his excellent translator, Justin O'Brien, he "played an increasingly dangerous role . . . as a member of an intelligence network. Even though many of his friends and associates were arrested, often tortured and executed, he carried on with his stirring editorials and his day-to-day clandestine activities." After the war there was another in Indo-China, followed by the one in Algeria, with its vile backwash in Paris.

Camus wrote his famous essay The Myth of Sisyphus in 1942, but it attracted little attention here at the time. The Stranger, written the same year, made a distinct impression. That impression however was misleading due to misreading. The novel was thought to be an avowal of nihilism arising from a deep-seated sentiment of futility. But The Stran is a description rather than a c fession. It is a dramatization of moral apathy in the years im diately preceding the war, a se of discouragement which many p ple in France and elsewhere to present moment display as if it w a badge of distinction.

To say that this interpretation Camus' meaning was the reverse the truth would be an oversimplifi tion. Camus grips us through anguished dialogue of his being. experiences the "nay" to its bitter dregs before he can save hims with a "yea." He is an idealist in constant trance of doubt. He belie in virtue, yet he writes, "I know self too well to believe in pure tue." This statement may be regar as the germ idea of his most famo though not his best, novel, The F Despite his repeated emphasis on own and the universal guilt, he parently contradicts himself when notes: "Nothing is pure, nothing pure—this is the cry that has pois ed our century."

The positive in Camus is generat by his contradictions. On one pa he upholds chastity as an ideal sta on another he admits that he can imagine love for a woman dissociat from physical possession. He voi a horror of life and gives evidence a passionate love for it. He is favor of commitment (engageme as the French say) and also arg against it. He is a novelist but calls The Plague a tract, and furt on adds: "Up to now I am not novelist in the usual sense." The is something abhorrent to him ab politics but he also asserts that "m ern man is obliged to be concern with politics."

What is at the root of this d quiet? If God does not exist, and doesn't for Camus, then everythi is absurd. Morality has lost its tional basis. When we contempl the facts of life, of which the fir issue is death, the result is not o personally excruciating but devas ting to any strict metaphysical fai To decide whether or not life worth living, Camus had said in T Myth of Sisyphus, is the fundamen problem of philosophy. Why then we not commit suicide, since there no reason for living?

The simplest answer is that m unreasonably wants to live. Cam as translated this primal motiva-ion into the idea of a conscious rebel-ion against life's absurdity. And ince ultimately truth appears in hat we do, rather than in what e think, man's life is acceptable nd intelligible in his revolt against s "insanity."

Such an answer no matter in hat intellectual jargon it is clothed ill not satisfy the philosopher, but it ay satisfy the artist. There is a mys-erious, magnificent and essentially own-to-earth drama about it — in-luding moments of great comedy. In ll his key responses, howsoever soterically elaborate they may seem, amus is an artist rather than a rmal thinker. He recognizes this imself. "The absurd world," he says, an receive only an aesthetic jusfication." Even more intimately he eclares: "A world in which there is place for the human being, for y, for active leisure, is a world that ust die. No group of people can e without beauty."

Now another doubt assails him:
Iave I the right to be merely an tist? I cannot believe so." On what rms and standards does he find mself prepared to protest and rebel?
he values I ought to defend and ustrate today are average values." ter all is said in the paradoxical d poetic structure of his philosophic ual, Camus fights such things as pital punishment, Hitlerism, Stalin-n, prejudices, vices and deformities ich all men of good will every-ere have opposed for at least the st thirty years. Camus ceased fight-g and being partisan on the Al-rian question. As a Frenchman of giers he felt himself as hesitantly lnerable in this respect as men of ser stature might have been. He uld not take sides or maintain an equivocal position.

Here we observe the personality
ference between Camus and Sartre, difference which caused the con-versy and their break in 1952.
mus was much the softer of the o. He engaged in politics but he ped somehow to stand apart from tory. The mechanism of history tails compromise, a pragmatism ich requires assent to elements of ustice and cruelty. There is a derness in Camus, a kind of inner bing and tremulousness, which de such assent impossible. This pite his effort to avoid the senental. Artists or poets may be, in elley's aphorism quoted by Camus, "the unacknowledged legislators of the world," but while they sometimes make brave fighters they rarely prove effective politicians.

The literary and artistic contribution of Camus' work is the quasi-mythical forms which he fashioned to express our contemporary malaise and the sense of his struggle to master it. We find it particularly poignant in The Plague and in The Fall, novels written in a language of classic purity, wrought into a discreetly gentle music. His Notebooks is a treasury of fine perceptions which served as the grist to his compositional mill. It is occasionally witty, sometimes as disarming as a college boy's enthusiasm and bewilderment at all the wonderful things he reads in the best books in the world, and at all his discoveries about himself.

This book should be read slowly —in bits and pieces. It traces a clear picture which is apparent only on reflection. It is finally inspirational. For it affirms what must be endlessly repeated: "Are we going to accept despair, without doing anything? I suppose no honest person can answer yes."

After Sedley, After Pound

ALL THE COLLECTED SHORT POEMS 1923-1958. By Louis Zukofsky. W. W. Norton & Co. 157 pp. $6.

Donald Davie

For those who need to know that Picasso could draw a likeness if he chose, Exhibit A is Zukofsky after Sir Charles Sedley:

Not, Celia, that I look for rest
In what I do or am;
In its own time this song addressed
To you is not for them:

The hurrying world, our hastes have
No part in you like me;
Faces stop showing what they crave
In my attempt to see.

"All that in woman is adored"
Grows my phrase, and your mind
Sings some hundreds of years to afford
My cadence in kind.

And if your ears hear me I store
It in our book Anew
Where we last who make Sedley—more Than he was perhaps—true.

Would he had writ thus always? Hardly. The high gloss on this elegant pastiche obscures rather than clarifies —certainly on a first reading and even on a second: the suavity of the phrasing conceals its compactness, although it is the compactness that makes the poem both difficult and rewarding. "Like me," for instance, means both "such as I have" and "such as they (our hastes) have in me." Again, the colon after the first quatrain explains "them" as being "this hurrying world" and "our hastes"; and yet when it turns out that these are the joint subject of another sentence, we make a rapid retrospective adjustment, and read "them" as the speaker's doings and beings ("what I do or am"). And this is not to mention the elusive sense of the faces that stop showing what they crave. This is a language

---

Donald Davie, English poet and critic, teaches at the University of Essex. The most recent of his published books is The Poems of Doctor Zhivago (Barnes and Noble).

"A penetrating and sophisticated study."
—Walter Johnson
University of Chicago

THE POVERTY OF ABUNDANCE

Hoover, the Nation, the Depression

By ALBERT U. ROMASCO

When he departed from the White House in 1933 after nearly four years of worsening depression, Herbert Hoover left behind the image of an inept, do-nothing President. Professor Romasco now takes a detached view of what happened between 1929 and 1933, to find out what Hoover tried to do, the methods he used, and how successful he was. Providing new insights into the depression years, he lifts some of the burden from Hoover's shoulders, spreads it more evenly over the nation's institutional leadership, and shows how the groundwork for the New Deal was laid in the very period for which Hoover had to take most of the blame for the nation's troubles. $6.00

At all bookstores
OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
NEW YORK

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you as a bonus copy upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my bonus issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME__________

ADDRESS__________

CITY__________STATE__________ZIP No.__________

11-1-65

to which the norms of prose synt are essential (hence the very sedulo punctuation), though it breaks t norms even as it respects them.

Zukofsky respects and uses gra mar because many of his poems, ea and late, are tight argumentative a fairs. And this means that, althou he belongs in the Poundian traditi with which he aligns himself, he quite often within hailing distance a quite distinct tradition which f a long time was more influenti among us—the wit writing of All Tate, say, or William Empson. Empson writes about cleaning h teeth into a lake while camping o so Zukofsky addresses his washsta and, through elliptical allusions designs half-glimpsed in acciden scratchings on its marble tiles, comes to the noble humaneness Empson at his best:

> so my wash-stand > in one particular breaking of th > tile at which I have > looked and looked
>
> has opposed to my head > the inscription of a head > whose coinage is the > coinage of the poor
>
> observant in waiting > in their getting up mornings > and in their waiting > going to bed
>
> carefully attentive > to what they have > and to what they do not > have

The Empsonian or "new" criticis ought to have appreciated the ma poems by Zukofsky which are den with compressed conceits in the 17t century manner, or (as with a pie about barberries in snow) in the n ultimately different manner of Ho kins. But in fact that criticism i nored Zukofsky, and among his pee it was Pound and Williams who a preciated and helped.

The ties which bind him to Pou are thus in the first place person and grateful. But he is indebted Pound also for concepts and prec cupations, as appears from the not which in one or two cases he a pends to poems. And not only co cepts but perceptions also come him sometimes from the same sourc as in a poem about a privet leaf winter, which ends:

> it happens wind colors like glas > shelter,
> as the light's aire from a vaul > which has a knob of sun.

Surely the most Poundian lines n written by Pound!

But above all what aligns Zukofsky vith Pound and Williams, what removes him from the world of wit vriting, is his concern, first and last, vith the musical measure of verse. 'he poem about the washstand is in laces obscure. But it is less obscure han the poem after Sedley which at irst seems so straightforward. And t is less obscure because, being so nuch further from counting off syllables to the verse line, it can use ine endings, as apparent on the rinted page and to the listening ear, o compel meaningful inflections:

carefully attentive
to what they have
and to what they do not have . . .

his is rudimentary. Zukofsky's more laborated music offers itself most ankly in the opulent orchestration f a poem to Tibor Serly, midway in first section headed "55 Poems 1923-1935." (This poem is still full of witty conceits, and excellent ones.) It is at its most elusive in the section "Anew 1935-1944," where it most often eludes me — and for reasons which are made clear:

The lines of this new song are nothing
But a tune making the nothing full Stonelike become more hard than silent
The tune's image holding in the line.

In the longest poem in the collection, "4 Other Countries" from Barely and Widely 1956-1958, the music, in its double aspect of submerged half rhyme and of spaced intervals at the ends of short lines, makes for astonishingly compact expression, and this vindicates more than one would have thought possible, that inherently unsatisfactory form, the poem as travelogue.

ETTER from ROME

Elisabeth Mann Borgese

ome was glowing in a late autumn n which warmed the blush on the ees of the Pincio gardens, and drew representative cross section of the pulation outdoors, to communal reet life. All sorts of people moved p and down the Spanish Steps beveen the umbrella-shaded flower ands below and the towers of St. rinita dei Monti above. A prelate, astening down the steps to catch a ecial bus headed for the Ecumenical uncil, almost stumbled over a beatk who had made his bed on the eps, his bearded boy-face resting a knapsack. A crowd of urchins d not stint their colorful comments.

Apart from the Council, the Eternal ty was host these days to an inrnational conference called to exore the meaning of European ant-gardes, past and present. Not at this was a gathering of beatks. It was the fourth international ngress of the European Community Writers. Founded by the Italian iter G. B. Angioletti five years ago, e "Community" now counts about 500 members in twenty-seven nans on both sides of the iron curn. The scope of the organization, stated in its charter, is "to promote, above the level of ideological and political differences, a close collaboration among the European writers on all professional problems of a moral or practical character; to increase the free circulation of the spirit; to encourage encounters, exchanges, translations, in order to advance mutual understanding and solidarity; and to aid any initiative that enhances the dignity and the authority of writers." The Community's past activities include international assemblies in Rome, Turin, Florence; council meetings and round-table discussions in Paris, Athens, Yasnaya Polyana, Leningrad, Belgrade and Marienbad. The topics ranged from the problems of the modern novel to literary magazines in Europe; from the relations between literature and mass communication to the problems of translating poetry. Besides these public manifestations, the Community has pursued considerable behind-the-scenes activity in behalf of writers, persecuted or imprisoned, whether in the Soviet Union or in Spain or Portugal. To appraise the level of these operations, it is enough to glance at the list of the organization's officers, elected by this assembly; Giuseppe Ungaretti, president; Giancarlo Vigorelli, secretary general (a position he has held, brilliantly and creatively, since the foundation of the organization); vice presidents: Jean Paul Sartre, France; Halldor Kiljan Laxness, Iceland; José Luis Aranguren, Spain; Tibor Dery, Hungary; Jaroslav Iwaszkievic, Poland; John Lehmann, England; Alexander Tvardovsky, USSR.

The fourth assembly took place in the large and well-equipped auditorium of the CIDA (Confederazione Italiane Dirigenti Aziende). About 150 writers had come from outside Italy, including—besides those listed above—Simone de Beauvoir, Ingeborg Bachmann, Maurice Nadeau, Rafael Alberti, Jesu Lopez Pacheco and Nicolaj Bajan. UNESCO was represented by Roger Callois; the PEN Club by its international secretary, David Carver. One entire session was reserved to speakers who represented the younger generation: the avant-garde of today. This session was presided over by the young Spanish poet and publisher Carlos Barral. Various schools of European avant-gardists were represented by Jens Björnebec, Alain Geoffroy, Renato Barilli, John Willit, Vassily Aksionov, Klaus Rifbjerg, Desmond O'Grady, and others.

No theme could have been more challenging, more elusive, more charged with implications of a cultural, even political, character than that of avant-gardism — especially isabeth Mann Borgese contributes quently to The Nation on European ellectual and political matters. Mrs. rgese lives in Italy.

---

RODALE'S
QUINTO LINGO

Learn or maintain your skill in French, Spanish, German, or Italian the new way. QUINTO LINGO presents the same fascinating articles, anecdotes, and jokes in all four languages, plus English, in 5 side by side columns. Read something from QUINTO LINGO each day and watch your skill in a foreign language grow. Learn the reading-way, not the grammar-rule way.

SUBSCRIBE TODAY

FREE with each new subscription: A pronunciation-teacher phonograph record.

Rodale Press is one of the leading producers of reference texts, magazines, and books, such as the widely-hailed Word Finder and Synonym Finder.

QUINTO LINGO Dept. NA 7
RODALE PRESS, INC.
Emmaus, Pa.

Please enter my subscription to Quinto Lingo. Also enclose my FREE record indicated below.
1 year (12 issues) $5.00

☐ German ☐ French ☐ Spanish ☐ Italian

Name
Address
City State Zip

when considered by representatives of the twenties and of the sixties, of the East and of the West. In the first place, the participants had the greatest difficulty coming to a general agreement as to the real meaning of the term. A brilliant attempt was made during the first day by Jean-Paul Sartre. Rejecting almost all of the European avant-gardes of our day as spurious ("they define themselves more by what they reject than by what they construct"; this in itself reflects the "age of criticism" of our aged, neo-Byzantine civilization), Sartre proposed four conditions which a true avant-garde writer would have to fulfill: (1) He must create language as he writes. (2) This must not be just a "game" but must result in a true vision which can be shared by the writer's contemporaries. (3) The writer must establish a dialectical relationship with contrasting cultures: cultures to be defined by contradictions. (4) He must create the audience "with his own hands." The audience must not be pre-existing, ready made, imposing its tastes and prejudice.

These conditions existed at other times — in 17th-century France, in Elizabethan England — and in such epochs art was true avant-garde. They do not exist in Europe today.

Sartre thus postulates a coincidence of form and content for avant-garde art (he rejects Western European "futurism" because, though revolutionary in form, it was reactionary in content; he rejects neo-realism which, though revolutionary in content, is reactionary in form). He also projects his criteria outside the work of art itself and postulates a coincidence between art and history. Only in a historically creative moment can society produce creative, avant-garde art.

Today, according to Sartre, the prerequisite for avant-garde art must be sought outside Europe; in Asia, Africa and Latin America. In such countries, where native language atrophied or regressed under the pressure of colonialism, the inevitable choice between a revitalized native idiom or an adapted European language itself imposes on the writer an avant-garde attitude. Language has to be created: an explosion of thought is touched off; a new world comes into being. The Western world is repudiated and ancient, indigenous cultures are streamlined and accelerated by revolutionary movements. In these situations—as occurred in Europe in other epochs—avant-gardism is not only literary; it involves the whole culture. And the public is created by the same forces that create this true avant-garde art.

Sartre's exposition drew resounding applause, but not everybody agreed with him. John Willet, assistant editor of the London Times Literary Supplement which recently ran a special issue on the avant-garde, argued that avant-garde literature must somehow reflect the most advanced spirit of our age: as modified by modern science, by automation, by new experiences of time and space. These influences, however, can be found only in the industrialized "advanced" countries. In fact, the literature of the "new" countries lags far behind. It is in the advanced countries that art creates new syntheses, offers new images, becomes experimental art. Willet drew particular attention to the new "pictorial poetry," a fusion of verse and painting to create images, much as modern psychology believes our thought processes create images.

The poet, Giuseppe Ungaretti, had some doubts. He wondered whether any of these "experiments" would endure, whether they were more than tricks to camouflage the agony of certain structures as the brilliant birth of . . . nothing. Ungaretti took a melancholy view of our art and o age. "Is a poetic language still p sible today?" he asked.

> Time has undergone such an a celeration that there is no longe any relationship between time an space. Time seems today withou duration: which means there is n longer any possibility of contem plation: hence, of poetic expression If contemplation is out, and tim has no duration, how can we giv a durable expression to poetry What we call poetry today, has i not become an act of despair What we call today written poetry is it not a denigration of the word An instantaneous succession o forms that fall into oblivion at th twinkling of an eye? Nature, Esenin complained, is shrinking from mo ment to moment. Must man capit ulate before automation? Must h transform himself into a robot o science fiction? Must he renounc his human prerogatives? These ar the grave problems of our time.

Another poet, the Belgian Robe Goffin, thought it altogether futile talk about the avant-garde of toda because we are not in a position know anything about it. What is t real avant-garde of today will be u derstood only tomorrow. All we c judge today is the past, the avan garde of yesterday.

These are discordant voices—just a few samples—chosen from

My Hand

My hand wants comfort.
It wants to rest in a pocket
Or under a pillow.
It says: I'm tired of clutching things
Which in the end I have to let go.
My strength has become painful.
Make me inert.
Make me forget what it is like to feel.

My Legs

My legs often collapse.
It is not that they are thin,
That sickness has made them weak.
It is a kind of prayer with them
For the man they carry Back and forth, through life.

The Boss Hires

I want a man who has nothing to gain.
I want his face to say: nothing more is to be lost.
I want to see from his hands:
That he shall not mind the hours,
That he shall stay on, that the pay will never be just.

Charles Simic

eat chorus; voices belonging to different generations, different nationali- es, different philosophies, yet all elonging to the West. The real "is- ıes" emerged when the concept of vant-garde" was faced across the oundary between West and East.

The history of the avant-garde in astern Europe was summarized with lmirable intellectual honesty and ankness by the Czech critic Eduard oldstücker — whose name is con- cted in literary history with the vival of Kafka in the Socialist coun- es. Goldstücker began at the begin- ng of this century, which has seen e rise of successive waves of Rus- an Futurism, Imagism, Surreal- n, as exemplified by such great gures as Majakovsky, Esenin and hers. These poets not only sought and found—new forms, new modes expression. They wanted to "trans- rm the world." This drew them into e ranks of the Communist revolu- n, a situation pregnant with trage- ; because the search for the new d untrammeled, the urge to trans- m the world, cannot long be con- ained in military ranks and files. e very term "avant-garde," taken om military experience, is ill-chosen describe the striving of free spirits point noted by more than one eaker).

Partly these poets became disil- ioned with the revolution and de- ted into despair and suicide. Part- the Communist revolution, once toriously installed, took a new k — not dictated in any way by rxist doctrine — at the relations ween the artist and society. Can Socialist society afford an avant- de art, with its restricted appeal a small elite? Must not art be bilized, as is every other aspect human activity, in the service of ial and economic progress? Must ıot be democratic; accessible to all sses?

Thus, Mr. Goldstücker explained, normal evolution of avant-garde in his own country was inter- ted twice: once by the advent of zi-fascism and then by the Com- nist revolution.

But art resisted mobilization, and the Twentieth Party Congress (56) the law was changed. Avant- dism was given, if not free rein, least a longer rein. In Czechoslo- ia, in Poland, in Hungary avant- dism is trying to catch up with West; and is not doing too badly, ne considers the two setbacks.

But the difference between the Eastern and the Western concepts of avant-garde as became evident from these discussions, is too deep to be explained by a mere time lag.

In the West, as we have seen, avant-garde is a concept that rather defies definition. An avant-garde writer, in the last analysis, is one who says he is an avant-garde writer and who is accepted by other self-appointed avant-gardists. The notion implies a component of anarchism. Trying to shock a bourgeoisie which is rather hard to shock by now and tends less to oppress art than to smother it under facile and snobbish applause, the Western avant-gardist often resorts to antics—like an adolescent whose impulse to rebel is frustrated by the permissiveness of his parents.

East European Communists, on the other hand, have fused the concept of avant-garde with their concept of "humanism." This became clear as they spoke one after the other to the assembly. Said the Russian critic, B. Sutchov: "The values on which the artist draws and which determine his aesthetic judgment must be close to life, in order to give to man the feeling of his own spiritual importance. Marxists do not accept certain types of so-called avant-garde art which codify and exalt the laceration of the human personality." Avant-garde art, said Alexander Tvardovsky, must be responsible. First of all, it must have faith: faith in the future; faith in the new man that it must create. Avant-garde art must create new values.

This fundamental difference between the Western and Eastern concepts does not concern art alone. It is of a far more general cultural, social and political importance. For, in the last analysis, what is an avant-garde but the spiritual and artistic aspect of revolution? The point was raised only on the last day, by the Italian critic, C. G. Argan.

The West, by and large, rejects revolution. Being liberal—when it is liberal—it grants some kind of fools' license to its avant-gardists. It recognizes their "experimental" value. After the "great break" which is assumed to be now behind us, the function of various avant-gardes is to effect micro-changes, or mutations, which will eventually contribute to the further peaceful evolution of the arts.

The East still believes in revolution. Not at home, of course, where new values have triumphed, and a new man is in the making. At home, avant-gardism can only celebrate this new man and affirm the new values. But in the rest of the world, where revolution is yet to come, avant-gardism has a different function: that of undermining bourgeois values, of breaking up bourgeois forms. When the day of revolution is still distant, the relation between revolution and the avant-garde is idyllic (many Western European avant-gardists are Communists). However, the revolution must construct as well as demolish. In fact it can demolish effectively only when the constructive ideal is mature, ready to occupy the void. Therefore, as revolution draws nearer, the relations between communism and the Western-type avant-garde become strained.

Some form of revolution seems inevitable in large parts of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The "Socialist" East has one concept of this revolution, the "liberal" West has another. As Walter Lippmann pointed out in a recent column, that is the crucial issue dividing us. The concept of revolution needs redefining—as does the concept of war. A new definition of "avant-garde" in the arts is a corollary of — or signpost to — this new definition of revolution.

A dialogue on the subject between East and West is therefore essential. It could not have found a more suitable forum than the fourth congress of the European Community of Writers, the proceedings of which are soon to be published in book form.

The congress offered ample occasion for social contacts, parties, receptions. A private, advance showing of Fellini's newest film Giulietta degli Spiriti was arranged for the writers. The President of the Republic, Giuseppe Saragat, received the writers and led them on a "guided tour" through the Quirinale. Official messages from members of the cabinet, of parliament, of the Roman city government, abounded. Messages came also from UNESCO, the PEN Club, and other affiliated organizations. The most interesting result of these wider contacts was that, encouraged by the experience and the success of the European Community of Writers, similar groups are being formed in other cultural "regions." A Latin American "Community" has already been officially established; an African "Community" is in the making. Nothing would be more welcome than an initiative on the part of American writers (United States and Canada) to form a "North American Community of Writers." These regional "Communities" are expected to remain fully autonomous, which should enable them to embody more specifically the local atmosphere, which, today, is no longer "national" but "regional." (North American, European, African, Arab, Latin American, etc.) In the end, the European founding fathers envision some kind of federation of these regional "communities": brought together in a truly global "Parliament of Writers." The patronage of UNESCO for this whole development — first regional, then global—has been assured.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

TONY'S PARTY

The ads for Tony Richardson's transcription of The Loved One boast that the film contains something to offend everyone, and it proved to be so in my case. What offends me is that Mr. Richardson, assisted by Terry Southern and Christopher Isherwood as script writers, has turned Evelyn Waugh's brief, witty, tough attack upon American mores, as exemplified in the country's funeral rites, into a loose-lipped, leering, cute-boys-together campground. They have invented prodigiously in a spirit of delicious naughtiness, and everything they have invented is bad—overdone, self-satisfied, pitched to a cheap laugh, and out of key with Waugh's astringent fable.

Why should Mrs. Joyboy be portrayed as an obscenely fat food maniac swimming in the contents of an overturned refrigerator? The point in the book is that Joyboy directs his extravagant momism toward a bad-tempered slattern whom a pier rat would be loath to call mother. Gluttony to the point of orgasm is not germane. Why should the Blessed Reverend of Whispering Glades be exposed as a sex maniac whose stained-glass windows can be electronically animated (not very persuasively) for pornographic ends? Waugh was writing about the commercialization of grief, not the exploitation of sexual caprice. Why should the flyboys from Dr. Strangelove be treated to an orgy in the display-room coffins? Why should Mr. Hump be found in a fag bar?—it isn't the kind of joint an old alcoholic newspaper man might be expected to frequent. Why should Liberace be employed for any dramatic role?—he is incapable of acting. All these ide stem from the impulse that caus schoolboys to make rude gestures b hind the teacher's back—the rest
the class can be counted on to titt

It could have been even worse. F example, Southern states in The Jo nal of the Loved One, a souvenir p gram being sold by Random Hou for $2.95, that the script called for scene in which Robert Morley was appear in drag. Morley, who is no fo vetoed the idea, although he c consent to pose for the book rubbi noses and lips with Robert Morse, w plays Dennis Barlow, Waugh's p tagonist. Southern has written l journal in a tone of hideous coyne he is bewitched by his own sense humor and by the notion that a reference to homosexuality is p se hilarious (as the aforemention schoolboys used to break up at eve mention of drawers). The picture sicklied over with a mist of inversio

I'm sure that John Gielgud, Rod
MacDowell, Jonathan Winters, R Stieger, Lionel Stander and the othe had a fantastic time (to borrow o of Southern's favorite adjectives) la pooning themselves under the nur maid eye of The Tip Top (Richardso again quoting Southern). How the tre people relax is their own busine but when their idea of jolly japes permitted to slop over into their wo and to smother the bite of The Lov
One in a mush of excess and innuenc they become a public nuisance. Wh ever gave these boys the notion th they were smarter than Evelyn Waug

PERSONALS

Bumper Stickers—MAKE LOVE NOT WAR—50c each; 5 for $2.00, from STUDENT UNION FOR PEACE ACTION, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 11-1-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Acropolis

the blossoms have broken from your stone stems. But your roots hold houses and stone streets hold my friends fast in the Plaka willing to fly over fountains of stairs into your Athens.

A Dream Like Wind

I came as close to you as ravishers on a vase

Away from the din of Maenads howling through islands Following your black hair prancing through mountain passes

A Bird

Where blue runs to purple beyond the chainmail of saltsea, she whines,
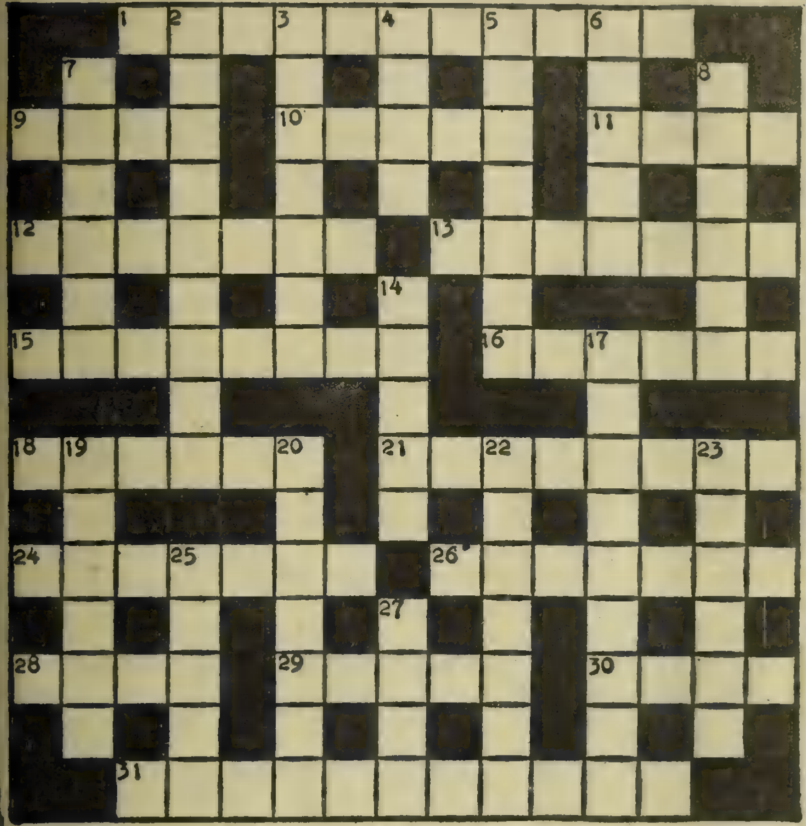
"Where? Where?"

William Gerchow

Crossword Puzzle No. 1125

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

The adjectives traditionally applied to this place might suggest a small revolutionary. (11)

and 27 down A shabby occasion, possibly associated with the name of the village for an intervening period. (8)

What they try to do at 1 across, but not at a way to draw out. (5) and 12 The basis for a current "cultural" attitude for the rest of the holiday-makers? (11)

Thurible-sounding critics. (7)

Sorry, it's an enclosure I find before something put up on 11-12.

Our association with the British game, possibly. (6)

Smells like money on board! (6)

Potential tool of destruction, but one's hilt is in sorry shape for it!

The more expensive bars, perhaps, with fancy trimming. (7)

They might run around the building, because one hears it turns very cold. (7)

The bird that might seem to hold things together for Boston cooks?

Set to catch itself, if the unusual occurs. (5)

See 19 down

Defied a noblewoman — possibly one representing spectacular growth in the entertainment world. (7, 4)

DOWN:

Make a study of an important reaction, with a perplexing result.

3 Certainly not like the accounts of the early settlers. (7)

4 If you find your forte is in music, the results should be. (4)

5 Some in 2 down about to allow certain dishes to be served hot. (7)

6 Acts like a Vandal in not-so-new clothes. (5)

7 Bachelors have at least one measure of criminality. (6)

8 Arise in an emergency, obviously!

14 Dwarf in a notable performance.

17 Bill might occasionally be so cool.

19 and 30 across Throws wood on the fire for dinner, possibly. (5, 5)

20 A cleaner look-out? (7)

22 Possibly dangerous, with no aspiration to be quite a burden? (7)

23 Act like a 20, and acted like one in the playground, perhaps. (6)

25 Permission to go? (5)

27 See 9 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1124

ACROSS: 1 and 22 Outing flannel; 4 Crannies; 10 Fall-out; 11 Flipper; 12 Nails; 13 Ice; 14 and 2 Horse mackerel; 15 Organ; 17 Puffball; 21 After all; 23 Rumba; 26 Osaka; 29 Wreck; 30 Innings; 31 Wittier; 32 Gold rush; 33 Bengal. DOWN: 1 Off and on; 2 Tilting; 3 Nooks; 5 Rifle; 6 and 25 Neighboring; 7 Imperil; 8 Serves; 9 Ethiopia; 16 Nee; 18 Fall down; 19 and 28 across Barred; 24 Meeting; 27 Abner; 28 Rasps; 29 Withe.

P U B L I C A T I O N S

HISTORY AFIELD
Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair.
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
$2 check or money order
B. F. JOHNSON
P. O. Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

Fun to Read

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E. Washington, D.C. 20002

Don't Die Without a Will

TWO WILL FORMS AND EASY-READING WILL BOOK $1.00

Nat'l Institute for Family Research
1800 N. Argyle, Los Angeles, Cal. 90028

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

A R T

ORIGINAL ART COSTS LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! GRAPHIC CIRCLE offers you contemporary original signed lithographs, etchings, woodcuts for $3.00 monthly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Free Brochure — Graphic Circle, Dept. NA, 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

S E R V I C E S

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to

THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

SAINT GENET
SARTRE
THE ESSENTIAL LIPPMANN
THE CITY IN HISTORY BY LEWIS MUMFORD
Pedro Martinez
OSCAR LEWIS
THE VITAL BALANCE IDENTITY AND ANXIETY images of man
THE INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT
THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS
MEMORIES, DREAMS, REFLECTIONS
CRISIS IN BLACK AND WHITE
Charles E. Silberman
the fate of man
THE HEART OF MAN
The Words
Sartre
COUNT AS ONE
ARTHUR KOESTLER
THE ACT OF CREATION
ABUNDANCE
THE MARTYRED
COUNT AS ONE

ANY 3 BOOKS FREE

WITH YOUR FIRST SELECTION / RETAIL VALUES TO $42.50

SELECTIONS MAKE THE DIFFERENCE—For more than 20 years the Book Find Club has offered its members the best in literature at substantial savings. Ranging from the social sciences to biography, history, psychology, the arts—Book Find Club selections cover every interest. These are books that last—solid, readable books that have permanent value. As you add them to your library, you will be building a rich, cultural center in your own home. Each month, as [redacted] member, you will be offered an important, timely book at average savings of 40% over book store prices. These books are authoritatively reviewed in the Book Find News which also keeps you up to date on the hundreds of alternate selections which you can buy at the same, low member's prices. You need choose only the books you want (four more during the course of the coming year). Upon completion of this introductory agreement you will be entitled to a free bonus book after every third purchase. Why not insure yourself against ever again missing the books you really want to read and own. Start your membership today by choosing any three of the books pictured above free with your first selection.

The Words, Jean-Paul Sartre; and The Heart of Man, Erich Fromm.
Combined retail price $8.95 .... Member's price (for both books) $5.95
The Protestant Establishment: Aristocracy & Caste in America, E. Digby Baltzell.
Retail $6.95 .... Member's price $5.50
The FBI Nobody Knows, Fred J. Cook. Retail $5.95 .... Member's price $4.95
The Act of Creation, Arthur Koestler. Retail $8.95 .... Member's price $5.95
Saint Genet: Actor and Martyr, Jean-Paul Sartre. Retail $8.50. Member's price $5.95
The Vital Balance: The Life Process in Mental Health and Illness.
Karl Menninger. Retail $10.00 .... Member's price $6.95
Crisis in Black and White, Charles E. Silberman.
Retail $5.95 .... Member's price $4.95
The Invisible Government, David Wise and Thomas B. Ross.
Retail $5.95 .... Member's price $4.50
Abundance for What? David Riesman; and The Martyred, Richard E. Kim.
Combined retail price $11.00 .... Member's price (for both books) $6.50
Pedro Martinez: a Mexican Peasant and his Family, Oscar Lewis.
Retail $8.75 .... Member's price $5.95
The Fate of Man, edited by Crane Brinton. Including Plato, Aquinas, Nietzsche, Freud, Toynbee, Kant, Whitehead, Shapley, Huxley, and others.
Retail $7.50 .... Member's price $4.95
The City in History, Lewis Mumford .... Retail $11.50. Member's price $6.95
Memories, Dreams, Reflections, C. G. Jung ... Retail $7.50. Member's price $5.95
The Essential Walter Lippmann: A Political Philosophy for Liberal Democracy. Editors: Clinton Rossiter & James Lare .... Retail $7.50. Member's price $5.50
The Basic Writings of Bertrand Russell .... Retail $10.00. Member's price $5.95
Identity and Anxiety: Survival of the Person in Mass Society. A massive compendium of studies by Mead, May, Orwell, Rosenberg, Richards, Gorer, Howe, Jaspers, Mills, and more. .... Retail $7.50. Member's price, $5.50
Images of Man: The Classic Tradition in Sociological Thinking, edited by C. Wright Mills. Retail $7.50 .... Member's price $4.95
TWO [redacted] COUNTING AS ONE SELECTION

THE BOOK FIND CLUB, Inc.

215 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. [redacted]

You may enroll and send me the 3 free books of my choice, with my first selection at the special member's price (plus postage and handling). I agree to buy four additional selections or alternates from the wide range of books that will be made available to me in the coming year at substantial savings. When I do not want the current selection—or prefer to order another book—I may do so on the convenient form provided for this purpose. I may cancel my membership [redacted] any time after purchasing the four additional books.

First Selection________________
Free Books 1.________________
2.________________
3.________________
Mr.
Mrs.
Miss ....
Please print full name
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip Code ....

(Same offer [redacted] prices apply in Canada: [redacted] Bond St., Toronto 2, Ont.)

B65-11N

EDVARD MUNCH: Max Kozloff

THE
NATION

November 8, 1965 . . 35c

LIBRARY

CRIME IS TOO BIG FOR THE FBI

An Ex-Agent Sums Up

William W. Turner

THE KLAN DISCOVERS HUAC

WALTER GOODMAN

The Student Left

Idealism and Action

Jack Newfield

Mr. Trilling Revives Gentility

Frederick J. Hoffman

LETTERS

War buddies

Los Angeles, Calif.

Dear Sirs: According to the papers, the International Days of Protest against the War in Vietnam had some counter-demonstrations, led chiefly by the Young Americans for Freedom, the Joe McCarthy Society, the National Renaissance Party and the Young Republicans (not to mention the Republicans for Conservative Action, Friends of Hells Angels and the Hells Angels, themselves).

A couple of Y.A.F. and Y.R. leaders, interviewed by the news media, said substantially the same thing, "We support President Johnson 100 per cent."

The irony of all this—the laughable, tragic irony—is that none of these people (be they Republicans, extreme Right or neo-Fascists) supported Vice-Presidential candidate Johnson for election; none supported candidate Johnson for re-election; none supported him on civil rights, on education, on housing, on poverty legislation, on medicare, on repeal of 14-B—only on the bombing of Vietnamese do they support him.

And, comes the next national elections, these same "supporters" will again accuse the Democrats of being the "war party." Harned Prasentnik

New chapter of protest

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: The October demonstrations established the existence of a militant peace movement, a coalition of pacifist and radical groups around the concept of an immoral, unjust war in Vietnam. The main idea of the demonstrations was to "get out!" It has been obvious for some time that such a movement exists. Now it has a formal expression and has made its own mark. . . .

Already the government has set in motion the apparatus to attack the movement. Not far behind will come the House Un-American Activities Committee. . . . The peace movement will be kept busy defending itself from attack. This will not only include legal attack but also vigilante attack by the Legion and other "gung-ho" groups.

The liberal peace movement which is planning the November 27 Washington demonstration represents a separate sector. It appeals to middle-class intellectuals and projects negotiation as the basis for peace in Vietnam. Politically it is close to the White House. . . . In essence the difference revolves about the terms of settlement. At one time, the White House all but pre-empted the program of the liberal peace movement, but the presence of 200,000 troops has shifted U.S. aims from a negotiated peace to a negotiated victory.

All realists have recognized that the U.S. could not be driven out of Vietnam, but neither have we been able to win the support of the Vietnamese people. We may be able to annihilate the people but it will take even more men to pacify the population. . . .

As the war escalates slowly . . . we find a game of attrition being played. . . . This game can be best played by a manipulative government and a passive people. The demonstrations and counter-demonstrations have not been programed on the "game-theory" board. This tends to distress the President and his advisers.

Somehow or other the very placidity of the situation, the failure of the opposition in Western Europe, Africa and Latin America to arouse more clamor, encourages the U.S. policy makers. Vietnam has not pricked the conscience of the world to the degree that Spain did in 1936-39!

We are in for some difficult months. A. Y. Gregoris

Segregated teachers

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: Stanley Elam's piece on teachers' unions, "Rift Without Differences" [The Nation, Oct. 18] . . . did overlook one major item. . . . Much of the NEA strength comes from segregated state and local organizations. One has the impression that the NEA has not vigorously pressed a drive to integrate, whereas almost a decade ago the AFT abolished segregated locals.

Umberto La Paglia

Reply to 'Rant'

Perth Amboy, N.J.

Dear Sirs: I write to continue the conversation with Mordecai Marcus [letter in The Nation, Oct. 25] on art and the Left.

In finishing a book with some paragraphs on the last forty-five years in art, I was struck by the fact that wherever great artists did work on an existing conflict of Left and Right they always chose the Left. This is not rant. It is a report on what happened.

The Fascist revolution in Italy cannot claim Fontamara or any comparable work. Franco likewise has nothing comparable to Guernica or For Whom the Bell Tolls; Chiang cannot match or claim Man's Fate. The Mexican muralists' works are on the Left.

In their lives or opinions artists can be for the Right, as was Pound. But, curiously, I find no great work expressive of the Fascist successes. Perhaps Mr. Marcus knows such a work.

David Mandel

THE NATIO

Monday, November 8, 1965
Volume 201, No. 15

In this issue

EDITORIALS

317

ARTICLES

319 Eleventh Hour in Rhode
N. M. Shamuyarira

322 Crime Is Too Big for the
William W. Turner

328 The Klan Discovers HUA
Walter Goodman

330 The Student Left: Idealism and Action
Jack Newfield

331 Movement (poem)
Todd Gitlin

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

334 The New Gentility
Frederick J. Hoffman

336 Delinquent's Progress
Truman Nelson

338 Berkeley: Free Speech an Free Verse
Donald Wesling

341 Primitive Anti-Communis
Samuel Adams Darcy

342 Art
Max Kozloff

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 34
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Warren Miller, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe

Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Nov. 8, 1965. Vol. 201, N

The Nation is published weekly (except in and August, when biweekly) by The N Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Av New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class po paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400

Subscription Price: One year. $10; two y $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is quired for change of address, which canno made without the old address as well as the Information to Libraries: The Nation is ind in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Review Digest and the Public Affairs Info tion Service.

EDITORIALS

ork for the "Fabulous" 89th

he "fabulous" 89th Congress has now adjourned the Presidential accolade, its own congratulations, almost universal journalistic acclaim. The jubila- is not without a solid basis. At a future cost of e $119 billion, virtually all the must items have enacted and in several directions new legislative nd has been broken. It is all so wonderful that tor Mansfield feels the second session should be of "pause" for consolidation and implementation. will probably be such a session in any case, since is an election year, a time when politicians be- e prudent, if not fearful. However, the record of 89th is not all that wonderful. Instead of taking a plete siesta, would it not be opportune to stage a ematic, thoroughgoing discussion of American for- policy? Such a review has been postponed again again for the past twenty years; and it is high that the Senate got to work in this neglected sec- of the nation's business. The reasons have been stated recently by Sen. George D. Aiken, Walter mann and John S. Knight, among others.

enator Aiken is not sharply critical of the Presi- t; he concedes that his policies in the past year e been "a fair reflection of the attitudes of the rican people." But he adds that a strong President ot only in a position to educate but to persuade, le or even intimidate the people into a particular se of action. However, in the American tradition, is not supposed to be the end of the matter. Con- s is not relegated to the role of rubber stamp under system, nor does all wisdom reside in the Execu- . By public discussion and debate, Congress is ex- ed to enlighten the public and to correct the errors are inevitable in complex affairs. When the recess ver, the 89th should honor this responsibility.

he consequences of a policy of neglect and acqui- nce in the legislative branch are the subject of ment by Lippmann and Knight; the latter titles his le in the Detroit Free Press, "Filling an Intellectual uum." The fact is that the teach-ins and street onstrations have been a democratic reaction to the of official debate and dissent. We are not a na- of yes-men, at least we never have been that in past, and when the President constantly on radio television announces faits accomplis that affect lives of us all, and then in private persuades or vbeats Congressmen to go along, free Americans state their views in their own way. Wise or foolish, university faculty members who have organized teach-ins, and students who have demonstrated in streets, have exercised a constitutional right and vic duty. They have done what the Congress should e done. Instead of the praise which is their due, have been greeted with a stream of abuse from e Congressmen, who seem to be under the impression that they are the censors of the voters—and the young who soon will be voters—rather than their legislative representatives.

One index to the effectiveness of a legislative body is its deference, or lack of deference, toward its most intelligent members. The ineffectiveness of the 89th in foreign affairs is shown by the quasi-isolation of Sen. J. William Fulbright, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, one of the Senate's outstanding foreign policy experts, and probably one of the unhappiest men in Washington. He has made speech after speech, each full of sense, and has been rewarded with the indifference of his colleagues, as if he were some brash newcomer. It is perilous to ignore men like Fulbright, and the Senate can remedy this neglect at the second session. If it evades its clear duty, all the accomplishments of the first session may be consumed in the fires of the expanding war.

Draftniks and Vietniks

One reason why Congressmen should refrain from bawling against Vietnam war resisters is that their philippics will be scarcely audible in the general chorus of brainless denunciation. The country has a sizable army of verbal shock troops always ready to cry treason when anyone dares to question the righteousness of any of our wars, declared or undeclared. Its members range from juvenile activists who have found a better outlet than overturning ashcans, veterans of past wars who revel in belligerent patriotism, intellectuals of the Establishment, fire-eating clergymen, white Russians and other émigrés—and a noisy section of the press.

Surprised and somewhat dismayed by the size of the October 16 weekend turnout, the news media, as is their habit, pulled out all the stops. Most of them misquoted the Attorney General, whose remarks in Chicago, while condemnatory, were notably cautious. Some jumped the membership of Students for a Democratic Society from 3,000 to 300,000—a slip of the decimal that must have panicked some readers. Others identified the anti-war movement with international communism. Still others maintained that in clean-living America, where the bathroom is a kind of household shrine, the demonstrators were the great unwashed. Although U.S. News & World Report, Time and Newsweek all had long articles denouncing the demonstrators, none found space to evaluate their opposition, answer their arguments soberly, or consider how and why the resistance to the Vietnam war differs from conscientious objection in the two World Wars and the Korean War.

Yet there need be no mystification. To begin with, Vietnam is a dirty, shameful war, in which we are trying to put down an indigenous revolutionary movement whose aim is to free the country from foreign domination and ultimately to unite the two halves, as provided in the Geneva agreements. Not surprisingly, conscientious objection is more widespread than in World War II, when the United States was attacked and fascism threatened the world, or in the Korean War in which, according to generally accepted opinion, the Communists were the aggressors. A young man might not wish to oppose war under all conditions, yet might with every moral justification refuse to fight in this war.

Moreover, a whole generation has been impressed with the issue of individual moral responsibility in mass killing. What else is the point of the endless debate about the responsibility of the Germans who heiled Hitler and knew nothing of the extermination camps until the Third Reich was defeated and there was no longer any need for them to do anything? After the Nuremberg trials, how can anyone who believes in the Judeo-Christian ethic take refuge in the doctrine of "my country, right or wrong," and gladly go out to kill?

Then, an uneasy feeling exists in the rising generation that war per se is wicked and futile. How widespread this feeling is, how deep it runs, remains to be seen. But the young can see that two world wars have settled very little, that the next war may bring on a nuclear disaster of inconceivable dimensions, and that, scarcely having lived, they may perish for no cause that can find any justification in love of country, love of mankind, or love of self.

Finally, are memories so short that the campaign promises of 1964 are already forgotten? Mr. Johnson gave no inkling that he purposed to expand the war in Vietnam. Both candidates suggested that the Selective Service system needed revision, that perhaps it could be abolished. Now the young are called on to engage in a general bloodletting, and theirs not to reason why. When they ask questions, they are told to shut up and get into uniform. It is late in the day for sheeplike conformity masquerading as patriotism.

An Arms Embargo

The simultaneous and interrelated rise of industrialism and nationalism was a bad augury for the future of mankind from the very beginning. Never, however, has its maniacal character been as clear as in the current eagerness of the industrialized nations to sell arms to the underdeveloped—when what the people need is bread, medicine, shelter and clothing.

It is bad enough that West Germany spends some $700 million on arms yearly under an "offset" agreement, with German purchases reimbursing the United States for the dollars it spends to keep American troops in the Federal Republic. Nor is it any better when, without an offset agreement, our government spends more than $300 million a year in France for military purposes. But this is military trade among wealthy countries; one might say that, if lives are no object, they can afford it.

It is also in the regular line of business when the chairman of the board of Lockheed Aircraft, ar less than five senior vice presidents, make a trip" to Saudi Arabia in connection with a ma air "defense" system including jet fighters, radar ground-to-air missiles in a deal that, according t Los Angeles Times, might run to $250 million. S Arabia is also among the wealthy, at least in the ing families. But the trade does not stop there. India and Pakistan are close to famine, but United States has supplied both with arms in past; now India is exercised over a report that Germany has decided to sell Pakistan seventy- jet aircraft. In the Near East a spiraling build-u arms continues between Israel and the Arab nat and John H. Hoagland and John B. Teeple des in The Christian Science Monitor (October 20) s of its ramifications. One involves the move of of the Willy Messerschmitt aircraft design orga tion from West Germany to Spain, and thenc Egypt. Armaments know no boundaries.

The Soviets are notorious arms suppliers to all sundry, as long as they are not allied with the Ur States—or China. However, at the height of the port program to Egypt, in 1956, Premier Khrush said: ". . . We should sell arms to states which us to do so, and the reason . . . is that shipments being made by other countries. If it were possibl agree through the UN or otherwise that this w not take place, we would welcome that and we w be prepared to take part in such an understandi Hoagland, who is vice president of Browne & Sl Research Corporation, and Teeple, who is superv of the Washington Arms Control Group of the Ber Corporation, suggest that it may be no more diffi to reach agreement on an arms embargo with Soviets than with "our friends in the West." They an embargo, both on arms and technology, a gu antee of borders, a regional arms freeze and par disarmament on the part of the major powers possible steps. The chances of an agreement are tainly not bright, but would it not be better to than to let the spiraling arms races in the und developed world go on unchecked?

Justice for Homosexuals

No doubt even in vice squads there are enlighte and dedicated officers of the law, but inevitably bru moralistic, authoritarian types will predominate in t environment. Partly because of this disproportion, treatment of the homosexual, especially the male ho sexual, is one of the murkiest areas of civil rights. is murky also because the homosexual, notoriou vulnerable to extortion and blackmail in our cultu is in no position to make an issue of his constitutio rights, much less of his rights as a human being. much is generally known. What is not so well kno is that even sexually impeccable individuals who tempt to intervene in this scandal of American soci are subject to much the same pushing around as t homosexuals whom they try to help.

he late Learned Hand, one of the wisest and most nane of American jurists, recommended that homoual relations between consenting adults in private uld be legalized. The latest Kinsey Report, Sex enders, suggests that the proper domain of sex law vhere force or threat is employed, in cases involvan adult and a child, and in cases of sexual activity solicitation so obtrusive as to constitute a public sance. Acting on these convictions, a group of gymen and laymen in San Francisco chartered the ıncil on Religion and the Homosexual as a non-fit corporation under the laws of the state of Caliıia. The Council has produced a brochure, "A Brief Injustices," which should be read by every citizen would like to see his country relieved of a legal mination. It may be obtained at $1 a copy from
.H. at 330 Ellis St., San Francisco 94102.

Among C.R.H.'s findings are that in effect the Amer-n mores, enforced by the police with or without utory support, deprive homosexuals of their legal ıts. The police use enticement and entrapment to ke arrests. Instead of protecting citizens from crim-ls, a substantial part of the police department dees itself to harassing and persecuting homosexuals, almost always are harmless. Public premises, such bars, are subject to loss of license if they provide vice to homosexuals or persons presumed to be homosexuals. When the members of C.R.H. tried to correct these abuses locally, the police accused them of violating "God's law"—to which they apparently considered themselves more privy than the clergy, who were greeted with remarks such as, "I never thought I'd see the day when ministers helped queers."

Aside from actions of the police or the California Alcoholic Beverage Control Board, persons conceived to be homosexuals, but who may be merely effeminate, are routinely subjected to discriminatory employment practices based on the folk belief that homosexuals are unstable and untrustworthy. Like most folklore, this is nonsense, duly sanctified by government. In this case the superstition is reinforced by the loyalty procedures of the federal bureaucracy. In countries like Denmark and Holland homosexuals are not ostracized by the public nor hounded by the police, and there has been neither a breakdown of conventional morality nor of national security. It is principally in the United States that cases occur like that of Walter Jenkins, for a quarter of a century one of Lyndon Johnson's most trusted aides, who was forced to resign a year ago because of a homosexual incident which bore no resemblance to his habitual behavior or responsibility. Such personal and national tragedies can be obviated if sensible people will support the efforts of organizations of the type of C.R.H.

LEVENTH HOUR IN RHODESIA

N. M. Shamuyarira

ıough Southern Rhodesia sudly leaped onto the front pages of world press only last month, the ic racial drama there has been olding steadily for nearly eight rs. Journalists who visited South-Rhodesia in that period, and ticularly since 1962, have ned sternly that another South ica in terms of racial patterns, ınother Congo in terms of racial flicts, was in the making. Their nings, reinforced by the protests n delegations sent by Rhodesian icans to every United Nations sion since 1960, were unheeded he international community and Great Britain. The latter could be urged to "act" until Ian ith, Prime Minister of Southern desia, demanded that it "abdi-
"* its responsibilities. There-
, a problem that could have been ed by the stroke of the pen of Alec Douglas-Home in 1957, or Mr. Duncan Sandys in 1961 (successive secretaries for Commonwealth Relations in the Macmillan government), may now require a full-scale military operation by Great Britain or the United Nations, or prolonged racial fighting between the 217,000 white settlers and the 4 million indigenous Africans of Southern Rhodesia.

In 1957, Sir Alec Douglas-Home brushed aside objections by 9 million Africans of the Central African Federation (to which Southern Rhodesia then belonged, along with Zambia and Malawi), and of the watchdog African Affairs Board, to the Constitutional Amendment Bill which established the principle of registering voters in the Federation on separate A and B rolls, according to their financial and educational qualifications. The A roll controlled fifty of the sixty-five seats in the legislative assembly, and this division of the electorate gave the white settlers, then led by Sir Roy Welensky, an instrument for maintaining effective control, while ostensibly extending suffrage to the native population. More important, the entire bill shook the confidence of the Rhodesian Africans in the basic intentions of the white settlers in Rhodesia, who were supported at this point by the British Government. Southern Rhodesia's prime minister, R. S. Garfield Todd (recently placed under restrictive arrest for twelve months), was ignominiously dismissed by his cabinet, party and the electorate, primarily because he had intended to improve the status of the Africans.

In 1961, the Africans of Rhodesia, backed by a widely supported reso-

N. M. Shamuyarira, born in Rhodesia in 1928, was for four years editor of the now-banned Daily News, the only paper in the country edited for African readers. He is at present studying for a Ph.D. in politics at Princeton University. Mr. Shamuyarira's Crisis in Rhodesia (Andre Deutsch) was published last month in London.

"Act or abdicate" was a key phrase he Devlin Commission on Nyasa-d, now Malawi, in 1959.

Illingworth: London Daily Mail (Ben Roth)

lution of the General Assembly of the United Nations, rejected the constitution that had been negotiated by Mr. Duncan Sandys in Salisbury at a conference attended by leaders of all racial groups and political parties in Southern Rhodesia. Although it had appeared that the African leaders at the conference had given tacit approval to the proposals, their followers rejected them outright at two representative party conferences. I was one of four delegates sent by the nationalist movement to the United Nations in 1962 to petition the Colonialism (Fourth) Committee against the introduction of this constitution. The main point of our argument then was that the A and B rolls were designed to place the 4 million Africans at a hopeless disadvantage in the legislature. We observed that the fifty A roll seats gave the settlers the two-thirds majority by which they could change the constitution as they saw fit—including the abolishment of African representation altogether, or the step of unilateral independence which now threatens. Duncan Sandys rode roughshod over our advice and the UN resolutions.

Both British ministers rested their cases on a belief in the expressed good intentions of the white settlers. In the 1961 negotiations, Duncan Sandys surrendered Britain's established power to intervene decisively on African legislation, whenever it felt the occasion demanded, and accepted instead a bill of rights, a constitutional council and other constitutional safeguards — all to be implemented by the settler administration and civil service. Indeed, he placed so much trust in Sir Edgar Whitehead, then Prime Minister and leader of the more moderate but now defunct United Federal Party, that in certain cases, notably the controversial Land Apportionment Act, he accepted only verbal promises that justice would be done to the indigenous Africans.

What has been the upshot of all this trust? The white settlers accepted the Sandys constitution in order to rid themselves of the influence of Whitehall, and then rid themselves also of Whitehead and his promises at the subsequent election in 1962. The more radical, right-wing Rhodesia Front, now led by Mr. Ian Smith, was brought into office with a mandate to halt the African progress that had been promised in the 1961 constitution, and to press harder for what has always been their main aim: independence and white supremacy.

Given this background, it may be understandable why the announced basis of the discussion in Salisbury last week between Mr. Harold Wilson, Prime Minister of Britain, and Mr. Ian Smith—namely the 1961 constitution and an international treaty—is totally unacceptable to the African people. For four years now the Africans have expressed unequivocal objection to the 1961 constitution, for the reasons stated above. Successive British governments have agreed that the Africans' view is reasonable, although they have urged them to participate under the constitution. It is unthinkable that that document can now be considered a basis of discussion.

Even more important, the native Rhodesians have made it clear that the "blocking third" idea—now one of the five principles being advanced by Great Britain—is equally unacceptable. In the 1962 UN debate, they would have accepted a blocking third in the legisla (which meant twenty-four s controlled by the B roll insteac the fifteen offered by Sandys), only to insure that white settlers not make retrogressive changes the existing constitution before final constitution of an independ Southern Rhodesia had come i being. At the time of independe the Africans want nothing short a majority of seats in the South Rhodesian parliament. No Afric not even the fifteen Uncle Tc now in parliament, has ever cepted the blocking third in the c stitution of the independent nati They know of too many gove ments that violate their own c stitutions with impunity.

The present dispute between I Wilson and Mr. Smith has tenc to obscure the fundamental diff ences between Mr. Wilson's p posals and the Africans' aspiratio Efforts to narrow this gap succe when the Labour Party is out of fice, but when it becomes the g ernment it inherits the Tory po tion of gradual African advan which means in fact no advan and either a studied disregard African voices raised in protest or revival of the doctrine of good fai in the settler population, despite record that speaks eloquently to t contrary.

Mr. Smith's case is not i tended to convince the African rather it is meant to frighten the and to strengthen his followi among the settlers. It rests on t premise that African states north the Zambezi are being badly go erned today, and that Rhodes should not be allowed to drift in similar chaos. Further, that Sout ern Rhodesia, under settler rule, h been self-governing for forty-thr years and now clearly deserves i dependence. The first point is sir ply untrue. Several African stat have had their teething trouble but on balance they are better go erned now than they were durir colonial days: there is certainly greater impetus for developme and more participation by all t people at all the levels of gover ment. In Zambia, the post-indepen ence economic boom has attracte to the country more Europea than left it in the hour of ind pendence. The European settler Southern Rhodesia can find sec rity in that country today and t rrow only under a majority gov-ment; they live securely on bor-ved time as a repressive minority.

)n the second point, while it is e that Southern Rhodesia has n self-governing for forty-three ırs—it is the only country in the tish Commonwealth of Nations ıt has ever controlled its army d police before independence—has not earned its independence the way it has governed. The ty-three pieces of discriminatory islation that have been put on statute books, the banning of wspapers and of five successive ican political parties, the dening of party leaders for periods to five years without trial, the ıoring of court decisions on contutional issues, a sharply rising son population (it now stands at ,000), the exclusion of Africans m fertile farming lands and from executive posts in the civil serv—all these acts comprise a recl of repression which does not deve the reward of independence.

More alarming is the grand den of the 3.5 million Europeans South Africa, Rhodesia, Mozamıue and Angola (there are 5 miln Europeans in Africa as a ıole) to defy African nationalism the whole of southern Africa.
eir ultimate intention is to make area a little Europe, bound to-ther by military treaties, and asiated with other African coun-es like the Congo (assuming hombe's influence remains or can re-exerted through the bands of ıite mercenaries still there) in a mmon market.

In the face of the record and the erall settler designs, the interna-nal treaty suggested by Mr. Smith ould be laughable if it were not ious. His own government vioed the 1961 constitution before e ink was dry. The most glaring ample was the restrictions placed the freedom of the two African tionalist leaders, Rev. Ndabaningi thole, President of the banned mbabwe African National Union, d Mr. Joshua Nkomo, President the banned Zimbabwe African ople's Union, even after the high urt had ruled such restriction thout trial to be contrary to the ter and spirit of the 1961 consti-tion. Another violation is the Land portionment Act—the main seg-gation law which divides the coun-y into white and black areas of out equal size. The Constitutional Council which was set up to watch over discriminatory legislation has reported that this act, and the principles behind it, cut clean across the constitution. The British Government has said the same. Smith refuses to release the restricted leaders, or to repeal the act, but still wants to create the impression that he can be relied upon to govern more justly in future if he is put entirely on his own. No one can be fooled. Africans are fully aware of the contemptuous manner in which basic clauses in South Africa's 1910 constitution were dislodged by the late Dr. Malan, who packed the senate and the courts with supporters of his brand of Afrikaanerdom and white supremacy. Actions over the years in Rhodesia have convinced the Africans there that the vote is their only effective safeguard. It is often asked on the other side, what safeguard will there be for the European settlers? The answer is simple: only the good will of the Africans, in fact the magnanimity of the majority, can safeguard the interests of the settlers.

The native Rhodesian's case is firmly based on two principles—that he must enjoy human dignity and exercise to the full his ability to advance in the land of his birth, and that minority rule is necessarily oppressive. The latter premise is clear from what has already been written. In order to rule for their own advantage the settlers are taking ever more oppressive measures against the overwhelming majority. The former and more positive point is equally self-evident. Until one sees the horizon one cannot desire to advance toward it. Until the indigenous people of Southern Rhodesia can determine fully the political, social and economic goals of their motherland, their enthusiasm for advancement can never be set in motion.

The question before Great Britain now is how to stop Ian Smith's Rhodesian Front from declaring independence unilaterally, if Wilson fails to persuade them to negotiate it. Economic sanctions, which London has promised to use, have failed to work in previous instances. However, the Rhodesian economy is so heavily dependent on England that if full sanctions were imposed by Great Britain and all its NATO allies, the Rhodesian pound would drop to about two-thirds of its present value. The new country would lose nearly half of its exports to Britain and Zambia, a third of its imports from Britain, and its London accounts would be frozen. The main target would be tobacco, the country's biggest export, which enters Britain on very favorable Commonwealth preferential terms. Half of the crop—about 100 million pounds—is sold to England. America, which will follow the British example, has stockpiled 700 million pounds of tobacco, enough to swamp the world market for some years. Other products to suffer from embargoes and the loss of Commonwealth preference include sugar, the country's fastest growing industry, and, to a small extent, beef. All this sounds impressive action on paper, but one does not know to what extent South Africa would want to bail out Rhodesia, or the reaction of trading countries like Japan, and even France.

It would therefore be imprudent for Great Britain on the one hand, and the international community on the other, to rely solely on sanctions to solve the Rhodesian situation. There should be contingent preparations for a military operation—not necessarily to punish Smith, as some British newspapers have suggested, but to prevent a racial war on the Zambezi. Such a conflict would set back race relationships in the whole of Africa for many years to come, and lower the prestige of Western nations throughout the continent. Nor is this the only justification for international action by the United Nations and/or the Organization of African Unity, alone or in conjunction with other regions. The harshness of the racial laws of Rhodesia is a violation of the United Nations charter and an affront to the dignity of man. Further, an illegal act of the magnitude of the unilateral declaration of independence is tantamount to an invasion of the people of Southern Rhodesia.

Britain may find it difficult to use force because of the deep personal feelings between its own people and the settlers. About 60 per cent of the settlers are British-born, and most of them are postwar immigrants (a fact which puts in question their claim to Rhodesia as their native land). There is already considerable dissension in the Conservative Party over the use of sanctions, but Britain has let it be known in New York that in the event of a unilateral declaration it could support and even contribute men to a UN force in Rhodesia.

As for the Africans, their leaders have made it clear that if Smith carries through his threats they intend to establish a government-in-exile and wage a vigorous guerrilla warfare inside the country. The aim will be to draw the allegiance of the 4 million Africans away from the settler government. Although i now late, decisive action by G Britain—which is primarily resp sible for the present crisis— the international community c prevent a Congo-type chaos o bitter, drawnout racial conflict.

Crime Is Too Big for the FBI . . William W. Turn

Shortly after the conclave of Cosa Nostra czars at Apalachin, N.Y., on November 14, 1957, special agents of the FBI could have been seen moving stealthily up and down the ranks of automobiles in the parking lot of a large West Coast air terminal. Every so often a G-man jotted down a license number, and it looked as if they were on the spoor of big game. In the spring of the following year FBI chief, J. Edgar Hoover, rejected a request from the attorney general's Special Group on Organized Crime that a number of agents be assigned to help nab the crime bosses who had found federal sleuths napping at Apalachin. Hoover snubbed the Special Group, claiming that it had no "specific target" and would use his minions on "fishing expeditions." "Obviously," he huffed, "we have neither the manpower nor the time to waste on such speculative ventures."

What was the crucial airport mission that occupied the G-men? I was there, an FBI agent on duty. It was part of a nation-wide drive, but not, I'm ashamed to say, a drive aimed at organized crime: it was the very model of a fishing expedition. The superbly trained agents were noting out-of-state license numbers on the random chance of finding a "hot" car that had been transported interstate. If they spotted one, they would be able to log a double statistic: one car recovered, one recovery value. A lot of time and manpower could thus be spent on finding just one stolen car that local police patrols would eventually stumble upon anyhow; but the airport patrol was part of the FBI's relentless campaign, year in and year out, for more and more impressive statistics. When results from all fifty-five offices are tabulated at the end of each year, Hoover can boast of "new peaks of achievement." An example: in 1961 the FBI recovered "17,430 stolen automobiles valued at more than $26.5 million," an "all-time high."

During my ten and a half years with the FBI, I learned to value the camaraderie and sense of public service that went with the job. But as time passed I became acutely aware that the bureau was hollow at the center. It buried its head in the sand where organized crime was concerned, alternatively pretending that it didn't exist or was none of the FBI's business. And it covered up this blindness with a gaudy show of statistics. The consequent sad paradox has been that over a period of forty years the FBI and organized crime have flourished together.

As a young, hustling director, J. Edgar Hoover got the FBI off to a flying start. He devised innovations that remain a tribute to his vision: the FBI laboratory, the identification division that houses the nation's fingerprints, and the National Academy that teaches the rudiments of investigation to law officers from all over the country. Though handicapped by lack of field experience, he showed a remarkably deft touch in guiding the affairs of his fledging bureau. The Man, as his subordinates referred to him, whipped what had been a lackadaisical, ill-regarded outfit into fighting trim.

It wasn't long before the new-look G-men were put to the test. Eliot Ness and his Treasury Department T-men had pulled the rug out from under Al Capone and his henchmen. Prohibition had been repealed, and the face of crime was changing. As Hoover described it: "Crime had been speeded up; crime had taken to the four-lane highway, to the roar of the aeroplane. . Roving bands of plunderers mo swiftly from city to city and st to state, their machine guns c tering death, their affiliations tending from one end of the co try to the other."

Crime's pace and scope found cal cops tripping over state borde but the ill wind blew some good in the FBI's direction. Congr beefed up existing federal laws a wrote new ones, to give the bure jurisdiction in kidnaping, bank r bery, car theft and other nev beleaguered fields.

G-men donned their sna brim hats and entered the fr Rashly, they decided to meet gu fire with gunfire; skirmish erupted all over the country, cre ing considerable hazard to innoce bystanders. In the ill-fated raid the Little Bohemia resort, fro which Dillinger and his croni fled by the rear entrance, two ta payers were winged by federal gur and one of them died. And in t confusion of the manhunts the b reau was sometimes outwitted, when Alvin "Kreepy" Karpis—Pu lic Rat Number One, Hoover call him—evaded an elaborate trap an Atlantic City hotel by scurryi down a fire escape in his BVI

When the gun smoke settled, ho ever, these mishaps had bare dented the FBI shield. The pre soft-pedaled them, concentrati instead on the impending trium of good over evil. With an enti nation watching, flinty-jawed G-me systematically mowed down t Public Enemies one by one. The p fairly cried for a hero, and as t last lone wolf outlaw's obituary w written, Hoover was cutting qui a public figure. The new celebri hobnobbed with the famous, di ported himself at the Stork Clu and signed autographs with Shirle

William W. Turner, a special agent of the FBI from 1951 to 1961, is currently a staff writer for Ramparts. His forthcoming book, In Light and Shadow, will deal with the effects of modern investigative techniques on contemporary society.

mple. He had become a latter-y St. George—and there would vays be a dragon.

But for Hoover the Dragon was ver organized crime. As the years led by the criminal syndicate w fatter and fatter, finally eclips- General Motors as the nation's hest "corporation." (Said racket-asher Thomas Dewey: "You y definitely assume that crime, is incorporated.") Hoover paid le heed, and after a time skeptics an to ask why. In an open letter Hoover on October 2, 1961, col-nist John Crosby spoke out:

> Crime in this country has made s most substantial gains in the 36 ars you have been head of the BI. Under your benevolent eye, e crime syndicates are now roll-g in wealth and respectability. ambling, narcotics and industrial ckets are now the biggest busi-esses in this country, and hood-m money is now infiltrating all rts of respectable businesses.

Hoover, accustomed to being han-d with kid gloves by the press, grily labeled the Crosby view-nt "appalling" and "degrading." for the issue, he tersely stated t the FBI didn't have "blanket isdiction in each and every facet crime, including narcotics and phases of organized crime."

Hoover was right, as far as he nt. But the bureau has pet mes—bank robbery, kidnaping, theft and the like—in which it s chosen to specialize. For the st part, they are amateurish ers that can be wrapped up with-t much fuss. What is more, local s, having done most of the work, often only too glad to turn the tly arrest and prosecution phase er to Uncle Sam.

In the 1930s, bank robbery was stock in trade of Dillinger types. w it's a greenhorn's sport. In San ancisco, an 18-year-old bride held a bank and seven hours later s honeymooning on the beach at ikiki. In Los Angeles, a grand-ther stuck up several banks by ndishing a vial she said con-ned nitroglycerine. In a San ancisco Mack Sennett comedy, ee beer-blurred bums were col-ed trying to make a getaway in dilapidated car with the wind-ield missing.

FBI spokesman Curtis O. num has confirmed this sad tamorphosis, stating: "The rob- today is not necessarily a hoodlum." Kidnapers never were. Abduction for ransom is a foolish game. Smart hoodlums won't touch it, and a line-up of famous shanghaiers would look like a hobos' convention. Bruno Richard Hauptmann was an illiterate carpenter who didn't even know that gold certificates had been recalled. Carl Hall and his paramour, Bonnie Heady, kidnap-slayers of little Bobby Greenlease in Kansas City, were in a continual alcoholic stupor. Angelo LaMarca, killer of infant Peter Weinberger on Long Island, was a penniless lone wolf. So is the still-sought chief suspect in the unsolved 1936 Charles Mattson kidnap-murder. Little can be said for the criminal cunning of the Frank Sinatra, Jr., kidnapers, one of whom got cold feet and turned in the others. Only "Kreepy" Karpis and "Machinegun" Kelly, whose single flings at the sport ended in disaster, had an iota of criminal stature, and they were working thirty years ago. As for car thieves, they tend to be juvenile joy riders rather than hardened thugs.

Once in a while the G-men run up against a tough customer, but for the most part the FBI has made a career out of nabbing the criminal lesser lights. And the problem is not one of jurisdiction. In bank robberies, the bureau takes its authority from a wisp of a technicality: federal money partially insures deposits. The federals plunge into kidnapings on the "rebuttable presumption" that the victim has been taken from one state to another (this rarely turns out to be the case and the matter winds up in a local court). And a youngster with a poor knowledge of geography may drive a stolen car 1 mile and be doggedly pursued by G-men, whereas if he had driven 400 miles in the opposite direction, it would be strictly a local affair.

When the FBI has wanted to get into the act, it has found one excuse or another for doing so. But when the crime doesn't appeal, the bureau suddenly turns legalistic. Civil rights investigations are a good example. As the laws are now written, violence in Mississippi can't lack federal jurisdiction. Yet the same G-men who have been known to stake out a bank for weeks on a tip it might be robbed, haven't to date caught anyone in the act of incinerating a Southern church used as a civil rights meeting place. Why? The FBI stays "within the bounds of its authorized jurisdiction," says Hoover. "We can't wet-nurse everybody who goes down South."

How big a stick could the FBI wield over organized crime? As Hoover stated, the G-men don't have blanket jurisdiction. The dope traffic, a syndicate mainstay, falls under the eye of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, a modest Treasury Department force of 450 (compared to the FBI's nearly 16,000). Led by Dr. Harry Anslinger, whose longevity in office almost matched Hoover's, the T-men have won some major skirmishes during their war on organized crime. One such was the capture of Vito Genovese, reputed evil genius behind the entire Cosa Nostra complex. Cosa Nostra czars came to look upon their do-or-die antagonists with a mixture of hate and respect: referring to "that bastard Anslinger," they decided at Apalachin to phase out narcotics in favor of rackets drawing less "heat."

Nevertheless, the inert FBI has had a legal arsenal bulging with firepower: interstate transportation of gambling devices, lottery tickets and wagering data, stolen property, white slave traffic, labor racketeering, extortion, hijacking, bribery, fraud by wire, unlawful flight, obstruction of justice, misprision of felony, federal firearms act, and a fistful of others. The hoods obviously had to cross the G-men's sights somewhere along the line. For instance, there's hardly a syndicate "gun" who doesn't have a 2-page rap sheet, and for him just to step across a state border with gun in armpit holster is a federal crime. But the FBI didn't move.

Why not? For one thing, ever since the Dillinger days the FBI has been living the life of a federal fat cat and it didn't want to risk its reputation against the tough organized-crime foe. More than that, I doubt that Hoover has ever really understood the enemy. The hard core of organized crime is the Mafia, now called Cosa Nostra, a terrorist secret society transplanted from Sicily that adopted the trappings of modern America. No outsider can penetrate its inner sanctums. It is so powerful and tightly knit that it could exert a virtual monopoly on illicit enterprises any time it wanted. But to prevent fratricidal gang warfare, it prefers to enter into lucrative alliances with nonmember factions represented by the likes of Meyer Lansky, the late Bugsey Seigel, Joseph "Doc" Stracher and "Dandy Phil" Kastel.

There are two faces to organized crime; Detroit Police Commissioner George C. Edwards described them:

> On the legal side, it is involved in selling everything from horse races to fruit juice; on the illegal, everything from dope to football bets. The Mafia men are characterized by the smile, the glad hand, the tuxedo and the ticket to the charity ball. But the basic Mafia tools are still money, murder and corruption.

Organized crime has been called the Invisible Government because of its influence in political quarters. The 1951 Senate rackets committee claimed that mobster Frank Costello, by giving the word to the right people, could name the leader of Tammany Hall. (A not too far-fetched allegation when it is realized that a chunk of valuable Manhattan real estate is owned by mob fronts.) When "grease" won't work, organized crime gets its way by muscle. For example, when a nightclub owner balks at buying the "right" brands of liquor and supplies, syndicate "torches" burn his place down. And syndicate "guns" enforce internal codes against double-dealing and stepping out of line. In Chicago alone, almost 200 gang-style slayings remain unsolved.

Organized crime is slick, subtle, and difficult to pin down. In 1951, Sen. Estes Kefauver's rackets committee grilled top hoods from coast to coast. Arrogant and cocksure, they regarded the committee with the faint annoyance of a man flicking a fly off his arm. But Kefauver could read between the lines, and had plenty of fill-in testimony from local authorities. As the hearings ended he remarked: "A nation-wide crime syndicate does exist in the United States despite protestations . . . that there is no such combine."

Hoover has sermonized about "vermin in human form spewed forth from prison cells," "scum from the boiling pot of the underworld," and "a criminal horde larger than any of the barbarian hosts that overran Europe and Asia in ancient times." But this colorful rhetoric obviously doesn't refer to Tony Accardo, owner of a twenty-two-room mansion with two bowling alleys, a pipe organ and a black onyx bathtub. Or to Sam Giancana, the dapper spender who frequented Frank Sinatra's plush Nevada resort and squired Phyllis McGuire, of the singing McGuire sisters, around the swankiest spots in the United States and Europe. Or even to Mickey Cohen in his $275 lounging pajamas. The aging G-man was talking about a conglomeration of panderers, rapists, muggers, stick-up men and heisters that were essentially a problem for the local police.

This myopia rankled the FBI agents. It has always puzzled them that field officials who were brilliant at devising schemes for am ing quick statistics went when somebody mentioned or ized crime. But none of us re blamed them—middle echelon men have been exiled to bu Siberias for falling a convictio two short in the annual tally.

When the FBI brass admitted existence of the Mafia at all, saw it in terms of rustics who ha gotten the dung off their shoes trustworthy Italian informant ( was more than a decade ago) me that a certain restaurant ow was the Mafia chieftain for the a "What Mafia?" laughed the cri
nal supervisor, "put it in GI
(The General Investigative Int gence File was a no-action ca all.) This was the attitude that tered down from above.

Even after Apalachin, view changed very little. Time porter Sherrell Hillman, assigned find out if the Mafia was fact fancy, ended up as perplexed when he started. The Narcotics reau assured him that it was ind very real; the FBI didn't beli
"that a Mafia exists as such."

Nevertheless, Apalachin was bombshell. The public didn't ha to be steeped in criminal lore to alize that Vito Genovese, "Joe nanas" Bonanno, Joe Profaci ( of the old guard that had attend a 1929 Mafia grand council me ing in Cleveland) and at least si others hadn't gathered from all o the country just to grill steaks gether. And it began to wonder w it took a lone New York state troop to find out what was going on.

The FBI was more than sligh embarrassed. Publicly, it maintain characteristic silence. Secretly, ho ever, it undertook what was call the Top Hoodlum Program, a lated effort to bring syndicate b wigs to justice.

Two years later, in 1959, I w assigned as an inspector's aide view the program's results in Los igeles. I found that agents had stalled wire taps and electronic ugs" on hoodlums and foraged rough their refuse for clues. They d also employed the conventional ctics of surveillance, interrogation d plain footwork. A tall stack of elligence had been culled from files of the Los Angeles police, io had started their own top hood- n program seven years previous- following the Kefauver hearings. nerally, the agents had done a od job in the short time, but it is apparent that the syndicate uldn't be toppled overnight. More- er, the FBI's interest, never genu- , was beginning to flag.

The bureau continued to live the past of Dillinger, Ol' Kreepy d the Osage Indian murders. By 55, truly significant crime was ndicated. For several years I had en assigned to an office known the service as a "country club." was distant from Washington and n in fairly autonomous fashion a local boss with high political nnections. He was able to inflate s agent staff "just in case," and is made work light for everybody. evertheless I repeatedly asked for insfer to the metropolitan East iere big-league crime flourished. ie boss didn't understand. "Why e hell do you want to go back to ose teeming cities when you have so good out here?"

That was the idea—relax and en- y what you can't change. Only one an called the shots in the FBI, and didn't take kindly to advice. ipes about organized crime fell deaf ears. No one wanted to be cused of having "mental hali- sis," which is how Hoover some- nes referred to those with non- nformist notions. Though every- e chuckled at the following anec- te when it made the rounds, they t the message:

Agents cornered a Top Ten fugi- e at a New York subway entrance. brief skirmish ensued. One agent is grazed in the leg by a bullet d taken to the hospital for obser- tion. The report to Washington t slightly garbled. The next morn- g Hoover appeared as scheduled deliver a speech to a civic group. entlemen," he began, "I am with u today even though my heart is avy. . . . Last night in New York e of my agents was killed in a n battle." The director's words t back to New York agents, who drew straws to see who would go up to the hospital and finish off the wounded agent.

But as far as the public was concerned the FBI blotter was, as always, filled with big-time criminal names. A publicity gimmick called the Top Ten Fugitives Program maintained the illusion. Two-bit hoods, about as colorful as an army blanket, were arbitrarily designated "The Ten Most Wanted." Most were alcoholic tumbleweeds, tattooed megalomaniacs and kooky criminals. Recent billings: Harold Thomas O'Brien, charged with the barroom slaying of a buddy and described by the FBI as a "quick-tempered, big-talking ex-convict . . . always having one or more guns readily available." Louis Vasselli, said to be "extremely dangerous, especially when he has been drinking, and particularly dangerous to women, most particularly strip teasers." Edward H. Maps, a bearded artist accused of slaying his wife and daughter, called by the FBI "the alleged murderous beatnik." Top Ten? The only one even tentatively linked to organized crime was Fred Tenuto, and he hasn't been found.

Most so-called Top Ten fugitives are wanted for local crimes, often vicious ones. After police have solved the case, they ask the FBI to locate the fleeing suspect under the Fugitive Felon Act. The G-men are indeed the world's best bloodhounds when it comes to tracking down criminals on the lam, yet they are forced to ignore the "mobsters in gray flannel suits" (as Robert Kennedy tagged them) who thrive under their very noses.

The Top Ten Program, despite its publicity value, can't be stretched into a $150-million-per-year appropriation. When it comes before the Congressional committee that holds the purse strings, the FBI's blandishment is largely statistical: so many fugitives captured, so many convictions, so many cars recovered. . . . The figures, running on and on, are impressive.

But the numbers don't just grow; they are manufactured. If a Congressman stopped to think about it, he might wonder why there is a slight increase in each category year after year. Here's the answer, in an official memorandum from a local FBI boss to all his agents:

> The statistical accomplishments as of April 30, 1961, reflect that we continue to be below the statistical accomplishments for the preceding year in the categories of convictions and fines, savings and recoveries. We have already exceeded our accomplishments in the fugitive category for the entire fiscal year, and in the field of automobiles recovered, we will need five additional recoveries to equal the accomplishments of the preceding year. . . . For your information, for us to equal our accomplishments in the field of convictions, it will be necessary that we report an additional 47 convictions between now and the end of June. (The end of the fiscal year.)

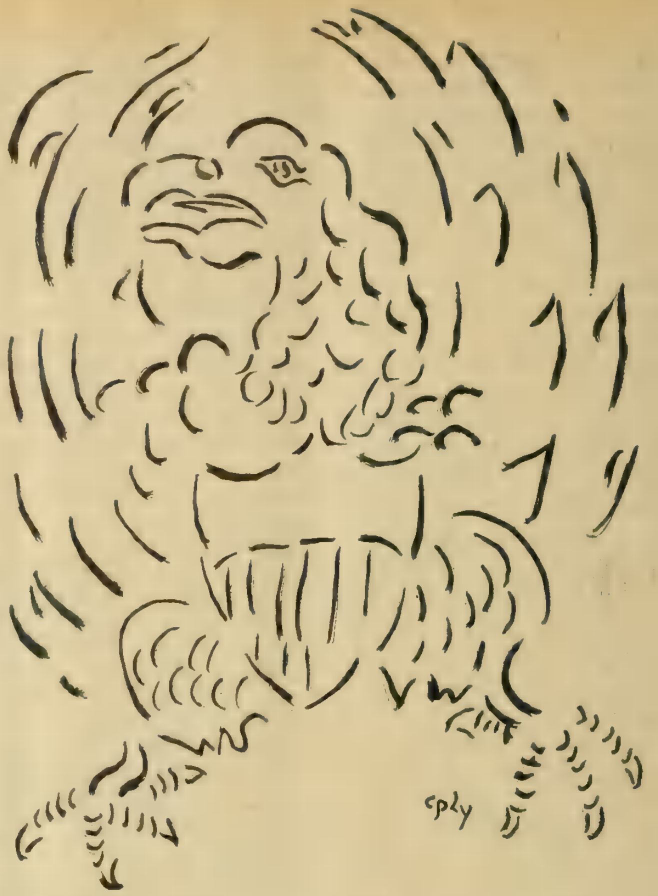
Translated, the memo reads: "Ease off on fugitives. Automobiles should take care of themselves. But for God's sake, go out and get a fistful of quick convictions." This is practically an ultimatum. The local boss is under the gun from Washington, and the agents are rated for their statistical production.

It is natural that under such pressure the scales of justice get out of kilter. It's the little guy, maybe without any criminal bent, who is caught in the dragnet, not the kings of crime with their batteries of lawyers. For example, we once broke up a ring of servicemen stealing small hand tools from military supplies. The ring had a "distributor," a civilian who peddled the tools as legitimate surplus. We arrested the servicemen and the civilian, and I thought that wrapped it up. But it was almost the end of the fiscal year and the office was starving for statistics. Arrest warrants were issued for seven citizens who had bought one or two tools, thinking them clean. The arrests were delayed long enough for forms to be sent to Washington declaring the seven as fugitives. A fugitive is a person whose whereabouts is unknown. Hoover calls them "fleeing criminals." Of course, we knew exactly where our "fugitives" were—they were reputable businessmen and workers who had lived in the community for years.

When the time came to swoop down on these seven, I was put in charge of a squad of agents. We gathered to plan final details of the roundup. One agent, disgusted with the whole thing, wanted to resign on the spot. None of us was very proud; we felt the men were being unjustly stigmatized. They would have an arrest record as FBI fugitives; it would cling to them the rest of their lives and make it tough to get a decent job. One, I knew, had applied as a deputy sheriff and this would finish him.

Three "beeps"—the bank robbery signal—sounded on the car radios. We hoped it was the real thing; anything for a reprieve from what we didn't want to do. But it was a false alarm, and we had to go ahead with the arrests. Later, when the prosecuting attorney took a long look at the facts, he hit the ceiling and dropped most of the charges. The rest were nullified in court. Secretly, we were glad. But the arrest records would never be erased.

"The Great Brick Caper," as agents sarcastically termed it, was another case of statistical pettifoggery. Residents of a small community had hauled away a few bricks from crumbling wash houses on an abandoned war-housing project. They built themselves patios and barbecue pits. The project was unfenced and unposted and the bricks, in legal parlance, were an attractive nuisance. Nevertheless, theft of government property charges were ordered. One arrested resident complained bitterly, "Why don't you guys go find Tenuto?" We also wondered.



Stolen cars are the FBI's statistical bread and butter. Here is a typical case. An alert deputy sheriff spotted two young couples in a stolen car, arrested them and notified the owner in a nearby state. Because of the interstate angle, the deputy also called the FBI. I went out and tied up a few loose ends, then arranged to process the four through federal court. However, I was reluctant to throw the girls, both juveniles, into jail. I proposed releasing them to their parents. The local boss vetoed the idea. "They won't be there long, and we need the convictions in a hurry." It was April, near the end of the fiscal year.

In addition to the four convictions, the FBI claimed the car's value, even though the deputy had actually made the recovery. It tacked on the usual catch phrase: "Recovered in FBI-investigated case." G-men habitually do this even though they may never lay eyes on the car. It helps Hoover sustain his boast of returning to the taxpayers $1.37 for each dollar spent.

Hoover has long insisted that almost all crime, including organized crime, is "essentially a local problem." He has said that the only way to lick it is by "mutual cooperation at all levels of law enforcement—federal, state and local." But the theory is contradicted by the record. According to Hoover (if not to local law officers) there has always been cooperation, yet in the period 1940 to 1960, crime mushroomed some 125 per cent.

Of course, Hoover is almost alone in demoting organized crime to a local problem. Senator Kefauver charged that "much of the responsibility for what is going on rests squarely upon the federal enforcement agencies." And Robert Kennedy flatly declared that hoodlums and racketeers "have become so rich and powerful that they have outgrown local authorities."

Even if organized crime became primarily a federal problem, there would still have to be teamwork all around. But the FBI won't always give as much as it gets. The testimony of state and local officers convinced Kefauver that "the Bureau tends to be overly secretive with information it collects on criminals—in other words, exchange of information with the FBI is something of a 'one-way street.'" Burt Turkus, the Manhattan D.A. who broke up Murder, Inc., said "the bleat of police departments across the coun is that the FBI too ardently guar many of the things it learns on local level—and which could aid t local officers. . . . This cleavage t mobster always enjoys."

How much mobsters enjoy it w shown in a 1962 Senate rack probe. A $10-million-a-year vice sy dicate lured unwed mothers in white slave rings and shunted the between mobster-dominated ga bling casinos and night clubs in fi states. Reputed Chicago syndica kingpins were named in the ope tion. It was a white slave rac perfectly designed for FBI jurisd tion, but U.S. prosecutor Willia J. Scott complained: "The syndica bosses seem better organized times than the splintered, sporac law-enforcement efforts of feder state and local officials."

From contacts with police ov the years I know that they rese the FBI's Big Brother attitude. Mc of them keep quiet about it becau they depend on the bureau for fi gerprint and laboratory services, b a few have spoken out. In the Fra Sinatra, Jr., kidnaping, Los Angel police chief William Parker accus G-men of causing a potentially e plosive situation by being "unnece

ly secretive." And when the FBI
d to warn the California High-Patrol about trigger-happy bank ers in the Lake Tahoe area, a ol commander thundered: "How ly more times will similar ciristances be repeated to sustain legend of the FBI with the life ne lone CHP officer hanging in balance?"

conspicuous FBI trait is its reance to share glory. The attorgeneral's Special Group, men-ed at the start of this article, id that out in blunt fashion.
r Apalachin, Attorney General
iam Rogers assembled the group the country's talented prose-ng attorneys. Their mission was ry to determine what had gone ng with the Cosa Nostra prose-on and to try to spearhead a erted campaign against the spirators. The response of most ral agencies was enthusiastic; gave unstintingly of men and materials. But Hoover turned old shoulder to the Special up, supplying only token co-ration. A "super-duper Dick cy outfit," he snorted.

urprisingly, the "Dick Tracys" red convictions of the Apalamob in federal court (later reed on technical grounds).
ereupon the FBI tried to grab major credit, stating that it had ished 1,588 pages of report to prosecution. (It didn't mention most of these pages were forth-ing only during the trial, when court ordered them to be pro-ed.) This ruffled the narcotics f, Dr. Anslinger, whose agents worked hand in glove with the cial Group. Noting the "other ple who are trying to take credit this since this matter has been ght to the public attention," he ted the names of five agencies elt did the whole job. Pointedly tted was the FBI.

Around the water cooler in FBI, Hoover was viewed, more we than admiration, as a bu-cratic Mr. Bigdome who knew to win friends and influence ple on Capitol Hill. Never has power been displayed more con-ntly than in the battle over a onal commission to crush or-ized crime. The idea of a rival ncy is insufferable to Hoover, whenever it is proposed he ages to shoot it down.
1951, Senator Kefauver enthusiastically favored a new agency. He envisioned the national crime commission as being composed of prominent citizens and representatives of the Justice and Treasury Departments. Hoover threw himself in front of it. Mustering his coterie in Congress, he invoked the specter of an incipient Gestapo. This was as silly as describing the Warren Commission as a potential MVD. "There is no connection between a federal crime commission and a national police force," protested Kefauver. "Every Senator I know, myself included, would stand up and fight to the last breath any suggestion that we create anything resembling an American Gestapo." But Kefauver was wasting his breath. Hoover got his way.*

In 1960, Sen. John McClellan, whose rackets committee had listened to the opinions of numerous experts, again proposed a national crime commission. John F. Kennedy, then a Senator, and two of his colleagues agreed. So did a steering committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, led by Edward J. Allen, who had compiled a brilliant record in fighting the syndicates of Youngstown, Ohio. So did Milton R. Wessel, a former U.S. prosecutor who had been head of the Special Group. So did Captain James Hamilton, founder of the model Los Angeles police intelligence unit, who stated: "A national clearing house for information about the organized underworld would provide us with a weapon to strike a real blow at this nation's organized criminals. . . . The definite lack has been on a federal level in furnishing local departments information as to the movements of national figures."

Robert Kennedy, at the time counsel to the McClellan committee, anticipated Hoover's objection. The national crime commission, he declared, "would not be a national police, but a national information service for police." This didn't check the G-man. In an address to the law-enforcement clan he scored "outside theorists" and "alleged friends" who advanced the "grandiose scheme" of a national crime commission. They were, he said, "blinded by the urge of 'empire building.' " "Nothing could be more dangerous to our democratic ideals than the establishment of an all-powerful police agency on the federal scene," cried the all-powerful police chief. The High Priest had spoken; organized crime could again heave a sigh of relief.

When Robert Kennedy became Attorney General in 1961, I took hope. In his book, The Enemy Within (Harper), he had stressed: "Our first and most urgent need is for a national crime commission." His brother shared his view, and it appeared that he might at last lay down the law to Hoover. Still in the FBI, I wrote to the Attorney General and to the old campaigner, Estes Kefauver, assuring them that "most agents would prefer to lock horns with organized crime, but are saddled with wresting minor violations from local authorities for the purposes of statistics gathering." In the end it was not Hoover who capitulated, but Robert Kennedy. He announced lamely that he wasn't "as strong for the idea as in the past." Kefauver told me candidly: "Hoover is more powerful than the President."

However, Robert Kennedy wasn't totally defeated. He took the indirect means of building up what resembles a national crime commission within the Justice Department. This left Hoover in the driver's seat, but the Attorney General's hand was on the throttle. The Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, first set up in 1953 as a result of the Kefauver recommendations, now concentrated on the top echelon. "We would rather jail one important racketeer," said Kennedy, "than a dozen lesser hoodlums."

This newly animated Justice Department activity, though obviously a stopgap until Hoover steps down, for a time seemed to show real promise. "We never had a decent intelligence picture before," said William G. Hundley, head of the section. Now the section holds dossiers on 1,100 of the country's top hoodlums and Hundley boasts mildly: "We're positive now who the real overlords are. We've gotten some of them, but only some." Examples: Tony "Ducks" Corallo in New York, Mike Cuppolla in Miami and Frank "Buster" Workman in St.

---

*The National Crime Commission set up by President Johnson is not the sort of body Senator Kefauver had in mind. It is more a study group composed of sociologists, penologists, et al., and is concerned with street crimes and similar problems. Hoover quite approves of it: now he can say that there is a National Crime Commission.

Louis. Under indictment are Angelo Bruno, reputed Philadelphia Cosa Nostra chief, and Felix Alderisio, the reported number 2 man in Chicago. In August, 1963, the section presented its first major witness: Joe Valachi, a Cosa Nostra sublieutenant jailed by the Bureau of Narcotics, described in chilling detail the inner workings of Cosa Nostra, the organization that Hoover had always considered a phantom.

To put sharper teeth in Operation Big Squeeze, as the effort was termed, Kennedy urged the House Judiciary Subcommittee to consider supplemental laws. Chairman Emanuel Celler called for the personal appearance of Hoover, for questioning about organized crime. The G-man declined. Celler then asked Robert Kennedy to try to "change Mr. Hoover's attitude." Hoover would not budge.

But a year later, the aging G-man suddenly bowed to necessity. "The battle is joined," he trumpeted. "We have taken up the gauntlet flung down by organized crime. Let us unite in a devastating assault to annihilate this mortal enemy."

The FBI quickly found that picking up the glove wasn't that easy—the syndicate hoods weren't the Dillinger kind of pigeon. In Chicago, for example, Sam Giancana turned the tables on the G-men in federal court by showing movies of them so close on his heels that he could smell their breath. "An admission of ineptness," admonished the judge. The local FBI boss declined to explain why he had orderec harassment, and was clapped custody for contempt of court.

For Hoover's antique outf looked like a long road. As Ric Ogilvie, the Chicago sheriff, ha it: "Some of Hoover's ideas are ly behind the times. . . . The F still organized to fight a crime tern of the 20s and 30s. It is set up to do battle with the crir syndicate. . . ." But old G-men die. At the end of 1964, Hoove ported sixty-five gambling and eteering convictions. None we the top level, and they were o drop in the bucket of 12,850 convictions; they hardly mac liar of Ogilvie. But it was a ste the right direction. Perhaps in other forty years. . . .

The Klan Discovers HUAC . . . Walter Goodm

Washington

The House Committee on Un-American Activities' Ku Klux Klan hearings opened a day after the start, in Hayneville, Ala., of the second trial of Collie Leroy Wilkins, Jr., for the murder of Mrs. Viola Gregg Liuzzo. This coincidence was unfortunate because it drained the hearing of some of the fun we have come to expect from HUAC's performances. It was delightful to learn that the North Carolina Klan's request for funds (checks to be made out to your local "improvement association" or "sportsmen's club") promises, "Your donation will be used to help make our community a better place to live." But down in Hayneville, an all-white jury was engaged in letting Klansman Wilkins go free.

There was standing room only on opening day in the spacious and ornate House Caucus Room. A dozen uniformed police were on hand, plus two plain-clothesmen who sat glumly beside the K.K.K. witness row, facing the audience—but whether defending them from us or us from them was not clear. Among the hundreds of spectators the first week were America's pre-eminent Nazi, George Lincoln Rockwell, whom the committee had been authorized to investigate, and America's pre-eminent peace striker Donna Allen, who has already been investigated and who wore a large button announcing that she is not now and never has been a member of HUAC. By the second morning plenty of seats were available and at no time was there any picketing or demonstration. The young protesters who usually enliven HUAC productions had not found it in their hearts to make a fuss over the civil rights of Imperial Wizard Robert M. Shelton.

As the hearings began, the Klansmen, some ten in a row, stood along the back wall, readily recognizable as the bunch from everybody's neighborhood whom nervous mothers warn their sons and daughters to shun, but dressed up now in white shirts and dark suits for the Saturday night dance where they are certain to drink too much beer and cause a disturbance. Wizard Shelton, whose ridged, sucked-in cheeks make him look considerably older than his 36 years, seemed almost attractive in the company of his colleagues.

Four of the five prosecutor-judges seated at the subcommittee table were fellow southerners: Chairman Willis of Louisiana; Representative Pool of Texas; Representative Weltner, the Atlanta liberal who first asked for the hearings, and, at the Republican end of the table, resentative Buchanan, the fi man from Alabama. Representa Ashbrook of Ohio completed panel.

The notion of many libe that these men were plotting turn the K.K.K. hearings into attack on the civil rights m ment was understandable, but conceived. It did justice neithe the political good sense of the gressmen nor to their personal titudes. Far from wishing to fend the K.K.K., the Southern who dominate HUAC are out prove that Klansmen are cr and freaks (Buchanan, in a b of wit, called Shelton the Impe Lizard) and have nothing in c mon with decent citizens of South — like the members of White Citizens Councils who on juries.

The show had its moments.
those who had always known the Klan was composed of clo and clods, it was satisfying to le that they think of themselves kligrapps (secretaries), kloka (lecturers) and kludds (chaplair
There was an instant of exc ment when Shelton, to the surp and disappointment of the c mittee, first took the Fifth. He c tinued to take it, in a voice t remained remarkably express hour after hour, considering

Walter Goodman, journalist and editor, is the author most recently of All Honorable Men (Little, Brown). He is now working on a history of HUAC.

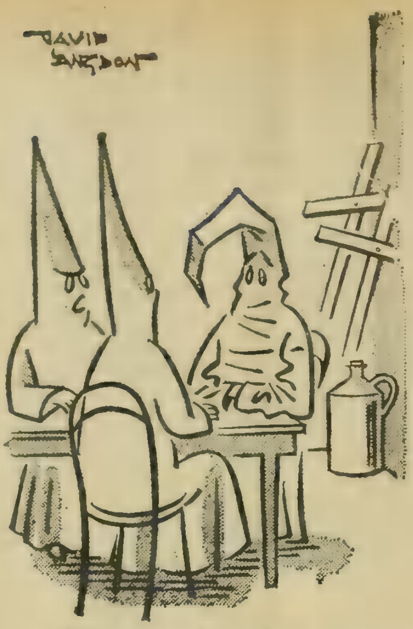
sage typed on the small rec- gle of paper his lawyer had ed before him:

"I respectively decline to an-swer *at question for the reason that hon-estly feel that my answer ght tend to in-*crim-*idate me in lation of my rights guaran-*teed me by amendments five, one, *ur and four-*teen of the Yew- ted States of A-mer-ica!"

a Kluxer to take the Fifth like ordinary Commy is poetry; for to take the Fourteenth is epic. lton proclaimed the statement; nd Dragon Jones of North Car- a intoned it; Grand Dragon negay of Virginia recited it. No ner had the chain-smoking Wiz- , impassive in the witness chair, n released than he came to life talked spiritedly to anyone who ld listen about LBJ, Dr. King the Communist conspiracy.

here was melodrama when Mrs. lton and Mrs. Carol Long, Shel- 's secretary, were called upon to whether they had signed checks h the names of nonexistent cor- ate treasurers. Betty Lou Shel- is a dark-haired, gray-faced, btrusive little woman. Plump rol Long, in the usual style of retaries set beside wives, made ore colorful appearance and she d off her constitutional preroga- s in a more musical voice. ere was nostalgia: In this very m seventeen years ago, commit- investigator Donald G. Appell, o is conducting the K.K.K. hear- s, participated in the Hiss- ambers inquiry, with the assist- e of a handwriting expert med Schmitz, who now reappear- to affirm with slides that Carol g was T. M. Montgomery and t Betty Lou Shelton was James Hendrix, invisible treasurers of Invisible Empire.

There were bows. The first day's rings had hardly ended before presentative Ashbrook was in nt of the TV cameras outside caucus room telling Shelton ho was still inside) that he had n shown up to all America: a n-event of supreme inconse- ence. And there were abundant npliments, reminiscent of those nd old comics who never forgot ask the audience to give a big nd to the boys in the band. The ommittee members took turns complimenting the staff. Appell nplimented Southern police of- ers, with the exception of one o gave him the secret K.K.K. handshake. Pool complimented Willis for his conduct of the hearings and Willis complimented the Klansmen's attorney, Leslie V. Chalmers of Raleigh, N.C., a soft-voiced, baby-faced, apologetic man of evident breeding, for his conduct of the defense; he hadn't behaved like one of those Communist lawyers. Willis also complimented the FBI and the firm that produced the slides showing locations of klaverns. At lunch, staff members congratulated themselves on how well things had gone. It was like first night on the borsch circuit.



"Pity your missus isn't more sympathetic to our aims, Crabtree."

Punch: Ben Roth Agency

While in Hayneville the good name of Collie Leroy Wilkins was being safeguarded by Alabama justice, in Washington the committee was producing evidence that Shelton has been channeling his blood brothers' contributions into a Tuscaloosa account belonging to an invention of his called the Alabama Rescue Service, and then, with the assistance of the signatures of his wife and Mrs. Long, had been taking it out again to buy himself a Cadillac and groceries at his nearby Piggly Wiggly supermarket. He was also alleged to have shaken down a local engineering firm in trouble with the state, and was apparently kicked out of the Alabama Knights of the K.K.K. for withholding dues from the reigning Wizard. As for the Grand Dragons of North Carolina and Virginia, they were impecunious drifters before their elevation in Wizard Shelton's Klandom, whereupon overnight they became affluent models for aspiring poor white lads all over the South. Dragon Jones even makes a profit on the sale of sheets; the material costs him about $3.20 and he sells the finished article, with peaked hat, for $15.

It was also revealed that a lot of crosses have been burned in the past couple of years and that the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan of Mississippi has passed around among its members a memorandum on accredited techniques of good-humored harassment; these include the use of itching powder, tear gas, snakes and lizards and mad dogs. However, individual initiative is also encouraged, and committee sources promise that future testimony in what is expected to be a long series of hearings will bring out details of more violent K.K.K. works than milking the till and infiltrating itching powder.

A Congressional committee investigation of the Ku Klux Klan does not outrage the Constitution. Despite complaints of HUAC's opponents, the Supreme Court has never declared that the production of laws is the sole legitimate excuse for the existence of committees of Congress. If the hearings served no function other than to inform the public about the circumstances that have created and maintained a condition in the South that makes the Liuzzo case possible, that would justify them. Setting aside for the sake of argument the possibility that the political tone in this country would not suffer if HUAC were disbanded tomorrow, the committee's behavior so far has been as decorous and as fair as it can be, given its inherited role and predilections. Investigator Appell, reporting that Shelton got a hardship discharge from the Air Force during the Korean War, noted in an aside: "And this was at a time when a lot of boys were losing their lives. . . ." Whereupon Chairman Willis told him to get along to the next question. It deprives Edwin Willis of no personal credit to observe, however, that his committee is trapped by its own bad habits.

HUAC has since its beginnings more than a quarter century ago been out not to educate (though on occasion it has been more educational than some of us have been willing to concede), but to hang—to get the bad guys. This vigilante mentality is what now impels it to broadcast revelations of small-time peculations by the kleagles. If the dragons and wizards are bilking their flock, or being careless about their tax returns or burning crosses and setting off fire crackers on people's front lawns, they ought of course to be prosecuted, but HUAC has always had trouble understanding that it is not the function of the Congress to go after private citizens, however detestable, for common misdemeanors. National attention needs to be directed less to the thugs themselves than to the police who will not arrest them, the courts that will not convict them and the officials who will not stand up to them.

Having said this much, however, I confess that it seems to me these hearings may be a heavier blow to the resurgent Klans than anything a more respectable body would have managed. The committee's insistence on asking questions that it knows are not going to be answered, its intrusion into affairs that belong in our lower courts, its reliance on publicity to do the job of punishment, its infatuation with establishing new Fifth-Amendment records—these, alas, are likely to work down there on the level where the K.K.K. operates most successfully. The North Carolina used-car dealer who, while in the witness chair, startled the committee by resigning as treasurer (klabee) of his klavern (the White County Improvement Association) and turning over a batch of canceled checks, explained that he was disillusioned by the Klan leaders' refusal to testify. "Anyone who takes the Fifth Amendment," he said, speaking now for many onlookers at HUAC's proceedings, "either has something to or is a Communist."

"How's everything under the hood?"
Renault, Frontier: Ben Roth Agency

Men who can abide a little cı ing of a pushy Negro may y offended by the idea of a g dragon gouging lesser knight the price of a sheet, or using 50c-a-month Imperial Tax to molasses not for the gas tank civil rights workers but for his table. What the Rev. Roy Wo former Grand Cludd of North ( lina, didn't like about his cl was that they wore diamond ri traveled first class and empl shills at rallies. He is annoyed they aren't working harder at serving segregation in the Sout

On the first day of the hearin pretty girl passed out a peti from five civil rights organizati asking the President to appoi committee to investigate the K
But a Presidential commiss though it would undoubtedly h proceeded in a more edifying n ner, would certainly have go things all wrong; its distinguis members would have been wo ing about murder instead of p larceny. The instinctive gift of majority of the House Un-Ameri Activities Committee is that w it comes to appealing to respecta whites in Mississippi and Alaba it knows how to put first things fi

The Student Left

IDEALISM AND ACTION . . . . Jack Newfie

We seek the establishment of a democracy of individual participation governed by two central aims: that the individual share in those social decisions determining the direction and quality of his life; that society be organized to encourage independence in men and provide the media for their common participation.

—Founding manifesto of Students for a Democratic Society

During the last month, four developments have helped to inscribe the initials SDS (Students for a Democratic Society) on the consciousness of political America. One was the announcement by Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach on October 17 that the Justice Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation were investigating SDS for its "aiding and abetting of draft evasion." A second was the sudden volley of attacks aimed at the 3-year-old group by Sen. John Stennis of Mississippi, by the SNCC-baiting columnists, Roland Evans and Robert Novack, and by such influential Senators as Dodd and Lausche. The third eye catcher was the fact that twenty-six new SDS chapters sprouted up as soon as the colleges reopened, and that most of these were self-starting groups which merely wrote to the SDS national office in Chicago for membership cards. And the fourth was the estimated 50,000 students across the country who actively protested on October 15-16 agai America's participation in the V nam war.

Together these events point a single conclusion: the New L is not a Pop culture oddity co parable to goldfish eating or pa raids, but a symptom of deep s dent alienation from the Great ciety. Underground movies, p smoking, bohemian dress, idios cratic haircuts and Bob Dylan also symptoms of this alienati but SDS—and SNCC—are the litical forms it takes. And it is n clear that both the right wing a the Johnson Administration rec nize the depth and durability this disaffection, and its potent for future growth to politi strength.

SDS was founded at an en

Jack Newfield is an assistant editor of The Village Voice, New York.

onal convention held in June of 962 at the AFL-CIO Labor Center t Port Huron, Mich. Fifty-nine eople attended, forty-three of them oting delegates. Less than three ears after this meager beginning, DS marshaled 20,000 people for n Easter march on Washington o protest the war in Vietnam.

The main business of the founding convention was the revision nd adoption of a 63-page manifesto called the Port Huron Statement. It was drafted by SDS's first president, Tom Hayden, and later became the basic intellectual document of the New Left. The heart of the manifesto was the call for participatory democracy" in all economic, political and human relationships. It also showed the influence of C. Wright Mills, especially in its affirmation of the student as agent of social change, and n its rejection of ritualistic anticommunism, as "unreasonable paranoia. . . . There should be a way for a person or an organization to oppose communism without contributing to the fear of common ssociation and public actions."

Immediately following the convention, SDS became locked in desperate combat with its parent organization, the ILGWU-dominated League for Industrial Democracy, which refused to recognize any of the decisions made at Port Huron and swiftly changed the lock on the SDS office. The League accused its student affiliate of hiring individuals of pro-Soviet convictions, of distributing "Stalinist literature"; it charged the Port Huron Statement with "popular frontism and fuzziness on authoritarianism."

For a month the infant organization's life was in hazard. However, SDS finally won the right to organizational integrity, largely through the intercession of adults on the LID board such as Norman Thomas, Dr. Harold Taylor and Andrew Norman. Recently Michael Harrington, the new chairman of the somewhat radicalized LID, has apologized to the students for his role in the post-convention struggle. But SDS's difficult birth left its scar, and today Tom Hayden says bitterly: "It taught me Social Democrats aren't radicals and never to trust them again." Quite recently, LID and SDS agreed to an amicable separation.

In the autumn of 1962, when SDS began to recruit in earnest on college campuses, it had 900 members, and had to compete with a host of other organizations: The Student Peace Union, New University Thought, the Young People's Socialist League, CORE, campus chapters of ADA, and all the Marxist sects. SDS has now emerged from this pack as the strongest group on the New Left.

There are several reasons for this eminence, the most important of which is that it offered a multi-issue approach to politics, unlike CORE and SPU which each concentrated on a single issue. The Port Huron Statement tied civil rights, militarism, poverty, deprivation of civil liberties and university reform into one analysis of the whole fabric of America as a cold-war garrison state.

Other reasons for SDS's growth were its activism, its freedom from a rigid ideology, its avoidance of sectarianism, its ability to attract adult supporters independent of the LID (among them I. F. Stone and A. J. Muste), its reputation on many campuses as "SNCC's best friend," and the intellectual caliber of many of its leaders.

Now SDS fears it may be growing too fast. "We could have handed out membership cards at the Vietnam march and got 8,000 new members just like that," says 22-year-old National Secretary Paul Booth, "but we wouldn't have known what to do with them, except to impress people with our membership of 10,000."

The organization's current accounting of 3,300 members in 100 chapters in forty-one states is, therefore, not an accurate index of its real strength on the nation's

Movement

After speaking on Vietnam in Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri

Once at night driving over the mountains impatient, I smoked a lot
The matches I struck many miles apart each ignited a world each almost blinding yes, each blowing out but etching a glory deep
The road rolled under my wheels with the gray trees my eyes tired, tired but hunting and my lungs were full

People said they liked my speeches
I was proud and nauseated
If I witnessed a bloody accident across the street my very moving chronicle would hold an audience too

I traveled bearing messages of bravado and fear on a careening death-bed exchanging diagnoses but someone I'd never met called me his friend

We talk a lot about cutting through it is good to talk about learning not to talk

There are a few or more who sing somber, ironic, false-heroic ballads with open ears impiously, becoming true-heroic

Christ who would have believed the country could be so big?
Sniff the perfumed must as in a great closet a glass chandelier hanging, banging from the expiring breath of the numberless rattle the door but don't bother waiting it locks from inside

Tonight the radio speaks of Nationwide Demonstrations
All my friends are desperate
We go on making plans

Todd Gitlin

campuses. Members of the New Left are, by instinct, not joiners, and for every registered SDS student, there are perhaps five others who participate in its activities.

The diversity within SDS is staggering. There are high school students, college students, college dropouts, beatniks, hipsters, graduate students, teaching assistants and faculty in the organization. There are liberals, rebels and revolutionaries; community organizers and university scholars; campus chapters and ghetto projects.

The overwhelming majority of members are white, middle class and concentrated on urban campuses like the Universities of Chicago, Michigan, California and Texas, as well as Swarthmore, Harvard and Oberlin.

Few of the members appear to be ideologues of the sort who inhabit the W.E.B. Du Bois Clubs, or zealots like the Progressive Labor Party rank and file. Instead they seem to be genuinely idealistic, but can perceive no outlet for idealism in a Great Society where the Civil Rights Act is enforced by segregationist judges, wars on poverty are waged by clubhouse politicians and "freedom" is exported by napalm.

The cultural heroes of the SDS members are not specifically political types, but rather utopian moralists like Camus and Paul Goodman; or alienated absurdists like Bob Dylan and Ken Kesey; and for the hip fringe, sexual explorers like Norman O. Brown, Allen Ginsberg and Lenny Bruce. They are idealists in search of an ideal. Politically, SDS shares many assumptions with SNCC—that the liberal institutions are impotent and finky, that social change will come only when the unemployed and desperately poor are organized into an insurgent movement under their own leaders, who won't "sell them out." Both groups have a strong streak of anarchism that makes them skeptical of all centralized authority, all bureaucracy and sometimes even of voting and programs. Both are strongly oriented toward grass-roots democracy, and ethical and moral absolutism, refuse to exclude Communists from membership, and take a radically critical position toward the American Establishment. Both groups to a degree wear the blinders of their preoccupations; as the SNCC worker thinks all of America is like Mississippi, SDS members believe America treats all countries as it treats Vietnam and the Dominican Republic. Both are activist; SDS, has organized projects in ten Northern ghettos under its Economic Research and Education Project (EARP), including three that are trying to build a radical movement among poor whites.

But SDS differs from SNCC in several crucial ways. First, while it shares some of SNCC's populist anti-intellectualism, it contains an extraordinary group of gifted intellectuals, now centered in Chicago.

This group includes students who were instrumental in founding the organization in 1962, and who are now university instructors like Dick Flacks, graduate students like Bob Ross, full-time staff members like Paul Booth and Todd Gitlin, or otherwise academically connected.

SDS has no one leader, nor even a cadre of ten who can be identified as the leadership. But as a result of a National Council meeting held in Bloomington, Ind., in September, the center of gravity in the organization has shifted toward these older intellectuals, after a long period when the EARP activists and the anarchist-hipsters set the tone. Prodded by this older group at the Bloomington meeting, SDS will hold an unprecedented membership co ference at Christmas, "to look ourselves intellectually and orga zationally."

A second way in which SDS d fers from SNCC is that it has ca pus chapters—by now more th 100—and these provide enormo organizational problems because the great differences among the Those members on small, rur campuses in Kansas and Oklahom are only vaguely liberal and pro ably unable to distinguish betwee a Spartacist and a narcissist. O these campuses the students a more concerned with liberalizin dress regulations than with bur ing up their draft cards. But o large urban campuses—the Unive sity of Chicago, Berkeley or Cit College—SDS members are supe militant, distrust liberals and ar ready to do anything to protest th war in Vietnam. The exercise no confronting SDS is at the sam time to educate the freshmen politically at Kalamazoo and Piedmont while retooling intellectually, whil not appearing less militant tha "the Trots" at Berkeley, while absorbing new memberships at the rate of 200 a week.

The EARP section of SDS began in 1963 with a grant of $3,000 from the United Auto Workers Union. Today there are ten community-organizing projects — in Baltimore, Newark, Oakland, Chicago, Cleveland, Cambridge, Cairo, New Haven, Chester and Appalachia. There has been uneven success—from Cairo, which is struggling to survive, to Newark, which has won several major concessions from the city (among them the de-activation of an urban-renewal plan that would have uprooted thousands from their homes) and has been able to add fifteen local Negroes to its organizing staff.

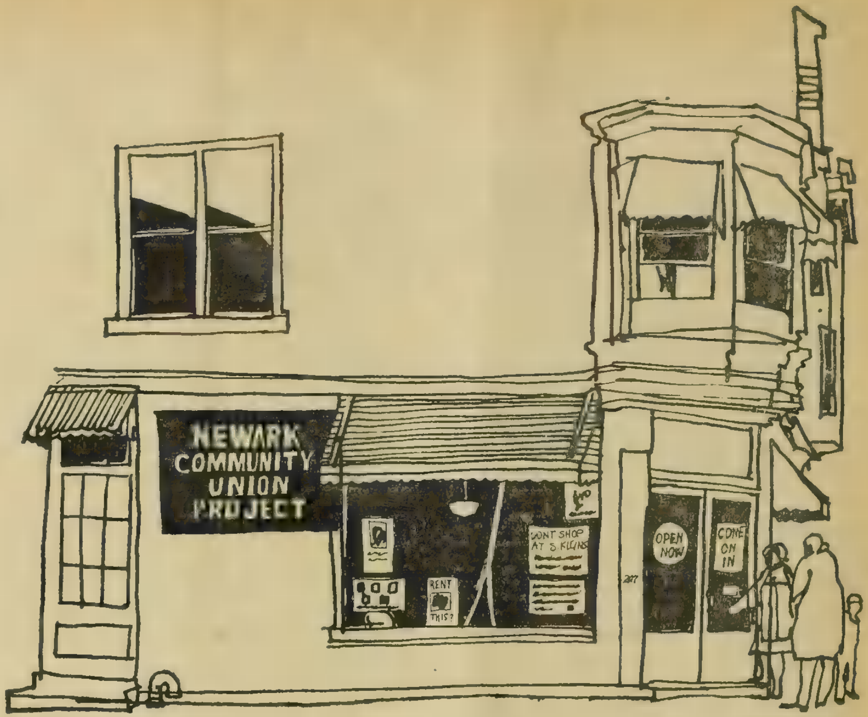
All the projects are based on the same organizing principle. The students move into a community, ask the poor what they want done, and then find indigenous leaders to help build a movement based on the goals of the community. SDS community organizers lack the toughness and discipline of an old CIO organizer. They seem more in the tradition of the anarchist Basque priests or the mystical Russian "narodniks." Many seem more interested in redemption of the poor than in revolution. Nevertheless, they have been called Comnunists in most cities and arrested n Newark and Chicago on charges hat later were dropped for insufficient evidence.

Their injection of participatory lemocracy into the ghetto can both nspire and irritate the onlooker. The non-leadership technique does give local people a chance to speak, to make decisions, to gain confidence and ultimately to lead, and it is a moving experience to watch an unknown Northern equivalent of Fannie Lou Hamer going through this process under the guidance of an EARP worker. But occasionally, in large meetings, or under the pressure of crisis decisions, participatory democracy breaks down into filibustering anarchy. SDS has tried to make it almost a substitute for a program, and that is a mistake. Participatory democracy is a brilliant, therapeutic organizing technique, especially in the rural South, but its validity as an ideological bulwark is dubious.

The ghetto projects, as their chief architect Tom Hayden says, can be judged only in terms of years. Right now they have not produced the goal of an "interracial movement of the poor," since 2,000 or 3,000 people in ten cities is not a movement. But EARP is the beginning of a long experiment, and Newark is a significant achievement.

With SDS now under attack from the President, the Justice Department, and even from enlightened Senators like Proxmire and Mansfield, it becomes necessary to examine the organization's attitude toward communism. First, on civil libertarian grounds, SDS does not exclude anyone from membership. It believes the sectarian Communist-anti-Communist debate to be futile and destructive. It believes in openness and honesty (and, in fact, it would be difficult for any bloc to take over so decentralized an organization). Largely due to SDS's stand against exclusionism, adult voluntary organizations like the ACLU and several peace groups are beginning to reconsider their own denial of membership to Communists. The theoretical formulation SDS has come up with to describe itself is "a-Communist."

Second, in private conversation, SDS activists are more hostile to Communists than they are organizationally. Berkeley SDSers report "the Communist kids were a cautious, conservative influence in the FSM. They were all hung up on the mainstream and respectability. They kept blunting the moral point."



Schwering

One of the leaders of SDS estimated: "Very few of our members look to any country like Russia or China as examples of the good society. Just about all of us think someone like Nkrumah is awful. Although there is probably a good deal of romantic feeling for the Cong in SDS, very little of it is political." And former SDS President Al Haber, chief initiator of the December conference, is insisting that the organization define more clearly its differences with student groups to its left.

In general, SDS still believes what it said in its founding manifesto: redbaiting and exclusionism have no place on the Left. But the organization is so confident of its own democratic values that it believes itself patently unattractive to the authoritarianism, elitism and manipulation of the Communist groups.

The leadership of SDS now expects prosecutions and jailings, "mostly of poor shnooks who burn draft cards, but if they can get any of the leadership, they will." The penalty for "aiding, abetting or counseling" draft evasion is five years in jail and a $10,000 fine. Harassment has begun. Last month, two SDS leaders, former president Todd Gitlin and current vice president Jeff Shero, were picked up by Chicago police for minor traffic violations and had to be bailed out. "They're really following us, day and night, now," says National Secretary Paul Booth.

SDS, however, will respond to the coming attacks in the established style of the New Left: with increased activism. The organization will pay little attention to redbaiting, and instead will devote more energy to campaigning against the Vietnam war, especially in its slum projects, in high schools, and among university faculty.

"There is incredible moral opposition to the war on the campuses," says Booth, "and it is all coming to us; we weren't making opposition to the war an organizational priority. But now we will."

The New Left, still in its infancy, consists of perhaps 150,000 young people, out of 5.2 million in college. Right now SDS is a scrawny finger pointing relentlessly at what is wrong with America. But some day that finger may clench into a fist and begin hammering for real political power—as the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party has done.

That is, if the Establishment doesn't cut that finger off now, and if the liberals don't abandon it because there may be dirt under the nail.

The New Gentility

BEYOND CULTURE: Essays on Learning and Literature. By Lionel Trilling. The Viking Press. 233 pp. $5.

THE MYTH AND THE POWERHOUSE. By Philip Rahv. Farrar, Straus and Giroux. 243 pp. $4.95.

Frederick J. Hoffman

I remember once having dinner with a critic who had published several works, though he had not as yet written one. His major concern was to defend the writing of essays as against the performance of the sustained work. Use your occasional work, he said, and bring it together under a catchy thematic title, and you have it. Well, I must say that we have had it in the last ten years. Books put together from occasional pieces have appeared with such regularity that they create the issue of evaluating an entirely new genre. The titles are frequently pretentious and are only indifferently related to whatever continuity may be found between the covers.

My issue is not with journalism as such, but rather with the necessity to differentiate between a sustained piece of work, which has been planned, "researched," written, and rewritten over a number of years, as opposed to a collection of odds and ends, which have only a strong or a weak sustaining theme, which is in no case to be considered the end result of a formal or an "architectural" necessity. The two types must be distinguished from each other. Given similar intelligences, the gathering of fugitives has less intensity and less sense of continuity; that is to say, the continuity (or "theme") is accidental within or imposed upon the book.

As I have elsewhere said, the presence of these volumes gives the impression that much sound work is being done in modern literature, while these books (Doings and Undoings, Waiting for the End, A Piece of Lettuce, The Age of Happy Problems, Puzzles and Epiphanies, etc., etc.) are definitely not that, but rather gatherings, more or less carefully chosen, some of them not edited at all from their original appearances. It is true that some of our greatest prose works, like Emerson's, have appeared mainly in essay form, but Emerson made an art of the genre, cultivated each example of it with the utmost care, and concluded each time with a book that was thematically sound and clear.

It has occurred to me that many examples of the fugitive collection have emerged from what is a journalistic fixation, in which the major concern is to keep one's remarks within bounds, because it is expensive to print too many words. Then too, it is a matter of assignment and commitment. Many assignments can only lead to a fragmenting of the critical sense, and to at best a desperate attempt to extend meaning from essay to essay.

The two volumes under consideration here are more or less examples of the weaknesses (or the effrontery) of the practice. Both are written by people who have been excellent critics and are again occasionally extremely worthy. Both have a theme that can rarely be said to be metaphorically suitable to any total conception of one achievement. And, I may add, both books are disappointments not because they are not good (they are, each of them, valuable), but because of what they failed to do, what they settled for not doing. Rahv's title suggests, in his rejection of both its terms, a strong moral view of literature. It applies to only a few of the essays explicitly, and to some others implicitly. We already know Rahv for his Image and Idea (1949) and for his editing and reviewing in various places. That he can be a first-rate critic is demonstrated by the two essays on Dostoevsky, both of them marvels of close reading, philosophical inference and useful knowledge. But Rahv's principal thesis, that modern critics are allowing us to be self-indulgent by substituting myth for a genuine "orthodoxy" is, at best, presented here too late to be relevant. And here is another of the faults of the omnium-gatherum: a reviewer's ideas are in danger of being out date, or at least only minimally us ful, by the time they are "honored by publication in a hard-cover boo with all the promotional energy an to-do that that event suggests.

Both Rahv and Trilling are indi posed toward contemporary literatur as distinguished from "modern" li erature, which Trilling says begin in the 18th century. (I might ad that both make exceptions of Sau Bellow.) Rahv's review of Norman Mailer's American Dream (the entir section called "Critical Sketches raises some doubts in my mind a to the value of its being reprinted suggests that Mailer's personal myth icizing is especially objectionable no only because it presents no mora weights or measures but that it ever seems to sponsor the idea that murder is useful therapeutically.

We have, I think, arrived at a new form of gentility. Both Rahv and Trilling would rather be critics of 19th-century literature than of 20th. Of course, Trilling's book is by far the more difficult to tolerate, because it is by all odds the more exquisitely written. We are aware of Trilling as a gracious man, who had at one time written with a sharp but useful wit about Parrington and Dreiser, had (in The Liberal Imagination, 1950) made important statements about Sherwood Anderson and The Great Gatsby; and while we knew he had begun as an Arnoldian, we assumed his turn toward 20th-century literature was genuinely motivated and truly governed by an advocacy of its values.

The new book, which is in almost all respects superior to Rahv's in the simple matters that give quality to an intelligence, is however in other respects a lesser book. For, while Rahv is genuinely willing to "face" modern literature, to accept an "engagement" with it, Trilling has chosen to abdicate his responsibility for teaching it. He does so on grounds that seem at first to be an epitome of good taste; but ultimately, looking at his book in its entirety, we must conclude that he does not really wish to acknowledge contemporary literature as such, to become engaged as a teacher of it. I do of course recognize that his denial of it comes from the most delicate of discretions: if

---

Frederick J. Hoffman holds the chair of Distinguished Professor of English at the University of Wisconsin. His most recent book is The Mortal No: Death and the Modern Imagination (Princeton University Press).

e include the contributions of mod- 'n Europe, he says, no literature is ther as exciting or as great as is odern. But it is a "dangerous" lit- ature to teach, because it too quick- , and suddenly engages the youth; o literature, he says "has ever been) shockingly personal. . . ."

This is the vital issue, then. That rilling should have come to his deci- on in 1961 gives one a double twist f the knife, because (as he says in is first essay) it was he who set ings going at Columbia, when the tudents had put pressure upon the ollege to teach a course in modern terature. But he had always been l at ease over the commitment, and ecame more so as his audience grew ounger and he older.

But of course, it isn't a mat- er of the increasing difference in ge between teacher and student. It as to do with two definitions of a ulture, that of a total culture—to hich manners and technology and eliefs integrally belong—and a cul- ure in the narrower sense, in which he arts themselves dominate. One f the persistent and primary ideas n Western civilization is that the rts can somehow "liberate" man rom the culture he is located in or rapped in. Presumably since World Var II, there are "a great many more eople who adopt the adversary pro- ram than there formerly were." An adversary program" is nothing more or less than the either noble or un- vashed marginal culture, frequently oncentrating upon the arts, which trikes at the conservative heart of ocial life. This is perhaps not a surprising fact, but it is surprising that Trilling dislikes it and may even be aid to be afraid of it.

Time and time again, I find him regretting" the students' spontane- us interest in contemporary litera- ure, in their literature, and wishing hey could look more objectively at literature older than they are, fear- ul of the ultimate commitment a eacher of modern literature must ave. At times it appears that the rouble is that it causes a "personal discomfort" to say what he really feels about D. H. Lawrence and André Gide and the rest. It is truly extraordinary to me that we can, as he says, restore the "freshness" to the work of the past (What is "freshness," if it is not vigor, vitality, contemporaneity?), but are subject to the utmost peril in communicating ourselves with respect to 20th-century literature. But, of course, it is because the basic terms on which contemporary literature is regarded are so deeply personal that it is difficult for Trilling to contemplate a commitment to them without annoyance.

He gives himself away again and again. Speaking of Keats's remarks about pleasure in that remarkable essay, "The Fate of Pleasure," he says that the quality of Keats's words was best to be seen when his affirmation of pleasure (erotic pleasure is of course meant throughout) is met "by his skepticism about pleasure." That is, an interest in pleasure is too simplistic; an unlust cannot be tolerated; but, if you are both interested in pleasure and doubtful of its ultimate value you have reached some point of intellectual balance (sophistication is not the word; it would be most unsophisticated to use it). There is an amusing footnote in the essay, in which Trilling suggests that Joyce's Molly Brown and Yeats's Maude Gonne (the one fictional, the other real) are "perhaps the last women in literature to be represented as having a transcendent and on the whole beneficent significance. . . ." And, in his essay on Jane Austen's Emma, he warns us not to accept the extravagant notion of a "Jane Austen's

NEW DIRECTIONS/
SAN FRANCISCO REVIEW

THIS IN WHICH
by George Oppen

This, Mr. Oppen's third book, carries further, and into longer poems, the poet's attempt to reach the nature of reality and experience through the poetic image and the accuracy of poetic speech. Thoroughly in the American vein, these are poems of maturity which mean to "bring into the open for the first time," says Mr. Oppen, "those things which can then be discussed in ordinary speech." They explore, in the words from Heidegger quoted in the epigraph of This in Which, "the third path, the arduous path of appearance."

$3.50 cloth; $1.75 ND Paperbook

NEW DIRECTIONS / SAN FRANCISCO REVIEW
333-6th Avenue, New York, New York 10014

England,” because the actual England was quite different indeed; yet, he says, we may pardon those who do make the mistake; it is a desirable mistake to make.

In many ways, Trilling's major point may be said to be that a culture to which we may commit ourselves, which has an order and a conception of manners—in short, a rationale—is a sine qua non, and that it is the task of education at least to put the possibility of one within reach of the students' minds. But he is equally engaged by the notion of what he calls our “adversary culture.” What he apparently cannot stand, or understand, is that it is possible (perhaps even necessary) to know the irrational components of our culture without giving in to them; he has gone too far in assuming that the teacher's rostrum might lead to direct action, to the stoning of embassies and the burning of libraries, unless indeed the dignities are preserved and the Austen “idyll” is at least within the reach of the imagination.

I am, of course, also a teacher of modern literature, and I happen to believe that it can and should be taught. But I do not believe it should be taught in such a manner as Trilling seems to think it would be taught, were it but taught well. It is quite possible to teach Naked Lunch and Corydon and Death in Venice—that is, to communicate with students with respect to them, beyond the merely “new critical” technicalities, without being “tainted” by whatever infections they may contain. In the same line of thinking, the fullest significance of our great classics is just as explosive, if indeed not more so, and the fullest communication of their explosive nature is our privilege and our duty. To communicate the great human and social significance of our literature is a serious, a necessary, and a possible circumstance. Neither our privilege nor our obligations in this respect are limited by a matter of past or present. Trilling too often appears to want to save himself not from the obligations but from the ultimate commitment which the humanistic engagement involves. His position has become all too similar to the ones taken by persons in the academe who feel that an emotion, because it is strong, must therefore be crude, and cannot therefore be tolerated.

Delinquent's Progress

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MALCOLM X. With the assistance of Alex Haley. Introduction by M. S. Handler. Grove Press. 455 pp. $7.50.

Truman Nelson

This is the story of a man struck down on his way to becoming a revolutionary and a liberator of his people. It is the real American tragedy: a fall from great heights of promise, not from inner weakness or self-betrayal, but because assassins stood up in plain sight, like a firing squad, and put thirteen shotgun slugs into his chest and bullets in his legs and thighs as he lay dying.

Malcolm had known the white man's violence from infancy. Five of his father's six brothers died by violence; one was lynched, another killed by white police. His father, very strong, very black, a gun-carrying Baptist minister and a Garveyite organizer, was killed by having his head bashed in and he then was laid on a car track to be cut in half. The white insurance company called it suicide. When Malcolm, his father's seventh child, died in Harlem on February 21, 1965, he was accused by the white press of having “initiated violence.”

His mother was nearly white, looked white, but she could not keep a job when any of her black children showed up, or her small-town employers found out whose widow she was. Keeping food on the table and some dignity around it for a family of eight was an insoluble problem in the 1930s. It drove her into insanity. The family was broken up, and Malcolm began a delinquent's progress through the ghettos of Boston and New York, with conked red hair, a sky-blue zoot suit and orange knob-toed shoes, all so grotesque on his 6-foot-5 gangling frame that he would stop traffic crossing the street. He became a hustler, a pimp, a narcotics addict and peddler, a petty thief and armed robber.

The stupendous transformat came while he was serving a ten-y sentence for armed robbery in M sachusetts. He had become the pr type of the hustler, by his own defi tion: “The hustler out there in ghetto jungle has less respect for white power structure than any ot Negro in America. He is interna restrained by nothing. To survive is out there constantly preying others, probing for any human we ness like a ferret . . . forever fr trated, restless and anxious for so action. Whatever he undertakes, commits himself to it fully, solutely.”

A man who calls himself Elij Muhammad knew how to get throu to the Malcolms, the hustlers, t wretched of the earth. He is the lea er of an indigenous Muslim grou He has a touch of genius. He know like Luther before him, how to lo in the mud for the fallen and redee them. He wrote to every Negro knew of in prison, sent each a litt money and a lot of message. H contact with Malcolm brought th unregenerate hustler to an instant neous conversion equal to those d scribed in the pages of Willia James's Varieties of Religious E perience. James would have unde stood Mr. Muhammad better than h critics: James always argued that th significance of a belief should n be judged by its source, but its fruit Regardless of Elijah Muhammad historical and theological eccentric ties—all religions have their absurd ties—he has transformed many o the worst of men into some of th best.

Malcolm began to write to M Muhammad every day. He had t study so he would have somethin to say to him. He had to study because he had virtually forgotten how to write. In the prison library ther happened to be a rare collection o old anti-slavery tracts. Malcolm ther honed his new revolutionary edge o the abrasive rhetoric of the grea abolitionists, on Garrison and Phillips whose volcanic eruptions on th shame and guilt of the slaveholder and a nation that suffered them t live, have never been equaled. This became his basic vocabulary of assault.

When he was released he had impacted in him two explosive elements: the “blessed assurance” of the converted man; and a place in a community which was believed to be stined to redeem an oppressed peo- e. In three magnificent chapters led "Saved," "Savior" and "Minister alcolm X," the making of a new alcolm is revealed. (The reader ust put aside any prejudice he may ive about a book "as told to" some- ne. You can hear and feel Malcolm this book; it is a superb job of anscription. (The tapes seem to run nto the paper with the clacking ef- ciency of a wire-service machine.)

---

Truman Nelson is the author of The Surveyor, a life of John Brown (Doubleday).

alcolm was saved because Mr. Mu- ammad convinced him that no egro has to fear the intellectual ower of any man who tries to de- nd or justify what has been done the black man by the white man this country: saved because he as taught that he had sinned and llen in a world he had not made, nd had no power to shape or cor- ct in any way whatsoever.

So Malcolm went from the anony- ious brutality of prison life to his rother's Muslim household in De- oit, with its beautiful disciplines nd dignities: where the father is the rst to rise in the morning and repare the way for the family to ve out their day in cleanliness, or- er and love, and with passionate yalty toward one another. He began function in the Detroit ghetto as missionary. His message was sim- le but overpowering: "The Honor- ble Elijah Muhammad teaches us at since Western society is de- riorating, it has become overrun ith immorality and God is going to dge it, and destroy it. And the nly way the black people, caught up this society, can be saved is not integrate into a corruption, but to eparate from it, to a land of their wn where we can reform ourselves, ft up our moral standards and try be godly."

Mr. Muhammad was reviving rev- lutionary separatism, which he be- eves to be the only way a persecuted inority can liberate themselves. long with it, Mr. Muhammad had write his new testament. A people ho have had their history stolen rom them usually embrace an apoc- yphal one until they are strong nough to wrest the truth from its uppressors. And to achieve this trength they have to be made to be- eve, somehow, that they are "the hosen people of God." The more one uestions Mr Muhammad's "history," he more one is forced to admit Mal- olm's genius in defending it and uilding on it a movement of such egenerating dynamism.

Fishing for men in the ghettos of Detroit, Boston, New York, Philadelphia and elsewhere, Malcolm changed a little store-front cult into a powerful religion with more than a hundred places of worship spread over the fifty states. Mr. Muhammad was the Messenger; he gave him the WORD, but Malcolm was pre-eminently the Missionary. He knew the streets as a hustler does, how to work the shifting, indeterminate fringes of public Black Nationalist or civil rights gatherings. He caught the people coming out, with unanswered questions, demands, yearnings from the Christian churches. The Muslims grew from 400 to 40,000.

Their suddenly visible strength attracted the white mass media, looking for new sensations to merchandise. A nation-wide TV program called The Hate That Hate Produced started a reaction that began to portray the Muslims as a potential source of violence, the shock troops of black racism. Malcolm, rushing to their defense, became disastrously diverted from the necessary organizing of his own people. He became a victim of the great American "image" psychosis. He began to "hustle" again, but this time among the whites. He thought he was "explaining and defending the Honorable Elijah Muhammad," but he was only playing the oppressor's game, on battlefields they were choosing. With his consciousness that their history, their humanities, their constitutions and churches were all part of an ideology of lies, easily exposed when examined in practice, he won Pyrrhic victories before microphones, TV cameras and forums, but this had very little to do with building a liberation force among his own people. The expanding nation of Islam, the only genuine movement of, by and for the black people since the deportation of Marcus Garvey, came to a halt. The Muslim ministers, including Mr. Muhammad, were too busy explaining themselves to people who didn't give a damn about them, but only wanted to assess how deeply they should be feared.

Doubts began to creep into Malcolm's own mind. He heard that Mr. Muhammad was beginning to disapprove of his many public appearances before whites. He thought it was jealousy. The outside pressure upon the Muslim movement, the mixed adulation and horror, began to disintegrate it. For his statement on Kennedy's assassination, Malcolm was silenced, then expelled. Again there were the white reporters at his elbow, urging him, daring him to talk, explain, justify! Malcolm never lost his real power of presence and personality; but, expelled from the Muslims, he lost his base. Mr. Muhammad taunted him brilliantly: "Who is Malcolm leading? Who is he teaching? He has no truth. I am not going to let the crackpots destroy the good things Allah sent to you and me."

Malcolm became convinced that the Muslims were going to kill him. He felt he had to raise a counter force strong enough to protect himself. He tried to recruit in Harlem among this potential of a million followers. But again he was drawn off into a tragic diversion: a pilgrimage to Mecca to prove that he, not Elijah Muhammad, was the real Muslim. This had no relevance to the streets of Harlem. There, they thought he was running away. Malcolm was not aware of the disintegration that had taken place in him after his god had cast him out. He was so dynamic that fragments of him seemed more powerful than the whole. In fact, he

NEW VINTAGE
PAPERBACK

VILLAGE LIFE IN NORTHERN INDIA

By Oscar Lewis. The author of The Children of Sanchez gives a provocative and well-documented picture of life in a Delhi village. Illustrated.

$2.45, now at your bookstore
VINTAGE BOOKS are published by
ALFRED • A • KNOPF and RANDOM HOUSE
For catalog, write Random House,
457 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10022

was like some exploding piece of fireworks, with its fiery particles dying in the sky.

He was talking integration now, under the banner of the True Islam. Whites again took up his time with interminable discussions of religious and ethical abstractions. And always he felt stalked by killers hired by his chosen father on earth and his own beloved brothers and sisters.

The complexities of his situation were unbearable. He would have had to leave Muhammad anyway; he had outgrown him. He had internationalized himself. Always he traveled, back and forth across the continent, abroad for eighteen weeks again, and then back to Harlem for some pathetic efforts at organizing by a handful of his faithful. And to write this marvelous book that is not a book but a man, a tragic, agonizing, palpable man.

He ended it in a chapter called "1965." It is unresolved. He is admitting he needs much more time to reflect, to clarify . . . if he could only study, rest a while from this interminable explaining, this mania for justification. He knew he had not gathered an adequate protective force. Almost the last sentence of the book is: ". . . societies often have killed the people who have helped change them."

But the great revelation comes in the Epilogue by his perceptive and enormously skillful amanuensis, Alex Haley. Malcolm was invited to speak in France by a group of African students. He had been talking, in late '64, of the great power of the black and yellow races when seen internationally. I heard him in Harlem, on a platform with Babu, the Zanzibar revolutionary, say the problem is now simply the oppressed against the oppressor. He had begun to renew himself, and his regenerated purpose began to take form, a political form. He was talking now like a member of a revolutionary majority. When he arrived in France, the government banned him as "an undesirable person." He was wrathful and puzzled when he came back to New York.

On Saturday, February 20, he made a most significant phone call to Alex Haley. "I'm going to tell you something, brother. The more I think about what is happening lately, I'm not at all sure it's the Muslims. I know what they can do and what they can't do, and they can't do some of the stuff that's happening to me lately. The more I think of what happened to me in France, I think I'm going to quit saying it's the Muslims. . . . I'm glad that I've been the first to establish official ties between Afro-Americans and our blood brothers in Africa." Then he hung up.

Twenty-four hours later, in the dressing room of the Audubon Ballroom, he said he was going to announce that he had been too hasty in accusing the Muslims because, "things are happening that are bigger than they can do . . . in fact, I'm going to ease some of this tension by telling the black man not to fight himself . . . that it's all part of the white man's big maneuver, to keep us fighting against ourselves." before he could get this noble resc on the record, the executioners r in the first row and the sentence carried out.

Viewed in its complete histori context, this is indeed a great bo Its dead-level honesty, its passion, exalted purpose, even its manif unsolved ambiguities will make stand as a monument to the m painful of truths: that this count this people, this Western world practiced unspeakable cruelty agai a race, an individual, who might h made its fraudulent humanism reality.

Berkeley: Free Speech and Free Vers

Donald Wesling

The crackle of the P. A. system carrying for blocks as a few hundred people stand outside Sproul Hall at noon being addressed by witty Free Speech Movement leaders on the state of California's revenge at the "trespassing" trial; a couple in the library, their feet blackened by barefoot walking, she takes a rubber stamp from the reserve desk, sits on the floor and stamps HOLD on her ankles and calves; in a lecture Allen Ginsberg describing how he was deported from Havana for advocating pot and pederasty, later elected King of the May by the students of Prague, before he was expelled by their government; Charles Olson stripping off his jacket while lecturing, chain-smoking, confessing he has been visited by spirits. At Berkeley, such observations explode the accepted notions of campus life; they contradict Hearst's dominating clock tower with its evening carillon, the artificial brook and wooden bridges, frat boys and coeds on the trimmed lawns, the vaulted reading room of a great library, the radiation lab on the heights clicking and shining all night. Perhaps from such observations and the political realities they imply there will emerge a new form of college myth, an uncritical romanticizing of the New Left which this brief report does not entirely avoid.

For now, at this volatile university, the issues of freedom and authority are clearer because of the hardening, the exaggeration, of both sides in the free-speech debate. On a first visit of only a few days, I saw at Berkel more of the university as critic a corrector of "outside" society than had seen over a period of years private universities in the East. A having gone to hear the second we of readings and lectures in the Berk ley Poetry Conference, I was une pectedly and deeply impressed by t seemingly programmatic congruen of free speech with free verse written by such men as Olson, Gin berg, Robert Duncan, Edward Dor and Robert Creeley. Most of thes poets are half reluctantly becomin political rhetoricians and prophet developing an epic sense of the d basement of American language an landscape. Certainly the Berkel student audience received them a genuine experimenters, even heroe because in lives and poems wher every successive moment is conceive as polemical they were making au thentic—and thus, in the best sense unconventional—choices.

Ending his introduction to Ginsberg's massive reading, Professor of Englis Thomas Parkinson said that it didn' bother him a bit, he was glad to know Allen as a friend. The defensivenes of that, the forced colloquialism o the whole introduction, were clea symptoms of the difficult position o liberal faculty members at Berkeley. Free speech for students, poets, and themselves as teachers is an ideal most Berkeley professors would defend. Nevertheless the faculty wants settled conditions for the processes of teaching and research, and often enough, wrongly or not, it identifies the privilege to do these things with the alleged right of the university to a contemplative retreat from so-ty. So faculty members, especially : majority who are essentially lib-ils and agree that last year's ad-nistrative fiats were grievous mis-:es, are in a cross fire between the iservative authorities who are their sses and colleagues, and the per-isive student activists who want ect engagement in civil rights and ernational politics.

---

Donald Wesling teaches English at the University of California, La Jolla.

In their readings and lectures the conference many poets also owed themselves obsessed by large :ial themes, moving in mid-career m aesthetics and epistemology to-rd an idiosyncratic politics as did :ir masters Pound and William rlos Williams. The poets of this iitmanic tradition—surely the most ierent and promising group now iting in the United States — are, e Berkeley students, testing the iits of freedom, looking outside isting social reference, outside ex-ing meters. "Limits/are what any us/are inside of" is the text from son's Maximus Poems most often oted by the others. Brilliantly, but th baffling disconnection, Olson in s own lecture spoke of the besmirch-g of "the world" by relentless storical forces and "neo-capitalism." iis is his theme in the Maximus ter on a Star Nosed Mole "mag-tized" by the highway:

> like the prettiest thing in the > world > drilling > itself into the > pavement. . . .
> he loveliest animal I believe I ever > did see > n such a quandary. . . .

such lovely particulars Olson finds amples of the poet's futility; that why he describes removing the ole to the grass with "an oar out the back seat of the station agon":

> nd off the marshes
> f Walker's Creek fall > raduatedly so softly to > he Creek and the Creek to > pswich Bay an arm
> f the Atlantic Ocean
>
> end the Star Nosed Mole > ll into the grass > ll away from the dizzying > ighway if that was what was wrong
>
> vith the little thing, spinning > n the middle of the > ighway

Olson the place—Gloucester, Buf-lo, anywhere in the States—is still artbreakingly there in its lineaments, still with the original untarnished name, but its lovely rudeness neglected by generations of merchants, overlaid now with hardtop, "debris/of common/wealths."

In his lecture, "What's Happening on Earth?" Ginsberg too discussed the world, or that part of it he saw in visits to Cuba, Russia and satellite countries during the first six months of this year. Discussing Communist suppression of divergent opinion among students and writers, he spent the lecture implicitly qualifying his own uninformed idealism about the continuing "revolution" behind the iron curtain. But Olson's charge in Maximus that "So few/have the polis/in their eye" was most eloquently expressed by Edward Dorn. He began his talk on "The Poet, the People, the Spirit" by drawing on the blackboard a quite detailed map of Idaho and the states touching it, then marking the various American Indian reservations in the area. Quietly and intensely he recounted his visit to a few of these reservations with a Negro photographer. Dorn sees in the Indian an "apt admonishment," the same kind of warning Wordsworth received from the Leech Gatherer; and like Lawrence's Navajos or Mexicans he sees the Indian as living in another world which is yet simultaneous with our own. Toward the end of his long poem, "The Land Below," he describes this old Indian man:

> He wore a green shirt, otherwise > he retained a solitude, his lean > ankles crossed.
> And the hair done up in back > with a simple white tight wound > cloth
> and girding his hair and forehead > a patterned handkerchief, a fore> lock hanging > over, the longer hair bobbed around > his head.
> There was a chipmunk stealing > wieners,
> the fastness a cartoon movement, > was such > a difference looking from it to the > man.
>
> (from Hands Up!, > Totem/Corinth, 1964)

In the final sentences of his lecture, Dorn turned his wealth of commentary on the interplay of Negro, dispossessed Indian, and himself—white, and maybe too self-consciously a poet—into an emblem of American society, praising finally all criminals, eccentrics, poets, strangers on the move, because those aliens among us at least "know where they've been." The lecture set forth a larger moral sense of poetry and American life than Dorn—or any of these poets—has yet encompassed in poems.

Dorn tentatively contrasted the impotent violence and rage, the playing with death, of young Shoshone bucks on the reservation, with the possible formative lawlessness of the poet in approaching his materials. This is the theme of his pamphlet, "What I see in the Maximus Poems" (Migrant, 1960)—"it is the matrix which interests me rather than the metrics"—of Robert Duncan's "Notes on Poetics: Regarding Olson's Maximus" (The Review, January, 1964), and also of Robert Creeley's conference lecture on "A Sense of Measure." William Carlos Williams, in a discussion of "Measure" (Spectrum, 1959) which Creeley quoted, focuses the problem nicely: "The 'moral' issue is never far in the rear. The exact point of pressure for an American . . . poet, is his own language, how it will be put on the page to represent what his mind perceives directly about him. . . . Our native idiom, the way we speak in this democracy, is the image our poetry must dig in as a fertile soil. . . . Men and women who are in love do not any longer feel this way, the way adopted by the sonnet, toward each other." And yet,

An unrepentant dissenter presents a joltingly dramatic, rambunctiously personal account of his life and career

"A valuable personal record of the radical experience in the United States, an authentic expression of the surprising self-discovery that many Jews have made in our time"
—ALFRED KAZIN

IS CURLY JEWISH?
by Paul Jacobs

Atheneum

Author of The State of the Unions. $5.95, now at your bookstore.

"Freedom cannot be the end of it": finished with "the abberation of free verse," which is "no more than a contradiction in terms . . . we have to learn to recount, taking our idiom as a constant (and for that we have to know what we are taking) and make units of it which we compose into our effects."

Creeley was careful to qualify that what he and Williams are talking about is a, not the, sense of measure; and that at best there is nothing "free" or arbitrary about the process of composition which gives the unique poem its appropriate cadences. He noted that when Charles Tomlinson started using Williams' three-tier line as a system or form, it went dead. Creeley is himself so suspicious of cliché that his normal conversation is studded with the unconscious formula "quote-unquote" — a rather crude way to disarm language of potential platitude. Surprisingly the word "love" doesn't stick in his throat. His poems in For Love have neither the full vocabulary nor the full confrontation with "the 'moral' issue" which Williams called for, being each of them a little exercise in purified or heightened idiom. His essentially lyric personality was best demonstrated at his open reading, where he was concerned, in the poems and their covering explanations, with intimate matters of phrasal nuance and personal love experience. He read his own work with anguish, uttering word after word, atomizing the syntax, turning each poem into a series of shining syllabic nuggets.

FORGERY . . . PERJURY

Learn about MASSIVE NEW EVIDENCE

HONOR the authors who have re-opened the Rosenberg-Sobell Case with the startling book
"Invitation to an Inquest"

Banquet for Freedom For Morton Sobell

SATURDAY, NOV. 20, 6:30 p.m.

HOTEL SHERATON-ATLANTIC
Broadway at 34th St., New York City

Hear:

- Authors Walter and Miriam Schneir
- John Henry Faulk Commentator
- Carleton Beals Author
- Robert Nemiroff Producer
- William M. Kunstler Attorney
- Mrs. Rose Sobell
- Mrs. Morton Sobell
- Songs by Ronnie Gilbert with guitarist Stuart Sharf

$12.50 per person

Special invitation: Attend as guests by obtaining contributions for 10 copies of the book ($60).

Auspices of SOBELL COMMITTEE
150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C., Tel.: 243-6030

Yet at his best, in the wonderful poem "Something," Creeley moves toward the public speech, the more active vocabulary and the flair for specific description, of Williams and Olson. Since measure means nothing if not the full sweep of a poem including its ending, I quote:

    I remember once in a rented room on 27th street, the woman I loved then, literally, after we had made love on the large bed sitting across from a basin with two faucets, she had to pee but was nervous, embarassed I suppose I would watch her who had but a moment ago been completely open to me, naked, on the same bed. Squatting, her head reflected in the mirror, the hair dark there, the full of her face, the shoulders, sat spread-legged, turned on one faucet and shyly pissed. What love might learn from such a sight.

The delicate deployment of punctuation (commas surrounding "literally" but not "I suppose"), the unobtrusive colloquial verbs, the unemphatic closing on a statement which is neither question nor exclamation: this is the concert of specifics which makes for movement within a measure.

The diversity of these poets is pronounced enough; however far more important is their shared interest in the problem of place, in the limits of observation and description, in the technical and moral perplexities of "measure" in its broadest definition.
I doubt that T. S. Eliot was tioned once in the two weeks of conference, but the documents the poets in their pantheon—H.
Louis Zukofsky, Pound, Willi
Olson—are constantly referred t
"facts," writers whose poems ar be mastered, even plundered.
speak of Berkeley free speech the writing of these poets is, ad tedly, to speak by analogy. Yet in order of things the conjunctio surely not one of chance. The b students, the better poets, have polis in their eye. And with t own free-speech movement, their search for the meaning of respon measure, these poets are as consc as the most sensible student-m ment leaders that "freedom ca be the end of it."

Genuine measure is the n urgent now because students poets alike have gathered to th selves a fringe culture which w anarchy for its own sake. To vive, the free-speech movement have to disembarrass itself of worst forms of Filthy Speech. C lined Telegraph Avenue at Berk has the Riviera atmosphere of sexual trading post: that copula thrives is not (probably) in it evil, but that this same area is heart of the student movement s gests that we may be observing sexualization of politics, a radi confusion of personal and politi freedoms. Probably this tendency reinforced by the personal exam and writings of Paul Goodman.
another, more relevant influence, motto of Filthy Speech seems to h come from a mimeographed ma zine which last fall printed w from most poets who read at Berkeley conference. This was famously lewd Fuck You: A Ma zine of the Arts, whose cry was "t war on culture" and whose editori with serious levity, demanded "f dom for hallucinogens," as well free speech. Reading this magazi one has to separate true original from shock technique, humor fr paranoia, writing from ranting.
similarly severe discrimination plies even more to Filthy Speech a other excessive attempts to flout values of the community outside u versity walls. The challenge is t inevitably a politics or a poetry wh is tentative, polemical, desperate, a principle of continuous anarch only its finest talents will be lea ing what to do with their freedom.

Primitive Anti-Communism

ARXISM. One Hundred Years in the Life of a Doctrine. By Bertram D. Wolfe. The Dial Press. 404 pp. $6.95.

RANGE COMMUNISTS I HAVE KNOWN. By Bertram D. Wolfe. Stein and Day. 222 pp. $6.

Samuel Adams Darcy

sor up, isolated in his armor, Beram Wolfe approaches Marx; it is ıch more a combat than the act scholarship he would like us to lieve it to be. Wolfe has for years en pursuing this war within a war: wever it began, the stance is now artial, which is not, perhaps, the st way to challenge Marx or to ıbark on the formidable underking of writing a history of Marxist aching. No doubt there are other ws: some would hold that Wolfe not nearly martial enough, and at the only way to deal with the low is to have at him. Whatever e merits of these arguments, the ct is that in Wolfe's case the posture s produced two inadequate books.

In the 117 years of its history, arxism has become the official ideogy of some 40 per cent of the orld's population. In view of the wer and determination of its opnents, and the frequent incomtence and even venality of some arxist leaders, this is a remarkable hievement indeed; and any book ich sets out to analyze the history Marxism should minimally answer o questions: what is the reason r this achievement, and are the arxist leaders now pursuing the ms Marx originally propounded?

Wolfe answers neither question. deed, a reliance on Wolfe must ad one to conclude that Marxism a fatally flawed doctrine and that immense growth and influence is terrible, unaccountable mistake. or is this all: Lenin's understandg of Marx was also faulty, and erefore he could never succeed in tablishing socialism in the Soviet ion. And Wolfe is willing to go en beyond this and say that Marx-Leninist socialism is in fact a blind alley and near collapse. One suspects his friends would have wished he had not tried to prove so much; in single combat he has attempted to take on all comers.

This is a pity. Intelligent and lucid explications of Marxism are still urgently needed, especially in this country where writers beyond number have produced books which aimed to kill off Marxism once and for all, a millenarian task which has created a new industry, books for the remainder tables, obscurity for the writers, and almost no light at all. It would be easy enough to say that this is the result of a determined know-nothingism; and, in truth, there was in the past enormous resistance to Marxist thought. But the recent meeting of the American Sociological Association, with Coser and Bottomore's tributes to Marx, and the encouragement of the study of his methods as a contemporary guide, is only one of many indications during the past few years that Marxism in America is achieving the academic respectability it has long held in Western Europe.

There is no reflection of this in Wolfe's history, and no response to it; he has, we gather quickly enough, other concerns. One of these is to prove that Lenin was for defeat of one's own country in war, and he devotes 70 pages to a close examination of this notion. Engels, we are told, was for the defense of one's fatherland. Therefore, obviously, these two great men are at opposite poles and flatly contradict each other. But in fact there is no contradiction; the truth is often simpler than Wolfe will allow. In Engels' time, Czarist Russia menaced all of Europe, much as Nazi Germany did in the thirties. The presence of Russia made even small gains impossible. In Marx's view, the defeat of czarism was critically urgent. He and Engels supported the German Government's efforts against the Czar, cursed those Balkan countries which supported Russia, and hailed the Poles who fought for independence and against the Czar. They urged France to make no pacts with Russia. This was not, as Wolfe suggests, German chauvinism; it was, clearly, Marx's strategy against reaction.

Like every other member of the European Left of his time, Lenin shared this view of Russia; therefore, though a Russian, he worked for Russia's defeat. Fearing precisely such confusion as Wolfe has fallen into, Lenin emphasized that despite his own tactics against the Czar, the "defense of the fatherland is permissible . . . as a defense of democracy." Wolfe evades the very problem he raises; it is all reduced to a counterpoising of isolated statements which become, by assertion, dogma. The journey from assertion to total confusion is an easy one. Contradictions may abound but on this point, between Engels and Lenin, there was none.

On Marx's economic ideas—a matter of some importance, certainly—we must assume that Wolfe claims

---

muel Adams Darcy was secretary of e Communist Party of the state of lifornia during the height of protest ovements of the 1930s, and played significant role in the San Franco general strike of 1934.

Tweedles and Foodles for Young Noodles Children's Songs by Malvina Reynolds
by Jodi Robbin

FOR A GIFT . . . Songs by Malvina Reynolds

Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs .... $2.45 postage paid
More than 50 original songs. 96 pages

Tweedles and Foodles for Young Noodles .... $1.75 postage paid Charming songs for kids 4-12, arranged for piano and guitar.

SCHRODER Music Co., 2027 Parker St., Berkeley, Calif.

small competence, since he does little more than advocate marginal utility economics plus the "use of computer mathematics." He evidences no grasp, for example, of the economic pressures and particularly the need to find a way to acquire investment capital without once more falling under foreign domination, which impel the former colonial nations to declare themselves Marxist. He takes this as a sign of the intellectual pretentiousness of new nations: even so "new" a nation as China.

On some questions Wolfe points to real problems, as others have done before him. The most urgent of these is the malignant nationalism, which is one of the crucial unsolved problems of the Socialist world. Even here, however, Wolfe takes refuge in a spurious "internationalism," and again avoids coming to grips with the hard facts. He considers the rise of "nationality" to be in opposition to "internationalism," and finds, not surprisingly, that "actually, the great ages of internationalism were to be sought in the past; the Roman Empire with its Pax Romana." In truth, all nations must achieve freedom from external domination in order to evolve into a genuine and effective world organization; internationalism is not possible for a people who are slaves, as so many were under Wolfe's exemplary Rome. In our epoch, the achievement of nationhood is historic progress toward internationalism, not a movement in the opposite direction.

Wolfe's confusion aside, it must be said that Socialist countries have manifested a narrow national self-interest which has produced much conflict and holds the potential for a great deal more. But it must also be said that none of these conflicts has yet reached a stage of war, as they would surely have done in the past. The problem is nevertheless present and it is a crucial one. It is interesting that Marshall Phillipe de Hautecloque ("Leclerc"), commander in chief of the French forces in Indo-China from 1945 to 1947, said that anti-communism "will remain a useless tool in our hands as long as the problem of nationalism remains unsolved." It is a troublesome problem to both sides, and one that will clearly not be solved by any one nation's Pax, a crude and antique device which perhaps still holds some appeal for the military but surely for no one else.

Wolfe's catchy title, Strange Communists I Have Known, provides a reviewer with a neat strategic device for revealing something of Wolfe's curious approach to the educative process. It is impossible to resist pointing out that he writes of ten people; he admits that he has met five of them; of the remair five, he met one only once; twc the ten, he tells us, were not, in f Communists. For the most part, book consists of anti-Soviet go and rumors, some of it long ago credited: John Reed's deathbed cantation, for example, which found by Theodore Draper to be w out substance.

Wolfe provides us with all the s bols of scholarship but none of treasures: there are many footno and exquisite avowals and disavow of translations, a meticulous dedi tion to details, and a marked fail to illuminate the subject. Wolfe rides Communist writers because, tells us, they hold to the view t "one does not think, one quotes." his Marxism, Wolfe uses 787 quo in the text, forty-five in the footnot and forty-three in chapter headin some of which exceed 400 words.

This may be a record. If so, c hopes it is never to be broken. Th two books, though brand new, ready have about them an antiq air: survivors from an early peri of primitive anti-communism, th now stumble toward us; however, is we who rub our eyes with ast ishment.

ART

Max Kozlo

RHYTHMIC FUROR

If one were to list Edvard Munch's various claims to attention (there is now a curious retrospective of his work at the Guggenheim), a great range of achievements would come to mind. Claiming first place might be the historical change he effected when his exhibition of 1892 created a storm in the German avant-garde, and generated not merely the Berlin Secession but modern Expressionism outside France as well. At one stroke it showed that nascent art nouveau (Jugendstil) could be far more emotive than decorative, and that a visual crystallization (Munch's favorite word) could be fused between Symbolist aesthetics and Scandinavian theatre. More synoptic than Ensor, more penetrating than Hodler, Munch became one of the most visible representatives of the exhausted fin-de-siècle renewing itself by the obsession that inner and outer worlds exist only to be transliterated by a tistic materials.

Or, one might point to his cont bution in prints, for surely he w one of the most consummate graph artists of modern times. A singul accord binds Munch's desire to fir emblems of situations and states mind with the discoveries he mac in spotting isolated black shapes- clumps of people huddled together- in simple, irrational designs. Th dark bulk of a couple embracing overprinted by a wood block whos lightly inked striations create a ve for their emotion, while stressin simultaneously the literal quality the medium, and an incipient al straction. Elsewhere, sinuous stripe energize voids with rhythmic echoe that are shared by human beings an nature alike. These are conception which reach past the particulars o draftsmanship.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 11-8-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

But it is as a psychologist that unch strikes home most forcefully.
is personal intensity matches the ictorial syntax with which he etches me rather elemental themes: sick-ess, death, man alone, sexual con-ict. This is not said specifically of is innumerable portraits, for in em Munch is incisive, even memo-ble, without really breaking with e naturalist mold. Nor does it point his later proletarian sympathies, pantheistic cycles in tribute of life rces, for these have more to do ith his intellectual make-up than ith his aesthetic nerve ends.

A visual artist, Munch could not rtray a human dilemma by depict-g its past or future history, as on e stage, nor as an avant-gardist, uld he characterize psychological sturbance by mimic illustration.
oth devices stem from romantic or terary tradition, and—though "litary" himself, in that he wanted to veal nonvisual relationships be-veen people—Munch had to recast e social infra-structure of his world formal terms.

Therefore, the shadowy vagueness om which his personages emerge disappear functions not as a time-ss context, nostalgic or monumental, t as a plasmic, ever-present, ever-enacing location which exposes the ner agitation of his actors ("Moon-ght," "The Death Bed"). Moreover, unch was one of the most acute nong those who realized the drama-c possibilities in the conflict be-veen surface and depth. If the pro-essive tendency of his day was to atten all volumes, and to move ong on one plane in the fashion of arabesque, Munch would at times raighten out the arabesque just ough to suggest a radically upded perspective (while disguising e point at which the shift occurs).
is images, whether animate or in-imate — and sometimes there is tle enough distinction—would conquently be locked in an insuffer-le tension of near and far, perpetu-ly disjointed in a shallow space. At eir most successful, his works com-ne these qualities of indistinctness d disproportion, put to the service isolating the shifting predicaments living.

Yet, that Munch in his early aturity was continuing to elicit oods, is quite out of the question.
"mood," no matter how piercing, by its nature circumstantial and ansient; one stages it. Munch, on the contrary, premises each of his important, anti-narrative tableaux on a statement about the condition of man; he delivers even an unspecified anxiety irrevocably. Not for nothing does one see his people only frontally or from the side. No real intimacy is vouchsafed the spectator. An invisible wall separates him from the muted events within the canvas. This transition from mood to statement can be seen when comparing the 1890 "Night in St. Cloud," where the gaze moves easily into a darkened room in which a man's figure is profiled against a dim window, with "The Voice" of 1893, a transfixed woman amidst a lakeshore forest, in which a stillness of the mind is as apparent as of the place. But this woman looks directly out, unaware that she is establishing a contact by one of the few "actions" the artist will permit. It is a matter of some judgment to determine whether this contact is caused by the heightened expectancy of the subject, or a more ambitious effort to draw the beholder into some new intuition of the surroundings ("The Red Villa"). That is, the artist deliberately equivocates about the status of the properties he displays: they may be fixtures of a synthesized reality, but they may also be alarms in the head next to which they are pictorially juxtaposed. This is certainly the case with Munch's "Jealousy" series, in which a man dreams his betrayal as a scene which he himself introduces. There may be no intimacy in all this, as I said, but there is great revelation.

Some of Munch's fruitful temporizing between archaic theatrical convention and illumination of the unconscious is carried over in his inflammatory treatment of iconography. "The Death of Marat," for instance, is transformed into a sexual murder. "The Dance of Life" has a "Judgment of Paris" subplot. A man in a woman's arms is entitled "Vampire." And of "The Kiss," Strindberg correctly and typically said that it is "the fusion of two beings, the smaller of which, shaped like a carp, seems on the point of devouring the larger, as is the habit of vermin, microbes, vampires and women." But the most haunting of his visions is a color lithograph, "Madonna," which combines the lassitude of a naked odalisque and the deathlike visage of the mother, expiring in a religious, yet carnal ecstacy. She is the St. Teresa of Symbolism, made all the more disturbing in one version (not at the museum) by a border of wriggling spermatozoa which call the bluff of the art nouveau whiplash. Put next to a gilded Gibson girl "Judith" by Klimt, Munch's "Madonna" would reveal some of the same equation between morbidity and seduction. But the Klimt is no more than a social titillation; the Munch subverts society. It is this subversion that marks him as the innovator, and the troubled man, he was. The expression of his hostile ambivalence toward women gained force because, in some respects, it was involuntary. Concerning Munch's corroded eroticism, Werner Hofmann remarks that it is "the final line that the century draws under the battle of the sexes. . . . There is nothing of that other dance of life found in the Moulin de la Galette. There is no illusion now, but bitterness, mutual recrimination, the awakening conscience, jealousy, mistrust, estrangement and a speechless coexistence that knows no more to say." The various pictorial genres, or

In the November 1 issue of The Nation, you read the highly explosive first chapter ("The Corvair Story") from the forthcoming book,

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED:
The Designed-in Dangers of the American Automobile

by Ralph Nader. This book will be published November 29 by Grossman Publishers at $5.95 (384 pp. Illus.) Nation readers who order now can obtain their advance copy at $4.50. Send order to

The Reader's Service Division
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE NATION
Reader's Service Divsion
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you as a bonus copy upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my bonus issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____

ADDRESS_______________________________________

CITY________________STATE__________ZIP No.__________

11-8-65

what is left of them, collapse in the poisonous intuition of the N wegian artist.

In order to effect such a c monological outlook, Munch's paint ly apparatus faced a decisive choic If his palette was to flare up, and h brush to gesture wildly, then h means would call drastic attenti to themselves. When this happen in his work, in the form of chromat clashes and a broken semaphore touches, its neurotic edge was lo without there being any correspon ing increase in energy. But to wo in half lights, thin coatings and su dued harmonies, in accord with th splenetic repression he himself fel was to risk a kind of schemati murkiness. This is what make Munch's paintings so uneven, becaus he could rescue them from physic anticlimax only by stopping short th dissipation that made them psych logically explicit. Quite often on sees in his pictures unresonant dis sonances, laconic turpentine slurps in which color itself hesitates to de clare the malaise that feeds his ver perception. At such moments, Munc can resemble scores of Northern provincial painters who flirted timor ously with Expressionism. On th other hand, especially when he deal with the crepuscular Scandinavian light, he evokes a reverse noctur which is attuned to the low-grad virulence of his coloring. At its best Munch's art is concisely vicious. An even its furor is rhythmic.

As an exhibition, the Guggenheim show packages a number of previously unseen works from Norway, but is overweighted toward dullness. Moreover, if "The Scream" is present, those other masterpieces, "Puberty" and "The Death Chamber" are sadly absent. The prints, too, are given short shrift; either much more or much less should have been done with them. Very little attempt has been made to untangle the knotty relationships of graphics to paintings. And the catalogue confines itself to information useless to the interested layman. Finally, perhaps because of the alien, antiseptic surroundings of this museum, the installation is unfortunate. All in all, not a model to follow in the future.

Advertise
Your Needs
In The Nation

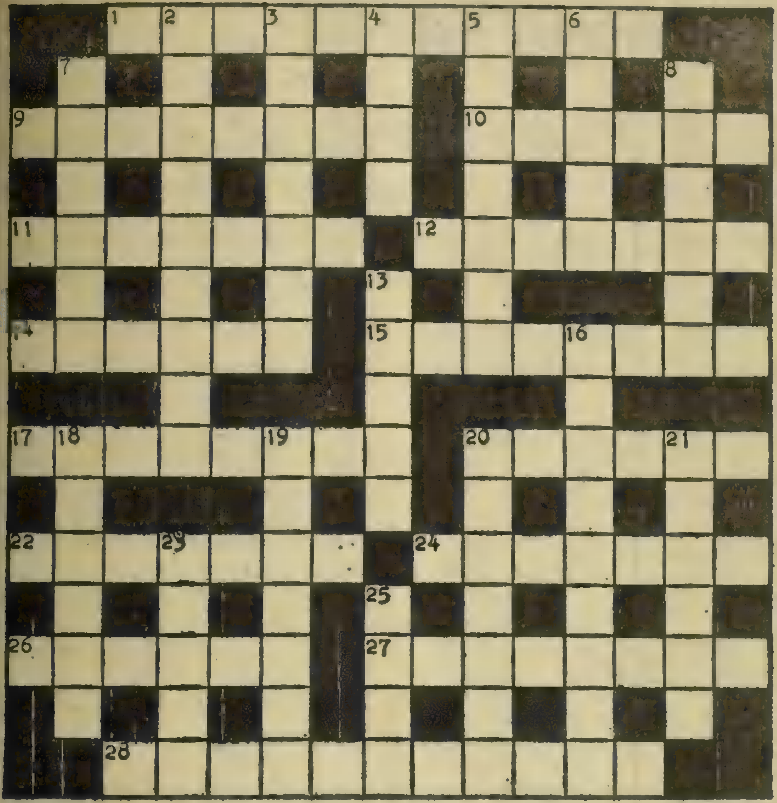
rossword Puzzle No. 1126

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

Almost all voice is false in a tropical band—no wonder one is misleading. (11)
Such a man could be both solid and hep, even when confused! (8)
One way to get given a lift, if highly considered. (6)
Does such furniture suggest the roll-away kind, as well? (7)
Most men, in a way, have their little ones. (7)
Basically, not speaking as a child. (6)
The lazy are not enthusiastic thus, and one who is patient might be advised not to. (8)
Possibly dangerous statement of the miserly property owner? (8)
Perhaps material saving if one does. (6)
Slip-line, suggesting a flop to some. (4, 3)
How to intimidate when taking cover—totally on one's uppers, possibly. (7)
Where one might hope to see at least one ace under control. (2, 4)
One comes without warrant. (7)
The end of 1 across? (A way to attack the business district might be charted after the late news.) 5, 6)

DOWN:

Where that sinking feeling would be particularly unpleasant. (9)
Get what is left; in her, it is pulled together. (7)
4 Probably not even a bone doctor of sorts inside! (4)
5 If you do, you like a very soft cover on what the rambler does. (7)
6 See 25 down
7 and 13 Spiritual 16 with Grandma, possibly. (2, 4, 5)
8 Certainly not so bad as one who plays the horses! (6)
13 See 7 down
16 A convenient place for some to store things who reuse a form of it. (9)
18 Like Richard III, seeking the answer? (6)
19 Where monks might be tidy? (2, 5)
20 Hers not to reason out a way to 20 across! (7)
21 Used to get red and more angry. (6)
23 Current method of expanding the service, much appreciated by some beer-drinkers. (5)
25 and 6 down It could be soothing to find metal on what might sound relatively like 24. (4, 5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1125

ACROSS: 1 Schoolhouse; 9 and 27 Meantime; 10 Educe; 11 and 12 Campgrounds; 13 Censors; 15 Penitent; 16 Soccer; 18 Scents; 21 Nihilist; 24 Bullion; 26 Friezes; 28 Skua; 29 Thief; 31 Bearded lady. DOWN: 2 Confusion; 3 Overdue; 4 Loud; 5 Omelets; 6 Sacks; 7 Degree; 8 Emerge; 14 Stunt; 17 Collected; 19 and 30 Chuck steak; 20 Spotter; 22 Harmful; 23 Seesaw; 25 Leave.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY AFIELD
Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair.
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
$2 check or money order
B. F. JOHNSON
P. O. Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

Fun to Read
Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.
THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E. Washington, D.C. 20002

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

You Enjoy TV Noise?
You too can enjoy TV commercials. Remote control with 20 feet of wire switches speaker on and OFF. Easy do-it-yourself instructions. Ethical, simple. Send $3.75, postage paid. Dandy Xmas gift; 3 for $10.
The A. N. MANTELL CO., Dept. N,
P.O. Box 228 Ellenville, N.Y. 12428

PERSONALS

MAKE LOVE—NOT WAR Buttons—25c each 5/$1.00—from STIEREN, 71 E. 32 St., Box 495, Chicago, Ill. 60616

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
71c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

AN OPEN LETTER FROM

STUDENTS FOR A DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY

Young people in America are in motion, motivated by their common desire to find the truth behind the rhetoric, to reiterate values as the basis for politics, to formulate alternatives to helplessness in American politics, and to reaffirm a belief in the ability of ordinary people to make the basic decisions which affect their lives.

Programs such as the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, the April 17 March on Washington, the community organizations of the urban North, the October 15-16 days of protest, the Free Speech Movement, and the anti-draft movement, are offering for the first time in a generation a true alternative. An integral to growth of this new awareness has been the growth of a unique organization—the Students for a Democratic Society.

In its quest for a society based on a democracy of participation, SDS seeks to implement its goals within the present. Thus as an organization, SDS is a community of people bound together by shared beliefs an responsibilities, not by organizational disc pline. It maintains a vision of a democrati society. It seeks relevance through a conti ual focus on realities. It feels the urgency o putting forth a radical democratic progran

As the movement for basic social chang in America grows, so will the voices of oppo sition and status quo. Our response is inter sified organization and protest. We shal continue to raise our voices:

- for the legitimate voice of the student in the academic community
- for a real war on poverty and the political enfranchisement of America's dispossessed
- for civil liberties and the rights of protest and debate in America
- for a foreign policy receptive rather than hostile to the aspiration of nine-tenths of the world's people who live in misery
- for an end to the war in Vietnam
- FOR A NEW LEFT IN AMERICA!

IF YOU SHARE our vision and program, we urge you to join. If you are a sympathetic friend, we urge you to contribute financially. If you are interested and want to know more, we urge you to write for more information.

Detach and mail to:

STUDENTS FOR A DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY
1103 East 63rd St., Chicago, Ill. 60637

☐ I would like to join SDS and enclose $3.00 for dues and Bulletin sub.

☐ I enclose $.................................... for your continuing work, please add me to your mailing list.

☐ I would like more information about SDS.

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

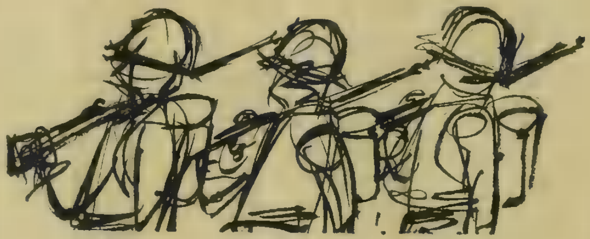
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP ....

NOV 1 8 1965
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE LINDSAY MIRACLE: Carey McWilliams

THE NATION

November 15, 1965 . . 35c



Ross Wilhelm

HOW TO END THE DRAFT

The Bourgeois Gentlemen of Saigon

Carl Oglesby

Smut Hunters: The New Jurisprudery

Howard Junker

THE ROSENBERG CASE

‘INVITATION to an INQUEST’

Review by FRED J. COOK

LETTERS

Benefit to all

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: I must dissent from Milton Viorst's rather morose attack on our efforts to secure a non-proliferation treaty ["The Nuclear Club: Why the Outs Want In," The Nation, Oct. 18].

Certainly we are aware that some of the have-nots may be unwilling to disclaim nuclear weapons without indications of restraint on the part of the club members. I would refer Mr. Viorst to William Foster's realistic appraisal in the July Foreign Affairs, where explicit mention is made of these contingencies.

However, none of this warrants Mr. Viorst's conclusion that "the draft treaty on proliferation burdens only one group of signers, without any demonstrable benefit to all."

The prevailing distrust and sensitivity have thus far barred the path to meaningful disarmament between the super powers. In this impasse our most promising course is to seek limited agreements to control the weaponry now in place. The spread of atomic capability to smaller countries would "nuclearize" local, traditional disputes, increasing tension and inevitably the risk of actual use.

The prevention of this development is most assuredly a demonstrable benefit to us all. Rep. Seymour Halpern
6th District, New York

The teacher rift

New Haven, Conn.

Dear Sirs: While some points of substance are raised by Stanley Elam in his article on teachers' unions ["Teachers' Unions: Rift Without Differences," The Nation, Oct. 18], the whole is remarkably superficial. . . .

Membership in the various branches of the NEA is often a condition of employment. . . . Sixty to 70 per cent of the directorship of the NEA is composed of school administrators. . . . How can the NEA possibly represent teachers when it is dominated by the very men from whom they must seek altered conditions and pay? . . .

Mr. Elam should have been aware that the remarkable successes of the AFT in Hartford, New York, Cleveland and in other cities have only been possible because of the interlocking support offered by the AFL-CIO, both locally and nationally, a support which removes the teachers from the "professional" isolation the NEA prefers. . . . Robert L. Herbert
Dept. of the History of Art
Yale University

Bloomington, Ind.

Dear Sirs: My thesis is that no fundamental ideological issues or principles stand in the way of NEA-AFT merger and that much could be gained by merger. When I read that a Yale professor considers my defense of this thesis "remarkably superficial," I expected some profound or at least some probing remarks to follow. Alas, Mr. Herbert evidently missed my major points, he saw some that weren't there, and he parrots some standard AFT dogma which is becoming quite obsolete as NEA affiliates change position. . . .

It is true that much pressure—sometimes overt, often subtle and covert—has been applied by administrators to force NEA membership upon teachers. It is also true—I said this myself—that AFT competition is forcing the NEA into a new militancy on behalf of teachers. As this militancy grows, superintendents have less and less reason to prefer NEA affiliation. The NEA Department of Classroom Teachers can, if it chooses, control NEA policy, and it may yet do so. . . .

When Mr. Herbert speaks of the "remarkable success" of the AFT in Hartford, I presume he means in winning a representation election. He ignores the fact that the NEA won the next four such elections in his state —Stratford, Manchester, Meriden and Berlin—cities with a much larger combined teacher corps than Hartford. Now let's be fair and see which group wins more support for good schools. My guess is that there won't be much difference between the two. But if Connecticut AFT and NEA affiliates would combine forces it seems reasonable to expect that they could accomplish a good deal more. Stanley Elam

Correction

In Ralph Nader's "The Corvair Story" (The Nation, Nov. 1), the reference (p. 298, col. 3) is to World War II, not World War I; and (p. 300, col. 3) the estimate is based on 750,000 cars, rather than 1 million.

Threat to Latin America

Danville, Va.

Dear Sirs: Reading Donald D. Ranstead's article on Latin America ["Latin America: Continent on a Teeterboard," The Nation, Nov. 1] I was struck by the thought that perhaps Mr. Ranstead has been in Chile a bit too long. He seems to have lost sight of the security of the United States of America.

Anyone who is at all informed on Latin America will agree with Mr. Ranstead's basic premise, but this does not diminish the Communist and Fidelismo threats to Latin America. Foremost in the minds of the Johnson Administration is, and should be, pı venting another Communist take-ov as occurred in Cuba.

Thomas K. Sta
Dept. of History & Political Scien
Virginia Polytechnic Institu

THE
NATION

Monday, November 15, 1965
Volume 201, No. 16

In this issue

EDITORIALS

345

ARTICLES

350 How to End the Draft
Ross Wilhelm
352 The Bourgeois Gentlemen
Saigon
Carl Oglesby
355 Aftermath to Harlem Riot:
The Epton Anarchy Trial
Frank J. Donner
358 Smut Hunters:
The New Jurisprudery
Howard Junker

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

361 "I Come From Julius"
Fred J. Cook
364 Poems
W. S. Merwin
366 Underlaw
George Feifer
368 That Man, Those Years
Paul Jacobs
368 Music
Benjamin Boretz
370 Theatre
Harold Clurman
371 Films
Robert Hatch
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 372
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Warren Miller, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Nov. 15, 1965. Vol. 201, No.

The Nation is published weekly (except in J and August, when biweekly) by The Nat Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A.
the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Aven
New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class post
paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two yea
$18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 ex per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is quired for change of address, which cannot made without the old address as well as the n

Information to Libraries: The Nation is inde in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, B Review Digest and the Public Affairs Inform tion Service.

JAN

EDITORIALS

razil: Second Act

Official Washington is reported to be "stunned" by : recent intensification of dictatorship in Brazil. t this second phase was clearly predictable, and no e should have been less surprised than the State partment experts on Latin America, for they were : authors of the script from which the Brazilian litarists played their roles.

If their memories are short, the men at the Brazil sk could utilize recent back numbers of The Nation · a quick refresher course. In an editorial, "The uldron of Brazil" (April 13, 1964), we discussed : coup against Joao Goulart as an aspect of Ameri- n policy. In a follow-up editorial (April 27) we ted the jubilation of Washington over the events Brazil; in the same issue Andrew Gunder Frank monstrated quite conclusively that, even from ashington's viewpoint, there was nothing to cheer out. In a piece on "Non-Recognition: the Diplo- atic Trap" (May 4) Richard A. Falk called attention the folly that was implicit in President Johnson's ecipitate approval of the Branco cabal which over- ew Goulart. On June 22 an editorial, "Under the lcano," called attention to the way in which the anco regime was driving out intellectuals, suppress- g academic freedom, stripping its opponents of litical rights, etc. A further editorial, "Brazilian tch Hunt" (October 12), was called in question by : Brazilian Embassy. Ronald H. Chilcote's reply, razil: Suppressing the Future" (November 23), elled out in elaborate detail what had happened and at the consequences would be. There could scarcely less room for mystery, unless the State Department ofesses mystification to cover up its recurrent lures.

When Branco seized power on March 31, 1964, azil quickly became Washington's favorite Latin nerican country, supplanting Chile, which had ned out not to be reliably reactionary. The Branco gime, like a new mistress, was duly rewarded. In : period from April 1, 1964, to June 30, 1965, Uncle m poured $513 million into Brazil, far in excess of l to any other country in the hemisphere and in ntrast to a total of $737 million in the three years eceding the Branco coup. Branco's Brazil was not grateful. When President Johnson needed OAS operation in his invasion of Santo Domingo, Brazil s the first to send in troops.

For Washington, it seems nevertheless to have been expensive bargain. Neither military force nor nerican largess has availed to produce a stable re- gne in Brazil, much less one based on justice. When nco and the other generals seized power, they is- ed Institutional Act. No. 1, proclaiming sweeping wers for the new boss and seemingly destroying all opposition. The gubernatorial elections of October 3 were carefully rigged, and no trouble was anticipated by either the American or Brazilian partners to the compact. Yet the government candidates suffered a resounding defeat. The generals had to ask themselves: "What would have happened if there had been really free elections?" Institutional Act No. 2 is the Branco-army reaction. Whatever was not forbidden before is now to be rigidly controlled. The opposition parties are to lose the latitude which the 1964 decrees left them. The Supreme Court is to be packed. Former presidents are to be tried by military courts—a provision aimed at former President Juscelino Kubitscheck. The camouflage is to be stripped off.

This self-revelation by the military dictatorship distresses Washington. It had hoped that these necessary if disagreeable steps would be taken by the Brazilian Congress, which was largely hand-picked to do such work, but instead the Institutional Act has been laid down by presidential decree. Washington had looked to a more seemly abrogation of democratic forms. Now it is embarrassed, and Senator Morse causes the Johnson Administration — and Under Secretary of State Thomas C. Mann—further discomfiture by crying that we are transforming the Alliance for Progress into an alliance for ever-increasing militarization in the Western Hemisphere. This is what our anti-Red policy has wrought. It is hard to see what further mischief it can create, but there is bound to be a third act—one in which the Brazilian people will have their say. The State Department may find that last act really frightening.

Dick to the Rescue

The next Presidential election is still three years off and much may happen in that time, but some political doctors, keeping vigil at the bedside of the Republican Party, think that Richard M. Nixon is still the most promising GOP candidate. If so, the best lifeguards are nonswimmers, and stuttering is a qualification for oratory. From 1960 on, Nixon has been a consistent loser and a graceless one, as his outburst against the press after his gubernatorial defeat in California demonstrated. More evidence is piled up by his performance in the New Jersey election, in which Governor Richard J. Hughes not only won a landslide victory but carried Democrats to majorities in both houses of the legislature, for the first time since Woodrow Wilson did it in 1913.

State Senator Wayne Dumont, Governor Hughes's opponent, went into the campaign a loser. One of his principal supporters advised him to cut his throat rather than commit suicide slowly in a drawn-out campaign. However, when a professor at Rutgers declared in a teach-in that he would welcome a Vietcong victory, Dumont and his advisers saw a ray of hope which they quickly magnified into a searchlight beam.

Discarding practically all other issues, Dumont concentrated on Professor Genovese. The fellow had to go. The Rutgers board of trustees refused to fire him; he had tenure, and he had made his imprudent remark outside the classroom. Hughes refused to intervene. He protested that he agreed with Administration policy on Vietnam, but the question was one of academic freedom.

This was a principled but somewhat perilous position—at least it seemed perilous at the outset. Especially in its northern counties, New Jersey abounds in organizations and individuals who equate patriotism with conformity. Many of them dislike professors with the bitter suspicion characteristic of the unschooled. It was toward this group that Nixon made his pitch when Dumont called on him for help.

Other supporters, in and out of the state, were more scrupulous. Senator Case took essentially the same position as Governor Hughes; General Eisenhower chose to ignore the Genovese issue. But Nixon would not, indeed could not, for he is drawn to this sort of argument by all his inclinations and political experience. Exploitation of the Communist issue had brought him to Washington in the first place (one of the dirtiest campaigns in American history was that of Nixon against Helen Gahagan Douglas) and the Hiss case gave him the Vice Presidency. But this time the gimmick did not work.

In a letter to The New York Times, Nixon explained his stand on Genovese at great length. Every American, he said, is for free speech and academic freedom, and of course no American is for these precious rights more than Richard M. Nixon. But it is the responsibility of the state not only to protect the rights of the individual but to "defend itself against enemies whose victory would deny freedom of speech to all." Genovese was evidently one of these enemies, and the victory he welcomed would extinguish the right of free speech "throughout the world." The line must be drawn somewhere, and Nixon drew it for the free world, for our fighting men and for Dumont.

This sort of boundless exaggeration, which would be hysterical if it were honest, is Nixon's stock in trade, as it was Joe McCarthy's before him. Millions of Americans are still willing to believe that opposition to the kind of war we are fighting in Vietnam can bring down our government and our institutions. But these millions, it turned out, are not unduly concentrated in New Jersey. The voters there were levelheaded enough to give Nixon the inattention he deserved. "Maybe we figured it wrong," one of Dumont's aides said after the election. They did, and henceforth Republicans in a like situation will think twice before putting all their cards on the conformist issue—and three times before calling on Nixon.

Actually the political moral can be pinpointed. A fairly large percentage of New Jersey voters—so the polls indicated—professed never to have heard of the Genovese case despite the noisy airing it receiv Of those who had heard of it, 51 per cent thou that "something should be done" about Genovese. itself this would provide cold comfort for those c cerned about academic freedom. But presumably t majority was satisfied with the general performa of the Hughes administration and did not propose let possible disagreement over a peripheral and rea irrelevant issue sway their decisions. But if Gover Hughes had become alarmed, if he had started retreat or equivocate, the issue might have been da aging. It was the Governor's refusal to panic— general air of confidence he exhibited—that made possible for him to turn the issue to his advanta

The Negro's Strange Bedfellow

White voters who have become jaded by the un citing experience of choosing between candidates w promise them everything must sometimes envy t Southern Negro, who, after the fight that gives h the right to vote, must then decide cannily betwe several candidates who promise him as little as p sible. Democracy for him is really an adventure.

Clarence Mitchell, spokesman for the NAACP fice in Washington, last week illustrated the trickin of such decision making.

Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia, he said, just p sibly might be the man for the Negroes to supp when he comes up for re-election next year. Russe The man who has led the Southern forces for yea in opposition to all civil rights measures? Yes, t same. Mitchell's reasoning goes thus: As leader the Southern bloc, Russell, a close friend of Lynd Johnson, makes it easier for the President to de with that region. If Russell were defeated, who wou take over the leadership of the bloc? Strom Thu mond? Or George Wallace, perhaps, after defeati Sen. John Sparkman? Compared to either, Russ looks very good to Mitchell. For one thing, "Russ gives intelligent leadership — he knows when h licked. I doubt that we could have gotten the ci rights bill through in 1964 without Russell's help. I was wise enough to know that anything less than wh was passed would have brought on a blood bath."

For some really stunning delicacy of choice, Mitch posed this hypothesis: What if Sen. James Eastla were opposed by ex-Governor Ross Barnett? Mitch couldn't see Negroes backing Eastland openly, but l did not think it unreasonable for them to back hi against such opposition: "I don't think they wou abstain and the NAACP would never advocate a stention."

Would the Louisiana Negro be wiser to vote f McKeithen or for Ellender, if that race comes off is now rumored likely? Should they vote for the lou mouthed economic liberal Wallace, who has abus them verbally so much, or for the quiet econom liberal Sparkman, who has never made even one sem courageous statement in their behalf?

During these mostly barren years of transitio itchell believes; the Negro must avoid moral judg- ents and squeeze what he can from his vote in a ldly practical fashion. Representing a race that has much to forgive, reasonable forgiveness is what tchell would advocate.

"I think if a politician who had always been a gregationist came to the Negroes and said, 'I'll ange my position. I was a segregationist because I d to be to get elected. But now I'll openly work for ur best interests'—it would be worth taking a risk him. Our risks have paid off in the past. I mean, tably the man in the White House."

So far, however, there seems to be no great rush ong Southern politicians to declare their change heart. The risk that confronts the Negro remains mething other than that of a false promise.

ick Children

Washington officials of Project Head Start are be- nning to realize that they may have a medical bear the tail. A survey of the health status of more than 00 preschool children, conducted last summer by e university-affiliated hospitals in Boston and re- rted in a two-part article in the Boston Traveler, veals that nearly a third of them are seriously ill d in urgent need of medical care. If the same rate disability holds for children of the economically prived throughout the country—and if the Office Economic Opportunity is serious about giving these ildren an opportunity to grow up in reasonably good alth—the cost could run into billions. At the mo- nt OEO has no medical care program, only a laud- le curiosity about the health of the poor. To date surveys have been made of adult health.

The pediatric findings, plus a couple of preliminary dies of teen-agers involved in the OEO retraining ogram, do, however, provide a pretty good clue to medical shape of things as they are—and as they likely to become—in the rural and urban slums the country. In short, the American Medical Asso- tion's "best medical care in the world" has failed reach them. Dr. Gardner Edwards, a Massachusetts neral Hospital internist who participated in the ogram, says: "One thing hits home when you see se children: How come no one spotted their prob- ns sooner—and did something about them?"

oison in the Air

The awesome dimensions of the air pollution prob- n are brought out in two notable articles: Edmund Faltermayer's "We Can Afford Clean Air" in the vember Fortune, and Gordon D. Friedlander's "Air- rne Asphyxia: An International Problem" in the EE Spectrum. Faltermayer's piece is featured on cover as "A Fortune Proposition on Air Pollution," ich gives it full editorial sanction. Since Fried- nder is a staff writer for the Institute of Electrical d Electronics Engineers, his article may be con- ued as reflecting in some measure the official view of the largest engineering society in the world, and one of the most influential.

If these articles were not so authoritative in their marshaling and interpretation of facts, they would be regarded as alarmist; they are in fact sensational in the best journalistic sense. Friedlander quotes a public health official: "Our urban civilization stands a much better chance of being suffocated by air pollution than of being annihilated by atomic weapons." Speaking for himself, Friedlander regards the air pollution problem in New York as "so far out of control that this writer could be panicked into leaving the city after reviewing his own copy." But where would he go—if he had to live in a city? Almost all of the megalopoli, both here and abroad, are in the same state.

The statistics on our own situation are little short of appalling. The gaseous and particulate refuse that is discharged into U.S. air every year is roughly equal in weight to the solid trash disposed of by departments of sanitation, and each exceeds the country's steel production of some 130 million tons. What the public sees is not the worst of it. A monthly sootfall of 60 tons per square mile is not exceptional in Manhattan, but the principal damage is to curtains. Some of the gaseous pollutants are far more dangerous: Power stations burning coal, or heavy fuel oil, catch 99 per cent of the soot before it leaves their stacks, but the sulfur dioxide goes right on into the atmosphere—some 800 tons a day for a big plant. The emission of carbon monoxide and unburned hydrocarbons from automobile exhausts can be more than halved by available devices, but emission of nitrogen oxides is uncontrolled. Exterior house paint may be blackened by hydrogen sulfide, and various other pollutants corrode metal, disintegrate stone, and do other damage to materials. In human tissue these poisons do not appear to be as carcinogenic as cigarette smoke, but they are linked to asthma, pneumonia, tuberculosis, emphysema and other respiratory diseases. The chairman of a panel of medical experts at the 1962 National Conference on Air Pollution Control termed the evidence that air pollution contributes to chronic respiratory illness "overwhelming"—and things have become much worse since then.

What are we to do? Faltermayer, who certainly hasn't got it in for industry, praises anti-pollution efforts by some companies, but calls industry's record as a whole "dismal." He shows how an expenditure of about $3 billion a year for clean air would sharply reduce $11 billion a year in property damage alone. For electric utilities, maximum use of gas as fuel is advisable, and nuclear energy, pumped storage and mine-mouth generation (when the mine is not near an urban area) should be further developed. In cities like New York where, as Faltermayer puts it, the residents inhale part of their garbage in the smoke from 12,000 apartment house incinerators, consideration should be given to the European method of burning garbage in steam and power plants, with little emission of smoke, and research should be pressed on far-out techniques like trash-carrying pipe lines to eliminate costly pickup services.

Automobile pollution is a subject in itself. Everyone knows how the auto industry has been dragging its feet on factory installation of control accessories. And is it necessary to equip passenger automobiles with 400 h.p. engines, when a tenth of that horsepower is perfectly adequate for a light car? Nor can Detroit be assured that the internal combustion engine is the last word in powering automobiles. Several companies, including General Dynamics, are experimenting with electric automobiles, and in England research is being done on cars operating on fuel cells generating power for electric motors. With air-borne chemicals endangering the health of the urban population, a small fraction of missile and space money might well be diverted to research on cleaning up man's most precious resource—the terrestrial atmosphere.

The Lindsay Miracle

John V. Lindsay's victory in New York is, first of all, a personal triumph. Without exception, the political wiseacres said it could not be done—the Democrats, with a 7-to-2 margin in registrations, were too deeply entrenched in power. Demographic factors favored them: more than 1 million middle-class New Yorkers had moved to the suburbs in the last decade. The famous New York ethnic geography also favored the Democrats. Lindsay, a white, Anglo Saxon, "first family" Protestant—St. Paul's, Yale, an Episcopalian and, worst of all, a Republican—seemed laughably miscast in terms of the conventional political anthropology. In March, Mayor Wagner looked like an easy victor; by no means had he been the worst mayor in the city's history. With all this in mind, Lindsay's decision to run against Wagner was an act of rare political courage. But the first significant polls indicated that he had been shrewd; the Mayor was far more vulnerable than the "pros" had thought.

Then came a series of bad breaks for Lindsay: the withdrawal of Wagner (Beame could avoid some of the onus that had attached to the Wagner administration), the newspaper strike, and the television antics of William Buckley. Worst, Lindsay had not been able to put together a real fusion ticket; Mollen and Costello, his "team," were both liabilities. But Lindsay kept campaigning—walking the streets, talking to the people—while his manager, Robert Price, set up an amazing "amateur" political organization, well financed to be sure but staffed by volunteers and housed in storefronts, on the street level. Price's achievement must be measured against the fact that the Republican organization in the city was decrepit, inefficient and, in many areas, nonexistent. However, none of this would have availed if Lindsay had not been an immensely attractive candidate and a fine campaigner. All sorts of theories will be spun by way of "explaining" his remarkable victory, but the simplest explanation is probably the most accurate: an opportunity existed (there was little t was not wrong with New York) and a fine candid against the "odds," had the courage to take vantage of it.

To be sure, Lindsay did get one break—the c didacy of the ineffable William Buckley. Not by inf ence but by his own statement, Buckley entered campaign to defeat Lindsay; it is a measure of general political immaturity that he succeeded electing the man he sought to defeat. In a carefu styled campaign, Buckley managed to attract the wh backlash vote, the hypped up "anti-Communist" vo and the extremists of the far Right. By clever a precise semantics, he managed to appeal to rac and religious prejudices, while denying any such tention and without being directly chargeable with The words were well chosen but Governor Geor Wallace would not have been more effective. T effect, of course, was to attract the support of low middle-class elements, largely Catholic, who wou normally have voted the Democratic ticket and wh in any other circumstances, would have found it ve difficult to identify with the verbal gymnast fro Stamford, Conn.

* * *

Nationally, Lindsay's victory offers a slight ho that the two-party system may still be salvageab But before the opportunity can be defined, the rea ties must be restated. In the wake of the Novembe 1964, election, The Nation pointed out ["The Mornin After," November 16] that the task of unifying th Republican Party would be far more difficult tha most of the pundits realized. Today, a year later, th GOP is still sharply divided. The Goldwaterites we finally ousted from the national committee staff, aft much bloodletting, but the splinter groups have mu tiplied. To date, Ray Bliss has failed to put a stop the internal feuding. The Goldwaterites control th Republican Party in six Southern states, they a dominant in California, and control the Young R publicans and many subsidiary party organization Despite the belated repudiation of the Birch Societ right-wing elements are strongly entrenched in man local, state and peripheral organizations. Moreove the Goldwaterites, as Buckley demonstrated, are wrec ers and spoilers. They detest the liberal or modera Republicans far more than they dislike Democrat From the outset their strategy has been to wreck th Republican Party in the hope that they might the be able to pick up the pieces. To think that all the want is to secure a "bargaining" position in the R publican Party is to misread obvious realities. Lin say's victory has not brushed these realities aside bu has created an opportunity (it has also considerab improved Governor Nelson Rockefeller's chances o re-election) if the top GOP leadership only has th wit to see it.

For nearly half a century, the GOP has tended t ignore the big cities, in part because it did not nee them to win elections at the turn of the century, i part because its traditional positions placed it at sadvantage when appealing to the big-city vote. Also, e big-city machines were for the most part domi- ited by the Democrats, and behind this dominance as a long social history. So the GOP in more than ie state turned a disadvantage into a policy. Deals ere made with the city bosses: City Hall for the emocrats, Statehouse for the Republicans. All the hile, important occupational and population shifts ere taking place: the farm vote was declining, the nall-town vote was declining, oldsters were shifting to the Democratic columns because of welfare, pen- ons, etc. These factors, combined with studied Re- iblican neglect of the big city's problems and of big- ty political organization, presented the big-city vote the Democrats on a silver platter. The movement white middle-class elements to the suburbs and the flux of Southern Negroes (and, in the case of New ork, Puerto Ricans) to the cities simply underscored e trend.

As the appeal of the party to the city voter declined, epublican leaders were more and more inclined to rite off the big-city vote as unobtainable and to base ieir strategy on an appeal to what the nuclear war rategists have long called Country B—that is, the untry outside the big cities and the metropolitan eas or, in other words, the non-nuclear target U.S.A. s long as the Goldwater influence—the nostalgia for 1 older America—was not offset by candidates with strong urban appeal and backed by real city organi- tions, this influence was bound to spread in the arty, to its detriment nationally. The Country B rategy is hopeless because the votes are in the big ties, which are in the states with the big bags of ectoral votes. Reapportionment will only strengthen is trend.

Big-city problems are certain to dominate the poli- cs of the next two decades, if only because roughly vo-thirds of the population now lives in the big ietropolitan areas. At the same time the Democrats ave, with rare exceptions, made a mess of big-city ffairs. Big-city Democratic machines once served a urpose: they turned up jobs and handouts for im- iigrants and gave the urban poor a feeling of belong- ig, of identification. But the typical big-city Demo- ratic machine cannot cope with today's big-city prob- ms (again note an exception for Mayor Richard ee, who was re-elected in New Haven, which has rban problems though it is not a really big city). The ew York story—"The Shame of New York," as The ation called it in 1959—eloquently supports this onclusion: New York is a shameful mess, and politi- ally the Democratic machine is responsible. Here, ien, is the Republican Party's opportunity: to move ito the big cities, where the party must be strength- ned in any case if it is to survive.

This opportunity has two additional facets. The emocratic city reform movement has largely faded— began to fade under Kennedy and it has continued fade under Johnson. It has lost out in New York nd Philadelphia and it never had much strength in Boston or Chicago. The spectacle of Vice President Humphrey and Senator Kennedy striving to breathe some life into the Beame candidacy was a sorry one indeed. Then, too, Negroes, traditionally Republican in the first quarter of the century, became New Deal Democrats because of bread-and-butter issues: jobs, welfare, relief and, later, civil rights. Republican indifference drove them into the Democratic Party. But increasingly the racial issue — more accurately the issue of personal dignity, of human worth—has begun to take precedence over the so-called bread-and-butter issues. The returns in Cleveland, Dayton and a dozen other cities in Tuesday's elections support this conclusion. Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles, a Democrat, would have great difficulty rustling up a baker's dozen of Negro votes today, and Mayor Richard Daley of Chicago is sitting on a keg of dynamite. In Boston, the grim-faced Mrs. Louise Day Hicks is a symbol of what can be done with lower-class and lower-middle-class "white" votes, in much the same way as Rosemary Gunning and Bill Buckley demonstrated how normally Democratic votes can be drawn from the party. The Republican opportunity, in a word, is its necessity. To be sure, Lindsay did not campaign as a Republican; but a man who had served four terms as a Republican Congressmen was certainly known as a Republican, and his campaign manager was Senator Javits. He was certainly not known as a Democrat, an Independent or a Liberal Party member.

*   *   *

Can Lindsay govern New York City? Is the city governable? The answer has always been obvious: the city is governable because it has always been governed after a fashion. The question is, how? For many years it has often been badly governed, as in the case of Mayor Wagner, by men of good will and personal honesty who yet lacked the imagination, the drive, the feeling for "modernity," for administrative skills and political inventiveness, to do the trick. No one can govern New York City who cannot enlist the support, the confidence and the cooperation of those who live in this envenomed city—and enlist them almost block by block, precinct by precinct. Lindsay's victory shows that a pronounced strain of American social idealism still survives in cynical New York but that, if it is to be mobilized, it must be by a candidate who radiates that idealism himself. Hacks cannot bring out the enthusiastic amateur idealists who, in the end, are the people who must govern New York if it is to be kept from self-destruction. To say that New York City is not governable is to say that democracy is a failure, that people cannot govern themselves. If New York cannot be governed, then the America of the second half of this century cannot be governed. Lindsay's victory is an indication that stronger than class, racial, religious or ethnic loyalties is public resentment stemming from a feeling that the entire environment has, through neglect and mismanagement, become malign.

Obviously Lindsay has his work cut out for him. He stands alone. The deeply entrenched civil service will be against him. So will the other elected officials and the city council. But he has something working for him: he can use the press (he was actively supported by four of the city's newspapers) and the air media to tell the people what is wrong and what needs to be done. In this way, the city machine will begin to feel a pressure it has not known for many years. He should not give an inch. He should turn his alonen to the people's advantage. He can tell them what do. He can talk to them. Lindsay's victory is a mira —they do happen in politics—but he cannot perfo miracles. What he is able to do will depend on ability to put the people to their tasks. He has qualiti as The Nation has pointed out before, of rare politi leadership. We supported his candidacy and we w him well.

CAREY McWILLIA

How To End the Draft . . . . Ross Wilhel

One of today's best-kept secrets is that the draft is not needed. Economic analysis and past experience show clearly that if the military forces were to pay adequate salaries they could attract all the personnel they require—including manpower for the anticipated Vietnam build-up—without resorting to coercion. Secretary of Defense McNamara, in hearings before the United States Senate, admitted that the draft was unnecessary. Many United States Senators and Congressmen, among them Sen. George S. McGovern (D., S.D.) and Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R., Mo), have acknowledged that there is a salary level at which the armed forces could operate on a voluntary basis. General Hershey, in response to a question by Rep. Robert Kastenmeier (D., Wis.) on television, supported this position. The real question is: "Why does the Johnson Administration refuse to change its budget and spending so as to eliminate the draft?" Is the Johnson Administration afraid to discuss the issue openly because that might lead to embarrassing Congressional questions about the undeclared war in Vietnam? Is the Administration reluctant to consider substituting money for the draft because the cost would be great and might jeopardize the reputations of Johnson and McNamara as "great economizers"?

The draft is an anachronism. The Universal Selective Service Act of 1939 was passed to meet the military manpower procurement problem and the mobilization problem of World War II. During the period from World War I up to the onset of World War II, military expenditures were cut to the bone; by 1939 the regular military establishment had been reduced to 328,000 men, backed up by 410,000 National Guard and Reserve personnel. World War II required 10,600,000 persons, and the draft was designed to bring into the armed forces huge numbers in a minimum time. A similar procurement problem faced the nation at the outbreak of the Civil War when the Regular Army consisted of 107,000 men, and 4,057,000 were required to fight the war. This force also was mobilized by a draft.

Today, however, the problem is not one of expanding an army of a few hundred thousand to ten or more millions. We have a force in being of 2,600,000, and the announced intention of the Department of Defense is to increase this to slightly more than 2,900,000. Thus, the 1965 problem is how to maintain a force of between 2.5 and 3 million men, and the draft is an inappropriate instrument for the purpose.

At present, the armed forces are meeting the bulk of their manpower needs through voluntary enlistments. About 500,000 men a year have been required in rece years, and only some 100,000 these have been draftees. Indee in some years the Defense Depa ment has rejected, for physical mental deficiencies, a larger nu ber of volunteers than the numb of individuals who have been dra
ed. Thus the military is very clo to being able to operate witho the draft, and the question at iss is the nature of the induceme needed to increase the flow of v unteers sufficiently to close the ga
The most direct form of induc ment would be higher salaries f all military ranks.

The size of the pay increase r quired has been variously es mated. Secretary of Defense M Namara, testifying before a Sena hearing on the 1966 defense budg on February 26, 1965, said: "If t pay [of the military personnel] we raised to anything approximati a point where it would attract sufficient number of men to away with the draft, I suspect would add about $4 billion a ye to the military budget." He adde
"Perhaps that should be co sidered"!

I estimate that all defense ma power needs could be satisfie with a flat across-the-board pa increase of $250 to $300 a mont per man. This would bring the pa of trained enlisted men to a lev competitive with civilian emplo ment, and would make the startin pay for a recruit (now $87.90 month) highly attractive to man young people. The total cost my proposal would be more tha $9 billion a year; however, the a tual increase in the military budge would be significantly less. A present, only about 5 per cent the draftees re-enlist for a secon tour of duty, while about 20 pe cent of the volunteers re-enlist an

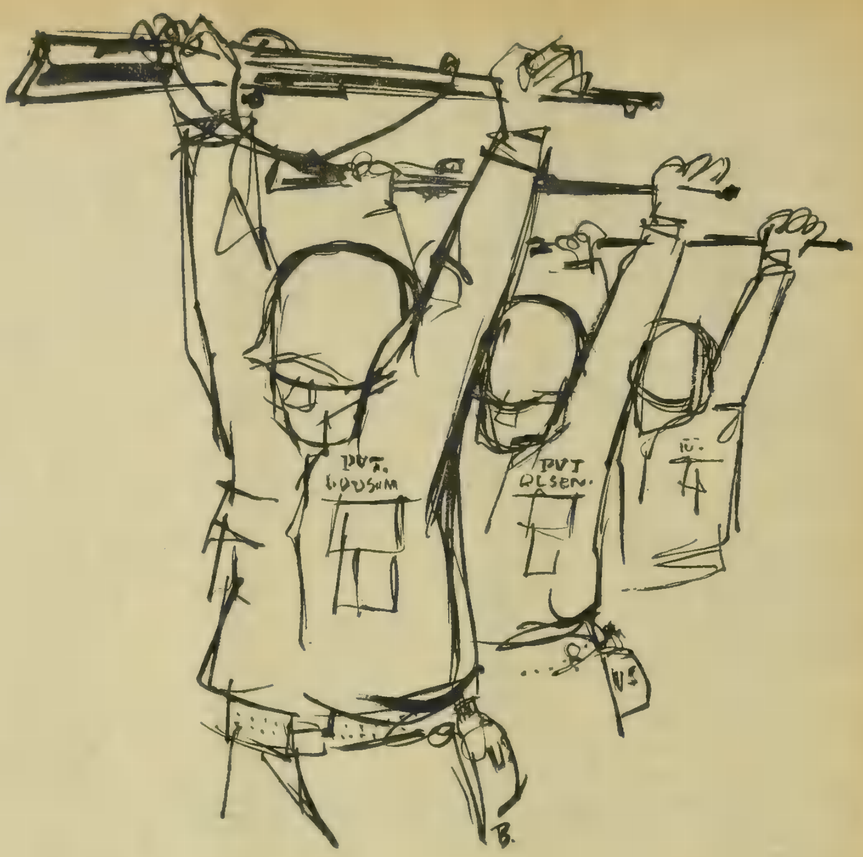
Ross Wilhelm teaches economics in the Graduate School of Business, University of Michigan. His weekly radio program on business and economic issues is carried by more than 100 American stations.

ore than 90 per cent of the regular reerists. It costs $3,387 for the sic training of every man enter- g the armed forces, plus the costs the additional training he re- ives beyond basic. Thus tremen- ius savings could be realized by ducing the turnover. But whether e cost of the increase were $9 llion or $4 billion, the point is at there is a pay level at which ive military labor would no longer needed. It is distasteful that the :hest nation on earth should use ercion to secure its military per- nnel when it could obtain all of e men it needs by paying ade- iate salaries.

The offensive nature of the mili- ry pay situation becomes clear hen it is realized that the Con- ess recently cut taxes by about 0 billion a year, and the Presi- nt has boasted that we can have th our "guns and butter." At the me time, a recent Air Force sur- y showed that 5,000 enlisted men active duty in that service alone ere receiving local relief pay- ents to help support families, id another 55,000 enlisted men e eligible to receive other wel- re benefits! The same shocking ndition prevails in the other serv- es. Even the Congress has begun grow uneasy over the military y situation. Rep. Thomas B. Cur- (R., Mo.) has called for a Con- essional investigation and has en quoted as saying, "The Ad- inistration is deliberately avoid- g a thoroughgoing review of our anpower procurement practices." addition, Sen. Gaylord Nelson)., Wis.), Sen. George S. Mc- vern (D., S.D.), and Rep. Robert istenmeier (D., Wis.) have been ying out for higher pay for the wer enlisted ranks.



From the viewpoint of so- ety as a whole, the cost of elimi- ting the draft by raising pay uld be significantly less than a to $9 billion increase in the fense budget. The draft clearly uses vast economic waste in the onomy. It does so most obviously forcing many highly trained and mpetent individuals to spend two ars performing duties that could done by less well trained per- nnel. If the military were oper- ed with volunteers, the social iste of assigning college gradu- es or individuals with comparable ills to jobs below their level of mpetence could be avoided. In addition, the draft has encouraged large numbers of early marriages, with the attendant expectation of higher divorce or separation rates. Further, one does not have to be around a university long to learn that many students continue their education at the graduate or professional level merely to postpone the draft summons. Educational investments beyond those needed are an economic waste.

To continue itemizing the waste, many employers are reluctant to hire young men who are eligible to be drafted. Every employer makes an investment in a new employee in the form of on-the-job training as well as in the lowered productivity of the employee during his early months. On-the-job training runs in many cases for three to six months, and it is not difficult to find instances where it goes on for two years. Finally, the threat of the draft hanging over such young people frustrates their decisions and is a hidden waste impossible to measure. If the economic wastes associated with the draft were eliminated, the total cost to society of a military pay increase would be far less than the direct increases in the military budget.

The draft should also be done away with because it is highly discriminatory. Today only three out of ten men from the draft ages of 19 to 26 are serving. Many young men are exempted because they are in school or hold "key or essential" jobs. Others are physically, mentally or morally unqualified.

The net effect of draft exemptions on the basis of study or job is discrimination against the lower income groups. Admission to colleges and universities is directly related to income, and the bulk of those attending institutions of higher learning come from the upper income groups. The average income of the parents of students attending the University of Michigan, for instance—a state-supported institution—is more than $13,000 a year. Further, college and university students tend to remain in school longer than do those attending trade or technical schools, and this also tips the selection process of the draft toward the lower-income groups. It is probable, furthermore, that an individual in a key or essential job will have an income that is higher than average. Finally, the draft discriminates on the basis of sex, since women are exempt. Thus the claim that the draft results in "universal military service" is a myth that covers up the most flagrant inequity.

The great social dangers of the draft do not end with its injustices. In recent months there has been alarming evidence that it is being used to control thought and to squash criticism of our Vietnam policies. General Hershey has been quoted as prescribing the draft as a cure for juvenile delinquency as well as a means of handling demonstrators. In Michigan, a group of college students who sat down in a draft office as a means of protesting the Vietnam war were threatened with having their classification changed from 2S to 1A. All over the country state legislators are threatening to cut the budgets of state-supported institutions whose students have been protesting the draft or Vietnam. A democratic society is clearly in great danger when officials of the government have the power to punish or actually destroy those who oppose their policies.

On the other side, the most common defense put forth for the draft is that it is the patriotic duty of each citizen to serve his country. Without judging the validity of such a claim, it should be said that patriotism is no excuse for paying slave wages. And yet if the wages of the military were raised to where they were competitive with alternative employments, there would be no need for the draft. Indeed, it would not even be necessary to repeal the draft law: it simply would become inoperative. Further, it is obvious that large numbers of persons in the country do not accept the "patriotic duty" thesis, since it is necessary to force men to serve.

An alternative often proposed t the present draft law is a true un versal military service wherei every young person upon reachin age 18 would have to serve in som capacity for two years. The mo obvious objection to this propos is that it is not an appropriate d vice for our present needs. In a dition, the cost of universal mil tary service, both direct and in th waste of training unneeded peopl would be far higher than the bi for adequate military salaries.

During the 1964 Presidenti election, both candidates promise to re-evaluate the draft and to elim nate it as soon as possible. Y there has been no action on Sele tive Service to date except for ste to muzzle critics. Are the you people of the country paying f the political advantage of the A ministration?

The Bourgeois Gentlemen of Saigon

Carl Oglesb

I call them bourgeois gentlemen by no means disrespectfully, but with concern for their exposure and with skepticism for a politics that may be as deeply French (remonstrative, reasonable) as it is romantic (elegant and doomed). There was something formal, even solemn, about our meeting with them. I sensed that we American visitors had been the subject of a difficult prior discussion: Was their risk, if we were "agents," greater or less than their opportunity if we were not? I felt that they had prepared for us, that they had arranged themselves.

Those who met us are apparently leading members of the group of some 150 that was arrested last February for calling upon Saigon and Hanoi to make peace. That evening we sat with a former Minister of Defense, a top Saigon lawyer who was a veteran of both the Vietminh (till '54) and Big Minh's Council of Notables, two professors, a publisher, a priest, a business statistician. Our host was formerly a Minister of the Economy, one whom a political opponent had characterized as "the most moral man in Saigon." He was also very well to do, had a fine house and lightly polished nails, wore gold cuff links and a silk tie. His table was laid with fine linen and silver; his servants offered around premium whiskey before a superb Vietnamese meal.

Such details are to the point: these men are from the north and the south; most are Catholic but some are Buddhist or Confucian (we would say "humanist"); but in common they are used to power, privilege and security, and perhaps now they are nearly beyond all three. They consciously identify themselves with those French nobles of the 18th century who sided with the Revolution in full awareness that their heads would be among the first to roll should the Revolution succeed.

Their view is simple and our host stated it at once. "The war must be ended at any cost." He was an eloquent man whose face seemed stretched with anguish. "Those who draw historical diagrams in guarded, air-conditioned mansions and speak of war's perhaps unfortunate necessity—these are men of no particular education." We were shown glossy photographs of the carnage that had educated our companions of the evening. "This is all one may s of war, nothing else."

They claim to fear communis Its victory, they say, would be personal defeat for each of the "But our fear is not the peopl fear. For them, communism mea a change. For them, a change already an improvement." The pl losopher warmly extended th point. "Even with peace," he sa "the lives of the people are wretche Even with peace, they may expe to live forty years. Nothing t Front could do to the people cou make their lives worse. This wou be true of the government, too, b it wants to do nothing. Now the are a few provinces where the g ernment builds schools and h pitals, but there are no teache no doctors—only soldiers. The g ernment builds these shells to pr it loves the people. Why not fore, when it was not too late? N the government is all for helpi the people and everyone in Saig is a Socialist. But there is of cou the excuse of the war. Win t war in order to help the peop But the people can see: the gove ment helps them only in order win the war. For six years th was no war. The people got nothi from Diem but inferior promi quickly broken. Why was this p

---

Carl Oglesby is president of Students for a Democratic Society.

nted? We had so much Amerimoney. We might have done much. We bought guns and de an army. We wanted to ghten the people. Then they uld not go with the Communists.
n you understand the size of s mistake?"

We wondered if this exaggerated political sensitivities of "the ople." The lawyer answered.
nly think of what you know. For irty years, the peasant of Viet-m has been at war and seen for-gn troops. First the French, then e Japanese, then the British, in e north the Kuomintang Chinese, e French again, and now the nericans are here. Any war, and pecially this kind, is politically eaking a most educational ex-rience. Reading, no. Arithmetic, ot so much. But the politics of ar, yes. From his childhood the asant is trained in that. It is not ke being an American farmer."

Our host argued that this was o longer relevant. The people anted only peace. "If the people ere allowed to choose between ar and the Front, 70 per cent ould choose the Front. At least."

But to us that seemed mislead-ng. By the logic of his argument, e people would prefer anything war — even, for example, the overnment. Given the choice beween war and a peace under the overnment, would 70 per cent till prefer peace? The question eemed to divide them and they poke among themselves in Vietamese; it was as if they had de-cended from view for a moment.
hey surfaced, nodding. Our host aid we would perhaps find the nswer to that somewhat difficult, ut he would try to explain why hey now believed the answer was o, although there was a time when hey would have said yes.

His explanation was substantially what we had heard a few nights before from an "underground" journalist of no apparent faction, the pseudonymous Cao Giao, who looks strikingly like Ho Chi Minh — younger by maybe twenty-five years, but with the same high features and long wispy chin whiskers and the same slight frame. He speaks quickly and with arresting precision. He has small, fine hands that fly continuously.
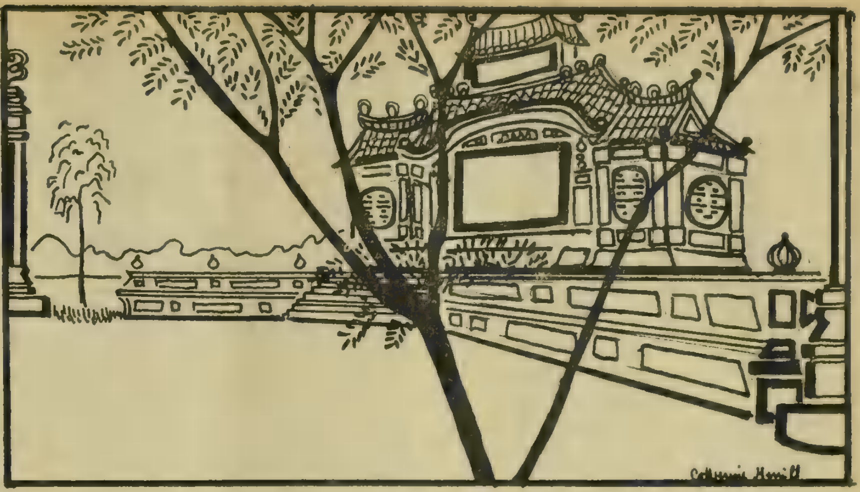
At the least sign of an interruption, he stops mid-sentence, pulls his beard, and lays his head skeptically to one side: "Yes? Yes? You fail to understand?" He left the Vietminh after 1954, for two years was a leader of the Duy Dan southern socialist party, was then jailed for a while by Diem, but by 1959 was in Diem's service as a trainer of the guerrillas whom Diem was exporting into North Vietnam. He now edits an opposition paper whose name he must constantly change to evade the censor.



"The government," he said, "is a mere imposture. Who doubts it, who does not know? You Americans are fond of saying the Vietnam problem is complex. But this is only an excuse for not thinking. The problem is not complex, it is only difficult. Vietnam requires just two things, independence and development. But these cannot be separated. The government that does not satisfy the one will not be allowed to satisfy the other. A Saigon government that embraces the Americans could develop Vietnam but cannot make it independent. One that does not could make it independent, but cannot develop it. Do we struggle with this difficulty? Now we have only governments whose officials prepare at once for a forced retirement in Europe. The first act of a new head of state is to deposit large sums of American dollars in the banks of Paris. Do you think this is disguised? It is part of the office routine.

"I know the Communists very well. They will make us a drab people. They do not tolerate the bizarre, the lonely spirit. Hanoi is a gray city. But they promise independence and development, and they can easily deceive the people. This is why they grow. We do not give them the opportunity of exposing themselves as liars. We provide them with excuses for their failures, we justify the tyranny they would impose in any case, and we hand them an explanation for their attachment to the Chinese.

"Here are realities. First. The Vietcong are winning the war because they are winning the people. This is disgraceful for us and tragic for Vietnam. Why does it happen? They started small and grew large. We started large and grew small. This happened because we had nothing to say to the people. Now the people are asked to fight with us for what this Ky has the impudence to call 'freedom.' Nonsense. What freedom did we ever show them? What freedom do they want whose ancestors, like themselves, died from hunger and sickness even when there was peace? We must stop defending this 'freedom' which does not exist and rise instead to attack the VC as traitors to the nationalist revolution. Then maybe the people would come with us.

"Second. A permanent solution for Vietnam cannot be seen through cold-war eyes. We do not want to be swallowed by China. But we cannot stand like sentries on America's side. That is to betray Asia and thus ourselves. You must learn this. If you force us to be with you, you are really forcing us to be with China. For us to be with you, in your way, you must simply invade us and conquer us. We are not insane. We know our country must exist not only today, but one hundred years from today. And therefore, five.

"Third. The Vietnamese detest foreign meddlers. Worse yet in their eyes are the Vietnamese who collaborate with foreign meddlers. This was true when the French were here. It remains true now that Americans are here, no matter how different America's reasons may be. For the Vietnamese who speaks only his own tongue, it is very hard to tell the difference between the Frenchman and the American. Both are very tall."

Did this mean he wanted a U.S. withdrawal? "Militarily, no. Things are very bad now. But politically, yes. Or things will only get worse." But what could that mean? How could these be divided? Cao Giao was not so clear. His lucidity for a moment flickered badly. Perhaps an international bank for aid, an international army for defense. But then he flared. "This is your problem because you have made it your problem. We Vietnamese did not make these decisions. The Vietnamese did not divide Vietnam. But for your own sake, if you understand nothing else, you must understand this, the fourth reality: Any Vietnamese solution to the problem of Vietnam is better than any non-Vietnamese solution. Grasp this and begin. Ignore it and be beaten."

United States Embassy, Saigon

The Bourgeois Gentlemen's peace plan rests on two assumptions. First, both the government and the Front prefer outright military victory. But since neither side is strong enough to win or weak enough to lose, continued pursuit of victory has become absurd and can result only in the destruction of Vietnam. Second, Vietnam, "a small country cowering on the frontier of the cold war," can survive only if it attains "equilibrium" vis-à-vis the two contending giants. The main features of the plan are as follows:

1. A month-long cease-fire agreement is signed by the two armies, the central political purpose being to test the good faith of each side. If the cease-fire should fail, then Vietnam had no chance in any case. The agreement would not demand the departure of northern NLF troops or the withdrawal of U.S. men and equipment, but it would ban arms shipments and troop movements on both sides.

2. The cease-fire freeze is guaranteed by the signatures of the generals who are actually directing the war, not by politicians. Thus it involves no political recognition — a subtle but important point. It means that the Front is encountered directly by Saigon, not through Hanoi, and that the Front is therefore granted the right to speak for itself. At the same time, there is no implication that Saigon legitimizes through "recognition" the Front's claim to a certain political status. That is, the cease-fire is made by the combatants, and it is incidental that this or that combatant may also be a member of the Front. The force of the agreement, of course, resides precisely in the fact that he is of the Front, that he does speak for it to Saigon, that Saigon hears (though its face is averted), and that everybody knows this.

3. The cease-fire is controlled during the one-month test period by a mixed commission of government and Front officers. The politics of this continues the thrust of point two—to be generous in realities where one is close-fisted in symbols.

4. The inevitable peace conference follows by a month the making of the cease-fire, which will be continued under the supervision of a strong International Control Commission. This conference must agree to the rapid formation of a strictly provisional and custodial government for the south. It will be made up of delegates from Hanoi and Saigon, who provide for the interests of the Front and the United States. The main business of this government and the ICC is to plan for and oversee general elections. The provisional gove ment must hold these electi within four or five months of formation. Sooner is too soon; la is too late.

5. The first election chooses a tional Assembly, either directly through an electoral college. T assembly's first job is to draft constitution that among otl things stipulates a method for ele ing a president. A presidential el tion is then held and the gove ment is established.

6. Saigon should even now forming "worthy cadres" who go to work with the people at onset of the settlement peri These cadres must be prepa with an ideology that transce Vietnam's Buddhist-Catholic, ru urban, and traditionalist-moder splits. Their program must basically Socialist, but it must detailed by the people themsel who alone are authoritative popular needs.

7. It is unrealistic to expect unwise to demand that Amer disappear overnight. Its interest Vietnamese neutrality — indepe ence of China — will show it prudence of supporting a Socia economic program first in south and then, after reunificat ("someday"), throughout Vietna And since no state can dema moral heroism of another, the V namese must not trifle with Am ica's insecurity. They must allo provisional American military p ence. Thus, Danang will remai U.S. base—a strategic position, one from which there will be m mal interference in Vietnam's ternal affairs.

What is claimed for plan is that it removes the two standing present obstacles to n tiations: if the United States go so far to accept the Front, Front can accept an American terest. If the United States can operate with genuine social cha aimed only at improving the qu ty of Vietnamese life, then Front can acknowledge a pr sional United States military p ence.

Who knows if others will such virtues in the plan? knows if others will even hea it? Shortly after these intervi Nguyen Cao Ky proclaimed " tralism" a capital crime against state. Was this only bluster?

ve the Bourgeois Gentlemen been nced? And if that has occurred, poses the toughest question of :

If Ky has now chosen to seal their e, has he not thereby moved to- rd sealing his own? And that of y following lackey Saigon re- ne? Not only from the Bourgeois ntlemen but from almost every- e we talked with in Saigon and ie, we got the following impres- n: The Front has never repre- nted a truly desirable solution for etnam. But neither has the government. In November of 1963, there was a moment of hope. But as coup upon coup condemned that hope, the wait-and-see loyalism of the anti-Communist middle and upper classes was forced to become a curiously apolitical neutralism which allowed one to speak only of peace. But coup still followed coup, each violent and peremptory change bringing with it a deeper reach of exasperated Americans into the structure of the southern government. For patriotic and proud Vietnamese, Ky is thus a national humiliation. The move has been from loyalism to neutralism, from Saigon to sitting on the fence that surrounds Saigon and divides that political ghetto from the rest of the country. Now that fence grows razor sharp, like bamboo spikes. What happens to the ex-loyalist neutralists when fence-sitting grows intolerable? As James Reston of The New York Times has at least been moved to wonder, will we win the war and lose the people? And what in the world could such a victory mean?

FTERMATH TO HARLEM RIOT

he Epton Anarchy Trial . . . . .

Frank J. Donner

prosecution under criminal anar- ny and riot statutes now pending the New York State Supreme ourt against William Epton, for citing the 1964 Harlem-Bedford- uyvesant riot, gives legal form to theory of individual responsibility r racial outbreaks in Northern ties. Epton is the Harlem-based ader of a super-militant, pro-Pe- ng splinter group, the Progressive abor Party.

The Watts riots of this year and ie seven riots of the summer of 964 have produced a gusher of xplanations for civil violence. hey range from environmental easons (chronic unemployment, ick of education) through psy- hological (status deprivation) to ersonal (mass crime in the streets, ubversion, conspiracy). Observers n the center and on the left of he political spectrum blame so- iety and social discontent for the utbreaks. Those on the right (both ear and extreme), along with nunicipal authorities, the police nd their apologists, absolve the ociety, praise local race relations nd point the finger at individual ulprits, desperate and evil men vho prey on their own people, or verzealous civil rights activists vho, it is claimed, inflame to the oint of violence a situation which hey themselves created.

Since all of last year's riots, as well as the Watts affair, were triggered by incidents involving the police, police brutality can hardly be ignored as at least a proximate cause of such outbreaks. But the police and their apologists trot out the same convenient scapegoat: subversion and conspiracy. The total misery of the Negro is discounted as a reason for the violence; individual plotters are blamed, and charges against the police treated not as legitimate grievances but as further proof of the criminal or subversive origin of the riot.

The best exposition of this thesis was offered by Mayor Yorty of Los Angeles in his explanation of the Watts riots:

> No problems existing here or allegations of police brutality can excuse the attacks of criminal elements upon the people of this city.
>
> Criminal elements have seized upon the false charge to try to excuse their lawlessness. It's the "big lie" technique. The cry of police brutality has been shouted in cities all over the world by Communists, dupes and the demagogues.
>
> Certainly Negroes in the South have been deprived of their rights and deprived of justice, but this provides no excuse for the criminal elements who terrorize their own people and indiscriminately and wantonly attack the citizens of our city.

The now almost forgotten 1964 riots in New York were no small rent in the fabric of public order. Violence broke out in Harlem on the night of July 18 in the aftermath of a demonstration against the slaying of a 15-year-old Negro boy, James Powell, by Police Lt. Thomas Gilligan. Thousands of Negroes raced through the center of Harlem, attacking white persons, pulling fire alarms, overturning cars and looting stores. Rioting on a reduced scale continued for five days thereafter, and on the third night it spread to Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant section—again, after a demonstration against "killer cops." The outbreak resulted in the death of a Negro by shooting, injuries to more than 100 persons (including thirty-five policemen), 185 arrests and several million dollars' worth of property damage.

---

Frank J. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitu- ional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Ameri- ans (Ballantine).

The riot quickly brought Mayor Wagner home from a sojourn in Europe, with promises to investigate police brutality, give sympathetic consideration to demands for a police civilian review board and, as a token of his good intentions, a summons to Martin Luther King, Jr., to parley with the embittered Negroes of New York about their demands for a curb on the police.

No action was taken at the time of the riots—or since then—to meet the grievances of New York's Negroes (complaints of police brutality are more numerous now than ever before). The action that did occur was the empaneling of a grand jury on August 3, 1964, to ascertain if there was criminal responsibility for the riot. The grand jurors—all of them quite affluent members of the white power structure—turned out to be enthusiastic believers in Yortyism. Two days after the grand jury was convened, it indicted Epton for criminal anarchy.

The indictment, though speedy, was not exactly a bolt from the blue. The Progressive Laborites had been denouncing the Harlem police for a long time prior to the riots and had been involved in a number of confrontations on the issue of police conduct in the Harlem ghetto. Indeed, ex-Police Commissioner Murphy, at the time of his resignation last May, bitterly complained to his intimates that he had gone undefended when he was given the racial tag "Bull Murphy" by the Epton-led group, which had sought to gain political support by exploiting the widespread ghetto bitterness over the conduct of the police.

However, the August 5 indictment did not mention that Epton and his group had made police racism a primary target. It alleged simply that, shortly before the riot began, Epton—in a twenty-minute speech (recorded by a red-squad agent in the audience) at a rally protesting the Powell killing—had advocated criminal anarchy: the violent overthrow of the "organized government" of the state of New York by killing its officials, especially its police. What Epton actually said is in doubt, because the tape is blurred at that point, but even if he urged an assault on the police, the law would find him guilty of a misdemeanor, not of a political crime. However, the thrust of the indictment is that the speech was a revolutionary incitement to anarchy which took the form of a harangue against the police. But the indictment did not specifically link the speech to the riot and was conceived of as a holding action pending a more comprehensive charge by the grand jury causally relating Epton's revolutionary politics, his "criminal anarchy" speech and the riot.

After a ten-month investigation (to which I shall return) the grand jury handed down a superseding indictment on June 6 of this year which refashions the case against Epton and makes his anti-Gilligan speech a detail in a vast subversive enterprise. It charges Epton individually with the advocacy not only of criminal anarchy ("the duty, necessity and propriety of overthrowing and overturning the organized government of the state of New York by assassination of the executive officials of the government and by force and violence") but of riot as well. But that isn't all. The advocacy of criminal anarchy and the Harlem rioting are each alleged to be the fruit of two connecting conspiracies, a large political conspiracy to advocate violent overthrow and a smaller one to riot.

Both conspiracies were allegedly furthered by six unindicted co-conspirators, five of whom (like Epton) are Negroes and involved with him in the Harlem Defense Council, an offshoot of the Progressive Labor Party. The sixth is a printer whose complicity rests on the fact that he reproduced a poster, widely circulated by the Progressive Laborites, describing Gilligan as "Wanted For Murder." This new legal howitzer threatens Epton with a jail term of seventeen years and $17,000 in fines.

The indictment is a forest of ideology and leaflets, with nary a sprig of action or preparation for action. No claim is made that either the defendant or his helpers committed even a simple behavioral offense against persons or property such as disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, assault or resisting arrest. At one point the indictment tantalizes us with the charge that the defe ant discussed the use of, and preparation of such a pamph
"Molotov cocktails." But for all know the defendant may have be opposed to their use and vetoed preparation of such a pamphl since none of the pamphlets a leaflets referred to in the ind ment relates to Molotov cocktails

The profligate use of the cons acy device (not one, but two c spiracies charged against a solit defendant) was designed to ma possible a conviction based on hi ly remote and hearsay evidence evidence not of plotting or parti pating in a riot but of engaging highly unpopular politics. Both individual and the conspir counts of the indictment raise gr questions of free speech, press a assembly. Most of the overt acts forth in support of the conspir counts, as well as the individ substantive charges against Ept involve only verbal attacks on police. The disturbing premise the entire indictment is that su attacks are steps in a criminal terprise.

The defendant and his associa are alleged, primarily through th anti-police agitation, to have in gated a multimillion-dollar ca and caused a death and scores injuries. This is Yortyism wit vengeance!

The zeal of the grand jury find a scapegoat for the riots o ran the available resources of New York penal law. The crimi anarchy statute, last used forty-f years ago against Benjamin Gitl was passed in 1902 in specific sponse to the justification by anarchist Johann Most of the ass sination of President McKinley. was aimed at violent anarchy a not at the Marxism which Epto party espouses. And the crime riot, a collective offense for wh liability may be imposed vicariou has fallen into disfavor because violates the principle that guilt personal. (Conspiracy also impo vicarious liability, and the ind ment charges the crime of cons acy to riot, a double form of vic ous liability, long ago judicially owned in New York State as a le monstrosity.) The almost arch portion of the riot statute deal with incitement to mob defiance constituted authorities, which invoked by the indictment agai on individually, has given way ler the pressures of a changing itical order to individual crimes h as resisting arrest and dis-erly conduct.

t hardly requires acute analysis recognize that reprisal played a e in the indictment. The law ich Epton and his associates lly violated is an unwritten one:
ticism of the police involves the k of a charge of law violation.
e law, after all, is the personal bience of the policeman, and his nmunity of interest with the secutive authorities stands him good stead when his own lawsness is under scrutiny. (The use the law as a shield for guilt is n most often in the charge of re-ing arrest brought against the tims of police brutality.)

n none of the riots, last year and s, has the need for police vindiion been as urgent as in New rk in the summer of 1964. Not y did the Gilligan tragedy ex-de the riots, but a long train of ice abuses against minorities had de a police civilian review board prime demand of civil rights ups. The Epton indictment con-niently confirms the thesis of the w York police that movements civil rights groups to check and cipline its behavior are a smoke een for revolution or extremism.
e conservative William Buckley, , was wildly applauded when, in speech this summer before a poe audience of 6,000 members of Holy Name Society, he dropped me consoling words about the abama State Troopers and conded: "Men who rail unthinking the police . . . tend to have a re-ionship with the revolutionaries." ly a short time later, Robert ses in a speech before the St.
orge's Guild also linked demands police reform to leftism.

In April of this year, ex-Commisner Murphy emphatically rejected nild compromise plan for a Civil-n Review Board proposed by the mmittee on Civil Rights of the w York County Lawyers Associa-
n. He explained that criticism of Police Department was confined a small and vocal segment of the mmunity." The Epton indictment, nded down after Murphy's resig-ion, was offered to the commu-y as his vindication.

The mood of the police and red squad for reprisal was revealed in the ten-month grand jury investigation which was used to destroy the Progressive Labor group without the formality of a trial.

From August, 1964, to June of this year about forty witnesses were summoned before the grand jury, most of them members of the Progressive Labor organization. The investigation relied heavily on informers and surveillance. The key witness to the alleged conspiracy is a police agent and provocateur planted in the ranks of the group. The red-squad head, Fritz Behr, was also apparently working undercover among the Progressive Laborites. Mail was opened, telephones tapped and dwellings bugged with wireless microphones. Homes of the group's functionaries were ransacked without warrant; FBI and red-squad agents tailed members of the group and tried to "break" them through hostile interrogation. Printers were discouraged from working on Progressive Labor publications; the partners of one printing firm were forced to surrender their business records to the grand jury and subjected to a grilling about their finances. One member of the group who lives in South Carolina was held in New York as a material witness. Lawyers for witnesses before the grand jury were smeared and intimidated.

The dawn or early morning service of subpoenas by red-squad agents was a routine abuse. One special police agent broke into the home of a young woman living by herself at 6:30 A.M. Subpoenas were also commonly served at the witness' place of work; a number of Progressive Labor Party members lost their jobs as a result. One witness, William McAdoo, was served four times at his place of work until he finally lost his job. McAdoo was served by seven plain-clothes men on one occasion; he was summoned before the grand jury six times in all. The police read his mail and riffled through his books, knocking over his 2-year-old daughter in the process. When the witnesses came to the grand jury room they were already thoroughly demoralized and in some cases terror stricken. The questioning frequently assumed a ranting and hectoring quality.

Witnesses were systematically questioned about the political affiliations of themselves and their associates, the obvious purpose being to compile dossiers on the Progressive Labor membership. For example, the first count of one contempt information is the refusal to answer the question, "Are you a member of the Progressive Labor Movement?" The second count is based on a refusal to identify the four employees of the witness' corporation. The third count is based on refusal to answer the question: "Who else do you know at the Harlem Defense Council?" The hunt for names was so pervasive that two members of the organization were served with subpoenas on a picket line by red-squad chief Fritz Behr, who recognized them as members from his prior undercover activities.

The refusal to answer questions seeking the identification of individuals resulted in contempt citations because the witnesses were invariably granted immunity and thus could not plead the privilege against

250' WINES AND LIQUORS 250
WINES AND LIQUORS
mosi

self-incrimination. The plea of the First Amendment was routinely ignored.

The grand jury became a high-production contempt factory. Of the forty witnesses called, some seventeen were cited for contempt; a number of them have already served contempt sentences. Four of the witnesses are young women, three of them students of CCNY. One of them, Eleanor Goldstein, was sentenced to two thirty-day jail terms —the second time to the oppressive Women's House of Detention (the judge explained that he was sending her there deliberately). Miss Goldstein was convicted of contempt for refusing to answer precisely the question for which she had originally served a contempt sentence. A number of other witnesses who served contempt sentences were warned that they might be recalled and again asked the same question. And the worst is not over: the grand jury's term has been extended, for the fourth time, to the end of this year.

The district attorney can proceed in a contempt case under judiciary law which provides f punishment of thirty days in and $250 fine or under the p law which permits sentences o to a year in jail and fines of $ In every case but four the dis attorney in this situation took more punitive course, despite fact that contempts are freque brought under the more len statute.

And when the harsh penal approach was used, the distric

(Continued on page 372)

Smut Hunters

THE NEW JURISPRUDERY . . . . Howard Junk

The days of book burning, alas, may be over. The new smut hunters, having learned that nothing incites the liberal, literate backlash like vigilante techniques, are now vigorously working by the side of the law. Moreover, Citizens for Decent Literature, Inc., the foremost independent (though predominately Roman Catholic) group of anti-dirty bookmen, insists that it deplores fanaticism and opposes censorship.

"Wild-eyed crusaders," warns CDL's Procedures Handbook, "fanatics, and zealots can destroy our public image, and do great harm to our cause. We are responsible citizens. . . ."

CDL does want to alert the public to the problem, but it also wants to stimulate the authorities to do their job, which is to arrest, prosecute and convict. CDL wants to muster nonflagrant support for the law. "We would have a resurgence of book burning," says CDL's Director of Public Relations, Thomas Blee, "the citizenry would be revulsed and bluenose groups would rise again, if there were no organizations like CDL fighting pornography."

Shortly after this not too preposterous statement, made to me at the fourth biannual CDL convention held October 22-23 at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, Blee showed me a small sampling of smut CDL had assembled and was keeping under padlock in a room adjoining CDL's press room. First, Blee demonstrated a nudist magazine, carefully leafing through the pages so that I could get a good look at the problem we're up against. Then Blee went through two cardboard boxes full of paperbacks, pointing out the somewhat old-fashioned (by today's standards) promiscuity titles as well as the more hip Lesbian, homosexual, fetishistic and so on kind of books. Included in the collection was the 1964 yearbook, Keyhole, from the Ben Davis High School, which contained a snapshot of a group of boys reading Playboy with obvious pleasure. And there was one paperbook, Youth Against Obscenity, which bore this blurb on the cover:

> In the crowded auditorium they preached and screamed about obscenity in magazines, but on secluded beaches and private bedrooms they enjoyed their sex in about every imaginable way. . . .

As we left the camera segreta to return to the convention proper, Blee said to an associate: "Keep your eye on the room." And as we walked to the elevator, Blee explained that it is essential to screen people who want to join CDL. Preferably, "they should be at least 25, with a family and with church affiliations. People who can handle such material over an extended period without being adversely affected."

Blee, who is amazed at the filth in Playboy whenever he reads it, which is regularly, is no prude. He is a 35-year-old adman in Fort Wayne, the father of four, clean-cut and forthright. Nor is Charles H. Keating, Jr., a Cincinnati yer who founded CDL in 1 conspicuously strait-laced. Kea has been a fighter pilot—"wi flip of the switch I could tri death from six 50's in the w —has a handsome wife and children, including two high-sc daughters who dined at The Seasons on the Friday night of convention. While talking with ("I'm too busy with other thing tilt lances with anyone") he "crap" once and once referre a bevy of CDL-letter-writing as "quail." Blee, Keating and rest of CDL resent the implica that they regard the examina of pornography as anything than a painful duty. Such an plication, said Keating, appe in The Nation's story of Ju ("The Anonymous Smut Hunt by Norman Mark) which quot national magazine publisher's servation of the audience at a film: "hundreds of little old l in gym shoes have gotten their sexual kicks in years from film." In no uncertain, though printable, terms, Keating and CDLers assured me that they rived no personal gratification viewing Pages of Death.

At the convention I saw Pr Poison, which cost about $4 to produce and contains a len though rapid, montage of lurid terial, with black masks on faces and genitals—for the pr tion of the performers, claime CDLer, explaining that m especially nudists, do not al know what they are posing

---

Howard Junker is a free-lance writer.

Printed Poison chronicles the tri-nph of a good citizen who is not fraid of treading on the golden lf of free speech," and who is fficiently aroused by the menace pornography to go to the police. supine officer tells him, "I can't lp you, my hands are tied. You t the D.A. to prosecute, then we n make an arrest." The D.A. is t moved either, but one of his sistants is. So carefully plotted, epared and procedurely correct tion is begun, culminating in ar-st, prosecution and conviction. nd the moral: "none of this would ve been possible if you hadn't ken the first step."

That is the basic premise CDL: prosecutors would prose-te, judges would convict, if they lt the public were behind them. eanwhile, our youth are being rrupted—about 70 per cent of all rno, says CDL, finds its way to e hands of youth. Crimes def-itely caused by porno are being mmitted. Most of the nineteen reat civilizations the world has nown have crumbled not under tack from without but from moral ry rot within. The fight, then, is atriotic. It is also, of course, moral nd in the interest of human dig-ity, for God, for America, for other, sister and daughter. More-ver, the laws are on the books.

The bastion of decency is the upreme Court's ruling in Roth 1957). Roth said that obscenity not protected by the First Amend-ent (freedom of speech) because is "utterly without redeeming so-al importance." The test of ob-enity, wrote Justice Brennan, is whether to the average person, ap-lying contemporary community andards, the dominant theme of e material taken as a whole ap-eals to the prurient interests."

Though CDL would like to see e "redeeming social importance" ophole plugged, and retired Navy aplain and California State As-mblyman E. Richard Barnes, who ddressed the convention, has un-ccessfully tried to push through gislation to that effect, and al-ough CDL feels that "community andards" are to be construed by e individual smut patrol, CDL is vesting its greatest energy at resent in an attempt to extend e power of obscenity laws by re-uiring jury trials in all cases.

At present in New York, for ex-mple, as King's County Assistant District Attorney Joseph Meglio explained to me at the convention, selling obscenity is a misdemeanor, liable to trial only before a judge, who is usually "pseudo-sophisticated." (In other states, defendants in obscenity cases simply waive their right to trial by jury.) As Reader's Digest staffer O. K. Armstrong, who addressed the convention, wrote in the September Digest:

> The criminal court, with jury, is the forum that assures the greatest chance of success, for the 12-person jury, drawn from the local community, can best assess offending materials on the basis of known "community standards."

A number of CDL delegates managed to widen their horizons at some point during the weekend by touring 42nd Street. And on Friday night, in a slot in the program titled, "The Way to Victory: A Panel Audience Discussion" — which I walked out of a moment too soon — a great debate broke out between the tourists and the townies over local effort to clean up the filth. According to the Rev. Morton A. Hill, S.J., head of Operation Yorkville, a New York City anti-obscenity group—none of the visitors I asked would tell me the story —the locals were accused of being lax in their efforts to arrest, prosecute and convict. What Cincinnati fails to understand, said Father Hill, is the "liberal climate" in New York. As Father Hill sees it, the forces for pornography, spearheaded by the American Civil Liberties Union, vastly outclass the forces for good. And though Father Hill admits that he is not as concerned with 42nd Street as he is with rooting porno "from the candy store and the corner store where our kids are going in and out," he feels that President Keating and the others underestimate the ACLU and overestimate the power of private citizens. In short, the educational and public relations battle must be won, before the legal one is begun.

As a parting shot, Father Hill told me of being blackballed at an ACLU-organized, Board of Education-sponsored course on the Bill of Rights, offered to city teachers for credit. Father Hill claimed that "the champion of freedom of expression," the ACLU, had refused to allow dissent in its course.

Aryeh Neier, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, tells the story a little differently. Father Hill was granted permission to attend an occasional class in the course, which was not open to the public, on the condition that he remain silent. But Father Hill arrived in the middle of one class, which was not the first session, did interrupt, did begin a discussion and left when he had finished his statement.

